The first of these classes is composed of a small number, and the latter of millions; but the difference, which appears so great at first consideration, becomes overwhelmingly greater, when years and calm criticism sifts again the winnowed grain; and all those who have been admitted among them, but not of them, who have appeared to be the children of light, by reflecting the light of others, have been returned to their baser kindred; when the chance elevation of fashion, or the partial nature of some quality which had supported them in the esteem of an age, or the sympathies of one class, has failed to be understood; or when the vanity of those who have endeavoured to take the place of their superiors has been disclosed by time. The seats in the Temple of Fame have always been few, and they must continue so. The capacity of learning, and the power of classification and comprehension in the human mind increase as the objects whereon to exercise these faculties multiply. Distinctions, which were technical, fade away; and differences, in degree, become less discernible, while we generalize on the results, and enter the wider sphere of accumulated knowledge: “looking before and after,” national, and theoretical, and artificial relations of all kinds are lost sight of, and the poets of any age or phase of social order become amalgamated under one common head. The models of poetic composition possessed by the ancients, were few and simple in their object as well as in their style. Their hierarchy of poets contained few other than fabulous thrones. Apollo himself, and Orpheus, who charmed the rocks and the wild animals with his art, and Dædalus, the plastic artist, were seated beside the more authentic persons of Hesiod and Homer. The lyric poets and the dramatists follow these; but wherever there was reverence there was fable with the natives of Attica; and the history of the death of Æschylus is only as dubious as that of the inventor of wings. All these were widely distinct, and the patron gods of their various compositions. But now, the whole coincides in a few broad characteristics, and the poetry of the Greeks is reducible, in its spirit as well as its form and machinery, to a unity in our complicated criticism. Society has become nearly three thousand years older since then; a new spirit animates all pursuits; new purposes, and combinations of purposes, have come into operation, and developed themselves in forms as varied and as complex. Every nation of our quarter of the globe has added to the number of inventors; and the exigencies of every age, the collision of new creeds with old, and of philosophy with both, have modified poetry both in its essence and in its more obvious features. But, notwithstanding all this,

we attribute the highest genius to a number not exceeding that of the choir of the earliest age of poetry. Some have made a higher selection than even that, and raised Homer, Dante, and Shakespeare, into a trilogy unapproachable; the only immortals, through a vast cycle of years to come, when the lesser varieties and temporary heroes shall have become forgotten or extinguished. They are representatives of generic, not specific, existence.

This separation, by intellectual capacity, is an unpleasant one. There are few who are ready to acknowledge themselves more fitted to enjoy, or to understand, than to invent; and the vast extension of education, and the means of improving taste, has converted readers into writers. The number of poets thus squandered on the world has been tremendous—prose had no charms for the majority—poetry was the vehicle which all resorted to; and the quantity of verse, written and printed, has been such as to make all works written in verse comparatively disregarded. Every member of the present Administration has been in his time poetic; and, for aught we know, every member of the bench of Bishops besides: the fashionable portrait painter (Sir T. Lawrence) was found to carry his MS. books of poems in his pocket; and the fashionable quack to improvise. Ladies agreed that writing verse was a necessary accomplishment; and of all men, they were also agreed, the most loveable were the poets. When poetry was thus in the zenith of admiration, both in the persons of its professors, and from its novelty, every one was ambitious of being akin to those who occupied so much attention. But those, also, were the creatures of the great impulse which brought so many into light; and the advancement both in art and taste, since the magazine poetry of half a century ago was tolerated, is an evidence of a new life having been infused from some worthier alma mater than fashion. The reaction which has followed has been the result of that overstrained and universal attention and emulation in the public, and of that high-wrought manner which was necessary to keep up that attention for so long a time.

The present equivocal condition of poetical composition, has also another cause. The Reflective poets, who placed themselves apart from the stream of popular excitement, becoming gradually more studied as criticism regains its equanimity, have created a second order of imitators. Before considering these authors and their several influences, it will be, in a great degree, advantageous to trace the expansion and change which successive centuries have evolved in the nature of English poetry. Poetry, as an art, may be said to have for its object the fitting and true expression of the passions and thoughts. The passions and thoughts of the human animal, then, in their phases, should possess a corresponding poetic vehicle; and it becomes a question, whether there ought to be such things as standards by which to judge of the propriety or impropriety of innovations, or in what degree it is an art established by, and referable to, fixed principles and ancient precedents. The refined condition of the physical, and the reflective condition of the intellectual, nature displayed in the present art, has little in common with the simple animal of an early period. From our being subject to external things, they have become subject to us. First, we have a picture of half-clad tribes invading or repelling tribes of a different tongue; the remains of the rectilinear fabrics and fortifications of the Roman conquerors, decaying before the hurried and grotesque inventions wherewith necessity supplies their place; a contented and enervated race receding from the shore, bearing with them their triad verse, and their unimprovable harp, before the landing of the northern foreigners, whose vinum demonum is poured out in a war-chant. By and by, grades and orders of men become fixed. The serf belongs to the soil, and the soil to his lord; more than bodily wants are felt; and religion, having also gained a firm organic condition, (that is to say, the Christian faith putting down all others, and, by constituting itself the crown and the head of social order, placing its affirmative on the feudal system,) the scene becomes infinitely varied. Festivals, dress, warfare, houses, decorations—everything becomes composite. A hundred different nations retaining wrecks of their distinctive characteristics, are amalgamated by the Christian and aristocratic principles of union and subjugation. Rome is changed, from a mere military task-master of savage nations laying claim alike to mountain and stream, to a vital law-giver. "The banners, the crosses of various composition, the cups, the shrines, the canopies, the capes, the cowls, the croziers, the mitres, whose forms are met with in the Gothic, preserved the symbols of the worship, at the same time that they produced unexpected effects of art." The regal, the knightly, the magisterial, the guild brethren, the peasantry; the secular clergy, the religious of all fraternities and degrees; penitents, pardoners, or bishops, presented equal diversity in their costumes and pursuits. The arts also shared in the novelties of the time; and romance presents us, like the architecture of the middle ages, with a style of composition almost without law or rule. This period, by its very nature, was one of transition. The monarchical principle is an imposition; and there is inherent in the human mind a certain self-reliance, understood both by the judgment, and more ultimately by the imagination, which must throw off dominations, and continue changing all laws but those of nature. Habit is a second nature; but still it is very secondary, and the primary power is always rebelling against it.

In Chaucer, James I., Lydgate, &c., the study of models in composition again arose. Writings began to be adapted to certain sorts of readers; and not long afterwards, the Reformation, addressing the reason of men, (which, be it recollected, was never before, in the history of the world, popularly addressed,) seems to discover the land which the previous generations had wistfully circumnavigated.

Thenceforward the known was carefully divided and separated from the unknown. The genius of the Reformation was, in a great degree, negation; while that of the old system had been a liberal affirmation. All things were now doubted but such as were proved: the onus probandi lay on him who asserted; formerly it rested with him who denied.

Rules were everywhere laid down. This, it is evident, was a great good, and one of the most important in history; but poetry was not capable of sharing in the benefit. It could not be reduced to rule, otherwise than rhetorically. Authorities cannot either move the feelings or convince the reason. The grand constellation of dramatists were free men standing on the isthmus between the new, and the old, and independent of both.

This period has now elapsed. The Reformation, by addressing itself to the logical faculty as its arbiter, has proved more than its own master. For a short time, the Horatian code contained the laws, without appeal, which governed poetry. But this could not continue: we had more to say than these laws allowed us the liberty of uttering; and it was evidently no crime to break laws whose use was long gone by, as it can be no evil to omit daily ablutions of the elbows in this country, though in Arabia such observance may prevent disease. We have all sorts of philosophy, speculative and experimental; schools of criticism, eclectic and æsthetic;* and schools of poetry manifold; and poets

Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks
In Vallombrosa.

With the principal of these the reader is, doubtless, well acquainted. The last thirty years have seen much heartburning and party spirit displayed by their partisans. In another place, it will be proper to consider how much the various great poets we have had, deserve to be considered diverse, and how much they are the same. Some have prefaced their poems by theories; others have only tried to please and to beguile the hour. One has said—"What can you make of a man who will write by system?" and yet the questioner himself did so, as much as he of whom the question was asked. This "writing by a system" is the characteristic of all alike.

From this plentiful harvest our granaries are now filled; nor has the grain been yet winnowed—the chaff separated from the wheat. This has not been done, partly from the difficulty of judging of the objects in close juxtaposition to which we stand, and partly because the politics of the day have caused parties and party feeling, which has but lately subsided. Reform, and the measures preceding it, have, in some degree, shifted the relation of state parties, and the virulence has subsided sufficiently to let us consider the literary doings apart alike from the political or the fashionable; while a quarter of a century, although short time in speaking of an immortality, may afford time to judge of the likelihood of its attainment. The voices of these gifted spirits are now, however, for the most part, stilled. Young poets springing up, (and there are many,) may find themselves, as it were, heirs to the title without the inheritance; and this, too, when the number of critics, more properly entitled to the appellation, is increasing; and the number of poetical aspirants, worthy to be

* In using these words while speaking of English criticism, readers of German may perhaps complain that they are made to mean something different from what they signify in the literature of that country. They are only used for want of others more correct, or more properly antithetical.

such, increasing likewise. That the audience is really so few as it has been repeatedly said to be, is, however, by no means so certain; as there have been such things as second editions of books of poetry, by names unknown, but a few years ago. But that the public attention is less directed to the poetic art than to any other, and to poetry than to any other literary product, is undoubtedly the case. It may also be granted that, if Southey, Moore, or Wordsworth, (as the volume published a few years ago, by the last of these, proved,) were this day to add to their works something even greater than they have yet published, they would meet with little increase of fame by doing so. The author of "Lalla Rookh" might repeat his own verse:—

Better far to be
In utter darkness lying;
Than to be blessed with light, and see
That light for ever flying.
All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the fleetest;
All that's sweet was made
But to be lost when sweetest.

This result would follow, because the public mind is made up regarding the merits of these; and this being so, additional quantity of writings would be useless. And all of them being in the highest degree mannered, i. e. drawing from their own resources alone, the pleasure which the reader might expect would be only a repetition of what he has already experienced. Several, indeed, it is said, have poems in manuscript, which they decline to publish; and Melpomene alone is worshipped by those who desire the honours of the muses. Novelty may now be more easily attained in the drama; and it is this desire of novelty, and the vast number of those who aspire to satisfy it, that are the greatest evils under which we labour. What appearance does the present state of the poetic public, both reading and writing, present? The most heterogeneous that can be imagined. As might be expected, after the advent of so many great and original minds, the whole is an imitation of certain peculiarities. The rising, or rather the risen generation, has been reared in admiration of our late promulgators of new poesies; and thus our young poets want the freedom of those who wrote in a period of excited hope and actual revolution. The shadow of reverence falls upon us as well as the shelter; while our ears are so filled with their melody, that we cannot listen to the multitudinous sea or to the beating of our own hearts. Thus it is with the writers: the readers, on the other hand, have been gorged; the feast has been spread with such lavish luxury, that they cannot so soon renew their appetite.

There has been much talk of Utilitarianism being the cause of this; but if so, how comes it there are so many writers? It might be expected that utilitarianism would have produced a lack of the producing as well as of the consuming party. But is this the case? Certainly it is the contrary; and instead of this age being antipoetical, if we take the quantity written as evidence, it is the most poetic in the history of literature. The economy which is spreading over all pursuits, and reducing them to democratic comprehension, and the practical and labour-saving character which is creeping over our arts, have already planted laurels, not rooted them up; and one of the most remarkable men that the age has seen has been produced by them. Ebenezer Elliott is a phenomenon not to be mentioned altogether without wonder. His soul seems to be possessed of physical passions like the body, and his poetry is like its writhing under their torture. He has been saved from the evil already mentioned as destroying originality in our younger poets, by being comparatively apart from the business of criticism; and so it is probable little an admirer of such as Shelley, Coleridge, Wordsworth, who are to be expounded and analysed. But, although the genius of Elliott must be acknowledged, and its qualities pointed out as at once the production and the embodiment of the indomitable thirst for political as well as for all other reasoning, he has little connexion with, or influence on, the state of poetry and the other writers of verse. He stands apart; and the value of his poetry is its passion,—its sincerity, in connexion with a particular object. He uses verse as the inventors of rhyme intended it to be used, and has much of the prophet in his strong and vital language. It falls upon its prey with crushing effect, like the axe on the forehead of the tethered heifer. He uses verse as the Druids did, who taught their whole cosmogony, history, and ethics, in metres; or as the writers of the Twelve Tables, which continued to be recited in the Etrurian dialect in Cicero's time; but still it is merely for the emphasis and other external qualities of verse that he employs it. But whenever a man speaks from the heart, and describes adequately the throes which he himself has felt and survived, whether he aspires to the name of poet or not, he certainly is one, and among the greatest. We sympathize with the suffering animal, and rejoice with his pride in having overcome, or his trust in the power to overcome; and as he communicates itself to all around, sincerity draws us to it and bends us to its own likeness. Many there are who consider poetry as properly only the language of passion: to those Elliott must be greater still. The definition which we have already given of poetry as an art—that it is the fittest and truest expression of passion and thought—involves this condition: that the expression be not excessive for the occasion, as well as that it be not inadequate; that the thought should keep pace with the passion, and have it ever under its direction.

That it is utilitarianism which causes the neglect of poetry, has, however, been abundantly asserted. In the preface to a publication by Mr. D'Israeli the younger, who says of himself elsewhere—

Amid the passions of a struggling world,
On me descends the spirit of great song,

he thus describes his style:—"I have already ventured to express my opinion that the age of versification has passed. The mode of composition must ever be greatly determined by the manner in which it can be made public. In ancient days the voice was the medium by which we became acquainted with the inventions of a poet. He caught a suggestion from his sister art, and invented metre.

And in this modulation he introduced a new system of phraseology, which marked him out from the crowd, and which has obtained the title of poetic diction.

"His object, in this system of words, was to heighten his meaning by strange phrases and unusual constructions. Inversion was invented to clothe a commonplace with an air of novelty. Were his meaning to be enforced, he shrank from wearisome ratiocination and the agony of precise conceptions, and sought refuge in a bold personification or a beautiful similitude. And this mode of communicating poetic invention still remained when the advanced civilisation of man, by multiplying manuscripts, might have made many suspect that the time had arrived when the poet was to cease to sing and to learn to write. Had the splendid refinement of Imperial Rome not been doomed to such rapid decay, and such mortifying and degrading vicissitudes, I believe that versification would have worn out. Unquestionably, that empire, in its multifarious population, scenery, creeds, and customs, offered the richest materials for emancipated fiction; materials, however, far too vast and various for the limited capacity of metrical celebration.

"That beneficent Omnipotence, before which we must all bow down, has so ordered it that Imitation should be the mental feature of modern Europe; and has ordained that we should adopt a Syrian religion, a Grecian literature, and a Roman law. At the revival of letters, we behold the portentous spectacle of national poets communicating their inventions in an exotic form. Conscious of the confined nature of their method, yet unable to extricate themselves from its fatal ties, they sought variety in increasing artifice of diction, and substituted for the melody of the lyre the barbaric clash of rhyme.

"While I have endeavoured to effect my own emancipation from the trammels of the old style, I do not flatter myself for a moment that the new one which I offer combined those rare qualities which I anticipated may be the ultimate result of this revolution. But, such as it is, it stands on its own merits, and may lead abler men to achieve abler consequences."

Although this facile writer, on whom, by his own confession, "has descended the spirit of great song," thus turns his back on his calling, he has employed rhythm, and even rhyme in the prose of his romance, and the reader cannot at first understand what occasions the cranks and jerks which disagreeably interrupt his progress. This vagary is one of those inventions which shows us part of an important truth, with much that is as false as partial consideration and a paramount desire of novelty can make it. True it is, that what is the poetry of one age cannot be the poetry of another without modification; that is to say, it cannot connect itself with the affections by the ties which are strongest, if those ties be such generalities as avoid all peculiarity of circumstance. But this is not concerning rhythm or rhyme, the means of affording an accompaniment of pleasure, which it is the primary condition of all Art to afford; but it regards the machinery, the dramatic accessories and conditions under which the Emotions and Thoughts are evolved. That "poetic diction," which the above-mentioned author calls the art of uttering "natural feelings in unnatural language," ought to have been acknowledged by every one who has read Wordsworth (to go no farther for authority) as a mistake; and, since that great poet has written, an exploded one. The pleasure we have in the versification and style of Homer is as great as ever; the delight we have in recognising the human passions of his heroes is also as great as ever; but the interest we take in the situations of these actors, and in their pursuits and manners, is only the interest of antiquarianism. Wordsworth has said—"If the labours of men of science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions which we habitually receive, the poet will sleep then no more than at present, but he will be ready to follow the man of science, not only in those general indirect effects, but he will be at his side, carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of the science itself." This is admirably said; but it is limiting poetry even more than in his poetic writings themselves. Sensation is not the only province over which the muses rule; truth is to the reason what happiness is to the moral nature, and both are the ultimate objects of true poetry.

The author of "The Wondrous Tale" tells us that the age of versification is gone, while verses are showered upon the printing machine like snow flakes in a northern storm: he would tell us the stars were all out, while it was their very number that suggested them to his mind. The venerable bard of Rydal Mount, in the last volume he gave the world, has a set of verses made by selecting a few lines from each of three different authors, and printing them consecutively as a poem. Appended to this is a note, guarding himself by a caution to the public against imitating this patchwork, from being the originator of a new kind of composition. And this advice is given to a community that might fill the markets with hampers of the "original" article. Why so great a mind busied himself with such a triviality, is no question, as the gravest and greatest has his hour of relaxation; but that he should entertain this idea of its importance, is an instance how much the uncertain condition of verse, in the present day, has unsettled the critical discrimination even of the author of the "Lyrical Ballads" and "The Excursion." The gravity with which he considers this trifle jars unpleasantly with our faith in the expansiveness of the poetic creed which he propounded.

Must we then seriously consider poetry as of the past:—now that steam has superseded the thews and sinews of the horse, that the useful has supplanted the pleasurable? What then is the useful good for, if it be not for the greater accumulation of happiness? Indeed all the facilities of science must conduce to this end; and the arts, instead of being on the wane, are, and must be, acquiring new powers, and now fitting themselves for greater purposes than they have yet pursued. Bentham himself has given us his favourable opinion, and exclaims—"What infinite regions are open to the explorer in the pursuit of pleasurable thoughts! The world is all before him; and not this world only, but all the worlds that roll in the unmeasured tracts or the measureless heights of imagination." "Regulated and controlled by the Utilitarian principle, imagination becomes a source of boundless blessings." Has the accumulation of poetic compositions made it unnecessary to add to the stock already so rich in our language? If poems were definite somethings, to be judged of as we judge of the correctness of geometrical problems, then adding to their number would be an useless task; but infinite as human thought, and never-ceasing like the pulsation of the heart, must be the poetry that aspires to be the interpreter of our humanity.

Having premised these desultory observations on the multifarious nature of the poetic, and on the doubtful manner in which it is at present considered, we shall take a slight review of its history, and the changes through which it has passed, in consequence of national or social revolutions. Doing so will throw considerable light on its artificial nature as we approach nearer our own time, and on those theories which have lately revolutionized it, and which are more particularly the subject of these pages.

In glancing over the political and moral progress of a people in connexion with literature, the question is suggested to us, in what measure the author is the product and embodiment of his time; and in what measure, conversely, the time has responded to and been modified by his genius. When injudicious admirers praise any one who has not been so successful as they desire, they often say, "He was before his time." To say so, implies a want of governing power in the individual, and a want of judgment in applying for sympathy to an audience which was not in a state to sympathize. Each of the great masters in poetic or other literature, embodies and perpetuates for ever the social character of his time equally with the intellectual character of his life. "He is the combined product of such internal powers as modify the nature of others, and of such external influences as excite and sustain these powers: he is not one but both. Every man's mind is, in this respect, modified by all the objects of nature and art; by every word and every suggestion which has been ever admitted to act upon his consciousness; it is the mirror upon which all forms are reflected, in which they compose one form. Poets, not otherwise than philosophers, painters, sculptors, and musicians, are, in one sense, the creators, and, in another, the creations of their age. From this subjection, the loftiest do not escape. There is a similarity between Homer and Hesiod, between Æschylus and Euripides, between Virgil and Horace, between Dante and Petrarch, between Shakspeare and Fletcher, between Dryden and Pope."

It is forgetting this which perplexes the casual reader, and which has caused so much falsity in the canons of pedantic criticism. It is the want of keeping this connexion between the history and the art, ever present to the mind in looking upon the paintings of the various schools and ages, from that of Cimabue to Claude, that makes so many dilettante play such fantastic tricks before high heaven. On the resuscitation of painting, the character of the Catholic Church, its martyrs, its saints, its angels, in whose aid only it was employed for a long period, determined the severe style of its design, and the sombre nature of its colouring. They may be beyond all price as containing this spirit—as illustrating a moral nature common to all times, and the intellectual transition peculiar to the age, and yet be as unentitled to admiration now, or to be a model to-day, as the Coventry mysteries to be reproduced upon the stage.

There has been, undoubtedly, many great writers who have had little connexion with the passing time. These, however, have been such as attached themselves to investigations of some precise logical or theological nature. They have been more men of science than anything else, and in no case connected with art. Their works are such as were not necessarily in the vernacular tongue; and this circumstance, even when they may be in verse, disentitles them to all claim to consideration in tracing the stream of a national literature. The venerable Bede, for instance, has written much that was scarcely ever known to exist, and at first could only be addressed to a few foreign monks—monks educated in foreign letters. And this continues to be the case as long as Latin was the written language. William of Malmesbury, Michael Scott, Roger Bacon, and Mathew Paris, are names which we venerate without knowing much about, and cite at second-hand, with a sort of negative respect. But it is the spirit, and not the formalized productions of these times, which it is desirable we investigate. The poetry of those days was acted more than uttered; it was the everyday routine of a life spent in vivid contrast of passions, hair-breadth 'scapes, and desperate accidents, or in the seclusion of a rude domestic or monastic contentment. The exercise of the imagination was listening to the old warrior from the holy sepulchre, or the pilgrim with the scallop-shell of St. John of Compostella on his hat, who had as many tales to tell as there were angels in the good host's coffer. Fancy employed itself in material, not in mimetic creations; and fen and fell were peopled with the pixies and fairy-folk: its spectacles were not tinsel and pasteboard behind the stage-lamp, but the proud display of rival wealth and rival power in joust and tournament, before kings and ladies raining influence and inciting to achievement. The knightly accomplishments were all learned in the field; and the only superiority was in greater dexterity or greater courage: the rest was left to the monks, who were the only clerks then known. King Arthur thus addresses the knight in the Boke of Sir Tristrem:—"For all manners of hunting thou bearest the prize; and of all measures of blowing thou art the beginner; and of all the terms of hunting and hawking thou art the beginner." The knight of chivalry was also to be endowed with personal beauty, to dance and ride gracefully, and to be skilled in music : and, in Provence, this included the composition of songs. Those so well accomplished in chivalrous refinement, were not, however, much known, it is to be feared, in Britain ; and the feat of casting a lance in the air, and catching it again by the hand three times, as performed by a knight on the field of Hastings, would be more admired by his Norman brethren, than any finding of rhymes, or sweet singing of love ditties, would have been. The knighthood of chivalry is now entirely gone. We have no institution that at all resembles it, as then acquired by preliminary service in the degrees of page and esquire, and entailing moral as well as political obligation. The prince even was here an aspirant ; and knighthood and holy orders were small intermediate and connecting links between the ruling and the labouring classes. There were no ethics, no divinity in those days ; and the "Gesta Romanorum" present a curious picture of the eloquence of the pulpit. The pardoner went his rounds, and the uneasy conscience was soothed by him as the case demanded. The penance was duly performed ; the craftsman leaving his stall, and betaking himself across the country with great faith, and feet well shod for the journey, to kiss St. Bartholomew's thumb. Monks and friars, gray, black, and white, mixing with the people (it may be much after the fashion of the "Frieres of Berwick," whom Dunbar has celebrated,) varied the social aspect of the time, and added to its picturesque. The sumptuousness of the times, too, was shown in much parade. Archbishop Becket, when he travelled, was followed by all the carriages which he could command : two of these were appropriated to the conveyance of his liquors ; but a horse could carry all the books he needed.

I found on a freiture a frier on a benche,
A great churl and a grim, grown as a tonne,
With a face so fat as a ful bledder,
Blown bretful of breathe, and as a bag hanged
On both his cheekes, and his chin with a challede
So grete as a goose eye, grown all of grece,
That all wagged his flesh, as a quick mire.*

But such as this was only a variorum specimen. All the devotion of the enthusiast, doubtless, occupied and made vocal with prayers many a cloister ; and the rigid emblazon of the Mater Dolorosa, received the tears of many a penitent ; although none of that time thought of weaving the scene into a drama, like Margaret's prayer in Faust ; and many an aged monk breathed his soul away in the contention between fear and hope, though the paucity of information caused him, as Bishop Percy observes, to remain "utterly unacquainted even with whatever related to the Mahometan nations, and to represent them as worshipping idols, or adoring a golden statue of Mahomet."

Everything was vital and active, nothing reflective and systematic. The compositions which then represented poetry were of two kinds ; the Romance and the Ballad. The first of these was the elder, and common to the western nations of Europe ; the latter was the more popular, and sprang up and decayed on the spot. Both of them are, as might have been expected, narrative ; and the populace collected in the market-place, listening to some "blind crowder" reciting "Chevy Chase," felt all the fire of feudal enmity stirred up within them. The characters, the scenes, were familiar. The badge of servitude might be on the shoulder of the minstrel, whose mode of recital strongly showed the character of the age. It was not enough that he related his verses : he was to sing them, and accompany his music with antics and gesticulations, as the passage dictated. The poetry was fully more in his delivery than in his words—a striking and stirring impression was to be communicated, and this was to be done by an excitement of the kind understood by the audience. Toil and hardihood were the masters of all who hearkened to him, and the sympathies were to be appealed to in a manner strong enough to obviate these numbing evils. The shows at Tourney, or Saints' Day, were made to charm the eye and ear ; and the minstrel found it necessary to unite mimicry and jonglery with his rhymes, to command attention. But the action and the musical accompaniment, it is difficult now to criticise, or take into consideration, in connexion with what remains—the rhymes. These are, in themselves, sufficiently interwoven with the interests of those for whom they were composed. The Border raid, or the freebooter's hiding-place in the deep wood,

Where leaves were sharp and long, was most frequently the scene ; or a more courtly strain admitted us to the ladies' bower or the lofty hall,

Where many a lady there was set,
In purple and in pall.

But how would the franklin and the hinda, or the artificers of those generations, the maker of bolts and bows, the lorimers, the croakers, and the armourers, be rejoiced by such ditties as Johnnie Armstrong, Kinmont Willie, or William of Cloude-sly. The latter is an ancient and perfect ballad, and very well illustrates the nature of the composition, and its adaptation to its audience. To imitate the historic ballad is now only an affectation of the curious ; although the narrative ballads of Allan Cunningham, Hogg, and Sir Walter Scott still interest ; although we have no prejudices for or against the heroes—no music, no mimes. The ballad of William of Cloude-sly begins by describing the three friends as being outlawed for venison—and William as unable to resist the wish to see his wife again. He comes to her window at night :—

"Where be thou, fair Alice," he said ;
"My wife and children three !
Lightly let in thine own husband,
William of Cloude-sly."

"Alas !" then said fair Alice,
And sigh'd wondrous sore,
"This place hath been beset for you
This half-a-year and more."

"Now I am here," said Cloude-sly,
"I would that in I were ;
Now fetch me meat and drink enough
And let us make good cheer."

* "The Credo of Piers Plowman."

She fetched him meat and drink plenty,
Like a true wedded wife ;
And pleas'd him with what she had,
Whom she loved as her life.

All this speaks to the heart ; and man and boy, matron and maid, bless the minstrel for calling up to their minds those domestic gods which we, as a nation, esteem, or did esteem, so much. The ballad goes on to narrate his capture, and the intelligence being conveyed to his brethren, and the rescue which they bring. The interest increases as it advances ; and to the end, which is a happy one, it continues to address itself to the self-interest of its auditory.

Thus endeth the lives of these good yeomen,
God send them eternal bliss ;
And all that with a hand-bow shooteth,
That of heaven may never miss.—Amen.

The Romance was for a higher class. The noble youth sat in the red, and azure, and green light of the painted window, with the illuminated book on his knee. "The Mort d'Arthur," it might be, or "Amadis de Gaul," or "Sir Lancelot du Lac," as has been told in the nobler fiction of Dante, the stern poet of Christian mythos,—retributive curse and benediction ; when their swimming and wildered eyes met, and "that day they read no more."

The adage so often quoted, although said by a wise man, "Let me make the ballads, and who will may make the laws," was an extravagant appreciation of the popular influence of those compositions. But their influence must have been very great. They alone were native productions ; and bear on their style and subject undeniable evidences of the truth of their descriptions and the sincerity of their sentiments. The domineering and tyranny of a Norman nobility over a Saxon husbandry were resisted year by year, and age by age. Robin Hood, and other heroes of a like stamp, were household gods around the joyous hearths of Old England. The stubborn impatience, and the quick forgiveness when the fight is done, which, down to our own times, has both secured our independence, and facilitated our being hoodwinked, to take our chance for good things, like ducking for apples at All-Hallow Eve, is everywhere visible. The Scottish ballads were distinguished from these, as the national character is distinguished from the English ; and the Jacobite relics show us all the inveterate prejudices and deathless feelings to which the Highland feuds bear ample testimony. Romance was a melange, and ours came from the French : besides the whole of the romances of any note may be numbered ; but the ballads were innumerable. They were the product of the men who sung them, and related what all the audience knew something of before.

The romance was filled with knightly courtesy and deeds of high emprise. It was a tissue of travels and feats ; and its machinery was composed of all that could be invented of gorgeous, or gleaned from Moriscan tale, northern tradition, or classic poem, heightened in colour and garnished with the chivalry of the age. Much has been said regarding its origin, and much regarding the origin of the Gothic architecture. Enough, for the present purpose, that both were the productions of that era : the one a grand invention of grotesque form and appropriate sculpture ; the other an imaginative divertisement, suited to the age when the hawker repeated to himself this prescribed formula, (the purpose or sense of which it seems impossible to guess,) if the valued bird was hurt by the heron, "The lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, has conquered : Hallelujah !" when the stern knight swore by the gay peacock ; when luxury showed itself by dressing in cloth of gold ; when the ladies a-hunting went on

"Jennettes of Spain, that ben so white, Trapp'd to the ground with silver bright ;"

and the desires of all were directed to the East, to the holy sepulchre on Mount Calvary, the scene of contention and zealotry for centuries.

There was also another kind of poetic creation which must be noticed—the Mystery. "The papal hierarchy, from accident, fanaticism, or policy, pursued too often a spurious plan of forcing mankind to become technical automatons of rites and dreams, words and superstitions, and supporting a system which, if not originally framed, was at least applied to enforce a long-continued exertion of transferring the world into the hands of ecclesiastics, and too often superseding the Christianity of the Gospel by that of tradition, policy, half-delirious bigotry, and unenlightened enthusiasm."* Part of that plan was the exhibition, on stages erected on the street, of certain persons and incidents in the Bible history. "Every burgher company had his pageante or parte ; which pageantes were a high scaffold with two rooms—a higher and a lower—upon four wheels. In the lower, they apparelled themselves ; in the higher room, they played, being all open on the top, that all beholders might see them (!) The places where they played them was in every streete. They began first at the abbey gates, and when the pageant was played, it was wheeled to the high cross before the mayor, and so to every street, so that every street had a pageante playing before them, till all the pageants for the day appointed were played ; and, when one pageante was near ended, worde was brought, from street to street, that so they might come in place thereof, exceeding orderly, and all the streets had their pageant afore them, all at one time playing together ; to see which plays was greate resort."†

It has been said the Calabrian peasant looks upon the pictures of the Virgin with a human love ; it is difficult to imagine with what feelings our ancestors witnessed those exhibitions, relating as they often did, to the miraculous birth—

O, sanctissima,
O, purissima,
Dulcis Virgo Maria,

how wert thou then outraged ! Chateaubriand says—"Language was then stark naked." The persons of the Trinity and the Mater Dei might be also said to have been stark naked. It was necessary to engage the senses in that barbaric state of religion. Materialism was the only condition of being the period could apprehend; and their teachers, the monks, were more inclined to bring the faith down to that standard, than to endeavour to raise the people to a spiritual knowledge. These shows were announced from the pulpits by the preachers; and frequently an abbot or a bishop presided at them with the crosier in his hand, though the entertainment might conclude with fights, baitings, jousts, wrestling, dancing, and racing. Clement the Sixth granted a thousand years' indulgence to those who should attend the series of sacred dramas at Chester. Such performances were for the commonalty what tournaments were for the nobles. But, besides these shows, the middle ages observed a much greater number of solemnities than modern times: genuine enjoyments are everywhere the offspring of national creeds. "Revolution has not had the power to create a single durable festival; and if there are still popular holidays, in spite of incredulity, they all belong to the old Christianity: mankind do not attach themselves strongly to any pleasures but such as are at once recollections and hopes."

In the midst of all this, what is called the revival of letters took place. Arts began to be cultivated in Italy. A greater dissemination of classics took place. Books addressed to select readers and to the learned began to be written in the vernacular tongue.

Now it was that the danger sprung up of having our popular literature, and especially our poetry, acted upon by those foreign influences which all along had separated the initiated from the vulgar, the cloister from the street. The struggle between the languages of the Norman and Saxon races was subsiding in the time of Chaucer: the danger did not come from that quarter, although the rival languages had interrupted, and, perhaps, prevented the springing up of an English poetry before this time. A Saxon bishop ran a chance of being expelled, if he did not know French; and the charters of monasteries had been destroyed because they were written in English. The trouveurs spoke the language of the invaders, and always extolled—

Mainte belle dame courtoise
Bien parlant en langue Francoise.

If the influx of Normans had continued, the contest might have ended fatally for our literature. As it was, the first English act of the Commons is so late as the year 1425; and the act in 1362, which directs that judgment be henceforth given, in the native tongue, in courts of justice, is drawn up in French. The force of numbers and of habit prevailed by degrees, although in Chaucer,

The well of English undefiled,

we find so many French idioms, that that high title has been endeavoured to be wrested from him, though bestowed by Spenser.

It was not from that quarter that the danger of our native vigour being impaired was to proceed. The classic models, again, were too sculpturesque for that epoch to imitate; and the genius of our earliest poets found more congenial material in the Italian poetry. They converted what they borrowed into a form of their own; and Chaucer, Gower, Dunbar, James I. of Scotland, and all the others who wrote before or about the era of the Reformation, are native. They had no precedents; they formed no school; or, if they did, Nature was their teacher. The story might be borrowed—the moral or figure transplanted, (not translated;) still the transplantation was so fitted to the soil as to retain its vitality, and to give fruit; and, though taken from the greatest master, it was retained merely as the shell, the skeleton, which the new beauty covered. Yet it was this worship of models which was to arrest the blood in the veins of our poets, when a more formal faith of foreign growth had taken root, and a new dynasty had infected the great, both at court and theatre, with the character of sycophantic refinement. The contention between the truly English and the falsely tasteful was long; but after Milton placed the crown on the scholastic, it began to subside; and, after the accession of the Prince of Orange, our poetry became as dead as a petrification. But before this disease began, or while its attacks were yet spasmodic, we had a band of mighty men: "there were giants in those days." The dramatists of the Elizabethan reign, that nebula, that great cluster of the illuminati of intense genius, were without models, precedents, or rules. They seemed, in adopting the new-found and unborrowed vehicle of the stage as their medium, to throw off all trammels, and lean in their own naked wisdom on the omnipotent protection of Nature.

Making a huge stride, we descend from this age of the "Immortals" to contemporary times.

Della Crusca, it appears, was the name of the celebrated Italian academy which undertook the sifting or purifying of the national tongue, and whose dictionary became its standard. By one of these arbitrary and unmeaning combinations of words and things, which spring up now and then, this cognomen has been transferred to the fashion of verses which Mrs. Thrale and some other English people, at that time resident in Florence, brought into vogue. It was an improvement on the French classic taste, which Swift satirizes; and, although now dead and buried by a sexton worthy of itself—the author of the Baviad, a man of a dogged pertinacity of understanding, and a powerful common-sense—it undoubtedly contributed in no mean degree, to cause the poetry of this country to be considered as the light web that idleness may spin for her amusement—as an invention to wile away an hour. This was the more easily done, as the practical tendency of the public mind was already beginning to treat it with neglect.

At the time when a daily paper, called The World, was set up, says Gifford, the first cargo of poetry arrived from Florence, and was given to the world through this favoured medium. "There was a specious brilliancy in these exotics, which dazzled the native grubs, who had scarcely ever ventured beyond a sheep, a crook, and a rose tree, with an ostentatious display of 'blue hills,' and 'crashing torrents,' and 'petrifying suns.' From admiration to imitation is but a step. While the epidemic malady was passing from fool to fool, Della Crusca came over and immediately announced himself ba 'Sonnet to Love.' The fever turned into a frenzy: Laura Maria, Carlos, Orlando, Adelaide, and a thousand other nameless names, caught the infection; and, from one end of the kingdom to the other, all was nonsense and Della Crusca."

Much as all this deserved contempt, and was to be deprecated, it was in some respects a pleasant and pure kind of folly. The meek innocence of Stothard's style of design is a better embodiment of the same feeling which inspired the Rosa-Matildas and Edwins. Miserably mannered and without character his figures are; but many of his females are perfect saints, and almost deserve the value which is still put on them. Perhaps it may have been the good luck of the reader to have solaced himself in a country inn, during some week or year, to be ever remembered for its summer sunshine both of heart and sky. Perhaps, somewhat exhausted, with strolling along the dry, white, limestone road, he may have sounded his way along the well-scrubbed boards into the wainscoted parlour with open window, and walls decorated with old engravings in black wood frames, by Cipriani and Bartolozzi. Here, while he refreshes himself with his ale, making himself contented with it, be it good or bad, and passes a listless hour in indolently listening to the rustic voices without, observing the interesting movements of boys about the stable door, or in gazing on the engravings in black frames, he may have felt for the lackadaisical figures therein represented, a sort of Christian benevolence, and come to the conclusion that the followers of Della Crusca, whether in verse or picture, had a desire for something better than they attained. One of the prints may be Music, and the other Dancing—or the one Hope, and the other Felicity; and, after decyphering the emblems, and admiring the soft round dimpled faces and sandalled feet, you find yourself just as far from hating as from loving.

The verse that like Maria's flows,
No rubs to stagger, and no sense to pose;
Which, read and read, you raise your eyes in doubt,
And gravely wonder what it is about.

Fuseli, and Louthembourg, and Mortimer, wild enough in their own styles, were horrible demoniacs, when compared to Angelica Kauffman and Cipriani; and Strange was a maker of cables in contrast to Bartolozzi. "To such complexion we must come at last." The decoration of the boudoir descends to the country ale-house, and from thence it has nearly sunk into oblivion. These ornamental prints are still, however, pleasantly associated with ease and dry leaves. When we think of them, we think of the vine about the old English bow-window, clearing lines across the dusty panes with its tendrils, as the wind sways it; and the heavy waggon passing to the town, hailed with noisy talk and a rattle of pewter. It may be that we are now greater worshippers of Mammon, and the portrait of a mail-coach has superseded the pretty faces; or a coloured Battle of Waterloo testifies to the military glory of the last thirty years; or the pattern paper needs no embellishment: but there is certainly a want of some taste to succeed that which is past.

The names of Burns and Cowper are nearly contemporaneous with each other, and with the trash just noticed. Burns—

He who walked in glory and in joy,
Following his plough upon the mountain side—had only one mode of study: he knew nothing of styles: he was ignorant of all the chances and changes that the history of poetry illustrates, and of the waxing and waning of opinion, and he was saved thereby: he knew nothing about the definitions of poetry, nor of the high calling of the poet; he knew only the ballads floating about, and the grave and gay music of Scotland. These were his models, and this his inspiration. His heart was his critic, his umpire without appeal. Cowper, on the other hand, a learned and shy being, was placed in a position the most favourable to a man of genius: he was as averse to the great world as Burns was distant from it. Hayley says "His own forcible expression represented him at Westminster School as not daring to raise his eyes above the shoe buckle of the elder boys, who were too apt to tyrannize over his gentle spirit." This timidity increased with his years. It was necessary, after his friends had got him appointed Clerk of the Journals, that he should appear at the bar of the House of Lords, to entitle him to hold the office. He was incapable of the effort; his reason was overwhelmed by the idea of even once being gazed upon by such an assemblage; and his future life of retirement in the country was one of extreme simplicity. Thus he also lived in everyday converse with the objects he described, and went to the well-head to drink. But these authors left everything to be desired. They pointed out to us the estimable and the amiable within our reach, and would read us a lesson of pride in our humanity, and contentment in our condition. All this, however, great as it is, is but little considered in the throng of pursuits that continually engage the world; and there was something else, more particularly at that time, necessary for the well-being of the age. The influence which Cowper had could have been no other than a restraining influence; whereas the movement had already begun which was destined to agitate all minds, and continue to do so until loftier questions shall be disposed of, and contentment (if its realization be possible) shall be warranted by being self-decreed and willed by the spirit within, as well as by the layers of clay or of silver about the household hearth and the senatorial council. The Scotch metaphysicians and conservative economists may play the same tune over again for ever, without making any, save themselves, really and actively believe, that there is no more in the soul of man than is dreamt of in their philosophy; and the voice of the charmer, though she charm ever so sweetly, shall not draw the crowd from pressing on in the vigorous race which public opinion and improvement are now running. Words have been whispered for ages which men repeated to each other as in somnolence; and, half conscious only, or nearly unconscious, of their meaning, were easily persuaded that they were evil dreams. These words are now bandied about on the lips of the multitude, hallowed or profane, Attic or Boeotian ; and the accomplishment and end will bring unheard-of things.

The poet must always sympathize with, he must be one of, his own audience. He must understand what it desires, and whether he direct or repress, he must again (as of old) exercise a beneficent influence, and "be the Aurora to the unknown time." If a period ever arrive (to use the words we have quoted before,) "when what is now called Science, familiarized to men, shall be ready to put on, as it were, a form of flesh and blood, the poet shall lend his divine spirit to aid the transfiguration, and will welcome the being thus produced as a dear and genuine inmate of the household of man." This transfiguration has already begun, although the author just quoted does not seem to have thought so in his poetical works. The power of machinery is substituted for manual labour. Steam binds, as with iron bridges, every land ; redeeming men from the chances of many evils. Political or intellectual rights have ceased to be, as formerly, bugbears for the vulgar ; they have become merely portions of justice ; anon they will be flat and unprofitable. "The serpent, with its tail in its mouth, from being the symbol of eternity, has become the bauble of childhood ;"* but there are new symbols to be invented, as there are new truths required to be symbolized ; a new and more perfect peace is to be aspired to and moralized on, which shall be different from the contentment which the pastoral muses have loved to describe.

All this has been vaguely moving in the German mind, and conferring a colour of spiritual and lasting interest, before we (a comfortable people, as the English have been called) have awakened to the consciousness of its existence. It was only by the earthquake of the French Revolution that we were convinced of those principles and tendencies in modern civilisation which are now so generally recognised. And even when that astounding self-disorganisation of a nation, and proclamation of the mortality or old age of conventions took place, (so slow were we to acknowledge the real state of the matter, and interpose to prevent worse evils,) we lent our aid to put them again in chains. Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, were then young men. "In Germany and in England alike," says De Quincey, in an article published in this Magazine, "the poetry was regenerated. The poets felt themselves putting away childish things, and now, at length, entering on the sincere thinking of mature manhood." With the thinkers of this country it was eminently so : the twenty miles of Channel had been enough to prevent the licentious voice of the French writers of the previous age from being heard among us ; and our philosophy had become altogether experimental. Among the Germans, transcendental ideas had been spoken of, and systems promulgated, which, if they favoured the visionary-profound—the national characteristic—they far counterbalanced that evil by asserting the existence of a sphere beyond the visible diurnal, and elevated art by exercising critical acumen. "Lessing had turned the minds of men to a deeper and truer interest in literature ; had even decidedly begun to introduce a heartier, warmer, and more expressive style. The Germans were on the alert ; in expectation, or, at least, in full readiness for some bolder impulse."* Werner, Schiller, and Goethe, were all observers ; and F. Schlegel calls the school of philosophy which Fichté originated, the co-tendency of the age with the French Revolution.

Wordsworth had published some verses about this time, called "Descriptive Sketches." These, although afterwards condemned as vicious in their principles of composition by his own maturer taste, would, it has been alleged, have gained him a high momentary notoriety with the public, had they been properly brought under its notice. But this they never could have done : they are cold and correct ; without enthusiasm ; and, altogether, were of a kind the most unpromising for a young author to produce : no erring power, no unaccomplished endeavour. Coleridge, also, had been poetizing, and Southey, the third of a triumvirate which shall be memorable, in these days ; but neither had done anything which may be considered remarkable. We write poetry in our youth ; and, when the business of life commences, exchange the muse for some better dowered and more housewifely companion ; acknowledging at last, or only satisfying ourselves with the excuse, that the gods had not made us poetical. With how many is this the case!—and with those especially whose natures were so attuned, the active and the passive, the rational and the imaginative, so tempered together as to check a decided bias. Such, perhaps, some of these triumvirs might have been ; and, in the advancement of the church, passed away "into the night of time" as quietly as the happiest vicar or the most discontented dean. There is no mistaking either of them for a Shakspeare ; or, to speak more properly, for that which Shakspeare would have been in the totally different organism of this age. Nor can we so mistake any of those that followed—Scott, or Byron, or Shelley, or Moore—nor all of them placed together, and viewed as the component parts of one mind—the mind of the age. There would be a deficiency, (if we except Shelley, whose eye is ever bent on the future, as one who sees the shadows of coming powers, and the illumining of coming glories, to which all other eyes are blind ;) a deficiency of one grand central idea controlling and directing. The present has been the most ambitious of all ages in its desires, but it has wanted completeness and unity. That of Shakspeare's was the age of observation, and was perfected in itself. Our late literature will be found to be, in fact, endeavours towards some object not attained, and which was so little understood as to be most often wrongfully pursued.

SOME LOOSE THOUGHTS ON HANGING.

THAT gentle humourist, The Standard, threw out a pleasant hint, some time ago, that it might be a source of general satisfaction, if certain Irish judges, of recent elevation, were served as King Alfred served thirty-six English judges in one day. And how was that, reader, if thou knowest? Mass, he hung them up, pour encourager les autres.

It is natural for a mind so constituted as to venerate the memory of a Norbury, to harbour these aspirations: for if that remarkable personage was a meet ornament of the high seat he occupied for so many years in the Temple of Justice, the judges to whom The Standard alludes, can scarcely be accounted worthy of any place appurtenant to his building, except the scaffold. Their "merit" designates them to that "bad eminence," as the surest way, at all events, of converting them into hanging judges.

Another reason for so disposing of the unconvertible functionaries, might be this: Unless these judges be hanged, there will soon be nobody else to hang. They may go about holding courts in Eyre; but the wholesome spectacle of a convict in air will be no more seen. The constellation of Jack Ketch, now dimly twinkling in the track of the departed Astræa, will abandon our hemisphere in disgust; and the art of "launching souls into eternity" be lost to posterity for ever. The ratio ultima legum, that perfection of the "perfection of reason," is running fast into the dead letter.

The progress of degeneracy is said to be gradual. The neglected garden does not become a wilderness at once; the tree does not always wither the moment it ceases to bear its accustomed fruit; yet, modern innovation bears all before it with a ruthless spring-tide. It is not twenty years—no, nor anything like it—since the gallows groaned in all directions with expiatory offerings to that many-headed dragon—the Penal Code. Not only murderers, highwaymen, and housebreakers, but sheep-stealers and common thieves; yea, swindlers and petty-larceny rogues, defeated in a controversy of forty shillings, took their turn under the fatal tree.

In 1820, two servants out of place, (Christian people thought them very much out-of-place indeed,) were hanged in Dublin, for taking advantage of a large dinner-party, to purloin the cloaks and umbrellas out of a gentleman's hall in Mountjoy Square, of which the door had been left open, through the carelessness or connivance of a domestic. The ground alleged for this most vigorous proceeding, was the shocking prevalence of cloak-and-umbrella stealing, at that period, out of gentlemen's halls. It was quite right, no doubt, to put a stop to it; but it does not follow, as a matter of course, that Wretches must hang that gentlemen may dine.

To speak, in detail, of the hundreds of whom the Whiteboy Act "thinned the land," by its comprehensive principle of construction, would open a field of politics upon which it is not now advisable to enter. That act only required proof of a district being disturbed, to enlarge a common riot or assault into a felony. Such proof, too, was, for the most part, established upon the oath of a peace-preservation Magistrate, who enjoyed the emoluments of his office as long as the country was sworn to be in a state of insurrection, and no longer. So late as 1834, I have seen the Crown Counsel on the Home Circuit, when all the overt proofs of a criminal's personal delinquency had been established, requesting a moment's indulgence, until Major This, or Chief-Constable T'other, could be brought into court, to sustain the capital count of the indictment, by his report of the "State of the Country."

Many hundreds were sacrificed, by virtue of the Whiteboy Act, and the liberal interpretation of which it was susceptible. Political hanging, however, has no relation to my subject, except so far as it might be included in the playful and good-natured proposition of The Standard. Let us, therefore confine ourselves to executions, which used to take place in a well-constituted and orderly state of society, before Whigs or Radicals had a voice, one way or the other, in the matter. In those days nobody ever spoke about hanging a judge. To have even mentioned King Alfred's practical measures of Law Reform, in connexion with any member of the bench, would have amounted to the crime læsæ majestatis, and have brought an editor to the pillory at least, if he might not be made, by a stretch of the old acts, to "go farther and fare worse." Shade of Ollamh Fodla!—how I should like to have seen the late Lord Ellenborough dealing with a libel of that sort!

A half-witted seneschal of a Manor Court in Galway, lately provoked a loud burst of laughter by threatening to hang up some boys for wrangling about a game of marbles at the door. He fiercely brandished a charter in the black-letter, which conferred the power of life and limb upon the authority which he represented; and he swore lustily that he would assert his privilege in five minutes' time, if he could but find a hangman. But although this may be excellent laughing matter now, it is not so very long since a man was hanged in Ireland for MAKING A NOISE!

The fact is authentic. It was cited at a solemn meeting of the Twelve Judges, last winter, by a member of the venerable Conseoderunt, who had himself been an eye-witness of what he related.

When Justice, with her black cap and funeral pall, rode the circuits, and Death skipping nimbly in her train,

Bless'd his maw
Destin'd to that good hour,— a man was found guilty of some felony, for which it appeared uncertain whether he would be cast for death or not. The court deferred the sentence, and ordered that he should stand over till the end of the assizes. The fellow was crazed; and being taken back to prison, fell a howling, and uttering various other disagreeable noises, such as judges do not like to hear, and which (as the window of his cell and that of the Crown Court opened upon the same plot) seriously interrupted the public business.

The cause of this strange disturbance being ascertained, the judge sent a peremptory order to the malefactor to keep the peace, or (as his Lordship pithily remarked) "it might be worse for him." But the wretch, ignorantly supposing that the law could do nothing worse in his case, returned an answer of defiance, and sent forth more piercing yells than before.

Now, what would one of our feeling Popish or Radical judges do in a like case? The solemn business of the Court was at a stand, and it was absolutely necessary that silence should be restored. To remove the noisy culprit to a distant part of the prison would have abated the nuisance, pro hac vice; but then some future convict might repeat it, and, at all events, this would have compromised the dignity of the sacred ermine. The judge, of whom it is our hint to speak, had no notion of sanctioning so bad a precedent; and therefore, as soon as he received the insulting reply, he cried with a loud voice, "Bring him up!"

These are thrilling words, from whatever lips they proceed, after the damnatory verdict of a jury; but who, that has heard them once uttered by the Rhadamanthus in question, can ever dismiss from his memory the tiger's growl, and the blood-shot aspect of cruelty, which filled the bystanders with indescribable horror, and shot a pang, equal to the very bitterness of death, through the heart of the stoutest criminal?

In five minutes after the issuing of that terrible mandate, the criminal stood again in the dock, and received sentence of immediate execution. It was like the scene in Rokeby:—

Ho! Provost-Marshal! instantly
Lead Denzil to the gallows-tree;
Allow him not a parting word,—
Short be the shrift, and sure the cord!

The court adjourned while it was done; and—so prompt was justice then—his Lordship resumed his seat in about half an hour, with an unmoved countenance, and went on trying men for their lives, who, if they were capitally convicted, did not (you may be sure) offend his ears "with exclamations hyperbolic."

It would be rash to speculate upon the distinction which King Alfred might have deemed fit to confer upon such a Cadi as that; but it may be doubted that he would have made him an Earl. The fact itself, which is well authenticated, and occurred within the present century, is important to be borne in mind, when there is a question of hanging some of our judges, because they do not more nearly conform to the example of their predecessors.

Not eight years ago, two insurgents were capitally convicted at Maryborough, and ordered to be taken out on the following morning and hanged. The morning came, and the judge, taking his seat on the bench, as usual all smiles and affability, proceeded to try other prisoners, who, aware of what was then going on "in another place," were in no enviable state of self-possession to think of their defence. The sheriff appeared in court after an hour or so, and his Lordship condescended to stoop forward and put some questions about the then executed criminals, and the manner of their death. If, reader, you had seen the unfortunate fellows in the dock, how their teeth chattered and their knees knocked against each other, during that short colloquy, you would never wish to stand a trial for your life in the same dignified presence. That personage is still an ornament of the Irish Bench, but not precisely one of those to whom the Tory oracle would award the Euthanasta of the gallows.

In the declining days of a very famous vindicator of the law, already glanced at, he presided at a trial, but was asleep the greater part of the time. It is well for those whose conscience can suffer them to slumber in such a situation. But, though he dozed during the evidence, he was wide awake to the charge, which was home for a conviction; and the jury, all picked men, according to the usage of that day, did their "spiriting;" and the wretch was sentenced to die. An application, however, was made to his lordship to recommend a mitigation of the punishment; which he stoutly resisted, until the convict's attorney boldly told him, that he must produce his notes to the government, which would be certainly applied to on the subject. Now, although Homer could sometimes nod as he wrote, it is not every one that can write while he nods; and our Nestor had, in fact, taken no notes at all. Conscious of this, and perceiving, also, that he was caught napping, he yielded without further entreaty; and thus, owing to a happy accident, the man's life was spared.

I suppose a hundred instances could be authenticated, from the personal observation of any barrister of thirty years' standing upon any of our circuits, showing what a mere lottery was the criminal law, as it used to be administered, and by what capriccios and fantasies of the individual bearing the sword of Justice, men's lives were saved or lost.

It may be said, that these things are better managed now; and there is truth in that. But still a great deal too much depends upon the humour and peculiar views of the man invested with the awful power of pronouncing the sentence. How often is it evident to the most ignorant peasant in the crowd, that so important an issue as that of life or death is determined, not by the amount of the criminal's guilt so much, as by the choice which a particular judge may happen to make of his circuit! I recollect, in a town on the Home Circuit, the late Sir William Smith, who was in the Crown Court, being so overwhelmed with business, requested his learned brother in the Record Court to try some prisoners; and, in consequence of this casual arrangement, three young men were sentenced to death, whom the humane and tender-hearted baron (had he taken them in their turn) would most certainly have considered amply punished with seven years' transportation. Nor would he have been too lenient either. But because they stood about "No. 60" on the Calendar instead of being at "No. 10," they were hanged: for the sentence was actually executed upon them.

If, therefore, the penalty of death is any longer to stain the criminal code of an enlightened Christian state, it would be much better, as insuring a greater certainty and uniformity of punishment, to relieve the judges altogether from the fearful responsibility of awarding it, and to transfer it to the Executive Government, which exercises that melancholy privilege in London, and ought to exercise it in all other places. But the experience of the last ten years proves that the infliction of this barbarous mode of vengeance is superfluous, either as a safeguard to society, or a means of preventing crime; and, consequently, that it is wholly unwarrantable, even on the ground of expediency.

Let the present state of Ireland be compared with that of any precedent period within the memory of man, and it will be seen that, while the numbers of the necessitous and uneducated portion of society have been increasing, without any corresponding improvement in their condition, crime has not increased; and yet the punishment of death is not now inflicted once for ten times that it was inflicted some years ago. At the periods referred to in the foregoing statements, life was not more safe; property was not better protected; the general frame of society was not more orderly and secure than now. But a vast quantity of blood was then spilled periodically, to guard and maintain interests, which are found to be quite as well preserved without recourse being had to such a horrid protection. No man will assert that robbery, or forgery, theft, or sheepstealing, have been more prevalent in the last five years than they were when those offences were actually punished with death: neither will it be maintained, that the more violent crimes, which still render a man obnoxious to the extreme vengeance of the law, have become more frequent since the Executive Government has indicated a reluctance, in most cases, to enforce the penalty.

It is unnecessary, and it might be deemed absurd, to contend that the partial intermission which has taken place in the infliction of capital punishments has actually increased virtue. It is enough if it can be shown that it has not increased crime; because, if it has not, then is this penalty useless; and it is murder—nothing short of downright murder—to go on with those barbarous and heart-rending exhibitions. It is painful to find, notwithstanding the conclusive proofs thus afforded, of the unnecessary cruelty of putting our fellow-creatures to death, that many good and enlightened men still adhere to the old prejudice about the "wholesome" terror of the gallows. It acts, they say, in numberless unknown instances, as a restraint upon fearful natures, and prevents the commission of gross offences, where a mere moral control would be ineffectual. I know not on what ground of experience this is asserted; but it is manifestly erroneous to assume that by dispensing with the extreme forfeit, all wholesome fear of punishment has been taken away. On the contrary, the certainty of a rigorous prosecution, and of a severe, though bloodless, judgment following conviction, operates more stringently than the fear of death, with all the chances of escape, grounded upon a calculation of the tenderness of prosecutors, the scruples of jurors, and the humanity of judges and men in authority.

Nor is it true to say, that the fear of death is in all cases the most powerful restraint that can be applied. In Ireland nothing was more frequent than for a malefactor, when condemned to transportation, to implore the judge to change the sentence to that of execution, that his bones might rest in the land of his birth; and, strange as it may seem, the wife and children of the convict have been often seen to join earnestly in the prayer that he might be killed at home, rather than sent to pine in hopeless exile away from all that makes life worth having.

Death is indeed a "bitter remembrance" (as the sage in the Apocrypha says) "to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, and hath nothing to vex him;" but to the half-fed, naked, houseless, buffeted, and despised peasant, to whom—it is far otherwise. The stoical indifference with which the Irish go to meet it on the scaffold, where, unless in a political cause, no honour is to be gained by dying like a hero or a martyr, has puzzled many a grave inquirer. But the philosophy of the matter was well explained by a ragged vagrant, who was sentenced to die at the Downpatrick Assizes in 1836, for a highway robbery. On his way back to prison he was taken under the gallows, upon which workmen were then employed, dressing it (as a Frenchman might say) for the execution of a murderer, which was to take place on the following day. The unexpected sight of these preparations appalled him for an instant; but speedily recovering from the shock, he walked on, remarking to the attendant turnkey,—“Well, it will save me many a wet foot and hungry belly!”

How well does this illustrate the sequel of the wise observation just now quoted, viz.—“O death, acceptable is thy sentence unto the needy, to him that is vexed with all things, and to him that despaireth, and hath lost patience!” These classes, it should be remembered, constitute a large majority of persons amenable to the law for crimes of great magnitude; and, consequently, to them the sentence of death is not an object of such dismay, that they will not be ready, at any time, to brave the contingency for a present gratification, either of revenge or gain.

As to the barefoot philosopher of Downpatrick, his saying (a bon mot to him) was the means of saving his life; for, otherwise, the case might not have been brought under the notice of the government until it would have been too late. The incident, however, having got into the newspapers, the attention of Mr. Drummond was drawn to it, and that good and kind man, with a heart ever awake, in private and in public, to the claims of humanity, and a spirit that instinctively recoiled from the thought of cruelty, nobly exclaimed,—“He must not die!” The case was submitted to the Lord-lieutenant, our present Home Secretary, to whom the proposal of mercy, "grounded on just and right," never came unwelcome; and upon inquiry, it was found that the interests of property, in Downshire and elsewhere, did not render it imperatively necessary that a poor shoeless vagrant should be hanged by the neck till he was dead. If he still lives, it is probable that he enjoys a bellyful, and walks dryshod to his daily servitude, in New South Wales, blessing the hour when he thought aloud under the gallows-tree at Downpatrick.

MORAN-OF-THE-COLLAR.

THE PATRON OF THE PARISH.

A NEW SONG BY AN OLD MODERATE.

AIR—The Vicar of Bray.

THE good little King of Yvetôt
The muse shall ever cherish;
But with your leave, Messieurs, just so
I'm king in my own parish.
It is a land of little kings
This England; and its glory
Must pale, when pale to limbo wings
The pious, ancient Tory.
Let Chartist and Dissenter rave!
This creed I fondly cherish,
There's none the storm-tost ship can save,
But THE PATRON OF THE PARISH.

Our parson, in his early day,
Taught my smart boys their letters,
And learned, betimes, himself to pay
Due deference to his betters.
He sat so modest, meek, and mum,
While we discussed our claret;
And now he beats the pulpit drum
With decent, sober spirit.
There's danger in a bolting brain;
No youth that's high and airish
A living, neat and snug, shall gain
From the Patron of the parish.

The gospel, when it 'gan to stir,
Was on a vulgar plan quite;
But now we've changed the carpenter
Into the gentleman quite.
To meet some twenty in a garret
They once might deem delectable;
But, now with lords and dukes we star it,
The gospel is RESPECTABLE.
The Church no more shall be capsize'd
By scoffers bold and bearish:
God's gospel now is patronized
By the Patron of the parish.

When with my wife to church I go,
So flaunting, gay, and garish,
I hear the flattering murmur flow—
"The Patron of the parish!"
And the young squire, how spruce, how trim
He graces his majority;
While on his father's broad hat-brim
Sits, visibly, AUTHORITY!"
Then, in the gallery's velvet front
We sit so gay and garish;
I well may bear the battle's brunt,
The Patron of the parish!

A jolly, dapper boy, they say,
The purple Pope in Rome is;
But red and ruddy as the May
The Patron in his home is.
Full many a dainty feast from him
The curate and schoolmaster
Enjoy: their shallow souls do brim;
Their slow thoughts travel faster.
For so it is, and so shall be,
The Church I kindly cherish;
This goodly arch must have a key—
The Patron of the parish.

For truth is ONE; and there must be
One Church, with bell and steeple;
One Law must stamp the Liturgy;
One Patron lead the people.
And every true church has one scope
To check all fiery particles
That would rebel against their Pope—
The law-established Articles!
It is, and shall be so, no doubt,
This creed I fondly cherish,
Religion would die out without
THE PATRON OF THE PARISH!

SPRING.

Spring! how I love thy gentle showers,
Thy fresh, yet balmy air,
That floats o'er beds of living flowers,
Yet will not linger there.

Thy green that changes o'er the hill,
And deepens in the vale,
Till hawthorn, stars, the trembling rill,
And daisies sheet the dale.

Breathe o'er me in thy mildness, Spring,
Breathe warmly o'er my soul
Thé joyous feelings thou dost bring—
The hopes that mock control.

O, let thy free blest sunshine fall
In gladness on my heart;
And, to my wayward spirit, all
Thy gentleness impart!

Thy skies are rich in light, that fills
Ev'n forest paths with joy;
And clouds melt down upon thy hills
With sunbeams mingling coy.

Thy gales are laden with perfume—
Thy streams are living things,
That sing to every wilding bloom
That on their margin springs.

'Tis wise to seek whate'er of mirth
The seasons may contain;
And I, in all my wanderings forth,
Have never sought in vain.

Though some are softer—some as bright—
No other time can bring
The joy, the freshness, the delight,
That come to me with Spring.

THE GREEN GAUNTLET; OR, THE TRAITOR'S SON.

CHAPTER I.

In those days of Ireland's history, when no gentleman, however legitimate his pretensions on the score of birth or fortune, could be received within the select circle of the High-bloods, who had not "smelt powder," or "pinked his man,"* there existed in Dublin a coterie, which occasionally figured under the titles of "Fire-Eaters," "Hell-fire Club-men," "Pink-a-dindies," &c., which assumed to give the tone and stamp of fashion to the "Bucks" and "Bloods" of their day, and whose least pretension to honourable notoriety was, that of having, at a moderate calculation, fought THREE DUELS per man, on the average. An adversary, more or less, sent to his account by an ounce of lead in his brain, or half a yard of cold steel through his body, placed the hero of the lawless exploit in the higher or lower grade of this murderous society.

The names of many of these characters are still held in remembrance, and even their unhallowed feats boasted of, by their more humble imitators and remote descendants. "HERO JACKSON" (so called, par excellence), was alive so lately as thirty years ago,—presenting to the eye the ruin of one of the noblest specimens of the human fabric; still erect and handsome at seventy, one of the best swordsmen of his day, and equally ready with the trigger, at any distance from three to twelve yards. The "Hero" was, in his day, the beau ideal of the young squirearchy of the blade and pistol school; having, with proud bravado, walked the streets of Bath, on a certain occasion, with his rapier dangling at his side without its scabbard! in defiance, as he stated, for some supposed affront put on his country. Next to him, came Edward Keogh, a man of good family and independent fortune, who had obtained the soubriquet of "Hell-fire Ned," and who reckoned his duels by fire by the dozen, and his rencontres with swords by scores. Then came the celebrated George Robert Fitzgerald, who could claim consanguinity with Ireland's only Duke, but who unfortunately killed a man too much; and, being out of the usual course, was executed for the MURDER,—one of the most atrocious on record.

Sir Robert Deane Tilson, from whose character the brilliant Sheridan drew the lively picture of Sir Lucius O'Trigger, in his Comedy of the RIVALS; and his brother, Lord Muskerry, the patron of all the pretty milliners in the city; the Honourable and Reverend Clotworthy Skeffington, (the most arrant church-militant since the days of the Crusaders,) were also distinguished on the list. The unfortunate Lord Santry, (at whose house the Hell-fire Club held their secret sittings,) was only saved from the gibbet by dying in Newgate, (not, it is said, without the friendly aid of his Lordship's apothecary,) while awaiting his trial for a brutal murder; the celebrated "Buok English," (the name by which that extraordinary duellist was for many years universally known,) who having fought so often without even a single hit, that he deemed his person invulnerable, at last closed his mortal career by the pistol-shot of his quondam friend and fellow-gamster, Brereton, on that favourite spot for field-days, the "Fifteen Acres" in the Phoenix Parks, Dublin,—were also of the number of the elect.

But the pattern of fashion and gallantry of that day, was the handsome Edmund, commonly called "Mun Roche," who, after a youth of dissipation and extravagance, found honourable employment for a few years in a foreign service, in which he fought his way to fame and promotion, but from which his restless spirit recalled him. He appeared in Dublin, a dazzling meteor in the world of gaiety. Splendid in person, polished in manners, and superior in talents to the general mass, even of well-educated men of the sphere he moved in, his company was universally sought; but there was a certain hauteur in his manner which sometimes chilled his warmest admirers. This, added to his skill in arms, (for he was esteemed a match for any man in Europe, whether with sword or pistol,) caused him to be at once feared as well as admired. To the fair sex, these qualities rendered him the more engaging. Although he passed but a few months each year in his native country, he became the glass of fashion,—always honoured with the hand of the leading beauty of the day at the court and birth-day balls at Dublin Castle. He was allowed to be "the best dressed man of the age he lived in." Insinuating in manners, smooth of tongue, cunning in fence as unerring in aim, his voice was a law amongst his circle. With a head as strong as his heart was brave, after drinking his sixth share of two dozen of claret at the once-noted "Candy's Tavern," he might be seen entering the grand ball-room about midnight, exhibiting no other symptoms of his evening debauch than a more reckless gaiety of manner and brilliancy of eye than usual. Mun Roche's appearance on one of those occasions is thus noticed by one of his early friends, John Paumier, who survived him for a quarter of a century, and who in his day cut no ordinary figure in the fashionable throng:—

"Roche sported, for the first time, on that night, one of the most beautiful and costly court-dresses ever seen in St. Patrick's Hall. He had received it from Paris only two days previously, and fame had already trumpeted forth the splendour of the glittering novelty; but its appearance outstripped all anticipations of its richness and beauty. The coat was an emerald green satin, spangled all over with such exquisite minuteness, as to give the effect of the ever-varying tints of brilliancy ascribed to the dying dolphin, at each movement of the wearer; who, at the desire of the Lord Lieutenant, repeated the Minuet de la Cour, and Garotte, with the young and beautiful Countess of Granard, then in the zenith of her bridal charms. The rest of the dress was of corresponding taste and elegance; both knee and shoe-buckles of costly brilliants."

Roche, like all the fashionables of every age and nation, passed a considerable portion of his time at play, the grand focus of which was then established at "Daly's Chocolate House," from which sprung, in the course of years, the once-celebrated, and still well-remembered "Daly's Club," College Green, demolished by the Union. The chocolate-house alluded to was the only society, in the nature of club, then existing in the Irish metropolis, where persons moving in the highest walk of life could congregate, in order to squander their fortune, fame, and health, in the odious pursuits of the gamester. But Fortune was to Roche a fickle and capricious mistress. His finances were consequently ever fluctuating; but after a few months passed at the Hague, Brussels, Spa, or Paris, he generally repaired his fortunes,—whether honourably, or otherwise, none durst question. He had fought hard in his early days to enforce the respect and good graces of his associates; and although, it might be, at war with all the world beyond that circle, he was in perfect amity there.

* Pinking an adversary was merely drawing blood with the sword, without inflicting a mortal injury.

Hints were, however, occasionally thrown out by continental travellers, not much to the honour of the fashionable Mun Roche's character; still, on each visit to his native land, his reception was unmarked by suspicious reserve, or by the slightest coldness of demeanour, on the part of his club acquaintances.

After an unusually long absence abroad, Roche reappeared in Dublin in the winter of the year 177—, accompanied by a handsome boy, apparently about ten years old, both habited in the deepest mourning. The striking resemblance which this interesting boy bore to his protector sufficiently marked the degree of affinity in which they stood towards each other; but all attempts to elicit information on that subject, by friendly banter, were met by evasion; while the slightest approach to a more serious and direct inquiry, called up a frown on that haughty brow, which the boldest and bravest could not treat with levity. But there were many who openly stated that Mun Roche (or La Roche, as he was called abroad) had, many years before, been secretly married, at Paris, to the daughter of the immediate descendant of the noble Earl of K—; who, attaching himself to the fortunes of the faithless James II., shared the exile of that unfortunate and guilty monarch, on his expulsion from the British throne; sacrificing fortune, rank, and country, to an honourable, though mistaken, sense of loyalty and duty. The recent death of that lady in Paris, and Roche's present sombre appearance, seemed to confirm this story; although it was long known that, under the temptation of beauty and fortune, he had, for some seasons previously, been paying the most ardent addresses to the daughter and sole heiress of an Irish Commoner of abounding wealth, whose infirmity of health but rarely allowed him to attend his Parliamentary duties, and never to mix with the votaries of fashion: hence he found a pleasure in the society and conversation of the fascinating Roche at his ancient mansion, to which he was, for the greater portion of the year, confined. On this rich heiress it is not improbable but Roche now fixed his thoughts; but fame had done him justice in that quarter, and his first attempt to renew his visits was repulsed with every mark of displeasure. From that moment Roche became an altered man: every attempt to assume the gaiety of his former days but more strongly marked an inward revolution. He consigned the boy to the care of his only brother, who had all his life resided in that remote part of Ireland, where the property once his was situated, and which was alone preserved to the name, by the economy and prudence of that excellent brother.

A reserve unusual amongst such characters, became the natural consequence of Roche's strangely altered manner; and the late roué, whom all admired, now became an object of suspicious caution. Even the attention of Government became excited by the close intimacy which subsisted latterly between Roche and a distant relative of his, a certain FRIAR JOHN, a Jesuit, whose periodical visits to Dublin were managed under circumstances of most suspicious mystery. One conjecture led to another, all to Roche's disadvantage. He was known to be a man of very superior talents, although, from the profligate life he had for many years led, those talents had found no scope for profitable development. He had never sought employment from the Government, although he had taken high degrees in Trinity College (which he entered at the age of sixteen as a reformed Catholic :) his character as a scholar stood high; and he had proved himself no contemptible debater during the two stormy sessions after the declaration of independence by the American Colonies, when he sat in the Irish Parliament for the burgh of E—y,—an honour which he obtained by the ready process of shooting his youthful adversary through the head on the evening of the day of nomination! It was stated, in palliation, that the intemperate language used by his opponent, in his address to the constituency, left Roche no other alternative than an appeal to the ordeal of fire; and his friends and partisans warmly exulted in the fatal result. It seemed that the unfortunate young candidate had acquired a more perfect knowledge of Roche's (or La Roche's) foreign transactions, than it was prudent, in his circumstances, to publish; and he paid the penalty of his life for his ill-timed temerity, in bearding such a desperate character on the public hustings.

Although an evident coolness of manner existed between Roche and his quondam friends, nothing had yet appeared to debar him from seeking the patronage of a Government, ever on the watch for talent to support its power and increase its parliamentary majorities; but he had other schemes in view, of which more hereafter.

Roche's journeys heretofore were generally from Ireland to the Continent direct, with no other delay in England than merely making it his route for convenience. This occasioned no surprise; but latterly his visits to England only, became frequent,—a country in which he had never been known to reside a week, and in which he had no connexions whatever; and those visits, it was discovered, were not to that region of fashion—St. James's, nor yet to "THE BATH"—(as that famous city was called in the olden time)—no, but to smoky, bustling, London city. It was remarked that Roche's absence from Dublin became more frequent, and of longer duration, after the French king dropped his mask of neutrality, and entered boldly into the war then raging between Great Britain and her revolted American Colonies, ranging all his powers on the side of the revolutionists. A new light then broke in on those whose minds already harboured the worst opinions of the suspected Roche, whose loyalty became for the first time doubted. His occasional absence of weeks increased to months; from months to years; until, at last, the once dazzling Mun Roche, "the observed of all observers," became lost to sight, and almost to memory. . . .

CHAPTER II.

Young Edmund, after a lapse of a few years, reappears on the scene, a finely-grown handsome youth of sixteen, attended by his uncle, and now sole protector, Walter Roche (only eighteen years his senior,) by whom he was entered as Fellow-commoner of Trinity College; thus starting in the aristocratic grade of academic rank. Six years passed in the wilds of Connaught, with no other companions than his affectionate uncle, and his occasional tutor, the Friar John already alluded to, had engrafted on his tender mind all the romance of his adopted country, with the earlier recollections of a foreign land; he had acquired a knowledge of the Irish language, and in some slight degree the accent of the province in which he had passed so many years of boyhood.

Trinity College could in those, and even later days, boast amongst her sons a fair share of the nobility; the aristocracy of Ireland being then content with bestowing on the rising generation that course of education to be found in a university, not surpassed by any in Europe for the profound learning of its superior members, or for the splendid talent which it has sent forth to adorn the Church, the Senate, and the Bar.

The dangerous age of eighteen found young Edmund, in all the pride of youthful attraction, favoured by the fair, beloved by his fellow-students, and esteemed by his superiors. That he was not proof against the fascinations of the gentle sex, or occasionally unable to resist the temptations of the taverns, then the nightly rendezvous of the wild and the witty of the thoughtless scions of fashion, was no reflection on his character; nor was he the less respected or beloved when, for some nocturnal indiscretion, he, in conjunction with an amiable young nobleman, his chum, were arraigned before the awful Board of Fellows, and, on their report, rusticated for a term;—a punishment always increased to the disgrace of expulsion, should the exiled party, under this ban, presume to appear in the city of Dublin during the term of his temporary banishment from Alma Mater. The young friends took country lodgings at Ranelagh (in the immediate suburbs of Dublin)—a place of all others least calculated to inspire melancholy reflections. But poor Edmund, was doomed to be the victim of a cruel destiny. The two young friends, when within a short fortnight of their release from restraint, in an evil hour ventured into the city, under the cloak of night, on some youthful frolic; and heeded not how the hours of folly fled, until the morning light surprised them in their seducing revels, and this, too, within sight of the gates of Trinity! Detection would have proved destruction to the prospects of both: each took a separate road to hurry to their suburban retreat. Edmund, being the more active, took the longer detour; and having performed a circuit of the College Park wall, was hurrying on towards the point of their proposed reunion, when, in turning a corner, he unluckily ran with such force against a gentleman, who was silently plodding his way along the then desolate street (unseen and unheard by Edmund, until the moment of collision,) as to throw him off his centre. Thus rudely insulted, as he imagined, this person uttered an ungente expression, coupled with an epithet which roused the blood of the fiery student. Edmund instantly clapped his hand on the hilt of his sword (for he, with his noble friend, had, according to the custom of the times, strapped on their swords when leaving their lodgings, to act as independent gentlemen for the night,) and looked sternly on the face and figure before him. He was apparently about forty, and one whose full dress proclaimed him to be of the higher, at least of the fashionable order; and who, to all appearance, had been just released from the saloon of some person of distinction, or probably from the Chocolate House: unfortunately it was from the latter!—and with a temper, by nature, fierce and unbending, not much softened by the loss of a few cool hundreds during the previous night's play. His hasty exclamation might, on explanation, have been pardoned, had he retracted the insulting epithet by which it was accompanied. Edmund, still grasping the handle of his sword, but without drawing it, expressed his deep regret at his unintentional assault; and, with all the emotion of wounded honour, entreated a recal of the vile epithet so hastily bestowed on him, or, if declined, the satisfaction of a gentleman.

Whose springs of life were poisoned at their source,

"Satisfaction!" replied the other; "why, silly boy, do you know who it is you so rashly tempt to chastise your temerity? I am NED KEOGH! better known as Hell-fire Ned! Retire; and bless your stars I do not sacrifice you on the spot!"

"If you were the Devil himself, I care not," exclaimed the now maddened youth—"Defend yourself!" drawing his sword, and throwing himself into position.

"By Heavens! you are a young fellow of fine pluck!" cried Hell-fire Ned; "although, at first sight, I did not give you credit for having a blade to your hilt; but I shall only pink you, young man—just that you may have it to say you were bled by Ned Keogh." Then calmly drawing forth his rapier, and taking off his little silk chapeau from the apex of his frizzed and scented toupée, he saluted his youthful antagonist with all the formality of the duello; then replacing his hat firmly on his head, threw himself into a posture of defence, while a look of fierce and angry determination flashed from his full dark eye, on the handsome and interesting face of the gallant young Edmund.

After half a dozen passes had been parried on either side, with a skill and grace which marked the hand of the master, Keogh dropped his point for a truce, saying, "Put up your sword!—you are a splendid young fellow, whoever you are!—and it would go to my heart even to pink you! Retire! and be for ever proud that you escaped Ned Keogh's point."

"Sir," replied Edmund, almost yielding to the first impulse of his generous and unpractised heart, "do but satisfy my honour by saying you are sorry for applying to me the opprobrious term RASCAL, and I will sheath my sword, and depart your friend."

"No, no, my lad!—that's too much!—apology is a word Ned Keogh could never find in his vocabulary! COME ON!"

Again their blades crossed. Keogh now became the assailant; his powerful arm, his steady eye, and daring courage, with the experience of twenty such combats on his mind, presented fearful odds against the inexperienced Edmund, who, although expert to perfection with the foils, had never, until that awful moment, been engaged in an encounter of life and death; but native, inborn courage nerved his arm. He gained each moment on his adversary, whose parries of Edmund's quick and masterly assaults became each moment more feeble. He ceased to attack in return, remaining strictly on the defensive; but his efforts were vain—skill and experience each moment yielded to youth and activity. Edmund forced his antagonist to the wall of the provost's garden, outside of which the rencontre took place; then pursuing his advantage by one desperate lunge in "carte," pinned his adversary to the wall! Keogh, whose colour but slightly changed, dropped his sword on the instant, and grasping the blade of Edmund, cried, "Don't withdraw your sword for a moment;" then drawing from his pocket his perfumed handkerchief, presented it to the youth, saying—"Wipe the point of your sword ere you draw it through my body, for I feel that it has entered the mortar of the wall!"

Edmund most delicately performed this extraordinary task, when a gush of blood followed the retreat of the weapon.

Keogh thrust his thumb, covered with the handkerchief, into the wound in his breast, which for the while partially arrested the effusion of blood; then, addressing Edmund, said, "You are a brave boy!—but who the devil taught you to fence?—for there was but ONE man in Europe, before yourself, who could ever hit me in 'carte,' and that," added he (with a sigh of sorrowful recollection,) "was poor Mun Roche!"

"My FATHER, Sir," exclaimed the agitated Edmund, trembling with the deepest emotion, while the tear of pity filled his brilliant eye.

"Your FATHER, did you say! then, by —, it was born with you. Well, be off, now, as fast as you can, for fear of the worst: you will pass a chair-stand half-way up the street, hurry one to me instantly; tell the chairmen, that Mr. Keogh is hit, and where they'll find me,—but stop a moment, give me your hand, I now heartily beg pardon for the odious name my angry haste bestowed on you. 'Rascal never did, and I am sure never will stand in your shoes;' but I feel giddy, lower me gently to the ground, and place me with my back to the wall. Farewell! O! that I should ever have been hit in carte!"

He ceased to speak; the vital spark appeared to have fled. Edmund hurried to the stand of sedan-chairs, and was soon on the spot again, where, with the aid of the chairmen, (who all knew Squire Keogh,) he placed the bleeding body in the chair, accompanying it towards its destination, determined, at all personal risks, not to forsake it, while a chance of life remained. The chairmen well knew where to go; and, as fortunately, Mr. Keogh's residence was not two hundred paces distant, but little time was lost. The motion of the chair, and the cool morning breeze blowing on his face, so far revived the wounded man, as to enable him to recognise his late adversary in kind attendance, to whom he stretched out his cold and clammy hand to give and receive the token of forgiveness, he then waved it to Edmund to fly.

This was Hell-fire Ned's last duel. He recovered sufficiently to drag on a life of precarious health for many years. His lungs had been irrecoverably injured; his once sonorous voice dwindled to a whisper; and he was only kept alive from season to season by dint of medical skill. The once bold and daring Keogh might be seen, during the ten following years, creeping about the pump-room at Bath, leaning on his valet's arm, or trundling along the sunny side of the streets in his wheel-chair, trembling at every breath of wind, yet gasping for freer respiration. He lived long enough to expiate, it is to be hoped, by penitence and severe suffering, the evils of his days of sin.

On reaching his lodgings, Edmund found his noble friend anxiously on the watch, and full of doubts and fears for his safe return. A few minutes sufficed to explain the unfortunate dilemma in which mischance had involved him during the brief half-hour of their separation. The recovery of the wounded man, they both considered as too hopeless an expectation to be entertained: flight from their present quarters appeared to both to be indispensable, at least for the safety of Edmund, whose first and most natural thought was the shelter afforded by his uncle's roof. To that arrangement his grieved and agitated friend agreed.

That extraordinary man, Ned Keogh, even at the worst period of his danger, preserved the most honourable silence as to the name and station in life of his late antagonist; always declaring that the duel was a perfectly fair one, and entirely of his own provoking.

Edmund took a fond, and, alas! a long and last farewell of his amiable friend, whose life (passed in the practice of all those virtues which ennoble the nobility he sprung from—a brave and loyal subject, a kind and generous landlord, a firm patriot and enlightened legislator) was prolonged until the year 183—; presenting an example of true nobility to the two generations which propped the declining years of the venerable octogenarian.

Edmund, by easy stages, reached his uncle's home in safety, and in renovated health and spirits. Walter Roche, in whose eye courage was a cardinal virtue, listened with pride to the brief details afforded by his beloved nephew, of his adventure with the well-known Keogh, and seized every opportunity of seeking to erase, from the mind of his young relative, the contemplation of his academic disgrace, by inculcating a taste for the profession of arms. His efforts were not thrown away; they but too quickly gained on the heart of the late studious and talented Edmund. America was still the theatre of active war: thither the ardent youth often expressed an anxious desire to repair; but there was a mysterious obscurity in Walter's replies, when pressed on the subject of purchasing a commission for him in the British army, which the unsuspecting youth found it impossible to account for: and, as his uncle had, in answer to his frequent inquiries after his father, been equally reserved, poor Edmund conceived himself to be an orphan!—the dependent child of his generous uncle's bounty. He, therefore, from delicacy, and a deep sense of grateful obligation, waited for Walter's disclosure of his real situation; but, in the meantime, his passion for the stirring life of a soldier, balked from day to day by the dull monotony of his present mode of life, rendered his existence a burden; and, in one of those moments, when the almost despairing youth, (throwing off his accustomed reserve,) expressed a wish that he could enter even as a volunteer in a foreign service, rather than continue a life of debasing idleness, which destroyed his peace, the eye of the watchful uncle beamed with delight; and clasping Edmund to his heart, he exclaimed "Spoken like a true Roche! Yes, my boy, you shall go forth to the war, and fight under the banner of your noble grandsire: your father lives! his heart pants to press his gallant Edmund to his bosom."

Overpowered, and almost intoxicated with astonishment and joy, at the mention of a living parent, Edmund was impatient for the moment that was to hurry him to his embraces. He never once thought of inquiring under what monarch, or in what cause that parent had drawn his sword. But, in a few days Walter disclosed to him the important secret, that his father had for the last few years been in a distant colony of France, in command of that regiment of the Irish Brigade, which the French monarch had bestowed on Edmund's maternal ancestor, as a reward for his fidelity and attachment to the exiled James, and whose granddaughter Colonel Roche had espoused.

France was to young Edmund the land of his birth; his native home; the scene of his earliest attachments. Of England he knew nothing, but that which he had seen during a hasty journey. Ireland, although beloved by him as the land of his fathers, had nothing to attract his ardent mind, cut off, as he appeared to be, for ever, from all chance of regaining his ancestral rights. The towering castle of Kendillon; its rich domains; its broad lands, extending over half a county, had, by the falsehood of an intrusive king, or the perfidy of his councillors, been torn from his great-grandsire; and the descendants of the slavish adherents of the Dutch usurper, now revelled in the halls of the too faithful exiles: a century of undisturbed and undisputed possession left them nothing now to fear; all those hopes which his boyhood cherished now vanished, as dawning manhood ripened his understanding; and too painfully was he convinced, that nothing short of another revolution could wrest those possessions from the present owners. Here, then, was another, and a powerful motive for withdrawing from a country where he had everything to mourn for and deplore; without a single ray of hope to cheer him. His impatience to depart was kept in check by the absence of the friar, on whom, he soon became sensible, his movements entirely depended. The Jesuit had gone on a secret mission to Holland and France two months before; but his return was momentarily looked for. This mysterious personage soon made his appearance; and, in a private conference with the uncle, learnt all that had passed in his absence with regard to Edmund. The friar, in his turn, informed his host, that he had a ready mode of conveyance to the coast of France or Holland; spoke exultingly of the threatened invasion, which at that time threw half England into stupid alarm; and urged an immediate departure. But few days passed in making preparation for the journey. The Padre was abundantly supplied with the grand "materiel," money! but in externals he presented the mean appearance of the humblest son of his church. Edmund assumed the garb of his lay-brother; and in that almost menial capacity appeared, with a small pack or knapsack on his back, on the morning of their flight. After an affectionate farewell, they took their departure for the coast, loaded with the blessings of the Jacobite uncle.

They reached the river Kenmare after three weeks' unceasing travel through the most wild untrudged portions of Galway, Clare, and Kerry. In a sequestered cove, near the mouth of this river, the friar calculated on finding his confidential skipper. Nor was he disappointed: Mynheer's lugger had just discharged a cargo of smuggled gin and brandy, and was again ready for sea. A dark night and favouring breeze facilitated their escape; and in a few hours they were beyond the bounds to which the revenue vessels extended their cruise. Another night and day brought them to the French coast; a pilot vessel, heaving in sight, was brought to, into which the adventurous pair stepped; the friar having previously paid to the skipper one hundred louis d'ors, according to stipulation. The parties on shore being, as might be expected, on the watch, the friar and his pupil were instantly arrested, and brought before the sub-commandant of the place—a garrison town. A few words from the Padre, and the exhibition of a paper, (which he carried in a silken scapulary, worn round his neck, inside of every garment,) soon changed their imprisonment into the most respectful reception: they were led to the house of the governor of the town, feasted, refreshed, provided with passports; and their requisition for a carriage and post-horses having been instantly complied with, they pursued their journey to Paris.

To Edmund all this appeared like magic; for he little knew that the friar bore on his bosom the secret circular of the Prime Minister of France, (whose confidential emissary he had been for years;) and which instrument was all-powerful, not only in France, but also in those countries engaged in the war against England.

Nothing occurred to interrupt or retard their rapid journey to Paris, on reaching which Edmund found himself domiciliated, "en pension," in the College of Jesuits, where he was daily visited by the friar. His recollections of Paris were so faint, that he felt as one who had been dropped into a new world, and experienced no small share of delight on being permitted, during certain hours of each day, to visit the galleries and musées of that celebrated city, under the charge of a senior of the college. On one occasion, he was led, at his earnest entreaty, to the Faubourg St. Germain, where, after some search in a gloomy and retired nook of that once splendid region of fashion, he recognised an old neglected hôtel, which, but ten years before, had been the scene of a painful incident in his life, which was never for a day absent from his thoughts and affections. But it is time, while the friar is employed in gaining intelligence of the parent, to give some account of the early history of the son.

Young Roche's earliest recollections brought him to the third or fourth year of his age, under the care of a lady at Versailles. Although ever kind, attentive, and indulgent to his childish desires, there was still that reserve in her conduct which forbid his young heart to love her as a mother. At six, his first male tutor was introduced; he was an Irish ecclesiastic, whose mild, engaging manners soon won the affections of his infant pupil: under his instructions, Edmund became master of the English language, in addition to his own; so that, at the age of eight years, he spoke and wrote each correctly. His range of amusements were limited, and such as were fitting for his age and lively spirit. For eleven months each year he never left Versailles, or its vicinity, but he constantly looked forward, with delightful anticipations, to his annual visit to Paris, which always extended to a month; where he found himself domesticated in a large old-fashioned hôtel in the Faubourg St. Germain, a locality which even then struck his tender mind with sadness from the silence and solitude which seemed to reign within. The establishment, though not stinted, bore the appearance of departed grandeur, which, on each visit of the quick-minded and observant child, made the deeper impression.

On the return of his annual visit to the metropolis, he was always received in the embraces of a lady whose doating fondness spoke to his beating heart in the language of nature, that he was in a mother's arms; while the mild and dignified caresses bestowed on him by a venerable gentleman, whom the servants addressed as Count, soon assured him that he saw, in that nobleman, his fond grandsire.

It was not until his ninth year he had been bleased with a sight of his father, (at least to his recollection;) but when, at that period, and with an understanding beyond his years, his mother presented him to a gentleman of splendid personal appearance and dignified carriage as "His Son EDMUND!"—the boy, bursting into tears of joy, rushed into the brilliant stranger's arms almost senseless with delight. The father seemed equally moved and delighted, gazing alternately on the beautiful features of his wife and son, as he pressed both in turns to his heart; but the frequent deep-drawn sigh which burst from his agonized heart as he pressed his sweet-countenanced boy to his bosom, too plainly told that all was not peace within. Roche felt that the hour was fast approaching which would unveil his real character, which would banish him for ever from the heart of a lovely and amiable woman, and change that devoted love which she had ever shown to him, under every vicissitude of fortune, into hatred and contempt.

Some ten years before the period of this interview, the gay, the gallant, the irresistible La Roche had been introduced as a visiter at the hôtel of the exiled Earl of —, the only son and successor of one of those self-devoted peers of Ireland, who followed the fortunes of the last king of the unfortunate House of Stuart. At the period of James's abdication, the earl collected, in money and jewels, a large amount of property: these, with the pension granted to him by the French monarch, and the profits and patronage of the regiment with which he was honoured as the reward of his fidelity, enabled him to support his rank with becoming decency; and, at his decease, Louis XV. conferred the regiment on his son, the successor to an empty title and forfeited estate! It was in the hôtel of the latter that Roche first saw the lovely young countess, as (by the gallant courtesy of her circle) she was usually designated. Her mother had lost her life in giving her birth, leaving the earl a solitary man! His daughter was placed under the matronage of one of the ancienne noblesse, who reared her with the tenderest care; and, at the age of sixteen, the young countess became one of the most admired of the youthful beauties of the courtly circle; at twenty she presided at her father's hôtel, to which mirth and gaiety had too long been strangers.

At one of those gay soirées, the young countess was, in an evil hour, introduced to the fascinating Roche, who made himself but too agreeable to be forgotten. After the brilliant crowd had retired, her mind was filled with his image; his fine face, manly and graceful form, his proud eye, (which, while it seemed to look with cold indifference or disdain on all the glittering throng, softened into the most seducing tenderness when bent on hers,) could not be banished from her busy mind; another and another opportunity for the completion of his conquest soon followed;—Roche won her heart, and her unhappy destiny became fixed for ever.

Melancholy forebodings possessed the mind of the old earl: although, himself a stranger to Ireland, still the intercourse he had always maintained with those Irish families of his own creed and politics, who occasionally visited Paris, enabhim to form a sounder judgment than his deluded child, on the pretensions of the son-in-law she proposed to him. He learned that his family castle and estate were but as shadows: all that remained of that estate, dilapidated and impoverished by a line of prodigal predecessors, had passed from him to his brother, whose frugality had rescued it from total ruin and alienation. Then, again, his long absences from his native country, without any visible resources in Paris, placed the character of Roche in a very doubtful point of view in the eyes of the cautious parent. But the daughter's passion, and Roche's importunity, outweighed a father's admonition, and, eventually, commands: the ceremony, which was to forge the fetters of her future sorrow, was performed in secret by the ever-meddling Friar John, who seemed to have been born the evil genius of that luckless family!

This marriage was fraught with all the cares and evils which a clandestine union, formed against a fond parent's wishes, invariably produces; but its natural effects could not be long concealed, and, in the course of a few months, the weeping, humbled daughter, on her knees, confessed the important secret, imploring the mercy and forgiveness of an offended father! The poor old earl, who had himself been a "man of sorrows," mingled his tears with those of his still beloved child; and, although he could not at once pardon, he did not too harshly chide the disobedience of the last remaining branch of his ancient house and name: but it required some time to overcome his repugnance to meet her husband; of whom, from the first, he had felt an insurmountable distrust and fear. Time, however, and the peace of one so dear to him, the sole object of his earthly thoughts, softened this feeling into one of gentle forbearance; which the grateful daughter repaid by the most devoted attention to his increasing infirmities.

Roche, on leaving Paris a few months after his marriage, was profuse of his flattering promises; only separating himself, as he stated, for a brief period, to make the necessary arrangements for the removal of his bride to his Irish estate and hereditary castle, where, as he boasted, she should preside over an establishment worthy of her birth and ancestry. Year after year did he thus delude his fond and faithful wife, with a story hatched in fraud, and continued in falsehood. He always found some plausible and, as he represented it, powerful reason, for passing half the year away from his wife and infant son, whom the anxious mother had placed in a situation better calculated to promote his comfort and happiness than the gloomy hôtel in St. Germain; but, on each revisit, his flattering promises were renewed, and, of course, broken. A woman's love, flattered and fostered by the apparently unabated fondness of the idol of her heart, is blind to every fault and doubt; but the old earl could ill reconcile to his mind this boasted fondness of the husband with his long absence from his too-confiding wife: this he delicately hinted to his daughter, and pressed her to demand of Roche the fulfilment of his voluntary promise, or to fix his permanent residence in France, where, in addition to whatever fortune he might himself possess, should be added as much as the earl could spare to support their rank in society, with, (as the earl expressed it in tears,) "the reversion of all I now possess, at that period which cannot now be distant." This kind and forgiving declaration of the generous earl wrung the heart of the young countess, and awakened suspicions long struggling in her breast against the husband of her unfortunate choice; for, alas! she had, in moments of tenderness, fondly urged all these points her parent had suggested, but met with a cold, and sometimes peevish, reproof from her husband, for doubting his honour.

When young Edmund had passed his eighth year, his mother, with the hope of awakening a father's feelings to a sense of duty, prevailed on him to see his son, after being estranged from his sight since his earliest infancy. The impression made on Roche by this interview, revived the wavering hopes of the wretched wife; but those hopes were destined to be wrecked. Another long and painful absence left her a prey to every suspicion unfavourable to her husband's honour and character; his name became publicly talked of; and suspicion soon yielded to the bitter conviction that she had sacrificed herself to a confirmed and desperate gamester! Longer to love him was impossible; and, alas, to hate him equally so. She almost hated and despised herself, for so readily becoming the dupe of his arts, and her own weakness. She beheld her aged parent yielding every day and hour to the intensity of his sorrow, and the disappointment of his fondest and most tenderly cherished hope. Amidst this conflict of feelings, the amiable countess sank into a state of apathetic melancholy, from which she never recovered, except during the few days preceding her death, which she passed with her beloved child. She charitably forbore to utter one sentence of complaint against his unfeeling father; but while endeavouring to impress on his tender mind his legitimate claim to the honours of her family—an object for which, from her earliest years, she had been an enthusiast—she forcibly urged on him, as her last injunction and departing prayer, to assert them. "Pursue them, my child, from youth to manhood—from manhood to the grave! Take this honoured badge of our house's rights—THE GREEN GAUNTLET—won from the invader on the field of honour; preserve it, until it can again be displayed in our ancient hall. There may be some living to whom the memory of this family badge is dear, whose great-grandfathers have fought under its banners, and who may have listened to the midnight tale of the wandering bard, as he told or sung the glories of the founder of Kendillon Castle."

Young Edmund heard his dying mother's last instructions in weeping silence: he pressed to his lips the hand which bestowed on him this last bequest, without understanding the weighty import of the command by which it was accompanied. He only thought, with an afflicted heart, on his dear expiring mother—to him infinitely more dear and precious than thrones or castles! Once more the countess grasped her Edmund, and attempted to give utterance to her thoughts; but the lamp of life was already dimmed—her child, the world, was lost to her view—and her last earthly effort was to press him to her bosom, ere she breathed her expiring sigh upon his moist and pallid cheek. . . .

Edmund was removed back to Versailles, under the care of his tutor, where he remained until the return of his father to Paris. The disconsolate earl was desirous of retaining the child as his adopted heir; but Roche, who professed, and no doubt felt, the deepest sorrow at the untimely loss of his much-loved, though unkindly-treated wife, prevailed on him to permit the boy to accompany him to Ireland: his object in removing him thither for a time being, as he stated, and, indeed, truly hoped, to secure to him the reversion of that remnant of the family estates which his brother had preserved. At that period, the peace between France and England had not been openly broken; but, in the contemplation of that event, emissaries had been despatched into various countries, to communicate whatever might prove a guide to the French ministry at such a critical moment. Friar John was selected, for his talents, address, and activity, to take up his residence in Ireland; and to foment and encourage that spirit of discontent, which under one form or another has never ceased to afflict that unhappy country: by the pernicious influence of that dangerous enthusiast—(who, to all his crimes, could bring but one virtue, the love of country!)—Roche became a TRAITOR!

After his final disappearance from Dublin, Roche went abroad with the regiment of his noble father-in-law, in which, as the representative of the earl, he was honoured with the provincial rank of Lieutenant-colonel. His period of service abroad was prolonged far beyond his expectations, and young Edmund remained in Ireland a few months too long; for the death of the old earl took place but three months before the friar brought him to Paris: but whatever property remained, was secured to him by his grandfather's last will. Roche was daily expected in France. Young Edmund felt each day of his delay an age to his impatient heart; at length intelligence reached them of his arrival at Bordeaux. Day after day passed in fearful anxiety; at length Colonel La Roche presented himself: but what an awful change a few years of foreign service, and heavy sorrow, had wrought on that once splendid frame. The late handsome gallant Roche, now worn down by climate, care, and, alas! by the stings of conscience, to a sallow skeleton, was but the fastly-fading phantom of his former self. His nerves were shattered; and he shrunk back with a shriek of horror, (as if a snake had reared itself in his path,) when his warm-hearted son pressed forward to bestow his dutiful embrace, in whose features Roche fancied he beheld those of his lost and martyred wife! His senses, for the moment, wavered; but, when he looked again, and saw that it was his own beloved Edmund, in all the grace of early manhood, who stood before him, he fell upon his neck with all a parent's pride and fondness, while a stream of tears poured down his wasted cheek. He was compelled to repair to his chamber, where his affectionate son was his constant attendant. The unhappy father recognised in the growing manliness of his noble-minded boy, the counterpart of his early self, ere yet the demon of false ambition, and the accursed love of gold, corrupted his once ingenuous heart. But when left alone to his reflections, the retrospect of the past brought horror to his soul; the faults and follies of twenty years were wound up by the crime of Treason!—the sense of which rankled in his heart, a festering incurable wound!

"And shall my boy—my brave, my handsome Edmund—be hereafter branded as THE TRAITOR'S SON?" The thought was maddening; but there was one beam of consolation left to the unhappy man, which broke through the gloom of his fevered mind. "Edmund is a Frenchman born; the descendant of a despoiled and plundered noble, ancient in blood, high in ancestry, and brave in battle; whose only crime was fidelity to his LAWFUL SOVEREIGN, to whom, as a subject and a peer, he had sworn fealty, even to the death! Edmund is, at least, no TRAITOR!" These were the audible sentiments which burst from the overburdened breast of the distracted parent, as he paced his chamber with flurried step, while revolving in his mind the events of his misspent life. Edmund, who had been tempted, by filial anxiety, to break in on his father's privacy, only heard the last sentence—"Edmund is at least no TRAITOR," instantly threw himself into his parent's arms, saying, "No, father, no traitor! but the sworn avenger of his noble grandsire's wrongs, and a beloved mother's sorrows. Weak and powerless as we are at present, the time may not be distant when the banner of the Green Gauntlet shall once more proudly float over the towers of Kendillon!" A deep sigh, and look of proud admiration, on the animated countenance of his enthusiastic son, expressed more than his faltering tongue could utter. Roche flung himself on his couch; and, after some moments' silence, rose and said:—"Time, time, my Edmund, may aid our cause. America has already succeeded in throwing off the yoke of her oppressive tyrant; IRELAND, the betrayed, yet still, in heart, unconquered Ireland, must follow in the march of independence. This country is pledged to her support. Forty thousand citizen soldiers* are in arms to assert her rights. The God of JUSTICE will aid our cause! but an awful storm is now gathering over the destinies of France, which casts its dark and awful shadow before. Great events are in the womb of Time. We must be patient and watchful. You are yet young, my son: a few years' active service will add to those attainments which your fond father's heart rejoices to acknowledge: your destination is fixed: in a few short weeks you must depart for St. Domingo, to join your late grandsire's regiment, which I have had the honour to command for the last five years. It bears your ancestral name, and you may aspire, should fate spare you, to the honour of being, at some future day, its chief! The good king has not bestowed it since the earl's death; and it is rumoured that it is reserved for me. Be that as it may, you, my Edmund, must commence your career as a volunteer in the ranks for one campaign : it is an honourable ordeal, submitted to by the Fitzjameses, the Conways, the O'Connells, the Walsh de Serrents, the Dillons, and Clonards of the last age : it is a proud humiliation, to which the descendant of the noble house of Kendillon will not fail to do credit."

Edmund felt too much elated at the prospect of employment in the field of honour, to offer the slightest objection to his father's proposition. The father's health and spirits appeared to rally under the excitement of meeting a son of whom he might feel so justly proud. He made the effort to appear at Court, where he presented young Edmund to the mild and amiable Louis, and also to his ill-fated partner, the beautiful Maria Antoinette, then the brightest star in the galaxy of royalty, the dazzling queen of beauty, and the idol of that strange, inconstant people, who, in a few short years, led her, a broken-hearted mother and a widowed queen, amidst the din of their brutal shouts and execrations, to a public and ignominious death!

Colonel La Roche was complimented by his gracious sovereign on the gallant bearing of the young soldier; and as personal attractions, such as Edmund possessed, never passed unnoticed by the gay, incautious Maria Antoinette, he was honoured with her majesty's especial favour and notice. At this Court-day the king, as a mark of his especial favour, and in approbation of La Roche's services, presented him with the regiment which his ancestor had bestowed on the first exiled earl,—a distinction which he was not long destined to enjoy!

The day which was to separate him from his every-day-more-loved Edmund, now fast approached; and the father's heart sank at the thought that such separation would be eternal! He once more relapsed into an alarming state of health, aggravated by the terrors of his approaching loss, and the sad review of his wasted life: the errors of his criminal career then hurried before him in threatening array; his cruel neglect of an amiable and too-confiding wife, whose peace he had wrecked, whose heart he had broken! his many violations of honour and integrity; the ruin of female virtue; the heartless plunder of the unsuspecting victims of his gaming arts; the blood which he had shed in lewd and wanton quarrels, to sustain, for a moment, the honour of a polluted, worthless fame, now claimed their revenge, and smote his heart with pangs unutterable. He could, with difficulty, go through the sorrowful task of leave-taking with his poor Edmund, after which he sank exhausted on his pillow. The son lingered until next morning, when, learning that his father, after passing through the severe struggle of the previous day, had enjoyed some hours of deep repose, and had awoke refreshed, comforted, and improved in health, the affectionate Edmund took his departure, accompanied to his port of embarkation by the guardian friar.

Edmund had not long reached his destination, ere death terminated the worldly woes of his guilty and unfortunate father. Young Roche's reception at his regiment was as flattering as his most ardent hopes could expect. Whatever had been the errors of his father's former life, he seemed to have felt the necessity of establishing a better fame. His name and features proved a ready passport to the respect and good-will of all the corps; and when the sad intelligence of his father's death reached him, he found much relief in the general sympathy of his brother-officers, who, like himself, were strangers to his crimes, and only knew him by his virtues.

Poor Edmund felt that, with the exception of his kind uncle, he now stood alone in the world, without a relative—without a country that he could call his home! It happened, fortunately for his peace of mind, that his first year's service was one of such perpetual labour and activity, as to afford him no time to brood over his distressing reflections. Yet he often looked, with moistened eyes and with flattering hopes, on his dear mother's gift—the Green Gauntlet! It was an embroidered glove of green velvet, studded on the back with costly emeralds. An ancient legend ascribed to it the virtue of protecting the person of the bearer from the perils of fire, of battle, or of shipwreck; but it was not those supposed virtues which endeared it to the heart of Edmund: his fond recollections of his beloved mother gave it all its value, and on her dying injunctions he often pondered with mixed feelings of hope and despair. His probationary year having expired, the commission of lieutenant, which he then received, was quickly followed by that of captain; sent out from France, after his father's death, as a testimony of respect to his memory and services.

Edmund's heart sank within him when, at the conclusion of the war, he found his regiment set down for a seven-years' tour of duty in the West Indies. At length time brought about that portentous event THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, which, though long foreseen and intensely dreaded, burst as a moral earthquake on astonished Europe, uprooting all those institutions which had, in fatal security, been deemed impregnable; implanting a new and dangerous popular sentiment, which still agitates the world. The flame of liberty, which at first spread its dazzling blaze over the parent country, soon illumined the dark children of Africa, forming the slave population of her colonies,—a race which had long thirsted to avenge the wrongs of ages on that refined and luxurious minority, by whom they were bound in chains of submission. Emissaries were soon sent to the West Indies to fraternize the sable citizens of all the French islands: partial revolts arose in almost every settlement; fierce and bloody were the contests for ascendancy and dominion; but, for a time, the royal cause withstood each revolutionary assault.

Watching a favourable opportunity, a little band of royalists seized on an American schooner (whose crew they quickly brought over to their purpose;) and, under cover of the night, spread their sails on the bosom of the wide Atlantic, hoping to reach the American continent, from whence they might obtain a passage to England, and ultimately join the allied army then invading France; but they were not destined to tread the shores of America. Two days had not elapsed before they were captured by a British frigate, which had been despatched "on board" the grand naval and military expedition against the French West India possessions, under Sir John Jervis and Sir Charles Grey, whose powerful armament was then in those seas, and expected, from day to day, at the rendezvous of Barbadoes.

In the course of ten days, the expedition had reached Barbadoes, when the refugees were presented. The senior officer was first examined. He gave general information as to the strength of the garrison, as well as the irregular forces at the several islands. The six royalist officers were left at Barbadoes, on parole, with the assurance of a passage to England in the first Europe-bound man-of-war.

Our hero and his companions reached England in safety, having been treated with the utmost liberality by the naval officer to whose charge they had been committed. On detailing to the British Government the events which preceded, and induced their desertion of the Republican standard, they were offered commissions in the regiments of the Irish Brigade then being raised in Ireland, under the names and colonelcies of their former chiefs—an offer which, it is needless to say, was joyfully accepted. Edmund's companions joined those regiments under whose commanders they had originally graduated; while he was honoured with the majority of that which was to bear his maternal ancestral name. Edmund felt that the stain of treason was on the name of Roche, and sought to wipe it out. He accordingly volunteered his services with the army on the continent, then under the command of the Duke of York, pending the completion of his regiment. His offer was accepted; and he repaired to his Royal Highness' headquarters, with the appointment as Acting-Assistant Quartermaster-General. It so happened, that the first service in which his courage and talents were called into action, fully established the superiority of both. The British army having been compelled to make a sudden retrograde movement, a detachment of British cavalry, employed on a distant reconnaissance, was unfortunately cut off; and its sacrifice, or capture by day-break, appeared inevitable, being hemmed in on one side by the right wing of the enemy and by the river Waal, on the other by the French army. Edmund proposed to attempt its release at every peril, and was allowed to undertake the dangerous service. Availing himself of the shade of evening, he found means, by a long detour, to escape the observation of the French sentries, between the army and the river, whose stations he had carefully noticed, and reached the detachment (whose unfortunate position was as yet unknown to the enemy) just as the officer in command had formed the desperate resolution of attempting to cut his way through the French piquets, or perish in the daring attempt. After a short conference, he placed himself and his detachment unreservedly under Major Roche's orders. 'Twas near the hour of ten, the night dark and hazy. Edmund ordered the dragoons to advance in the strictest silence, each man carrying the scabbard of his sabre under his left arm, to guard against its clattering; each file to keep his eye fixed on his immediate leader. In this silent order they proceeded, Edmund and the officer in front, until their arrival within a short distance of the post where he calculated they would encounter the first sentinel. Edmund then dismounted, and with pistol in hand turned off in an oblique direction, desiring the officer and detachment to move gently on, to await the sentry's challenge for the parole. Edmund was correct as to the distance; and seeing the drowsy sentry open to attack, sprung upon him ere he could raise his voice or musket, and in an instant brought him to the ground, gagged by his handkerchief. With a pistol to his temple, he extorted the parole in a stifled whisper, when the handkerchief was drawn tight through his mouth, and tied behind his neck; his arms were pinioned by Edmund, with his sash, his legs by the strap of his own musket, from which Edmund took the precaution to dislodge the flint. Thus having securely bound the sentry, Edmund advanced to meet the detachment, when, in a loud voice, he challenged with the usual "QUI VIVE?" Encouraged by his first success, he sprung upon his horse, and leaving the overpowered sentry in that helpless state in which, before another quarter of an hour, he was discovered, boldly pushed on at a trot. Arrived at the next post, his ears were saluted with the "Qui vive?" of the sentinel.

"Republicain Français," answered Edmund, with the pure French accent.

"Avancez, et donnez la parole."

Edmund advancing nearly to the point of the bayonet, answered in a low deep tone—

"La Victoire!"

"Passez, mon Colonel," replied the sentry. "Vive la République!"

"Allons, mes citoyens," cried Edmund to the dragoons. "Vive la République!"

The sentry resumed his silent walk, while Edmund and the detachment (which had naturally been mistaken for the rounds of the visiting field-officer of the night) pushed on at a good pace, still on the flank of the main body of the army, and almost on the brink of the river, when he took a moment's breath to give his farther orders. "Keep that star," said he, pointing to the northern constellation, "in sight: there lies our course. At the word GALLOR, follow ME! we must have no firing. Silence and the sabre! my men, are what we must trust to." Sounds resembling the tramp and clatter of cavalry in the rear, at that moment broke on the ear of the anxious Edmund; again they were heard, and nearer! "Now," cried our hero, "the moment for action has arrived; we can no longer conceal ourselves! FORWARD! AND CUT DOWN ALL WHO OPPOSE YOU!" This was the very order they all panted to receive: in a few moments they were challenged by the quarter-guard. Edmund's hurried reply to the challenge for the parole did not seem quite satisfactory to the officer of the guard, whose men, while hastily turning out for action, were rode over, trampled on, and cut down by the brave detachment. An ill-directed fire, which slightly wounded a few of the horses, only aided their flight, as by its flash they were the more clearly directed to the track of their gallant leader, whose sword gleamed in the sudden blaze. The last outlying piquet had yet to be passed: in their front a platoon awaited them with levelled muskets; in their rear, the noise of pursuing cavalry became each moment more distinct. At this critical moment, Edmund reined up to order the detachment to advance in line and extend themselves, then proceed at the top of their speed. This instruction obeyed, the word "GALLOP!" sent them on like a whirlwind. The volley by which they were met, did some partial injury both to men and horses, but was instantly avenged by the yawning gashes of the British sabre. The main body of the enemy had been passed; their route now happily lay over an unbroken plain, and within less than a mile of the British lines, which they shortly reached, undiminished in numbers, and unsubdued in spirit, but not without some damage in wounds—fortunately none mortal. Never did men behave with more steadiness and courage.

This exploit, trifling as it must appear when blended with the general occurrences of the campaign, nevertheless created a powerful sensation at the time amongst the British army; and the highest encomiums were passed on him, who had the judgment to plan, and the boldness to execute, such a desperate rescue. The regiment to which this gallant detachment had been so fortunately restored, was one which had ever held a distinguished fame in the military annals of Great Britain. The officers of all ranks vied with each other to afford proofs of their admiration and grateful feeling towards our hero—to whom this was a proud moment, too soon, alas! to be clouded by that curse which seemed to hang over his existence, converting each transient joy to future misery.

"Will honour live with you?" our great dramatic poet asks, and wisely answers, "No; detraction will not let it." Thus it was with the doomed Edmund. Invidious whispers were heard, and as basely repeated, injurious to the fame of our unfortunate but guiltless hero. The ear of royalty was poisoned; the base epithet of the "Traitor's son" made its fatal impression; and Edmund found that cordial reception, with which he had been for a few days honoured, sinking hour by hour into cold and distant civility, or marked distrust. Amongst the whole army, Edmund could not trace the originator of that base scandal, under which he in silence winced, unless he fixed the foul deed on an object so contemptible, as to be at once beneath his anger, as well as protected by age and infirmity from the demands of injured honour. This person was an old half-maniac Lieutenant-colonel of Dragoon Guards; an Irishman. Edmund, on him, with justice, fixed as his traducer. More than thirty years before he had been "pinked" and disarmed by the celebrated Mun Roche, in a chocolate-house rencontre in Dublin. His hatred to the name and blood, strengthened with his years and infirmities; and he rejoiced in the opportunity afforded to him, of revenging on the guiltless and gallant son the disgrace inflicted on himself by the guilty but no less gallant father, over whose faults the grave should have thrown a shield.

That coldness, which is the more deeply felt, because pride forbids inquiry as to its cause, chilled our hero's rising spirit, and crushed those hopes which the acknowledgment of his merits had lately inspired; but the frown of royalty was upon him. Of the many who were of late so profuse in the offers of their friendship, all became cold and silent, save the officers of the brave dragoons, to whose regiment he had rendered such an important service. That gallant corps never for a moment slackened in their warmest hospitality; and, although delicacy for the feelings of an injured man forbade all allusion to his altered reception at headquarters, enough was said and shown, to convince Edmund, that there he would ever find a brave soldier's welcome.

The hopes of conquest with which the allied army took the field against the undisciplined republicans (or "sans culottes," as they were contemptuously termed,) in time yielded to more sober speculations. The veteran armies of some of the great Continental States were all but annihilated by the self-taught warriors of the "bonnet rouge;" and the once-vaunted march to Paris soon dwindled into a rapid retreat on their respective frontiers. The movements of the British troops were more critical: their safety could only be found in their floating castles; and to that extremity they came at last. The royal commander, leaving the army to conclude the campaign as it best could, took his hurried departure for England before the winter set in; the Hollander, trusting to his native swamps, doggedly returned to their protection, (together with the cavalry, and a portion of the infantry, of the British army;) but a hard winter formed a flinty passage for the pursuit of the half naked republicans, and, ere long, General Pichegrue taught the phlegmatic Dutchman and the dainty Briton the delicacy of a meal of horse-flesh!

On the return of the army to the luxury of English quarters, all the officers of the general staff were honoured with a step of brevet promotion, with the exception of the gallant Edmund! His name "did not appear on His Royal Highness' list."

The regiment to which our hero was appointed major having been completed in the course of that year, received orders for immediate embarkation for the West Indies. To Edmund, neither distance, clime, or danger, formed any obstacle to his ready service; but, with the sting of unmerited personal neglect still ranking in his honourable heart, and the more recent insult of being passed over in an all but general brevet, he felt it his duty to make an humble remonstrance, and placed his name on his Royal Highness' list for an audience. Rash man! could no friend be found to whisper to you that "They never pardon who have done the wrong!"

that your country, creed, and talents, were all mortal offences in the mind of intolerance and bigotry? No: poor Edmund had many admirers; but friendship is a rarely exhibited virtue in the British army, when its exercise has too often proved the downfall of the hopes of many a noble heart!

Edmund, on his appointed day, appeared before the Illustrious Duke, and was received with disdainful civility and averted eye. Having heard Edmund's energetic, but still most guarded, respectful remonstrance, his Royal Highness made his bow of dismissal, saying—"Your claims, Major Roche, shall be noted."

Edmund replied—"It is known to your Royal Highness that I am under orders for foreign service; and it would be highly honourable to my feelings, and, I humbly trust, not beyond my deserts, should your Royal Highness condescend to reconsider my case, and, even now, honour me with your royal recommendation for that brevet rank, to which, I most humbly submit, my services have afforded me a just claim."

"Sir," answered the Duke, "I have said your claims are noted—you will immediately join your regiment!"

Edmund (with a look that astonished the prince and soldier) replied—"THAT, I NEVER WILL, SIR." Then, with a profound bow, he left the Royal Duke, to expend the outpourings of his wrath on his obsequious secretary, whom a hurried ring of his private bell brought to his presence. Edmund anticipated their plans for getting rid of him, by sending in his resignation that very night, which was eagerly accepted, and a Horse Guards' hanger-on appeared in the next Gazette for the majority thus vacated. Here poor Edmund's connexion with the British army ceased, and for ever! His views were now fixed on Ireland: there, at least, he had a temporary home. His circumstances, too, were not low: he possessed upwards of five thousand pounds, inherited from his maternal grandfather, which his prudent uncle had the foresight to withdraw from France, and place in the British funds, before the breaking out of the Revolution. But what must have been his horror,—his despair,—on learning that this beloved uncle—this only tie which bound him to earth—was, at the very moment he so rashly threw his commission at the feet of majesty, a prisoner in Dublin Castle, on a charge of HIGH TREASON! And the affectionate nephew lost not a moment in setting off for the scene of his dear relative's captivity; but he was little aware of the despotic sway exercised over life, liberty, and property, in that unhappy country, by a Government at that period equally strangers to humanity and justice. Month after month passed, while the tools of a sanguinary faction were employed in the base attempt to concoct proofs of sedition against the unfortunate prisoner, Walter. It was by one of those vampires, called Government informers, that Walter Roche had been denounced; but the vile attempts of this furious faction were frustrated by the resumption of the Habeas Corpus Act.

THE SONGS OF THE TREES.

WHEN April arrayed in his smiles and his frowns,
Walks down the green valleys, and over the downs,
With young Spring in her garlands of primroses drest,
Leaning full on his arm, and oft by him caressed;
O then 'tis delightful, when Evening reigns,
To rove by the groves in the green grassy lanes,
And list to the madrigals sung by the trees,
As across them is wafting the wing of the breeze;
Their half-naked arms round each other they fling,
And of unalloyed pleasures they cheerily sing.

O they sing of the odours that live in the air;
Of the bright silken garments they quickly shall wear;
Of the nosegays that shortly will blush on their breasts,
And bloom in their hands, and embellish their crests;
How the zephyrs will come with their lineaments fair,
And kiss them, and play with their beautiful hair;
How the warblers of heaven in love with their charms,
Shall come and repose in their out-reaching arms,
And carol their holiest ditties away,
In the ears of the Morning the Eve and the Day;
How the dews will bespangle their emerald dresses,
When Night, gemmed with stars, the Earth's fair lip caresses;
How the sky will unveil its blue face clad in smiles,
And the clouds shine like crowns on the heads of the hills.

When the dark wing of Tempest the welkin enshrouds,
How the Rains will leap forth from the hands of the Clouds,

When Summer is scorching Earth's brow with his beams,
And bathe their green temples in hyaline streams:
How the young leaves their children will dance in the gale,
And flutter, and tell to them many a tale:
And how they will gently repose them to sleep,
When Cynthia beholds her bright face in the deep.

And they sing how the wild flowers will bloom at their feet,
Regaling the air with their fragrances sweet;
How the streamlets, set free by the icy chains made
By the rude hand of Winter, will leap in their shade,
And laugh with their dimpled cheeks all the long day,
As they fling on the campion their silvery spray;
How Passion and Beauty will come to their groves,
And blush on each other, and breathe out their loves.

Come here Sloth, and Labour! Come here Want and Thrall;
Come leave the thronged streets, the loom, bench, and the stall;
Come away from the bottle and fly from the can;
Bring here your worn frames and your visages wan;
For now 'tis delightful while Evening reigns,
To rove by the groves in the green grassy lanes,
And list to the madrigals sung by the trees,
As across them is brushing the wing of the breeze.

Manners and Customs of the Japanese in the Nineteenth Century. From recent Dutch visitors to Japan, and the German of Dr. Fr. Von Siebold. 1 vol. pp. 423.

THIS careful compilation gives the most complete picture which the English public has yet received of this singular and hermetically-sealed insular empire, mainly because, in forming it, every available authority has been employed. From the expulsion of the Jesuits and the Portuguese traders, two centuries since, little, until comparatively of late, has been heard of this remarkable people; who might in the interval, for all that was known of them to other nations, have as well disappeared from among the families of the earth. Of late the members of the small Dutch factory, imprisoned on a point near the coast of Japan, the Dutch being the only European people permitted to hold any commercial intercourse with that country, have, in emulation of the English, the French, and Russians, begun to keep journals of what they have seen and learned on their permitted journeys to the capital, to pay court and tribute; or in their restricted association with the natives. The whole foreign trade of Japan is limited to cargoes of copper and camphor for two Dutch ships which come annually to the factory, and a few Chinese junks,—the whole amount of the commerce being under £200,000. Japan is a country blessed above all others, by living wholly within itself, and by, in all things, highly valuing the wisdom of its ancestors. Custom and usage are omnipotent, and, together with superstition, present insurmountable obstacles to further progress in civilisation. They still prefer the matchlock to the musket, because the want of flints in their own country might make them dependent upon foreigners! But even in the hermetically-sealed Japan, there is a little smuggling, though the regulations under which the Dutch Factory is allowed to remain are rigid and jealous to the utmost degree.

The Japanese are evidently of the Mongol race, and their customs and manners have a general resemblance to those of the Chinese, with many differences and peculiarities. Their knowledge of the arts and sciences has been derived from China, though the insular empire—the kingdom of three thousand islands—has made less advancement in civilisation. The different kinds of religion, and the form of government, though much has been said about them, are, we apprehend, still but imperfectly known. Abundant absurdities and superstitions, as may be expected, mingle with both. The mikado or supreme sovereign, the grand lama of Japan, is over-ruled by a kind of viceroy; the siogoon, who in turn is ruled by a Council of State, fixed in the capital of Yedo, who appoint governors to all the provinces, who again appoint their own subordinate officers. It is quite like the House that Jack built.

The narrative of a journey made by the Dutch Embassy, (if it deserve so dignified a name,) to the capital Yedo, as it is here spelled, tells more about the country than might have been expected from the jealous exclusion and watchfulness with which the members of the embassy were treated, though, when cooped up, they were not unkindly used. In Japan, the system of espionage seems as complete as if a Fouché were at the head of the department, or an Emperor Nicholas. The women of Japan are not secluded like those of other eastern nations, and it is said that their education is as well attended to as that of the other sex; but they are without legal rights, and their evidence is inadmissible in a court of justice. The husband possesses unlimited power of divorce; but the wife can, under no plea, demand a separation from her husband. On the whole, the universal law of Woman and her Master is not inoperative in Japan. All the population receive the elements of education, and it is positively asserted that there is not a destitute day-labourer in the empire, which the exclusive system has preserved in peace for two centuries. This is inconceivable. Disregard of life is one of the most remarkable features of this singular people. The first law of nature, self-preservation, gives way before usage and etiquette. To practise suicide, by ripping up the abdomen, is regarded among the better classes as the point of honour; and it forms part of the chivalrous education of boys of the higher orders to be taught,—

The whole mystery of the Hara-kiri, literally meaning, we are told, "happy despatch;" and the proper appellation of the abdomen-ripping, by which a well-born man is often compelled to terminate his existence. They are taught not only the proper mode of performing the operation, and the several accompanying ceremonies, varying with the occasion, and with the consequent publicity or privacy, but also the nature of the occasions, i. e. of the causes and situations, which render this form of suicide imperative upon a gentleman. Girls, in lieu of this fearful indoctrination, receive lessons in the craft of the needle, with every species of ornamental work, in the service and management of a house, and in whatever it is thought may be useful to them as mothers and mistresses of families.

The power of opinion and custom is even more strongly displayed in this remarkable usage than in the Swille of the Hindoo widow. A man of any consequence, when accused of a crime, at once rips himself up, and thus evades the confiscation of his property, and the disgrace to his family, consequent upon a trial from which there is probably little chance of acquittal. Their criminal laws are sanguinary, and cruelty is a necessary consequence of their customs. The man who must, without hesitation, rip up himself, will not be very scrupulous about inflicting torture on his neighbour. As the French noblesse, under the old regime, were permitted to exile themselves from court, and remain secluded in their chateaux, so the Japanese courtiers are permitted by the monarch, the siogoon, to perform the hara-kiri, or happy-despatch—a permission equivalent to a command.

The Mikado—the highest, or spiritual sovereign—is of divine descent, and is not permitted to meddle in affairs, which would be desecration of his godlike nature. Nor is it properly the siogoon, but the council of state, who contrive so to overwhelm this unfortunate and exalted individual with the observance of ceremonies and festivals, that he has no time for government. This council is, in fact, the reigning power. It consists of thirteen members, either hereditary, or chosen from the princes and highest nobility, and has a president, who is the real monarch. He is styled the Governor of the Empire. He is said even to have the power to depose the siogoon, and appoint the next heir in his place. The siogoon frequently abdicates; and no wonder—for his life also must be a weary one. So does the mikado sometimes give way to some other of the divine race, when tired of his duties. One of them is thus described—

He every day passes a certain number of hours upon his throne, immovable, lest by turning his head he should bring down ruin upon that part of the empire to or from which he should look; by this immobility maintaining the whole realm's stability and tranquillity. When he has sat the requisite number of hours, he resigns his place to his crown, which continues upon the throne as his substitute during the remainder of the day and night.

The honours paid to the mikado are as extraordinary as his situation and pretensions, and all are indicative of, or relative to, his half-divine nature; if half-divine be an expression strong enough to express a degree of divinity so exalted, that all the kamis or gods are held annually to wait upon the mikado, and spend a month at his court. During that month, the name of which implies "without gods," no one frequents the temples, believing them deserted. To dignify and to guard from violation the high sanctity of the mikado's person, is the grand object of all the honours in question. That his sacred foot may not touch the ground, he never moves but borne upon men's shoulders. That unhallowed eyes may not pollute him with a glance, he never quits the precincts of his palace. This absolute seclusion in his palace appears however to be a modern improvement upon the old system. According to most reports, neither his hair, beard, or nails are ever cut, that his sacred person may not be mutilated, although the erudite orientalist Klaproth avers, that such mutilation as may be deemed essential to his comfort, for instance, cutting his nails and trimming his beard, are performed during his sleep, and called "stealing his nails and hair." * * *

No article of his dress is ever worn a second time; the plates and dishes in which his repasts are served, the cups or bowls out of which he drinks, must be new at every meal, as must the culinary utensils in which the meal is prepared. But none inherit his leavings. Whatever article of any kind has been hallowed by the mikado's use, even such remote use as cooking what he is to eat, is thereby so sanctified, that no human touch must be afterwards suffered to profane them. To wear his cast clothes, to eat off his plates, cook in his saucepan, &c., or even to feed upon the broken victuals from his table, would call down the vengeance of heaven upon the sacrilegious offender. To prevent all risk of the kind, everything that has once been in any way employed in the service of the mikado is immediately torn, broken, or otherwise destroyed; his clothes, which are of a colour that no other person may wear, are burnt; and hence arises the only drawback upon all this state. The mikado is supported by the siyogun, and the allowances from Yedo not being as ample as might be wished, the heavy expense of renewing daily, almost hourly, whatever appertains to the Son of Heaven, is alleviated by supplying his wardrobe, table, kitchen, &c., with articles of the very cheapest, and therefore coarsest, description.

No wonder the mikado abdicates. What a curious book; what a proof of the folly or gullibility of mankind would the usages of royalty, the ceremonies of courts, in the different countries of the world make; including, as it should do, the ceremonial of an English coronation, and the customs attending the coming into the world of our princes and princesses! That the divine race may never fail, the mikado is allowed twelve wives, though polygamy is not permitted in Japan.

Though hampered in their intercourse by endless etiquettes and ceremonies, the Japanese are a social people, and spend much of their time in practising their own rude music, in dancing, (which is confined to the women,) and merry games. Cards and dice are prohibited by law, and are never used in private houses. In summer, they enjoy boating and water-parties.

Large companies will spend the afternoon, evening, and part of the night, upon the lakes, rivers, or innumerable bays of the sea, in their highly-ornamented boats, with music and banquets. During the heat of the day, they lie moored in some shady nook, protected from the sun's rays, but open to the sea-breeze, whence they command a pleasing view. In the evening, the waters are all alive with music, and illuminated with the moving light from the coloured paper-lanterns of the several boats.

There is one Japanese calling not yet reduced among us to a regular profession, though we do not want for amateurs—that is, scandal-mongers; a new variety of the story-tellers of the East.

These persons make it their especial business to learn, not romances, but all the gossip of a neighbourhood, which they retail for the entertainment of their employers. Some of these traders in scandal are frequently hired to relieve the tedium of a sick-room; but those engaged to divert a party of pleasure, have a second and somewhat startling duty—it is, to set an example of politeness and high breeding, to improve the tone of the society that requires their services. These several, and not very homogeneous functions, they are said to combine in a most extraordinary manner.

The spies are as important an order as the anecdote-mongers and scandal-chroniclers.

They are of every rank in life, from the lowest to the highest—beneath that of a prince; since even the proudest noblemen undertake the base office, either in obedience to commands which it were death—that is to say, imperative self-slaughter—to disobey, or impelled by the hope of succeeding to the lucrative post of him in whom they can detect guilt. Those spies at Nagasaki,* who are subject to the governor, are entitled to demand an audience of him at any hour of the day or night; and woe betide him, should he, by postponing their admission, incur the risk of their reports being transmitted to Yedo otherwise than through himself. But there are other spies, not officially known, upon himself; and this, which, notwithstanding the constant mention of spies as official public characters, it is self-evident must be the case, is further proved by the following anecdote of the success of a high-born spy. The incident did not, indeed, fall under the personal observation of the Dutch factory, inasmuch as it occurred in another and remote government, Matsmai; but it is given upon good authority, and is general in its application.

"Complaints† of the governor of this province had reached the court, which took its own measures for ascertaining their truth. The agreeable tidings that the governor was displaced were speedily received; but it was not without astonishment that the capital, Matsmai, recognised in his successor a journeyman tobacco-cutter, who, some months before, had suddenly disappeared from his master's shop. The journeyman tobacco-cutter had been personated by a noble of the land, who had assumed that disguise in order to exercise the office of a spy, for which he had been sent to Matsmai by the court."

This is the exact parallel to facts at present current regarding the energetic administration of the Russian autocrat in the distant parts of his dominions.

The population of Japan is divided, if not into castes, into hereditary classes,—1st, the princes of the blood of Mikado—2d, the nobles—3d, the priesthood—4th, the military—5th, the upper portion of the middle class, or persons comme il faut—6th, the traders, merchants, and considerable shopkeepers—7th, the petty shopkeepers, including the artists—8th, the peasantry. There is yet another: the tanners, curriers, and dealers in any form in leather, who are the outcasts—the scavengers, or worse, of Japanese society. How this absurd custom or idea has arisen it is not easy to tell; but as every nation must have its pariahs—one having the Jews—another the Irish—another, like the Americans, the coloured race,—the Japanese fix upon leather—quite as rationally and humanely as any of the rest. The workers or dealers in leather—

Are not permitted to dwell in towns or hamlets with other men, but inhabit villages exclusively their own, whence they are called into the towns only to discharge the functions of executioners and gaolers, in which, if they need assistance, the tea-house proprietors are bound to supply it. They are not allowed to pollute an inn or public house with their presence; but, if in want of refreshment on a journey, they are served on the outside with what they purchase, and the landlord would rather throw away than take back a vessel from which one of them had drunk. Finally, they are not numbered in a census of the population; and, what is yet more whimsical, their villages, when situated upon the high road, are not measured into the length of that road—are subtracted from it as nonentities—so that in paying by the distance between town and town, the relays of men and cattle stationed at the post-houses, the traveller is actually carried gratis through a village inhabited by makers of leather.

In Japan, it is “anything but leather.” The tea-houses spoken of are the bagnios of Japan; and their keepers adopt female orphans, or the female children of the very poor, and educate them with the same care, and for the same profession, as the Natch girls of India. The remarkable fact is, that, after a certain age, these women retire, conduct themselves well, and are often well married; and that they are, in the second stage of their career, not looked upon as in any respect inferior to the other women.

The Japanese have made considerable advancement in the science of medicine and in astronomy. Their proficiency in lacquer-work, or what is properly called Japanning, has long been known; and their skill in tempering steel exceeds that of any other people. Their sword-blades bear the fine edge of a razor, and will, it is said, cut through a nail, or a European sword, without turning or notching the edge; £100 is, accordingly, not thought too much for a peculiarly fine blade; while an old one, of exquisite temper, is considered beyond all price, and the exportation of these is prohibited. They are skilful in metallurgy, and have an art of blending and combining different metals, so as to produce the effect of fine enamel. Their porcelain, like that of China, has degenerated, but they cultivate the tea-plant to perfection. Tea is indeed the common beverage of the nation, though they have also sakee, a fermented liquor made of rice, which is drunk at their festivals. The Japanese are ingenious horticulturists, though Europeans may fancy their ingenuity perverted. They are fond of beautiful landscapes; and flowers and pictures are essential parts of their entertainments; the kind of flowers, and the particular pictures suitable to the occasion being fixed by etiquette. Their gardeners will excite the envy of the monster-cultivators in Europe.

They value themselves alike upon the art of dwarfing and that of as unnaturally enlarging all natural productions. They exhibit in the miniature-gardens of the towns, full-grown trees of various kinds three feet high, with heads three feet in diameter. These dwarf trees are reared in flower-pots, as alluded to in one of the poems given in a former chapter; and when they bear luxuriant branches upon a distorted stem, the very acmé of perfection is attained; or, to speak more correctly, it might be supposed attained, had not President Meylan, in the year 1826, seen a box which he describes as one inch in diameter by three inches high, but which Fischer represents, somewhat less incredibly, as four inches long, one and a half wide, and six high, in which were actually growing and thriving a bamboo, a fir, and a plum-tree, the latter in full blossom. The price of this portable grove was 1,200 Dutch guilden, or about £100.

As examples of the success of these horticulturists in the opposite branch of their art, Meylan describes plum-trees covered with blossoms, each blossom four times the size of the cabbage-rose—of course, not producing fruit, which the Japanese appear not greatly to value—and of radishes weighing from fifty to sixty pounds; radishes of fifteen pounds weight he speaks of as of common occurrence. This gigantifying art, to coin a word, is more beneficially applied to fir-trees: many of these growing in the grounds of temples are represented as extraordinarily large. No dimensions of trunks are stated; but we are told that the branches springing at the height of seven or eight feet are led out, sometimes across ponds, and supported upon props, to such a length, that they give a shade of three hundred feet in diameter.

It may here be added that Japan is said to abound in cedar-trees, which rival in magnitude the far-famed cedars of Lebanon.

The empire contains neither sheep, goats, swine, nor asses.

The Japanese do not use either the flesh or the milk of the cow, though they do not scruple to eat at the Dutch Factory, beef brought from Java. They are not so conceited nor self-sufficient as the Chinese. When the model of an oil-mill, part of the presents to the siogoon, was explained, its admirable mechanism was at once understood and admired; but the model was returned, because the adoption of machinery might throw the labourers who made oil out of employment. As they have had few wars for some centuries, and no foreign trade, they have attained no knowledge of military engineering, nor of navigation, though they possess the mariner's compass.

This comprehensive account of this singular empire, of which the population is estimated at from fifteen to forty millions of souls, and which, beyond doubt, is very considerable, is well worthy of general attention, as another curious and popular chapter in the history of the human race.

Italy and the Italian Islands, from the Earliest Ages to the Present Time. By William Spalding, Esq., Professor of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh. 3 vols.

This work forms a distinguished portion of the Edinburgh Cabinet Library, which has now reached its thirty-first volume. It is executed with great care and ability, by an author in whom sound learning and cultivated taste are equally balanced. In a field so wide, it required no little judgment and skill to seize those salient points, which, while they interest, may also inform the general reader; and in this respect we consider the author very successful. On a clear ground of history, comprehended within bold outlines, he has interwoven literature, topography, biography, and, above all, Art,—which must ever be a first-rate object in any satisfactory account of Italy and the Italians. To classic history, Mr. Spalding has, indeed, paid comparatively slight attention; the history of the Roman empire being, in general, more familiar to English readers than that of their own country; while of the history of the dark and middle ages of Italy, and also that of modern times, ordinary readers are comparatively ignorant, until Italian history becomes involved in the wars and conquests of Napoleon. It is not, however, the Political History of Italy, whether taken as a whole, or at any single period, which gives value and charm to the work, but the clear and comprehensive picture of the people, ancient and modern; their chief social characteristics; their manners, morals, religion; and, above all, their literature, and that which marks them a great and distinct European nation, their Arts; from the rude cradle of Art to its highest state of perfection, its subsequent decline, and present condition.

Taken as a whole, we know of no work where, within anything like the same limits, the reader will find nearly the amount of exact information, combined with the results of extensive knowledge, discriminative judgment, and fine taste.

Selections from Robert Hall; with a Sketch of his Life. By Charles Badham, Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

The compiler appears to be a High Churchman, which gives a slight degree of one-sidedness to his selections. He has, however, a fervent admiration for Hall, though, we presume, he could not bestow upon him the complimentary epithet, Reverend, nor call him a clergyman. In so rich a field, it is difficult to glean without gathering an abundant harvest. The volume is, therefore, deserving of commendation, though it does, by no means, present the boldest or fairest aspect of Hall's mind, that might be obtained from his writings.

Europe in 1840. Translated from the German of Wolfgang Menzel.

We have here a bird's-eye view of the political character, tendencies, and relations of the group of European States, as these appear to an intelligent German. Though English political thinkers and foreseers cannot coincide in all Menzel's views of European policy, they are well worth studying. He seems to consider Prussia at present as the arbiter of European destinies; but the condition of Germany as by no means stable.

The Life and Remains of the Rev. Robert Housman.

By Robert Fletcher Housman, Esq. 8vo, with portrait, &c. &c.

We have here two goodly-sized volumes in one; the first Part consisting of a Memoir and a Selection from the Letters of this venerable person; the second a Selection from his Sermons. Mr. Housman was a pious, worthy, and single-hearted man; a blessing to his flock and family, and an ornament to the church of Christ. He was of an old stanch Lancashire stock, who had been settled upon their own property for above three hundred years. Mr. Housman was originally intended for the medical profession, but inclination led him to the church; and his journey to Cambridge, related in a letter to his "Honoured Parents," written some eighty years since, reads almost like a bit of Latimer's autobiography. He early attached himself to the Evangelical party in the church; and went so far, when leaving the chapel at which he had officiated in Lancaster, as to direct two females, who applied to him to learn where they might obtain the same spiritual advantages that they had obtained under his ministry, to go to the Independent Chapel—where alone Scripture doctrine was fully and faithfully taught. His biographer is of opinion that, in 1836, he would, in the same circumstances, have given the same advice as in 1786. After officiating as a curate in different places, much to the satisfaction of those committed to his charge, Mr. Housman finally settled in Lancaster in 1795, having built a church or chapel for himself, for which he obtained the license of his Bishop. In this design he was countenanced and supported by Wilberforce, Thornton, and other influential persons of the Evangelical party. He at the same time encountered not a little opposition and persecution. The church was at that period as callous and lukewarm as it is now in the other extreme of fiery persecuting zeal.

NO. LXXXIX.—VOL. VIII.

The record of this good man's long and useful life may be read with advantage and pleasure by all good men, whatever their religious denomination may be. He was not only a truly Christian minister, but an Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile.

The Courts of Europe at the Close of the Last Century. By the late Henry Swinburne, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo, with Portrait.

The familiar correspondence of Swinburne, whose work on Spain still remains a standard production, after all that has been written about that country, is not fully described in the above catching title. There is no doubt a good deal about the Courts of Versailles, Naples, and Vienna in the volumes; but there is much more in a series of letters, which contains the cream of the correspondence of a life. The letters are written in an easy and unpretending style, by an accomplished gentleman, and a ripe scholar; who, with equal or superior opportunities of observation to those which Horace Walpole possessed, had also much of the brilliancy of that prince of letter-writers, with manliness of character and solidity of understanding to which the wit and dilettante of Strawberry Hill had no pretension. The work is, indeed, one of the most attractive in its peculiar department of literature which has appeared for some time. We therefore indulge the hope of returning to a fuller examination of its merits, and in the meanwhile point it out to the attention of our readers as a production of no every-day kind. It abounds in characteristic anecdote; and evinces throughout, that the author eminently knew what was worthy of being noticed and recorded.

Moore's Poetical Works. Volume VI.

This volume contains LALLA ROOKH, now in its twentieth edition! and a preliminary history of the publication, which contrasts delightfully with the thousand-and-one stories of squabbles between authors and publishers, and does much credit to the good sense and honourable feeling of all the parties concerned.

My Life. By an Ex-Dissenter.

This pleading for the church, and attack on the principle of Voluntaryism, defeats its own object by the one-sidedness, and even gross exaggeration, in which the writer indulges. But as a wise man may profit, even by a caricature, to correct some evil trick of his physiognomy, so may Dissenters reap advantage from the misrepresentations of their adversary, if they are studied in a right temper. It is true the exceptions, the rare exceptions, are here represented as the rule; but the warning may still be useful. The following quotation on Family Prayer will explain what we mean: the narrator has just been apprenticed to a surgeon, a Dissenter:—

As soon as I entered the house of Mr. Griffiths, I found that family prayer was regularly attended to, night and morning; but as Mr. Griffiths' practice was large and widely scattered, he could seldom officiate more than once a-day. Mrs. Griffiths, who was even more bigoted than her husband in all her dissenting tastes and predilections, acted as chaplain on all occasions when her husband was not able to preside; and, as she rejected all forms, even Mr. Jay's prayers, she was monotonous, prolix, without ideas, always appeared to be discoursing to God, and informing him of what he was, rather than confessing her sins, thanking him for his mercy, imploring his forgiveness, or petitioning for a continuance of his love and goodness to us all. This is the general character of all dissenting prayers, both family and public. . . . I have frequently heard dissenting ministers declare, at the house of Mr. Griffiths, that "they had been that morning so lost in prayer, as to be unable, with any comfort, to go on." Useless repetitions; long and verbose declarations to God of what were his attributes, as though the Holy Ghost required fallen man to inform Him of his perfect and inconceivable character; crude and undigested petitions for all sorts of things, known only to a dissenting vocabulary, make up the bulk of the prayers of our modern Dissenters. . . . Sometimes a minister prayed on a Sunday morning [in church] for a quarter of an hour; others for twenty minutes; and a few for a half-hour. Then there were complimentary prayers, in which the minister of the place his wife, family, children, and the deacons, and their wives and families, and I know not who besides, were all brought forward by name or designation, and extolled before the throne of God, as if they had been saints in heaven, instead of sinners on earth. Then some prayers I have heard pointedly personal, when a deacon, a member, or some one in the congregation, had offended the officiating or stated minister. Then I have heard prayers full of bitterness and unkindness, reproaches, or insinuations, which excited not the pious ejaculations of the assembled congregation, but the nods and gestures of approbation, or the shakes of the head, and other signs of dissatisfaction, of those who listened not for themselves, but for others. . . . Sometimes I have heard a dissenting minister ask, "Did I not hit his case in my prayer?" when speaking of some individual; and, at other times, I have heard a member of a dissenting congregation declare, that he knew who was meant by the minister in his prayer; for he told him he would pray at him.

This is no doubt highly coloured; but there is something in it; and a good lesson may often be found in over-statements of an enemy. The book is very conciliatory towards the Wesleyan Methodists. This is at present the cue of the Church.

THE HISTORY OF INITIATION; comprising an ACCOUNT of the RITES and CEREMONIES, DOCTRINES, and DISCIPLINE, of all the SECRET and MYSTERIOUS INSTITUTIONS of the ANCIENT WORLD. By the Rev. George Oliver, D.D. [This is a new edition of a learned, and yet a popularly amusing work, particularly in the account of the Gothic mysteries.]

DR. OLIVER'S HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY, from 1829 to the PRESENT TIME. [A compilation from the newspapers, of no great interest save to the Brethren.]

JACKSON'S BOOK-KEEPING. [Sixth Edition.]

AN INTRODUCTION TO SHAKSPEARE'S MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. By James Orchard Halliwell, Esq. [Believing that many years must elapse before "a complete inquiry can be made into Shakspeare's language and allusions," this gentleman, nevertheless, contributes his mite of elucidation, conjecture, and commentary, in an agreeable vein, and with considerable acumen.]

PNEUMATICS. By Hugo REID. [This is the first of a projected series of little works on Natural Philosophy

adapted either for self-instruction or the use of schools, of which the previous performances of the compiler give fair promise.]

REGISTER OF CONTESTED ELECTIONS. Compiled by H. S. Smith. [This will be a useful work of reference to some. It is at least curious. The elections are arranged in alphabetical order. It commences in 1766, and closes with the recent contests at Canterbury, St. Albans, and Walsall.]

HINTS for the PEOPLE. By One of Themselves. [A little work, containing much that is good, and something that is admirable, on the plan of the sayings of De la Menais; but composed in a more sober tone, and adapted to English minds.]

TRADITIONS OF THE COVENANTERS; or, GLEANINGS among the MOUNTAINS. By the Rev. Robert Simpson. [A little work that will charm the circle of a Scottish cottager's winter-evening fireside; and which may both benefit and please any class of Scottish readers.]

PAMPHLETS.

POPULAR VIEW OF LIFE INSURANCE. By William St. Clair, Accountant in London.

CRAIG'S PATENT ROTATORY MACHINE, Explained and Illustrated.

THE WORLD in the YEAR 1840; A Retrospect of the chief Events of the past Year.

THE TAMWORTH READING-ROOM. [A High-Church bigot's attack upon Sir Robert Peel, because he is the first Tory statesman who has practically recognised the fundamental principles of all genuine liberality, namely, the instruction of the people by their own agency.]

INTERVENTION and its FRUITS. [A Letter to Lord Palmerston, deliberately and courteously pointing out his errors in the Eastern question.]

A LETTER to MR. WILLIAM LOVETT, lately Resident in Warwick Jail. By a Non-Voter. [A well-reasoned epistle; though the unqualified praise of the New Poor-Law, with which it sets out, renders it liable to suspicion. It is idle now to talk of the vices and corruptions of the Abolished Law. These are acknowledged—past and gone. But they do not prove that the new rule, though a manifest improvement in some respects, is altogether perfect.]

THE DUTY OF PAYING TRIBUTE ENFORCED. By Robert Haldane, Esq.

THE AUSTRIAN TREATY ANALYSED, and its BANEFUL TENDENCY EXPOSED. By William Cargill, Esq.

RIGHT and WRONG among the ABOLITIONISTS of the UNITED STATES, &c., &c. By John A. Collins, Representative of the American Anti-Slavery Society.

STATISTICAL EXERCISES on the MAPS of GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND. By E. C. Nunn.

THE ADVENTURES, SUFFERINGS, and OBSERVATIONS of JOHN WOOD. [This is the narrative of a credulous and unfortunate emigrant to a settlement on the Mosquito shore.]

MAMMON. [A cheap reprint of Dr. Harris's excellent and popular Dissertation on the besetting sin of such Christians as are "at ease in Zion."]

WESLEYAN METHODISM CONSIDERED in RELATION to the CHURCH. By the Rev. Richard Hodgson. [This treatise is intended to conciliate the Methodists, and unite them effectively with the Established Church for co-operative purposes.]

1. A PLEA for the POOR of SCOTLAND, and for an INQUIRY into their CONDITION. By the Rev. Dr. Robert Burns.

2. REMARKS on the CIRCUMSTANCES and CLAIMS of the INDIGENT POOR, and the INADEQUACY of the PRESENT SYSTEM of PAROCHIAL RELIEF in SCOTLAND. By Charles Scott, Session-Clerk, Peterhead. [These pamphlets may, from their authorship, be considered as semi-official statements, referring to two important localities; Paisley, of which Dr. Burns is one of the clergymen; and Peterhead, where, from his office of session-clerk, Mr. Scott is necessarily brought into intimate contact with pauperism. Both pamphlets are written in the spirit of a wise and Christian humanity, and both contain important statistical and illustrative facts. We heartily commend them, at this time, to the attention of the people of Scotland.]

DAILY BREAD; or, a PLAN for the ABOLITION of the BREAD-TAX. By one of the Millions. Our Account of this Pamphlet shall be borrowed from its pages.

[As an exemplification of the insufficiency of food, we may take the town of Little Bolton, in Lancashire, and the following facts as given on the testimony of a highly respectable gentleman, Mr. Ashworth:—

“There are three hundred families, consisting of one thousand four hundred individuals, whose whole income does not exceed £130 per week, or, deducting rents, £105, 11s., which is equal to 15½d. per head, per week! There are 1000 families who have only 1s. 6d. per week to live upon. 1200 whose income is under 2s., and nearly 1300 whose income is under 2s. 6d. per head, per week. Of these poor people, 1601 had only 500 beds amongst them; 582 of them sleeping three in a bed; 185 five in a bed; 78 six in a bed; 42 seven in a bed; in one place eight had only one bed; and 23 were wholly without a bed to rest on.”

Here are thousands of persons literally pining to death, who have the power to employ their labour in making calicoes or prints, which other thousands of persons, in other countries, are anxious to obtain for clothing for themselves and families, and to send in exchange, food for the inhabitants of Bolton; but the landowners' law says, “the Bolton people shall not exchange their labour for bread. We do not ourselves want any further quantity of their calicoes or prints, and we cannot spare them a full supply of food; nevertheless, we will not allow them to obtain food from where it is abundant, unless they pay to us a tax, which they are quite unable to pay; and therefore it is equivalent to saying, they shall not have a supply of food at all.”

THE CORN LAWS and the NATIONAL DEBT; or, the PARSON'S DREAM and the QUEEN'S SPEECH. By a Somerset Clergyman. [This is No. 7 of the Rev. Mr. Spencer's valuable Tracts. It has obtained a wide circulation. The pamphlet was suggested by an article in Tait's Magazine, entitled, “How do Poor Men Live?” An extract of this the dreamer sends to her majesty, and receives, by return of post, the following answer:

“Rev. Sir,—I thank you for the extract from Tait. I was not previously aware of the injustice practised upon my people. I laid it before the Privy Council, but my Lords declare, that in consequence of the National Debt, domestic agriculture cannot compete with foreign agriculture without the protection of the corn laws. My Lords tell me, that the empire over which I reign, is a mortgaged estate; and that high prices and high rents are necessary, in order to enable them to pay the interest of the mortgage. I will direct my attention to the subject of Free Trade; in the meantime I will impose a task upon you:—Write, for my inspection, the speech which you would desire me to deliver from the throne, on the opening of the ensuing Session of Parliament.

The pamphlet costs but twopence, so we need not quote the Extraordinary Speech concocted for her Majesty, which was “delivered from the throne amidst the consternation of the selfish and the delight of the patriotic.”]

THE OUTCRY against the NEW POOR LAW. [This is a Tract by the same author. He is favourable to the New Law; or at least, opposed to what he considers the senseless or hypocritical outcry so prevalent.]

A STATISTICAL SKETCH of the ISLAND of CHUSAN. By Lieutenant Ouchterlony of the Madras Engineers.

A SERIES of LETTERS on PUBLIC EDUCATION. By Philanthropos.

THE DEPOSIT ENIGMA UNRAVELLED. By Samuel Spurrell. 8vo.

LETTER to CHARLES WOOD, Esq., M.P., on MONEY, and the MEANS of ECONOMIZING IT. By George Warde Norman, Esq. 8vo.

LETTERS on the CURRENCY, addressed to Charles Wood, Esq., M.P.; ascertaining, for the first time, on true principles, the amount of Inland and Foreign Bills of Exchange in circulation for several consecutive years, and out at one time; also defending Country Bankers from the Charge made against them in the work of S. Jones Lloyd, Esq.; and giving Unanswerable Reasons why the Notes of a Bank of Issue should not be substituted for the Circulation of Country Bankers. By William Leatham, Banker, Wakefield. Second Edition. 8vo.

TEE-TOTAL PAMPHLETS.

1. DISCOURSE on the DUTY of ABSTAINING from INTOXICATING DRINKS in the PRESENT STATE of our COUNTRY. By the Rev. Dr. Ritchie.

2. SOME INQUIRIES into the EFFECTS of FERMENTED LIQUORS. By a Water-Drinker. [This is a third edition of Mr. Basil Montague's work. The author, or compiler, is one of the oldest of the now large family of Tee-totalers. It is thirty years since his discourse on Total Abstinence first appeared.]

3. THE WINE QUESTION SETTLED. By the Rev. B. Parsons, author of “Anti-Bacchus.” [This learned gentleman goes, as the Americans say, “the whole hog.” He proves that there was no such thing as fermented wines known or used among the Jews, nor, probably, among the Greeks and Romans, or any other ancient people, though they had “drugged possets.” The wine, of which “a little dose was recommended to Timothy now and then,” was none of “the modern poisons” called Madeira, Port, or Sherry. When fermented wine is found in the sacramental chalice “there is death in the pot,” says our author.]

4. TEMPERANCE versus ABSTINENCE; or, A REFUTATION of the DOCTRINES of TEE-TOTALISM. By a Lover of Truth. [A sensible, temperate pamphlet, in which the question is treated on rational principles.]

SERIAL WORKS.

LONDON. Knight & Co. [Of this new weekly serial we have not seen the first two Numbers; but we presume they are all alike. At the outset, the work is necessarily antiquarian and historical, containing familiar notices of popular customs and social usages. It is of handsome size, very moderate in price, and profusely embellished with good wood engravings, illustrative of the subjects discussed. Those in the Numbers we have seen are Paul's Cross, a notable locality in more senses than one; the Tabard, Chaucer's Tabard, and London Bridge. These afford a species of reading which has many attractions.

COMPANION to the WAVERLEY NOVELS. Part I. [Pictorial Illustrations, engraved on wood, intended for embellishments to the new cheap issue of Scott's novels, and favourable specimens of the Art. Several of the designs are by eminent artists.]

FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. Part II.

M'CULLOCH'S GEOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY. Part X. [Including London, Liverpool, &c. &c., it carries us through Madrid, and leaves us in the Malaccas.]

HISTORY OF STAR FISHES. Parts V. and VI.

FLORICULTURAL MAGAZINE for APRIL. [With a neatly coloured Azalea Splendens and Stephilia Tubiflora. This work is remarkably cheap, and is well-conducted.]

BRANDE'S DICTIONARY OF SCIENCE, LITERATURE, and ART. Part III.

TYAS'S SHAKESPEARE. Part XIII. Love's Labour Lost.

THE DEVIL ON TWO STICKS. Parts XI. and XII.

MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE. Parts XII. and XIII.

MANON LESCAUT. Parts VII. and VIII.

WORKS OF MONTAIGNE—Part I. Edited by William Hazlitt. [This promises to be a desirable work. It will contain a biographical notice of Montaigne, an account of his works, and the Essays as translated by Cotton, with copious notes from Montaigne's commentators. The work well deserves to be popularly introduced into England, which it has never yet been.]

NEW POEMS AND DRAMAS.

RETROSPECTION; or the LIGHT OF DAYS GONE BY, and Other POEMS. By the Rev. William Liddiard.

THE EARL OF BRECON: a Tragedy—FAITH'S FRAUD: a Tragedy—and THE FERRY-MAN: a Drama. Each in Five Acts. By Robert Landor, M.A.

POEMS and SONGS. By John Imlah. [These pieces are chiefly in the Scottish Dialect; and are of average merit—neither sinking nor soaring, and always pleasing.]

VIVIA PERPETUA: a Dramatic Poem. By Sarah Flower Adams. [A very striking and beautiful production; which must command attention even in an age distinguished above every other for female genius. As we cannot help considering this as a performance possessing a strong claim on the attention of the literary world, we hope to be able to give an account of it in some degree corresponding to its merits, and meanwhile merely announce the publication, and remind our readers that the martyred heroine was one of the earliest and noblest victims to the Christian faith.]

OLDEN TIMES; or the RISING OF THE SESSION: a Comedy. [This play, written by a member of the Scottish Supreme Law Courts, can only be understood and enjoyed by those connected with that venerable body, and familiar with its traditions, jokes, and transmitted bon mots. Here figure OLD BRAXY, and HARRY ERSKINE, and LADY WALLACE, and also many practitioners of the olden time; characters and oddities in their day, but we fear forgotten in ours, even in the profession.]

FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVINGS AFTER THE BEST MASTERS—Part II. [We described the scheme of this new candidate for public favour in December last. The new Part does not fall off, nor does it exceed the promise of the first. The subjects are—Thomyris with the Head of Cyrus, from the original of Rubens, effectively engraved by Thomas Dick. It is a splendid but painful composition. The next plate is engraved by Robert Bell from Rembrandt's picture of the Daughter of Jairus restored to Life. It is not allowable for those who have never seen the original to criticise the painting; but as it stands, it would seem, in some of the details, to have required the softening and refining help of the graver. The gorgeous depths of the shadows, and force of expression in the picture, do not atone for the want not merely of beauty, but of truth, in the countenance of the young maid, who more resembles a shrivelled and exhausted old man. A Landscape by Claude—Evening, exceedingly well engraved by William Miller, is to us the gem of the Part. Nothing can be more blissfully tranquil and soothing than the expression and tone of this lovely plate, which combines, in exquisite harmony, every element of scenic beauty,—the grand, the rich, the simple. It must be not a little gratifying to modern Athens, to see her sons taking so high a place in executive Art. All these plates are engraved in Edinburgh; and the whole of the projected series is to be executed by Scottish engravers. The undertaking is a proud though a perilous one, and we hope that it may at least obtain fair play.]

ENGRAVING FROM ALLAN'S PAINTING OF POLISH EXILES on their WAY to SIBERIA. [William Howison, the same engraver with whose plate, taken from Harvey's Curlers, we were so much struck and pleased two years since, has more than verified our predictions in this engraving, which is one of the most highly-finished specimens of the art that has yet been produced in Scotland. Many of our readers will remember the original painting, which is, in expression, among the finest that Allan has painted; but those who have not had this pleasure, may be assured that the original has suffered nothing in having, without losing one whit of its character and beauty, assumed another form. Like the Curlers, this engraving is executed in the line manner; and the most minute details, as well as the leading features, have been carefully and delicately elaborated. The plate is, though not of the largest, yet of respectable size, and makes altogether a most desirable picture, in which the art of the engraver not alone renders the pictorial effect of the original, but heightens its pathos and beauty.]

SCENERY and ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND. Part II. [The drawings which Mr. Bartlett has made, that appear in this Part, are from the finest and most romantic scenery in Ireland. That of the Darley, the Rapids near the romantic Castle Connell, in the neighbourhood of Limerick, Killarney, and the wild coast about Kilkee. The view of Puffin Hole, the weltering sea, and beetling crags, alive with sea-fowl, will convey a new idea to many. We know not what determined the choice of the publishers to the American Penciller; but he gets along pretty fairly,—rather historical than anecdotal, however, or descriptive, and far in the wake of the artist; for while the plates carry us to Killarney and the Shannon, Mr. Willis has only got the length of Drogheda, or perhaps Dublin. It is a pity but the pencil and pen could keep nearer in company.]

HEATH'S WAVERLEY GALLERY, in the late numbers, contains some pretty things:—a Rose Bradwardine, very sweet and lovely; an animated and arch Catherine Seyton; a stately Eveline Berenger; and, beyond them all, a Jeanie Deans, beautiful enough for her sister Effie. But that is error on the safe side.]

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE SESSION.—Parliament, which was opened on the 26th January, adjourned for the Easter recess on the 6th April. The three months during which it has sat, have been the most unproductive as to work, and the duller even as to talk, which have occurred since the Reform Bill.

The battle of party has again been fought upon Irish ground; but the contest was not so fierce nor continued as in former sessions. The Ministry having obtained a majority of five on the second reading of Lord Morpeth's Irish Registration Bill, seemed contented with their unwonted success, and postponed further proceedings in the question till after Easter. To this arrangement the Tories eventually gave a tacit acquiescence, Lord Stanley postponing his bill to nearly the same day as that to which the Government measure had been deferred. The result, as regards the present session, is expected to be, either that the Ministerial bill will be passed with some of the worst clauses of Lord Stanley's ingrafted on it; or that, after continuing the discussion till the approach of the grouse-shooting, the legislature will disperse, leaving the matter where it was.

The principal business which has occupied the Commons during the last month (and it is only in the Commons that there has been even a show of business) has been the bill for continuing the New Poor-law. Owing to the multiplicity of amendments which have been carried, or have been adopted by the Government, and the precise effect of which cannot, for the most part, be gathered from the reports, it is impossible to state, with accuracy, the form which the Bill has now assumed. The general result, however, seems to be, that though many of the minor details have undergone alteration, generally with a view of rendering them less stringent, the measure remains pretty much the same as it was, even in details, while all the main features of the system have been preserved unimpaired. The clamour has always been directed principally against the Commissioners, the "tyrants of Somerset House;" but the commission has been continued with unabridged, or rather with increased, powers, for a new term of five years, and with every prospect of being continued for an indefinite period beyond—a motion by Mr. Hodgson Hinde, that the Commission should extend to "the end of the year 1846, and no longer," being negative without a division. The most important alteration, or rather addition, is one which was introduced by the Ministry, relating to the education of pauper children. The Commissioners are empowered, upon obtaining the consent of a majority of the guardians of the parishes interested, to institute a school (distinct from the work-house) for the rearing and educating of the pauper children of any Union, or of any district of parishes which may unite for that object. The benefits of these pauper colleges are not to be confined to pauper children, but to be extended (so far only, we presume, as regards education) to the children of all poor persons who choose to attend. This clause is, therefore, a new and an important step towards national education; and is capable, in skilful and honest hands, of being worked to great advantage. And there can be little doubt that most beneficial results would have flowed from it, had it passed in its original shape, and had the working out of it been left to the Commissioners. But this, like every other attempt to extend education, has been damaged, if not destroyed, by the ever-vigilant friend of ignorance, "the Church." Mr. Colquhoun, the pharisaical Member for Kilmarnock, moved, and, with the assistance of Lord John Russell and Dr. Lushington (!), carried an amendment, that it should be imperative on every school established under this clause to have a chaplain of the Church of England, who is to be paid from the rates, and "who shall be empowered to regulate and superintend the instruction and training of the children," except those whose parents or other guardians shall object. The clause is thus rendered likely to become as pernicious as it originally promised to be beneficial. In the first place, it will, in many instances, operate as a bar to the establishment of the schools, by inducing the Dissenters to oppose them, as involving the infliction of a new injustice; and when we consider how many of all sects there will always be found ready, on less just grounds than this, or on no ground at all, to refuse any increase of assessment on their own pockets, the result will very probably be, that, even in districts where dissent is not paramount, guardians will be returned known for their opposition to the proposed schools, with their inseparable accompaniment of paid chaplains of the state religion. But, supposing all obstacles overcome, and the school established, who does not see the annoyance and mischief which must inevitably arise from the chaplain acting under so wide a commission as that of "regulating and superintending the instruction of the children?" It is provided, also, that "such chaplain shall be appointed, subject to the sanction of the Bishop of the diocese," and we may very easily conceive the sort of men whom the Bishops of Exeter, or Oxford, or London, or of five-sixths of the sees of England, would conceive as alone fitted to "superintend and regulate" the schools. The injustice, and intulity, and mischievousness of Mr. Colquhoun's "amendment," is obvious in many other respects than those we have adverted to; but it may be beneficial as adding one more to the proofs now so rapidly accumulating, that the ambition, bigotry, and greed of the State Church, form the main obstacle in the way of the smallest, as of the greatest, attempts, either to enlighten the ignorance or extend the privileges of the people.—Sir Robert Peel, and all his party but a few of the "outsiders," have hitherto given a steady support to the Bill, as introduced by the Ministry; and almost every one of the "ameliorations" which have been introduced, have proceeded from Whigs or Liberals. When we consider that, almost without exception, every Tory organ and orator in England has, for the last three years, vehemently opposed the "infernal Whig Poor-law," this result says very little for the sincerity of the party, and will, it may be expected, greatly disable them for the future from continuing their attacks on the Whigs on this point.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION COMMITTEES.—The result of the inquiries into the petitions against the returns for St. Albans, Canterbury, and Walsall, has rendered it plain that the new mode of selecting election committees, introduced by Sir R. Peel, produces a tribunal quite as incompetent, inefficient, and untrustworthy as the system which it has succeeded. The facts regarding the case of St. Albans are peculiarly instructive. It was proved that Dr. Webster, a leading Whig partisan in the burgh, having proceeded to the Treasury in quest of a Ministerial candidate, and having procured Lord Lis-towell, brought him down with him in the same post-chaise; introduced him to the electors; was the most active Whig canvasser and orator throughout the contest, and the constant companion and chief adviser of the candidate. Bribery, wholesale and systematic, continued during the struggle; and several cases of the very grossest character were clearly proved against this Dr. Webster. The petitioners were also ready to prove many more cases against this person and others, but were prevented by the obstruction thrown in the way by the reiterated "objections" and legal quibbles of the counsel for the sitting member—objections which could not have been listened to for a moment had the object of the committee been simply to elicit all the facts of the case, but which they considered admissible according to the rules of evidence usually observed in Courts of Law. It is not by any means clear why the committee should have bound themselves down to rules which, even supposing their necessity or judiciousness in the case of uninformed and inexperienced juries to be undoubted, do not appear applicable where the decision rested solely with men who, as legislators, are at least to be presumed as fit to be intrusted with a wider discretion. But notwithstanding the rejection of much evidence which bore the most directly on what, to the eye of common sense, seems the main point at issue—the means, namely, by which the return complained against, had been accomplished—this much was clearly proved,—that extensive bribery was practised by the partisans of the sitting member; and that, in particular, Dr. Webster, the nature of whose connexion with the candidate we have above described, was guilty of several distinct and undoubted acts of corruption. Surely, it might be thought, there was enough here to vacate the seat gained by such means. But this, it seems, was by no means enough to satisfy the committee. By repeated decisions they found that it had not been proved that Dr. Webster, the political sponsor, the most active supporter, and constant personal companion of the candidate, acted as his “agent!”—and, partly because of these decisions, and partly for another reason, about to be mentioned, the petitioners withdrew their case. It has thus been settled that it may be proved, not only that an election was gained by wholesale corruption, but by corruption practised by persons who appear, on all occasions, as the most active supporters of the candidate, and with whom he is in constant intercourse and consultation—and that yet the election is valid, and the member blameless!

The other reason, besides the hopelessness of contending against such decisions as these, which induced the withdrawal of the Tory petition against Lord Listowell's return, furnishes another instructive illustration of the working of the system. The recent “glorious Conservative triumph” at Canterbury had been gained by means quite as bad, at the very best, as the “triumph of Liberal principles” at St. Albans; and an exposure being inevitable if the petition against the return was proceeded with, a “compromise” was effected between Whig and Tory, on the simple ground, that it would be much worse than useless to expose practices which were common to both, in a case where no balance of gain could be left for either party. If there had only been Tory bribery at Canterbury, or only Whig bribery at St. Albans, its perpetrators might probably have been punished and its object defeated; but the offence being committed in both cases, the one crime is set against the other, and both together form no crime at all—two blacks being held as making one white. Had the call for exposure and punishment been precisely one-half less urgent, they would have been applied; but the crime being doubled the punished is escaped. This neutralizing of Tory by Whig offences against purity of election, may be a very convenient arrangement for the contracting parties; but it is certainly one which could scarcely have been expected to be countenanced and protected by a “Reformed” Parliament.

The fate of the petition against the return of Mr. Gladstone for Walsall, proves this additional fact: that public-houses may be opened for weeks to all known as the friends of one of the candidates; that hundreds of electors, free of all expense to themselves, may carouse night and day, presided over by the principal supporters of the afterwards successful candidate; and that, nevertheless, the Committee may not be able “to connect the treating with the sitting member or his agents,” and the return be, consequently, held valid.

It thus appears that, in eight years from the passing of the Reform Bill, three elections, happening within the same fortnight, were carried by wholesale bribery and treating; that there exists no visible means of checking or punishing these practices; and that, for the future, the very slightest exercise of discretion may enable any man to be returned by the corruption of any constituency in the empire, without running more than a nominal risk of being unseated and exposed.

When corruption is seen prevailing not only among the old constituencies of freemen, like St. Albans and Canterbury, but in Reform-Bill constituencies, like Walsall, there seems no probability that anything short of secret voting and a wide extension of the franchise will prove an efficacious remedy. But, in the meantime, much might be done by an alteration in the species of tribunal for trying disputed returns. The mode of selection under Sir R. Peel's plan appoints a committee containing an equal number of Whigs and Tories, presided over by a chairman belonging to the party of the member petitioned against; and yet, notwithstanding the apparent fairness of this arrangement, the decisions have, in every case that has yet been tried, been in favour of the sitting member possessing the casting-vote of the chairman. The cases of St. Albans, Canterbury, and Walsall, will scarcely admit of this result being accounted for by the supposition that the sitting members had always right upon their side.

In a conversation which took place in the House on the subject of the compromise between the petitioners in the cases of Canterbury and of St. Albans, almost every member who spoke confessed that the plan of Sir Robert Peel had failed in producing an efficient tribunal, but no one suggested a remedy; nor is it likely that any will be adopted by the present Parliament, nor till after the disputed returns of a General Election have been subjected to the judgment of the confessedly incompetent tribunal. Nor are there any good grounds of hope that any efficient reform will be made even then; and, in the meantime, it would be much more honest, and would produce no change in the actual result, to adopt the advice of Lord Howick, by repealing the laws against corruption at elections, and “letting everybody do their best.”

THE ANTI-CORN-LAW AGITATION.—The war against the bread-tax goes vigorously and hopefully on. The National League, which leads and gives the tone to the movement throughout the whole country, has never relaxed for a moment the energy of its exertions, and seems only to gather new strength and hope from each defeat. The movements of this body have, from the beginning, been distinguished by a vigour, and earnestness, and determination, and, at the same time, by a skill and prudence, which both deserve and must command success. In no one point have both their earnestness and their prudence been better exemplified, than in their wise and manly resolve, to push on towards their own object by the nearest road, careless of the effect of their movements upon the wretched and meaningless strife between Whig and Tory. This portion of the tactics of the Repealers has, to be sure, proved a great annoyance and disappointment to those who looked upon the anti-Corn-Law agitation only as another serviceable instrument for “keeping out the Tories;” but it has served to unmask insincere and self-seeking friends; has extorted respect and fear from enemies; and is every day bringing over in multitudes that portion of the working-classes who were at first neutral or opposed, from a very natural suspicion, that the new movement was only another of those party devices of which they had so frequently been made both the instruments and the dupes. Every day furnishes increasing proof of the wisdom of the course which has been pursued. The influence of the violent and unreasonable section of the Chartist leaders is visibly on the decline, and in some towns has been proved to be nearly quite extinct; and the question has been actively taken up by many of the middle-classes among the electoral body, of Conservative or neutral politics. The last “electoral visit” paid by the League, was to Lancaster, (a town at present returning two bread-taxers;) and at a meeting of electors alone, to which all the persons on the register were invited, and at which a considerable majority of them attended, resolutions were unanimously and enthusiastically passed, condemning the Corn Law, and recommending the immediate adoption of the measures necessary for returning Repealers. Within the last month, large and effective meetings have been held in nearly all the great towns of England; and petitions are also getting up in multitudes of the smaller places, and in many of the agricultural districts, where the lecturers and publications of the League have produced a great effect. Scotland, also, is speaking out; and there seems no reason to doubt that, before Mr. Villiers' motion shall be brought on, the number of petitions and of signatures will exceed even those of last year, notwithstanding the disgust excited by the insolent and insulting tone in which the prayers of the people on this question were treated by the Legislature in the two last sessions. The untiring activity and zeal of the Repealers has evidently excited dread and confusion in the enemy's camp; and nothing more is wanting than a vigorous perseverance in petitioning and agitation, to secure a speedy triumph to a cause the ultimate success of which became secure at the moment when it was taken up with honesty and sincerity.

THE REVENUE.

The revenue tables for the year and quarter ending April 5, 1841, present a result very far from satisfactory. The following is an abstract:—

It will be thus seen that there is an aggregate decrease on the year of £309,280, and on the quarter of £70,154. But to see the whole extent of the falling off, we must take into account the addition made to the taxes last year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing the addition, calculated the increase of revenue, to be thence derived, at £2,337,000; so that, adding this expected increase to the actual deficiency on the aggregate revenue for the whole year, the real decrease appears £2,646,280. It may be asserted that this statement presents too unfavourable a view of the case, as the whole amount of the additions did not come into operation equally throughout the year; but this objection, if taken into account, would make only a very small difference in the result; and this fact at least is clear from the above table, that the additional ten per cent. laid on the Customs, Excise, and Taxes, has scarcely produced five per cent. The principal decrease, it will be seen, is on the Post-Office, on which item there is a falling off of £27,000 on the quarter, and £83,000 on the year. According to The Morning Chronicle, the decrease in this item, as regards the quarter, is partly to be accounted for by the accounts for the corresponding quarter of last year having included the receipts of a month of the four-penny rate, and by the increase of the money-order business rendering it necessary to leave a greater balance in the hands of the deputies. No small portion of the decrease in this item, both as regards year and quarter, may be safely set down as ascribable, in a great degree, to the depressed state of the trade and commerce of the country, as indicated by the decrease in other items. With all these drawbacks, however, the Post-Office department still appears as producing a net revenue to the Exchequer of £414,000; and in this fact alone we have a sufficient answer to those who have attempted to find, in the large decrease of revenue from this source, a proof of the "utter failure" of the Cheap Postage Scheme. It was never expected that the revenue, under the cheap system, would equal that under the dear, at least for a considerable period of time; it was only argued, that a uniform penny rate was more than sufficient to cover all the charges of the Post-Office establishment, and that a tax on the correspondence of the country for the purpose of revenue was a burdensome and impolitic impost. The soundness of this argument is completely proved by the result: the Post-Office has produced, even under most unfavourable circumstances, a clear profit to the Exchequer of £414,000; and the number of letters transmitted through the establishment has been nearly tripled,—showing that, under the dear system, two-thirds of the correspondence of the country was either suppressed or driven into illicit channels.—Great curiosity is excited as to the means which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will propose for making both ends meet—the expenditure for the year ending 5th January last exceeding the revenue for the same period by £1,593,970. The additional per centage laid on the old taxes has proved a failure; and there would be both difficulty and danger in the Ministry, in their present precarious position, attempting either to increase the existing taxes, or impose new ones. There is, therefore, good ground for hope that necessity may at last compel the Legislature to grant what reason and justice might long have demanded in vain—a thorough reconstruction of our clumsy, pernicious, and unproductive system of tariffs.

THE OPIUM WAR.

Our success in the Opium War has as yet been destined to bear a very fair proportion to the justice of our cause. Although we have, without much difficulty, battered down forts, destroyed whole fleets of junks, and taken possession of islands, it seems to be all but the universal opinion that we are little, if at all, nearer the attainment of the objects for which we went to war, than we were before the first shot was fired. The capture of the Island of Chusan, which was represented as an occurrence of the first importance, and as certain to lead to a satisfactory adjustment of the dispute, was productive of no other result than furnishing a grave for a large portion of the British forces, and affording the Chinese another opportunity of cheating our negotiators. On the 29th of February, Admiral Elliot, being afflicted with palpitation of the heart, resigned his command of the expedition; having failed to open a direct negotiation with the principal officers of the empire, notwithstanding his having ceased hostilities on the most formal and solemn promise that such communication would be granted. The command of the expedition then devolved on Sir Gordon Bremer. He carried on operations with greater apparent vigour than his predecessor; but, for reasons on the soundness of which it would be premature as yet to decide, seems to have been held in no high estimation either by the forces under his own command, or by the British merchants. The only intelligence which has been received since Sir Gordon assumed the command, reached London by the March overland mail from Bombay, on the 7th April. The dates were—from Chusan, to the 24th December; from Macao, to the 27th January; and from Bombay, to the 1st March. After in vain endeavouring to bring the Chinese to negotiate explicitly and sincerely, Sir Gordon, on the morning of the 7th January, commenced an attack on two of the Bogue forts, both of which were speedily in possession of the English. The Chinese fought with some obstinacy but with very little skill; and, in one of the forts, suffered a loss of from 500 to 700 men. The loss of the British was only three killed, and 30 or 40 wounded. The next morning, when preparations were making for commencing the attack on Anunghay, the chief fort, the Chinese authorities begged to renew negotiations; which request was acceded to. The result was a "preliminary arrangement," of which the following are the conditions, as we find them stated in a circular, dated January 20, s dressed by Captain Elliot to British subjects in China :—“1. The cession of the Island and Harbour of Hong-kong to the British Crown. All just charges and duties to the empire upon the commerce carried on there to be paid as if the trade were conducted at Whampoa. 2. An indemnity to the British Government of six millions of dollars—one million payable at once, and the remainder in equal annual instalments ending in 1846. 3. Direct official intercourse between the countries upon an equal footing. 4. The trade of the Port of Canton to be opened within ten days after the Chinese new year, and to be carried on at Whampoa till farther arrangements are practicable at the new settlement. Details remain matter of negotiation.”

The ministerial journals have hailed these conditions as containing a “settlement,” and a satisfactory settlement of the whole dispute; but by the community generally, they have been viewed in a very different light. Lord John Russell, in last session, announced the war to have three objects: compensation to the British merchants for the opium destroyed by the Chinese authorities; satisfaction for the “insults” received by British subjects in China; and the placing of the trade between the two countries on a better basis for the future. We have never failed to denounce these reasons as affording, in the actual circumstances, no just ground whatever for the war; but as they were formally stated by the mouth-piece of the government as the ends sought, the question as to the “success” of the war must, of course, be determined by the consideration, whether or not the objects, or any of them, have been obtained. Let us see how the boasts of a “satisfactory settlement,” put forth by the Whigs, will stand the test which they have themselves supplied. Not one word is now said as to exacting compensation from the Chinese for the destroyed opium; the only reference to the subject being a sort of promise, made by Captain Elliot, to urge the claims of the merchants—upon the British government! One of the objects of the war has therefore been completely foregone. It is not very easy to understand precisely what was meant to be understood by the term, “satisfaction” for the “insults” received by British subjects; but it may be very safely considered that this object also has been abandoned; for we have not been able to obtain even the slightest apology or confession of error; and as for any more substantial “satisfaction,” the sum of which we have obtained the promise (making allowance for the mode in which it is to be paid, not exceeding £1,200,000 sterling) will cover only a small portion of the actual expense of the expedition. The only portion of the above conditions which bears on the remaining object of the war, is the cession of the island of Hong Kong. This island is the largest of the group called the Ladrões, is about fifteen miles in circumference, and lies at the mouth of the Canton river, about 120 miles distant from Canton. It is utterly barren, and inhabited only by some fishermen; but, according to the organ of the British merchants in China, would prove an excellent position for a British settlement, were it not for the conditions under which it is to be held, (submission to all regulations, and payment of all duties, which the Chinese may choose to impose,) which the Canton paper declares, render the possession of the island of no value whatever. Not one, therefore, of the three objects of the war is accomplished, or is even proposed to be accomplished, by what the organs of the very parties who began the war, have been trumpeting as a “satisfactory settlement.” But, more than this, infinitely short as the above conditions fall of what we have declared to be our just claims, there is no probability that even they will be fulfilled, at least until after a renewed expenditure of time, treasure, and blood. “Details remain matter of negotiation!” A single glance at the conditions, shows that the whole essential part of the arrangement, except the sum named as compensation, may, without any breach of honesty half so heinous as that which habitually characterizes Chinese diplomacy, be considered as “details,” and that, consequently, the whole dispute still “remains matter of negotiation.” Nor are our chances of an honest and favourable settlement of “details” rendered any better by our having voluntarily resigned the only guarantees for the fair dealing of the Chinese which we possessed. The Chinese flag again floats upon the two captured fortresses, and Chusan has been abandoned by the British troops; a step which Keshen, the imperial commissioner, announces as a proof that “the English barbarians are now obedient to orders, and are invoking favour with the most earnest importunity.” We have in fact abandoned almost every advantage gained by our arms, merely on the faith of obtaining conditions which, in any circumstances, are in themselves of the most insignificant value, and which, possessing as we do, no better guarantee for their fulfilment than a Chinese promise, are of no value at all. There seems little doubt that, in the course of time, we may force the Chinese to comply with a portion of our demands; but it is evident that, so far from this new “preliminary arrangement” being, as trumpeted forth by the ministerial organs, a “satisfactory settlement of the whole question,” we are, at this moment, scarcely one inch nearer to a “settlement” than before the commencement of the war.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts from nearly all districts of the country, from Cornwall to Caithness, agree in representing the present seed-time as the best which has been experienced for many years. From the middle of February to the time at which we write, approaching the end of April, the weather has been, for the most part, unusually dry and warm for the season; and in most districts the sowing operations were more than half over before the end of March. The young wheats have come away well, and, as yet, promise excellently. The lambing season, in the lower districts, (in most of the hilly districts it has not yet commenced,) has, so far, been a favourable one for the farmer. In the Border counties, the number has been considerably above an average, but the mortality has also been considerable. One farmer in North Durham had nine ewes which produced the extraordinary number of twenty-eight lambs; and we know of numerous instances nearly equally remarkable. The prices of grain, for the last month, have, on the whole, been pretty steady. Average of wheat, from 62s. to 64s., though the finest qualities have brought 8s. or 10s. more; barley, 33s.; oats, 23s. 6d.; rye, 34s. 9d.; beans and peas, 39s. 6d. For a number of weeks, turnips were worse than unsaleable: in many districts, offers having been made, and frequently in vain, to give them for nothing, on condition of their being eaten on the ground. This is partly ascribable to the plentiful character of the turnip crop of last year, and partly to the dread of the murrain having prevented stock being brought from the hills. This state of matters has seriously retarded sowing operations in some portions of the south of Scotland and north of England.—We give a short summary of the reports which have been given in from several of the more important agricultural districts, on agricultural subjects in general:—Berwickshire and Roxburghshire.—Both the winter and spring wheats are looking uncommonly well; and sowing was conducted under the most favourable circumstances. Pastures, both old and young, are exceedingly well planted, and far advanced for the season.—Northumberland.—Spring and autumn wheats both promise excellently; and the pastures were never known to have a more luxuriant appearance. The murrain is now nearly extinct in the county, though still lingering, in a modified form, in its southern portion.—County of Galloway.—Beans, peas, and oats, have had a most favourable seed-time, and the wheat-plant is well-established and vigorous.—Strathmore.—Wheat forward, thick, and healthy, and grass very advanced and promising.—Fife.—Beans, oats, and barley, have been sown under the most favourable circumstances; and the young wheat, of which more than the usual quantity has been put in the ground, looks thick and healthy, and is at least three months in advance of the average of seasons.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

JUNE, 1841.

THE NATIONAL CRISIS.

AFTER a dreary period of seven years, unmarked by any large and decidedly good measure of reform voluntarily brought forward by the government, we have once again the satisfaction of hailing the dawn of a new era of improvement, the beginning of another struggle, involving consequences as important to the country as the imperfect though great measure of 1830. The present is not to be considered as merely a ministerial crisis, as the customary changing from Tory to Whig, or from Whig back to Tory—though the existence of the Whig government may be involved in it—but as a national epoch; as the first authoritative acknowledgment, by the Sovereign and her Ministers, of the great principle that there is no longer to be protection of any one class at the price of injustice to all the other classes. This, at least, is the light in which we would fain view the measures proposed by the Ministers;—narrow, and perhaps imperfect, in their actual being, but pointing to mighty results.

It is peculiarly satisfactory to Radical Reformers to be able to say, once in seven years, that their old friends and allies, the Whigs, have really done something to redeem their character,—that they have “deserved well of their country.” They have shown, at the eleventh hour, that which, though a tardy, looks like a genuine conversion, since it is displayed in amendment of conduct. The precise date of any political conversion is generally of trivial importance in itself, and the motives of public men placed in embarrassing circumstances will hardly ever bear to be too nicely scrutinized. Let their deeds speak for them. The Ministers have not advanced far; that was perhaps impracticable, if they wished to carry any imposing force along with them; but they have moved in the right direction, under the now fairly unfurled banner of FREE TRADE, and in the strength of a good cause. They have offered the country a fair opportunity of getting rid of some of the most galling and pernicious imposts that ever indirectly crippled the energies, and directly robbed a people. They have made a formal assault upon the most oppressive and severely felt of those monopolies which plunder the wealthy and starve the poor—namely, the Bread-tax, and the Sugar-tax. The first duty of the people is energetically to seize and improve the occasion offered—to be up and to be doing!

If we were to measure the amount of what the government has proposed, by the fury and panic of the landowners, the East and West Indians, and other monopolists—so sensitive at all times to the approach of anything threatening to touch their sacred privilege of pillaging the people for their own benefit, under the name of protective duties—the ministerial project were vast indeed. In reality, save as the hopeful commencement of financial reforms, and as a distinct avowal that the present tariff system is vicious and rotten to the core, and fraught with ultimate ruin to every class, there has been nothing to excite the ferment we witness, unless conscience makes cowards of the guilty.

What awful thing was it that produced the commotion? The Chancellor of the Exchequer required money. The consequences of the monopoly of the sugar-trade, and the heavy duties laid upon that necessary of life, together with the general distress and impoverishment of the people, had depressed the revenue. Those expensive warlike expeditions, and naval equipments, which the Tories had either urged or sanctioned, had, at the same time, caused an increase of expenditure which not only drained the public coffers, but left a considerable deficiency; and it was seen that, in the present state of manufactures and commerce, indirect taxation could be strained no farther. Of that important fact every man conversant with the subject is now convinced. There was, therefore, no resource left, but either some such scheme as that propounded by Mr. Baring, or a direct tax on property,* which would have excited a ferment among the monopolists, not much less than the announcement of the change of the sugar-duties and the revision of the corn-laws has done. So far as Mr. Baring's scheme went, and susceptible as some of its details might have been of improvement—particularly, as we think, in the proposed scanty abatement of the timber-duties—it was founded on larger and more statesman-like views than those that have been familiar to men in office in this protective country. Its tendency was to enlarge the basis of taxation, and to make the increase of the revenue of the government depend upon the increase of the consumption of sugar and timber, and, consequently, of comfort, among the people. Although this unfortunate budget has been thrown overboard by the strangest combination of parties ever seen in Parliament of planters and anti-slavery advocates, renegade Whigs and high Tories—the principle which it embodied has not perished with it. That must still be acted upon; and, probably, the more speedily for this very defeat. The cause of FREE TRADE, which is identical with that of national prosperity, not to this or that class, but to the whole people,—which to the labourer means full employment and competent wages, ample food, shelter, and clothing, and to the manufacturer the readiest and cheapest place for the purchase of his raw untaxed material, and for the disposal of his commodities the markets of the whole world, wherever winds blow and waters roll—that cause made a huge stride during the eight nights when the nation beheld Monopolists and Anti-Monopolists in pitched battle on the sugar duties. Men's minds had been gradually ripening by knowledge and by suffering, for the reception of the new ideas which that debate evolved; and many minds were already matured. Howsoever tardy, and for, themselves, critically timed, the demonstration of the Whig Ministers has been, there is, in our opinion, little doubt that those of them most worth reckoning upon as statesmen, have long been in their secret convictions FREE TRADERS. Those of them who thought at all on the subject, which latterly financial difficulties must have kept continually before them, could not miss to see the manifold evils of the twice-cursed principle of the monopoly and protective system. We have no doubt whatever that Sir Robert Peel is as much aware of the bad policy, and of the real, if not immediate, evil consequences of persevering in the present system of restriction and protection and unequal pressure, as Mr. Hume or Mr. Villiers. It would be disparagement to his understanding to think otherwise. When reluctantly put to the Question the other evening, by the adroit tactics of his rivals, he distinctly avowed as much, when, amidst many evasions and sophisms, he stated that to the landed interest prosperous manufactures were of more value than any Corn-laws—even than his favourite sliding-scale. He tacitly confessed his convictions on the question of free trade, when he would have avoided the deputation of the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester, who care not a whit whether the object they have at heart is accomplished by Whig or by Tory, provided they obtain it. —Lord Palmerston was the colleague, and, in one sense, the pupil, of Mr. Huskisson. He must have been an interested witness of the successful experiment of annihilating the East India's Company's Monopoly; of the fortunate consequences of lowering the duties on coffee and other articles, thereby immensely increasing their consumption, to the vast improvement of the revenue, and the spread of comfort and harmless luxury among the labouring classes. He was a party to the “glorious nibble,” made on the restrictive system, by throwing open the silk manufacture to foreign competition: a small measure comparatively in itself, but great as an experiment, and a triumphant one; and all that could be attempted in that day of small things. To have attacked the West Indians—the Slave-owners—the East Indians—or the Corn-though even so far back as that period, Lord Palmerston must in opinion have been opposed to the system. But opinion unfortunately does not always influence conduct. Lord Melbourne himself, whose recklessness of speech involves him in so many scrapes and apparent inconsistencies, though he uttered the hasty words with which he has been so often taunted, first by the anti-corn-law party, and latterly by the ungrateful Tories, whom he and his colleagues have done so much to conciliate—afterwards, or previously, we forget which, modified his rash expressions about the madness of meddling with the Corn-laws, by the distinct avowal, that if the nation insisted upon that measure, if they demanded it from the Government, agitated for it, pressed for it, no doubt they must some time or other get it—though he had made up his mind not to yield—save on compulsion. Now, that a measure, or a half measure, of this sort, is voluntarily brought forward by Ministers, it is to us doubtful whether or not the anti-corn-law party—that is the whole people—ought not secretly to wish that the landed interest and their allies may defeat Lord John Russell's scheme of a really high protective duty, as they have done Mr. Baring's budget. Their true wisdom would be quiet acquiescence in the diminished but still lavish protection, at the people's expense, which a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter, increased by other expenses of carriage, freight, and insurance, to the average amount of 18s. a quarter, would give them against all other corn-growers in the world. A blinded, obstinate resistance might, in this case, be followed by the same fortunate consequences for the country, which the opposition of the borough-mongers proved in an analogous instance. Instead of a paltry measure of Parliamentary Reform,—an East Retford disfranchised, and Manchester invested with the franchise,—that insensate opposition strongly helped the country to the Reform Bill. Let the landowners oppose the “fixed injustice” of a really high fixed duty, and the people will thereby be animated in their struggle for untaxed food—for total and immediate repeal. We rejoice to see that, while any instalment of justice is welcomed, the great principle of total repeal is not in one iota abandoned. There is, at the numerous meetings lately held, no whisper of compromise; the demand is total and immediate repeal of an impost which ensures a man possessed of acres a pension from the consumers of this country, as surely as if it were regularly paid to him out of the public treasury. The French, the people of the United States, nay, the whole civilized world, begin to perceive the monstrous injustice of our prohibitory and protective system, and the consequent sufferings of the productive classes, under its united wisdom and mercy; and there is justice as well as humour in the retaliatory associations which are said to be forming among the planters of the Southern States of America, for effecting the emancipation of the white slaves of the British factories from the thralldom of the trencher-taxing lords and squires. We hope to hear more and more of food-tax abolitionists in America. But the complicated mis-chiefs and iniquity of the Corn and Provision Laws are now tolerably well understood both at home and abroad. Streams of light have of late been let in on this irritating subject, which have penetrated and illuminated even a few Tory landlords' craniums; and the colonial monopolies, and especially that of sugar, though also tolerably well sifted within these few weeks, still require investigation. Above all, the artful and hypocritical howl of "Slavery"! "Slave-grown produce"! raised to mislead weak minds, ought to be thoroughly exposed, though the base manœuvre has, we imagine, had but partial success. With the exception of one or two well-meaning individuals—the tried and sincere opponents of slavery, who have unadvisedly and inconsistently allied themselves with those men who struggled to the last extremity to retain their fellow-creatures in slavery, to the Anti-Slavery party throughout the country, without abating one jot in their principles, have indignantly refused to be made the convenient tools of the West India planters; who now grasp that monopoly which deeply injures the manufactures of Britain, and deprives the poorer classes of a necessary of life, quite as tenaciously as they did the cart-whip, until it was wrested from their hands. Not contented with a protective bounty of 12s. 7d. per cwt., which Mr. Baring's scale would have given on their sugar, they will hear of nothing less than the existing duty; which, with the scanty supply they have produced of late, and the exclusion of all foreign sugar, save at the almost prohibitory duty of 63s. per cwt., decrees that the labouring class shall have no sugar, or but the scantiest allowance.

Chain them, and task them,

Last year, and the year before, this impost, and the exclusion of Brazil sugar, from the ransom duty upon it, rendered sugar an article which the labouring classes, ground down by the corn and provision taxes, were compelled to forego. Hence a greatly diminished consumption of sugar in the country, and a corresponding falling off in the revenue. That our depressed manufacturers might find a little vent for their overflowing stocks, and some employment for their rusting machinery; that the labouring people might obtain sugar, though at a very exorbitant price compared with that at which it may be obtained by the people of other countries; and that the failing finances might be recruited by an attempt at a somewhat better mode of taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the slight alteration in the tariff which has been quashed by a combination of those monopoly interests, which eveningly are still too powerful in Parliament. Now, how stands the case between the people of Great Britain and Ireland and these alarmed and angry planters? It is now seven years since the labour and capital of the nation was taxed to bribe them with twenty millions to do that tardy justice to their black fellow-creatures, for which the people of England had struggled long, and which these slavery-haters (!) had resisted for forty years. The gold was paid down, and the cruel grasp was at last unloosened. But the receivers of the gold were not yet done with us. We must continue to give them an annual bonus, in requital of their generosity in accepting our twenty millions,—which sum was by no means held payment in full. We must give them a monopoly of the sugar-market, and from four to six millions a-year in protective duty, taken directly from the pockets of the consumers of Britain to go into those of the planters, who had so shortly before divided our spoil. They were not, in their altered circumstances, longer able to supply even our diminished consumption; while they clamoured against our manufacturing classes seeking a supply from their customers in Cuba and Brazil, the allies of Britain. When will these reasonable gentlemen—with the price of their slaves in their pockets—allow that they have had enough of protection, enough of the people's money, and be in a condition to permit us to go to cheaper markets, to exchange our manufactures for sugar? It might be fancied, from the outcry made, that they were by the rejected budget, as they ought to be and will be, deprived of every farthing of protective duty. Mr. Baring dealt more liberally with them. He still offered them 12s. 7d. per cwt. beyond the price at which sugar might be obtained from other quarters; that is, nearly 1½d. a pound. And is it at this they cavil? The original twenty millions of bribe, and the four or five annual millions of pension or bonus, in the shape of protective duty, have rendered them careless. The cultivation of their plantations has fallen off, from this and other causes; and they look to the tax-ground people of England to continue in all time coming—or how long would satisfy them?—to make good their losses, howsoever caused, and insist upon receiving monopoly prices for their diminished quantities of sugar. What Mr. Baring offered them, (12s. 7d. per cwt.), is estimated to be double the price at which sugar can be and is produced. From an important document on this subject, still privately circulated, we cite the following passage:

When we gave the owners of slaves in our colonies twenty millions of money to reconcile them to the emancipation of their labourers, we deprived them of no more than has been described above—the power of ill-treating those labourers. The labourers remain; and the curse of Adam being upon them, as it is upon all of us, black or white, they must still earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. The only fund from which their subsistence could be drawn formerly, or from which it can be drawn now, is the produce of their labour. If they get a little larger proportion of that produce now than they did when slaves, what then! For what but for their advantage did we give our hard-earned twenty millions of money? If the planters are to have as large a share now as formerly, what claim can they put forward to one penny of the twenty millions? If they are to make the negro work as hard as he did before for the mere necessities of life, so that their incomes are to be as large as ever, then have they swindled us out of the compensation money. The planters have clearly no shadow of claim to "protection," as arising out of the Emancipation Act. Upon what other plea, then, can they seek to make us pay a monopoly price for our sugar? Why, forsooth, because they are English planters, and it would be hard if the nation did not prefer their advantage to that of the foreign sugar-grower.

To this we may reply by asking, "Where would be the hardship? why should we pay you four or five millions a-year more for your produce than will buy the same quantity from others? It cannot be called a national benefit that you, for your private advantage, shall be allowed to tax all the rest of the nation. Such a proposition would be evidently absurd. Either you are now pocketing, by means of the protecting duty, enormous gains to which you can have no title, or you are carrying on a business which causes an enormous yearly loss to the nation."

But then come the "practical men," as they are pleased to call themselves, but who should rather be called, par excellence, the "theorists;" and they insist that it is wise to pay this exorbitant price to your own people rather than encourage foreigners, because your own people lay out money with you in return. Why, so they do, and so must the foreigner if you buy from him, for he will not give us his sugar. But let us ask, Do the West India planters buy from us? Is not the course of their dealings with the mother country rather, that out of every twenty shillings we give them beyond the price we need give to others for the same article, they take some fifteen shillings of that gift in the form of manufactures? In 1840 we paid them in the price of their sugar beyond what we should have paid the foreigner for the same quantity, rather more than five millions of money; and the whole of our fellow-subjects in the West Indies, planters, labourers, merchants, all together, buy from us their yearly supply of manufactures to the value of between three and four millions. Truly this must be a profitable game for Old England!

But the sugar with which we could be cheaply and largely supplied, and which would benefit the revenue to the estimated amount of £700,000, while it extended the comforts and fostered the moral habits of the people,* is produced by the labour of slaves! Although this argument had been found in purer mouths than those of the same men who defended slavery to the last extremity, it would still, in the present circumstances of the country, be objectionable. If Dr. Lushington, and those he represents—if he indeed represent anybody save those who have taken up a hollow and hypocritical cry, to serve a purpose—if the excellent Doctor had come forward with a proposition, at once to suspend all commercial intercourse with slave countries—to receive no slave-produced commodities of any description—neither to touch, taste, or handle the accursed thing; this would have been an intelligible principle—a yielding to the force of moral obligation. But do we at present exclude slave-grown sugar? No, indeed; we import and refine it for the whole world, and, among others, for the planters of the West Indies, who find it better economy to send their dear sugar to us, and to supply themselves with the cheap slave-grown sugar, which we refine for them. And the slave-grown sugar becomes innocent to all of us, when it has undergone the purifying process of paying 63s. per cwt. of duty. There is no harm in using it after that. The West India Anti-slavery men will permit us that indulgence. Those who in sincerity join in this cry, are of the kind of people who strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. Suppose a man who has inherited great wealth from his father having grown enormously rich from slave-grown sugar,—suppose him with a pair of gold spectacles on his nose—gold, obtained, like every sovereign in his purse, by slave-labour in its direct form,—in the mines;—suppose him lolling in silken robe and slippers from Turkey, another land of slaves, sipping a basin of slave-grown coffee, or of rice-soup—rice being yet another slave product—or inhaling the bliss of a Havannah cigar, or dipping into his golden reservoir for the powder of the "Virginian weed,"—all slave-produced luxuries—and philanthropically declaiming against the deep iniquity of permitting the labourers of England—the exhausted denizens of the workshops and factories—to recruit their strength and refresh their spirits by sweetening their tea-water, or gruel, with sugar one penny or three half-pence a pound cheaper, should we not call him fool or hypocrite? The consumption of sugar has fallen off one-fourth, owing to the high price and the general distress of the country. But we will be bound to say, none of this privation has affected the higher classes, and little of it the middle orders. The poor must bear all at the last. Those who always had little, now have less, or none. There never was grosser hypocrisy or more one-sided drivelling humanity, than in the outcry about admitting slave-grown sugar; and the real friends of the Blacks, with few exceptions, must so view it. It is painful to see the venerable name of Clarkson affixed to this delusion—unconsciously on his part as this may have been done. At the head of some scheme for rigidly excluding all slave produce, however Quixotic the idea might have seemed, we could have understood it: not here. This precious humbug—this latest form of cant—has not, in the course of the whole discussions in Parliament, or in the country, been more effectually exposed than by Lord Palmerston,* in that mas-

* Lord Palmerston's speech, especially where it bears upon the anti-slavery jesuitry, deserves to be put on a more enduring record than the newspapers. It told in the House; it must tell in the country:

"Do we not," he said, "encourage the slaves of North America to produce as much cotton as they can; and do we not send that cotton to South America, in order to induce them, by slave-labour, to produce as much sugar as they can? We say to the Brazils, 'We can supply you with a quantity of cotton cheaper and better than you can get it elsewhere; will you buy it?' They say in return, 'Certainly we will; and we will pay you in sugar and coffee.' We say then, 'No; sugar and coffee are the produce of slave-labour: we are men of principle; and our consciences will not allow us to consume slave-labour sugar and coffee.' But does the transaction end there? do we then take our goods to a free-labour market? No; we try to help them out of the difficulty: we say, 'We will not consume sugar and coffee the produce of slave-labour; but the Germans are not so conscientious; take your produce there, and get for it money, which we have no scruple to accept.' But the Brazilians say, 'There is still a difficulty in this: Germany is across the Atlantic; we have very few ships fit to cope with the waves of the ocean.' What do we then say? Our reply is, 'Oh, we have ships in plenty; we will carry your produce for you.' Slave-labour sugar shall not contaminate our warehouses, our shops, or our tables; but as to our ships, that is a very different thing. But the Brazilians say there is another difficulty—and, indeed, there is no end to them. The Brazilians say, 'The terly speech, which proves that, whatever his official policy has hitherto been, his private judgment is hostile to monopolies. Sir Robert Peel also has had the becoming self-respect not to lend himself to the egregious cant of the quondam slaveholders.

The protracted debates which have been described as a pitiful party manœuvre—though they seem only a fair use of those Parliamentary tactics over which the Tories chuckle so loudly when they have the luck to jockey or over-trump their antagonists—compelled members either to speak out, or to have judgment recorded against them by the country in spite of their cunning silence. And above all, Sir Robert Peel: His comparative enlightenment on subjects connected with commerce and finance, his practicability, and his position, place him among the ways and means of reformers; who are become indifferent to which party improvement may be owing, so that it be effected. Sir Robert, forced to speak, has committed himself as little as possible; indeed, not at all, against the great principle asserted in the Whig Budget, and taken up by Lord John Russell's Corn-law motion. He stands, indeed, by a sliding scale, but not the sliding scale. He commits himself in nothing. Details are reserved. The graduated sliding scale,—that magic wand which was to effect impossibilities, was, it may be remembered, a hobby of the Duke of Wellington. And the duke, with several other great dukes, has still to be propitiated. Sir Robert—and it is a memorable declaration—tells the land-owner that “a prosperous state of manufactures is a greater support to agriculture than any system of corn-laws,”—nay, than even the sliding-scale. The Peel scale may still slide, but we suspect the range of its graduated operations would be considerably shortened. If prosperous manufactures are of the vast importance to landlords which is here ascribed to them, no one is better able to tell how manufactures are fostered than Sir Robert Peel.

So, whether our next Government shall be Whig or Tory, there is a prospect of gain to the country.

Germans like our sugar; but they are fond of refined sugar: we cannot refine our own sugar, and the Germans are not willing to do so.” But we again say, “Oh, we are aware of that; we will step in and help you: we will refine your sugar for you.” So that, however sinful it may be to continue to use slave-labour sugar, there is no sin in refining it. We refine it, then, and think we have done. Not a bit: the Brazilians say, “We have a great deal more sugar than the Germans want; what are we to do with it?” And what do we say in reply? Why, we say, “We will buy it of you; we will not eat it ourselves, because we are conscientious men, but will send it to our West India islands, and to our distant settlements, there to be consumed by the negro or the colonist, who has no right to a conscience. It can do them no harm to eat slave-labour sugar; and, to prevent any difficulty, we tell you that if that will not do, and if through any accident our own sugar shall get dear, we will eat your slave-grown sugar ourselves.” Now, without wishing to give the slightest offence, I ask, is not this the grossest hypocrisy! And are we to be asked to forego an arrangement which will be attended with relief to our commerce, and with assistance to our finances, upon pretences so hollow and so inconsistent with what we are doing every day?

The Whig measure may have been twice-blessed in opening that way for Sir Robert, which he clearly saw, but durst not have ventured to tread in his own strength. If the people be up and doing—if they be active and true to themselves—they have no cause to dread the accession of the Tories, should a combination of circumstances render that inevitable. Six weeks since, it would have been safe to predict that the Tories would gain very considerably by a dissolution. Now the event is doubtful: parties are breaking up; there is for the moment a kind of political chaos. But, amidst all this confusion, the fate of the Bread-tax is sealed,—save for the temporary respite which Lord John Russell's measure might obtain for it:—and it is really immaterial at whose hands it receives the death-stroke; though the field of politics has its laws as well as that of the chase, and those who started the game have a kind of prescriptive right to be in at the death. Difficulties in finance have often been the instruments of reform; and gold will no more ooze from the earth to flow into Sir Robert Peel's exchequer than into that of Lord Melbourne. There must be an improved system, and rigorous retrenchment. There is but one clear path to financial safety,—one means of winning back prosperity to manufactures and support to agriculture. The landlords themselves will perceive this after their eyes get a rubbing at the hustings. Within the present year a considerable change of opinion has taken place among middle-class Tories as to the wisdom of the corn-laws; and the effect of the Report and Evidence of the Committee on Import Duties has also been very great among them.

The impending discussion on Lord John Russell's motion on the corn-laws,—that final Whig preparative for a dissolution,—will prove a more severe ordeal than the sugar-duties to many of our worthy representatives; and to many persons who never before joined in the corn-law repeal agitation, this discussion will place the subject in a much more imposing light; favoured as it is by the Queen, and formally brought forward by the Cabinet. Here the slavery delusion cannot serve; nor can we think so meanly of the understanding of the most impenetrable dolt among the agricultural labourers, as to imagine he can be longer hoodwinked by the barefaced assertion, that the corn-laws keep up the rate of wages. His knowledge and reading may not be extensive; but he has a father and grandfather to question about what wages were when wheat was dear, or at the dearest, and he has memory and his own hungry experience to guide him. Some of the great and noble landowners are indignant at the idea of the Government taxing the people's food!—forgetting that, as they get a great deal themselves, the Government, driven to their wit's end for money, fancy they may obtain a small share for the public service; that the whole need not go to bolster up the exorbitant rents which the bread monopoly has created. Tax the people's food for revenue!—for what lightens, or ought to lighten, their burdens in some other direction! That is an idea not to be entertained for a moment in free and happy England, where all the people wear broad cloth, and eat beef and pudding every day. Such benevolent individuals will therefore certainly oppose the "fixed injustice" of a high duty,—and 8s. is a very high duty, much too high.

One good effect of the Whig measure is already apparent, in rousing the people from torpor and apathy as to their rights, and teaching them to feel that there is still something to strive for, worth obtaining; to strive for, not indeed with the enthusiasm, and unlimited confidence, and cordial union which marked the Reform struggle, but with perhaps better sense, and with more solidly-based, if more moderate expectations. There is still matériel left for a good fight: perhaps the anti-monopolists may conquer at once at the hustings; but, in the worst event, a powerful phalanx will be found in the next Parliament, pledged, in addition to every former pledge, to stand by the banner of Free Trade. Save for the handle which would be given to the Tories to misrepresent the popular sentiment on that question, if they be brought into power by the results of a general election, the matter, except as a question of time, is, to genuine reformers, of small consequence. If the more liberal party be, for a season, excluded from office, the lesson may be useful. They have been long enough in power for all the good they have done,—and may be none the worse for a few months of the bracing and discipline of Opposition, ever a quickener of Whig liberality. These are general remarks, and by the by. We give Ministers hearty praise for what they have attempted,—and, if they adhere to their professions, confidently foresee for them the returning confidence and warm support of the aroused People.

KENNEDY'S TEXAS.*

THE true El Dorado is at length discovered; nor, to speak in round terms, is the latitude in which it lies on the surface of the terrestrial globe materially different from that which was originally imagined. It is, according to the Report of Mr. Kennedy, corroborated by other authorities, neither more nor less than the young Republic of Texas. Since Imlay, the American, some forty or fifty years ago, wrote his glowing and hyperbolic account of Kentucky, then lying an Eden-wilderness, and turned the heads of the whole population of the Atlantic States, while he strongly excited the people of this country, and first sent the mighty tide of emigration rolling westward, nothing has appeared to compare with this description of Texas; which would seem to surpass Kentucky as much in beauty, healthfulness, and fertility, as it does in extent of surface. That, according to one sanguine estimate, is nine times. One alleged superiority of Texas consists in a delicious and healthful climate, not so cold in winter as the north-eastern United States, which we can easily understand, nor so hot in summer, which it is more difficult to comprehend. Texas is a land flowing with milk and honey, capable of producing in luxuriance, besides the articles most valuable in European commerce, corn, wine, and oil—the fruits of the tropics with all the commodities of the temperate zones. Its coasts and rivers abound in delicious fish; its prairies and rolling land, or undulating plains, with all kinds of game, and those animals most useful to man, as wild horses, asses, buffaloes, deer, bears, wild turkeys, and smaller game. What is more wonderful, the rattlesnake of Texas is either innocuous, or its sting is easily cured by a strange process; the alligator is there so simple that a child may elude its jaws; and the musquito and sand-fly cease to be the minute but horrid pests which they are found everywhere else from the St. Lawrence to the Sabine. There are in Texas none of those putrid swamps, which in all the Southern and Western States concur with a rank vegetation and burning sun to generate the poisonous miasma, which occasion that interminable scourge of new clearings—fever and ague. The yellow fever has hardly as yet visited the country; and when it did once appear, it was suspected to have been imported from New Orleans, and not to have been endemic.

The genial month of March in Texas equals "the glad, green May" of the States of New York and Philadelphia; and even in summer, when the thermometer ranges the highest, the sky is clear, the water delicious, and the breeze "as exhilarating as champagne, and far more invigorating." Many of the natives live to the age of one hundred years; and a traveller may, night after night, sleep in wet clothes, and with wet bedding, under heavy dews or rain, and be not one whit the worse; which could hardly chance save to some highly favoured individual, in any other region of the globe; or perhaps the exemption may be peculiar to surveyors employed by speculating Land Companies!

Seriously, however, Texas, beyond all doubt, is one of the finest countries in North America; possessed of many natural advantages, and even of marked superiorities over a great part of the western and southern territory of the United States; and, save for one plague-spot, one fatal germ of corruption, which it carries in its young bosom, the consequences of which are hardly yet beginning to be developed, Texas is destined to become, and that rapidly, a prosperous and powerful empire: this is—need we say?—SLAVERY; which has not crept in gradually and unawares, but is laid deep in the foundations of the State.

Mr. Kennedy, as we apprehend, may, with the judicious, as well as the sceptical, have somewhat marred the effect of his otherwise excellent book, by occasional overcharged descriptions, and a too implicit faith in the statements of the interested trumpeters of Texas. His work is, however, by much the fullest and most complete account—historical, geographical, and statistical—which has yet appeared, of a country which must become of vast importance to England, from political and commercial considerations, and also as a probable field of British emigration.

If we were to examine carefully and scrupulously into the foundations in which empires are laid, there are few, with the noble exception of the United States, and, perhaps, that republic from which Texas revolted, which could fairly stand the test. Texas is certainly no exception to the fraud or violence with which kingdoms and colonies have generally been planted; and the elaborate attempt of Mr. Kennedy and others, can, at best, only show something in palliation of the crimes in which the young republic rose, but falls far short of complete vindication. We must, however, now look to Texas as it is, and as it promises to be; contented, as to what is past and irretrievable, to rest in that solemn annunciation—"The wrath of man worketh the righteousness of God," and in the sublime promise consequent upon this—"And the remainder of wrath He will stay." Leaving therefore our readers to consult Dr. Channing, and on the other side the champions of Texas, and to adjust the balance for themselves, at once, we frankly confess that, in existing circumstances, we cannot see how England could longer wisely refuse to follow the example set by the United States, Holland, and France, who had previously recognised the new republic. There were many reasons of sound policy for this step, and but one, though a powerful one, against it—the direct institution of slavery by the constitution of Texas. For this fatal error, the advocates of that country plead many reasons of policy and expediency: it was, at all events, impossible for England to have originally prevented this state of things; while as a powerful ally, and a customer worth all the rest of the world put together, she may still, by her example and her counsels, restrain and mitigate that evil which, with justice to her own people, she wanted power to repress at the outset.—We are not deceived by the statements and professions of the advocates of Texas. Slavery, if still in comparative infancy, must rapidly increase in that country. The demand of Texas has already stimulated the traders of Cuba, as well as the breeders of the Slave States of America; and though the laws of Texas provide, that no negroes are to be introduced into the Republic save from America, where the trade is abolished by statute, whatever the practice may be, it is undeniable that native Africans are smuggled in considerable numbers into Texas, both from Louisiana and from Cuba; the only debateable point being the numbers, which one party probably exaggerates, and the other greatly, and, we fear, consciously, underrates. It is but too probable that nothing save want of capital keeps down the importation of Africans, and a great increase of their numbers. Waving this painful topic, we shall content ourselves with merely inquiring whether it is the duty of British statesmen to break off amicable relations with the Brazils, of which no one dreams, or to recognise the new Republic of Texas? From this plain question we come to Mr. Kennedy's account of this naturally rich, finely situated, and most promising new country.

Mr. Kennedy went to Canada in the train of the late Earl of Durham, of whom he speaks with affectionate gratitude, as not merely a kind patron but a great statesman; making that mistake which is extremely natural, and even graceful in one in his position, of confounding a strong self-will and passionate temperament, with a vigorous intellect. When Lord Durham returned abruptly home, Mr. Kennedy, desirous of seeing more of America, made a journey into the United States; which was prosecuted, in the spring of 1838, so far as New Orleans, and afterwards he went into Texas; "nothing dismayed," as he states, "from travelling beyond the Sabine by the alarming accounts which I received, of Texas and its people, from my northern acquaintances; who placed before me the agreeable alternatives of being eaten by Indians, sliced by Bowie-knives, or pressed for a soldier." A voyage of only forty-eight hours took him in a steamer from New Orleans to GALVESTON, at present the principal port in Texas; from whence he proceeded still by steam to Houston, then the seat of the government. Here he met with every facility for acquiring information concerning the country; and much of his time, while in Houston, was spent in accumulating materials for his projected book. These were afterwards increased in the United States. The authorities at Houston were probably not averse to enlist an English traveller of some name, in the service of the infant republic, at least so far as bespeaking his favourable report. If the United States was their Mother, England, they said, was their GRANDMOTHER,—and it was hoped that this venerable relation would not be slow to acknowledge the territorial right which her hopeful descendant had established "by an untarnished sword." Now, the truth is, that the Texans had, with the Mexicans, completely realized the fable of the hedge-hog and the snake; and that "the untarnished sword" was neither more nor less than the rifle and the Bowie-knife, turned against the freely-chosen rulers who had admitted them into their territory, so soon as the attempt could be made with impunity.—But we are breaking our pledge made just now, not to look too nicely into what is past recall.

Texas, our readers are aware, before the revolt and the conquest of its independence, formed a considerable part of the Mexican Federal Republic.

Texas exhibits the very reverse of what our good Scottish king said of a now fair portion of his realm—that it was a frieze garment with a silken fringe. In Texas the robe is rich, the bordering coarse and unpromising. Mr. Kennedy remarks—

The first appearance of Texas is unfavourable, from whatever point it may be approached. If by sea, a low sandy beach, backed by wet and level prairies, offers few inducements to the agricultural settler. If by the Rio Grande, it wears an aspect of aridity; and if by Louisiana and Red River, it breaks upon the observer as a poor upland district, overrun with wood, with a weak soil of alternate sand and clay. But, after traversing the borders and advancing towards the interior, the scene is entirely changed. Then this singular country exhibits its beauties and develops its resources. In the rolling and hilly sections, the grazier and cultivator of the products familiar to the European farmer, may obtain easy and ample returns from plains and valleys unrivalled for natural attractions: and on the low line of the coast, the enterprise of the southern planter will be prodigally rewarded by the vegetable treasures of a tropical clime. To the settler who desires to enjoy the advantages of the upper region without fixing his residence remote from the sea, the western coast of Texas, with its sparkling streams flowing through a fertile and picturesque country, until they blend with the blue waves of the gulf, is more suitable than the eastern. But it is the peculiar charm of Texas, that it offers to the most dissimilar tastes and habits the means of selecting a "place of rest" in some congenial spot.

The boundaries of the Republic, as laid down by treaty agreed upon by Spain and the United States, are these:—

Beginning at the mouth of the river Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico, following the course of the said river to the 32° of north latitude; the eastern bank and all the islands in the river to belong to the United States, and the western bank to Spain; thence, by a line due north, to the northernmost part of the 33° of latitude, and until it strikes the Red River; thence, following the course of the said river, to the northernmost point of the bend between longitude 101° and 102°, by the shortest line to the southernmost point of the bend of the river Arkansas, between the same degrees of longitude, 101° and 102°; thence, following the course of the river Arkansas, to its source; thence, due north, following the forty-second parallel of latitude to the South Sea.

But it is needless for our purpose to be particular about boundaries, where, for many a year to come, there will be space enough for both American and British settlers. The natural features of the country, and its great resources and capabilities, are more important.

Texas possesses many noble streams, having each numerous tributaries. The rivers flow in a nearly parallel course; which indicates the general surface of the country to be an inclined plane, sloping towards the north-east. The whole extent of the maritime coast of the Republic is only four hundred miles from the river Sabine to the Rio Grande; but many of the rivers are navigable for a great way; and obstructions having been removed by skill and industry, steamers are already plying on several of them and their tributaries for many hundred miles inland.

The surface of the country is divided into three distinct regions—the LEVEL, which extends along the whole coast, averaging, in breadth, from thirty to seventy miles; what is called the ROLLING or undulating region, which forms a larger and finer division, and leads on to the MOUNTAINOUS ridges. These three great divisions are characterized thus:—

The prevailing character of the soil of the level region of Texas is a rich alluvion—singularly free from those accumulations of stagnant water, which, combined with a burning sun and exuberant vegetation, render a large proportion of the southern parts of the United States little better than a sickly desert. The porous character of the soil, the gradual elevation of the level lands towards the interior, and the general rise of the banks from the beds of the streams, preclude the formation of swamps to any injurious extent.

THE ROLLING, OR UNDULATING REGION, forms the largest of the natural divisions of Texas. North and north-west of the level section lying between the Sabine and San Jacinto rivers, the country undulates towards the Red River. The thickly timbered lands extend quite to the Red River, and as far to the west as a line drawn due north, from the heads of the Sabine. A wide belt of rolling and thinly wooded prairie extends westward of this line along the margin of the Red River.

The country rises in gentle and beautiful undulations above the alluvial region of the Brazos, Colorado, and Guadalupe; extending in a north-westerly direction up those rivers, from 150 to 200 miles, as far as the hilly district. Here is a delightful variety of fertile prairie and valuable woodland, enriched with springs, and rivulets of pure and sparkling water, which, like the larger streams, are invariably bordered by wooded "bottoms." The undulations often swell at lengthened intervals into eminences of soft acclivity, from the summits of which the eye may repose on some of the fairest scenes in nature.

The rolling lands between the Guadalupe and Nueces sweep towards the north-west, with an elevation gradually increasing, until they terminate in the high land range, at a distance of about 200 miles from the level region of the coast. Timber and water are not so abundant in this section as in the country lying further east: but it affords excellent pasturage, and is peculiarly adapted to the raising of all kinds of stock.

THE MOUNTAINOUS REGION forms part of the Sierra Madre, that great chain which, broken at the junction of the rivers Puerco and Rio Grande, and taking a north-easterly course, enters Texas Proper, at the sources of the river Nueces. Continuing thence, in the same direction, to the head waters of the San Saba, a tributary of the Colorado, and inclining eastward down the San Saba, it crosses the Colorado, and is finally lost in the woodlands of the Upper Brazos, between the river of which name and the Sabine the country is rolling or level. Spurs of this mountain range project southwardly down the rivers Medina and Guadalupe, to the vicinity of San Antonio de Bexar. Other spurs branch down the rivers Llano and Piedernales and the smaller western tributaries of the Colorado; and similar spurs extend to the Colorado above San Saba for a considerable distance, rounding the head waters of the San Andres and Boaque rivers, which flow into the Brazos.

The mountains are of third and fourth magnitude in point of elevation: those of San Saba are deemed the highest. They are clothed with forests of pine, oak, cedar, and other trees, with a great variety of shrubbery. Extensive valleys of alluvial soil wind throughout the range; most of them susceptible of irrigation and profitable culture. The sides of the mountains themselves, with not a few of their summits, are adapted to agriculture. Copious and limpid springs abound in the high lands, fertilizing the soil, and forming innumerable rivulets, which, gliding with a rapid current, unite their waters, until they swell into large and bounteous rivers, that scatter plenty over the central and western districts of the Brazos and Bexar. Of the table lands beyond the mountains, which are said to be healthy and fertile, little is known, and still less of the northern region, extending to the 42° of north latitude.

Whatever may be said, Texas still wants a good harbour; the coast of the Republic offering no exception to the general character of the Gulf of Mexico. Here, however, we find an accredited pilot bred in the British navy, affirming that Galveston affords a harbour that may be approached with less danger than any port in the United States; as, on the whole line of coast west of the Sabine, in five fathoms of water, is the best holding ground "at all seasons of the year." The numerous creeks, islands, and inlets in this lagoonish and singular coast are minutely described by Mr. Kennedy.

The Reports of the Surveyors employed by the different great Land Companies, though about as liable to suspicion as any other lottery advertisements, seem to be confidently relied upon by Mr. Kennedy; nor is it possible at present to say what degree of confidence ought to be placed in them, even in relation to internal water communication, though it is probable that navigation downwards, which is the most important as conveying raw produce to markets and shipping places, will be found as free on the fine rivers of Texas as on those of the United States. The rolling country in general is represented as lightly timbered, like the Great Western Prairies of the United States; and we apprehend that the general resemblance is, in several other respects, closer than the Texans are willing to allow. The porous nature of much of the soil, which prevents the formation of stagnant swamps, also dries up the rivulets in summer, and presents permanent inconveniences, which are thus proposed to be obviated.

In the sand-bed branches fed by small springs, the water not unfrequently retires by day and returns at night, to the great surprise of the traveller, on stirring from his encampment at early morn. An ample supply of good and cool water, fit for all domestic uses, may be procured in every section of the country, by digging wells of a moderate depth. Rain-water, easily collected in tanks and cisterns, is frequently used on the eastern coast, and is, when cooled with ice, agreeable to the taste in warm weather; but this mode of keeping the essential element is objected to as tending, in the low lands, to the production of annoying insects.

Heavy rains, and the sudden descent of torrents from the high lands, sometimes occasion unexpected overflows on the sloping-grounds adjacent to the water-courses. They are, however, of too limited an extent and brief duration to be seriously injurious to property or health. The rise of even the minor streams, in the rainy season, is sufficient to enable the settlers to convey their surplus produce by boats, or small craft, to the coast. Free, on the one hand, from the overwhelming inundations of the Mississippi and its vast tributaries, and on the other, from the scanty or partial distribution of water, which occasions total barrenness in some extensive sections of Mexico, and in others the extremes of sterility and fruitfulness, Texas derives from the earth and the clouds as large a share of aqueous nutriment as any portion of the temperate zone. It is the rare felicity of this favoured land to combine within itself the advantages both of a northern and a southern climate, evinced in its serene skies, its branching streams, its fertilizing rains, and its diversified products.

From the southern boundary of Texas, onwards to the Equator, the tendency of the regular division of wet and dry seasons increases, until they form the great climatic distinctions.

We have already stated our difficulty in understanding the theory of Texas enjoying a climate neither so cold in winter nor so hot in summer as even the Atlantic States of America, though Captain Marryat states a plausible cause, which we shall afterwards notice; but if the following description be accurate, we can easily account for the superior healthfulness of the LEVEL land of Texas.

On the coast, especially near the large river bottoms, which are occasionally overflowed, the climate is similar to the neighbouring state of Louisiana, but with an ample abatement of its injurious influences. The forests are free from the rank undergrowth of the woody districts of Lower Louisiana, as the level region generally is from those putrid swamps, the exhalations from which, under the rays of a burning sun, poison the atmosphere, and produce sickness and death. In Texas, from river to river, the country is an open, mild acclivity; in Louisiana and Mississippi, from river to river, it is a compactly wooded level, retaining the waters of the annual inundations, which, acted upon by a dense vegetation and a powerful solar heat, generate noxious miasma, the certain cause of malignant fevers. In the low, alluvial parts of Texas, intermittent fevers frequently prevail;

but to these visitations all new countries are subject, particularly where, by the clearing of the timbered land, the rays of the sun first break upon the vegetable deposit of ages.

So, after all, Texas is not exempted, cannot indeed, in the nature of things, be exempted, from the scourge of all new settlements in rich soils, even in moderately hot latitudes. One decided natural superiority Texas may claim, and it is of vast magnitude.

While the midsummer air of the alluvial region of the Mississippi is surcharged with noxious moisture, the clear atmosphere of Texas is quickened and renovated by invigorating breezes from the blue expanse of ocean which, passing over the dry, rolling, and verdant surface of the interior, enliven the spirits, and induce a love of existence, even for the passive physical enjoyment it affords.

But for these refreshing breezes, which, during six months, blow almost without intermission, the summer heat of the low lands would certainly be oppressive and pernicious. By thermometer calculations, made throughout the season, from April to September, for a period of three years, and in different sections of the country, the mercury has been found to range from 63° to 100°: average heat, nine o'clock in the morning, 73°; twelve o'clock, noon, 83°; three o'clock, afternoon, 77°. But the graduation of the thermometer can convey no accurate idea of the climate of Texas to those who have never experienced its effects. From the same degree of heat which in New Orleans was overpowering and relaxing, I suffered comparatively little inconvenience, even in Houston: a town situated in a low-lying and rather insalubrious prairie. So steady, bracing, and cooling was the breeze, that it not only mitigated the heat, but enabled me to take pedestrian exercise with safety in the open prairie at mid-day in the fervid month of June; and so potent was this affectionate and welcome wind, that I was obliged, when writing, to close the southern window of my apartment, to prevent my books and papers from being whirled off the table where they lay. At such times it would have been no easy task to have carried an expanded umbrella across the prairie. From the 1st of April to the close of September, these benignant breezes commence soon after sunrise, and continue until three or four o'clock in the afternoon, when they gradually die away; and, as they decline, the elasticity of the spirits sustains a corresponding depression. After sunset, a light breeze again springs up, the atmosphere grows cooler until midnight, and increases in coolness until early morn, when the covering of an English bed at the same season is by no means unacceptable to the wooer of repose.

The sweet south-western breeze, which is so accessory to health and comfort on the level region of the coast, may almost be termed an unmingled luxury among the cool springs, translucent streams, wooded "bottoms," "islands" of timber, and flower-spangled prairies of the rolling country.

Drought, which continues from the end of April to September, is often mollified by copious refreshing showers, which, however, fall very unequally. This is felt by farmers as the chief defect in the Texan climate. It is not here attempted to explain the phenomenon; nor why,

One section of the country is frequently saturated by teeming showers, while, at the distance of only a few miles, the ground is gaping for moisture. At such a time, by keeping to the open prairie, remote from the water-courses, whose circumjacent woods attract the clouds drifted by the wind from the gulf, the traveller may pursue his course, and see the rain at intervals descending around him, and leaving himself untouched. Not so, however, at other periods of the year. Then wet weather is general, and in the early spring predominates, especially on the coast, where it breaks up the roads, swells the streams, and sometimes injures the stock, and retards the preparations of the agriculturist. From March to October, comparatively little rain falls, and the constant action of the sun upon a dry, open, elevated surface, causes a regular influx of air from the sea.

Every country and climate has its peculiar drawbacks. If we are to believe our next-door continental neighbours, it is impossible to exist in our own cheerless, sunless land, of violent change, and perpetual vicissitude. In Texas, one drawback on human comfort is those impetuous chill winds, also felt in the Southern United States, which suddenly occur from October till March, termed "The Northers," and which, according to Humboldt, make the thermometer descend, at Havannah, to 32° of Fahrenheit.

In Texas, the strong "northers" set in about the month of November; and in December and January the cold north winds sweep down the plains with nearly as much regularity as the south-west wind in summer. In these ungenial months, the southerly winds sometimes interpose their kindly agencies, but only for a short time, being soon followed by rain, the sure precursor of a "norther." Early and late in the winter season, the "northers" usually blow from the north-east; in mid-winter, from the north-west. The effect of these winds, in changing the depth of the tide-water of the bays, is singular, and applies to the whole line of coast.

But very fine days occur during the bad season, and the grass is often green even in January. So is it often in England, and in Ireland always. A fine climate, a climate always genial, is perhaps the richest gift of nature to any country. Its influence is all-pervading, and perennial. It supplies many wants, it comes in place of a thousand artificial luxuries. It is itself the greatest of luxuries. It is not perfect in any part of the American continent—not even in Texas, although two crops of garden-fruits may be gathered in one year, and there are gardens for spring and summer, and others for autumn and winter with crops suitable to each season.

The "northers," which are peculiar to Texas, and the eastern coast of Mexico, generally follow a few days of rain and southerly winds. They burst forth suddenly, with a gust of wind which almost checks respiration, and seems to dry up all the moisture of the skin; severe cold immediately succeeds, and the thermometer frequently falls ten or twelve degrees within half an hour. Their average duration is three days; the clouds generally disappear a few hours after their commencement, leaving a clear, cold sky. Coming from a point west by north, they depress the mercury in the thermometer lower than easterly winds; but they are regarded as less prejudicial to health. During the summer months, "northers" are of rare occurrence, and their rude visits are not an un-mixed evil, as they tend much to purify the air. The shelter of the groves and woods affords sufficient protection to cattle from their assaults.

There is no encouragement to medical practitioners in Texas; at least not yet.

If any part of Texas can be termed sickly, it is the narrow strip of country running parallel to the gulf, where, in the low, timbered-bottoms, the rivers deposit the accumulations of their annual overflows. In this section, to which Providence has granted exuberant fertility, in compensation of its comparative insalubrity, settlers are liable to be attacked by bilious and intermittent fevers; but, after receding some distance from the coast, no part of the globe is more friendly to the regular action of the human frame. The towns immediately on the coast, within the direct range of the trade winds, are healthy, although rather trying to temporary sojourners from cold climates, during the months of June, July, and August. Pulmonary consumption, so destructive in England and the northern states of the American Union, is almost unknown in Texas. Rheumatism and chronic diseases are not prevalent; and nine-tenths of the Republic are considered healthier than the most healthy parts of the United States. In the opinion of respectable medical men, a residence in this country would be as favourable to persons of a consumptive tendency, as the South of Europe, or Madeira. As a general fact, it may be stated, that the farther from the lands bordering on the coast, the more salubrious is the locality; and persons who arrive in summer will be quite safe by retiring fifty or sixty miles inland. Western Texas is best adapted to a northern constitution; and above the falls of the Brazos, or in the region lying about seventy miles above the mouths of the rivers westward of the Brazos, natives of Great Britain may settle with at least as fair a prospect of longevity as they had at home. The district comprehended in the Mexican "department" of Bexar is of remarkable salubrity. It rarely freezes in winter; and in summer, the heat, by the thermometer seldom exceeds 85°.

Every succeeding year, by extending cultivation and the clearing of the woods in the lower region, with improvements in drainage and the police of towns, will diminish the few existing sources of sickness. At present, Europeans need not be deterred by apprehensions on the score of health, from removing to a country whose powers of production all but anticipate the necessities of man. Clothing adapted to the summer and winter of England is suitable for the warm and wintry seasons of the young republic. Lightly burthened to raise an abundance of all things requisite for comfortable subsistence, the human frame—stunted in its growth and swerved from its fair proportions by the inferior and insufficient food and incessant drudgery, which enfeeble and wear down the physical energies of the depressed and hopeless labourers of Britain, and the states of the old world—will, on the kindly soil, and under the fostering temperature of Texas, expand its dimensions, and assume the mould of strength and the symmetry of beauty. In travelling through the United States, I was continually struck by the changes which, in the course of a generation or two, had been effected in the various European races by transplantation to a land where labour is respected, and comparatively independent. In Baltimore, especially, where there has been a considerable immigration of poor Catholic Irish, I was frequently amused by a specimen of the Hiberno-American—the offspring of some laborious exile of Erin—in the state of transition, and wavering, as it were, between his insular descent and his continental nativity. The broad, low comedy features and hard scrubby undergrowth of the original ill-fed and hard-worked importation had become grave, elongated, and erect; and, in another generation, the Celtic physiognomy and hard-compressed corporeal outline bade fair to be obliterated in the comparatively austere aspect and tall spare build of the undoubted American. In walking with a republican friend on the quays of New York, I noticed a heap of uncouth and squalid Dutch and Bavarians just deposited from an emigrant-ship, and remarked the contrast which their dirty and squab appearance exhibited to the native population. "Such as they are," said my companion, "we shall see their progeny tapering up among us like lilies!" And so it is:—moderate labour, abundant food, useful instruction, and the absence of servile forms, are speedily indicated by the thoughtful look, erect gait, and developed form.

Perhaps in no part of the civilised world is there a race of men more generally large and robust than in the south-western states of the Union, and certainly none more enterprising and energetic.

The gay and fearless spirit of roving enterprise which animates the athletic Kentuckian is proverbial; yet the soil and climate of his parent State, which nourish the vigour that inspires him with adventurous daring, must yield the palm of excellence to the plains and skies of Texas.

But we must stop. Mr. Kennedy goes beyond Imlay with Kentucky, in sounding the praises of Texas; yet the natural resources of the country are beyond doubt very great. Every region has its peculiar capabilities. The LEVELS of the coast are adapted to the culture of cotton and tobacco; for the first of which the bottoms of Texas possess advantages over the cotton-growing districts of the United States, as the frost does not set in so early. The more inland districts are adapted to the cultivation of the sugar-cane, Indian corn, wheat, potatoes, sweet and common, olives, and grapes. The cotton produced on the low alluvial lands of Texas is said to equal the sea-land Georgian cotton, which is reckoned the finest quality that comes from the United States to the Liverpool market. The culture is also said to be easier, as the plants do not require to be renewed oftener than once in three years; while in the United States they must be renewed annually. The expense of cultivation is thus considerably less; while the return on the acre is considerably greater.

It is to Texas that we must look for the supply of a considerable part of the supply of cotton which will be required for those extended manufactures to which free-trade must yet give rise; and it may, it is here alleged, be cultivated, not only by free blacks, but by a white population: "because (according to Captain Marryat) Texas, though so far south, is a prairie country; and from its situation at the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico, a sea-breeze always blows across it, rendering it cool, and refreshing it." This breeze he considers a continuation of the trade-winds. The cultivation of cotton is certainly likely to prosper in Texas, but we imagine that, whatever may afterwards take place, negro slaves only are engaged in it at present. The same fact, probably, still applies to sugar. Yet the whole number of negroes in the country, if we may credit report, is only from six to ten thousand—a number which looks as if the whole were guess-work. We cannot, however, believe the extravagant statement of the Dutch Consul-general at Havana, quoted by Mr. Turnbull, that 15,000 Africans had been sent from Cuba to Texas in one year! This the want of capital must of itself have rendered impossible; neither can we believe the whole number of slaves only between six and ten thousand, while the whites amount to 200,000.

The cultivation of Indian corn is much less expensive in Texas than in the United States. We hear of one man, assisted by a boy of ten, raising and gathering 1500 bushels in one year. The returns are—fifty, sixty, and seventy bushels per acre. The demand, owing to the great influx of settlers, is constant, and the price consequently high. Vineyards, which have not yet prospered in the United States, would, it is imagined, thrive well in Texas; and Humboldt foretells, that to the upland regions of this fine country, the American continent must look for wine. Tobacco grows luxuriantly in the alluvial bottoms, indigo is indigenous, wild cochineal is obtained, and the mulberry thrives vigorously in Western Texas. In short, the difficulty is to find what the Republic does not spontaneously produce, or is not capable of producing. In spite of all that has been said, large timber does not seem plentiful, though on the banks of the rivers, and skirting the prairies, or girdling the mountains, much fine timber is found, and a luxuriant growth of underwood. It is on drift-wood, brought plentifully down by the streams at the periodical floods, that the settlers depend for a considerable part of their fuel. The northern division of Texas possesses a novel and remarkable feature worthy of notice, in what is termed the Cross Timber.

The Cross Timber is a continuous series of forests, extending from the woody region at the sources of the Trinity, in a direct line north, across the apparently interminable prairies of northern Texas and the Osark territory, to the southern bank of the Arkansas river. This belt of timber varies in width from five to fifty miles. Between the Trinity and Red River it is generally from five to nine miles wide, and is so remarkably straight and regular, that it appears to be a work of art. When viewed from the adjoining prairies on the east or west, it appears in the distance like an immense wall of woods stretching from south to north in a straight line, the extremities of which are lost in the horizon. There appears to be no peculiarity in the surface of the ground over which the Cross Timber passes, to distinguish it from the surface of the adjoining country; but, where the country is level, the region traversed by the Cross Timber is level; where it is undulating, and where it is hilly, that also is uneven, conforming in every respect to the general features of the adjoining country. The trees composing these forests are not distinguishable by any peculiarity from those which are occasionally found in the adjoining prairies, or in the bottoms bordering the streams which intersect the Cross Timber. Oak, hickory, elm, white oak, post oak, holly, and other trees, are found in it. The elm is often found growing luxuriantly far from any stream, and in apparently poor and sandy soil. The black jack, a species of oak, is met with throughout its whole extent, from the Arkansas to the "Black Jack Ridges," at the sources of the Trinity.

The Cross Timber, in its general direction, does not perceptibly vary from the true meridian. Dr. Irion (formerly Secretary of State of the Republic) a few years since accompanied a party of surveyors, who measured a line extending forty miles due south from the bank of the Red River, near the Cross Timber, and found, to their surprise, that the western border of the Cross Timber continued parallel with this line through the whole distance. As might naturally be supposed, the Cross Timber forms the great landmark of the western prairies; and the Indians and hunters, when describing their routes across the country, in their various expeditions, refer to the Cross Timber, as the navigators of Europe refer to the meridian of Greenwich. If they wish to furnish a sketch of the route taken in any expedition, they first draw a line representing the Cross Timber, and another representing the route taken, intersecting the former. Thus a simple, but correct, map of the portion of country traversed in the expedition is at once presented to view.

The remarkable uniformity which characterizes the Cross Timber, and its apparently artificial arrangement, under a particular meridian, has induced some persons to believe that it is a work of art, and owes its origin to the unknown race of men who have erected the mounds and ancient fortifications of the Mississippi valley. It is difficult to conceive, however, for what useful purpose it could have been intended, unless as a land-mark to distinguish the boundary between two nations. But whether it be the work of art or of nature, will probably never be determined. The lines of civilisation are rapidly extending towards it, and soon the scrutiny of science will be for ever checked by the destroying axe of the pioneer.

The whole face of the country is represented as rich in indigenous grasses, and it possesses a various and beautiful Flora. Here, again, is a passage worthy of Inlay :—

To the unscientific eye, its multitudinous array of plants and flowers would seem to defy calculation and arrangement. Many of the northern garden-flowers and hot-house exotics bloom spontaneously on the prairies; amongst others, the dahlia, the trumpet-flower, the geranium, heart's-ease, lupin, several varieties of the lily and digitalis, lady's-slipper, anemone, jessamine, golden rod, lobelia cardinalis, the passion-flower, &c. Of the rose, numerous varieties, including perpetual, monthly, and multiflora, yield their sweetness, without exacting from man any care in return. Primroses, violets, and the delicate flower of the ground-apple, are common embellishments of the soil. The slopes ascending from the water-courses are often entirely overrun with the elastic and delicate mimosa sensitiva, which shrinks and contracts its leaves, to the distance of many feet in advance of the approaching wayfarer.

The open, wood-girdled lands, which the early French settlers in the Mississippi valley distinguished by the name of "prairies," or meadows, and which are called "savannas" by the Spaniards, form the characteristic feature of the landscape of Texas, in common with the scenery of Illinois, and some other Western States. In Texas, the prairies vary in extent from one hundred to many thousand acres. Their superior elevation, which, with the porous quality of the soil, facilitates drainage, renders them more healthy than the prairies of Illinois, on which the waters lodge until evaporated by the heat of the sun.

Mrs. Holley, a lady whose pen, as is well known, was set in motion on purpose to sound the praises of Texas, is frequently quoted by Mr. Kennedy, and particularly in her flowery descriptions of the beauties of the vegetable creation in this "terrestrial paradise"; nor though her colours are glowing, does he consider her picture overcharged.

Texas is also rich in minerals. Iron and coal, both anthracite and bituminous, are said to abound from the Trinity River to the Grand River. Salt is abundant from the Sabine to the Rio Grande; and there are numerous saline lakes and springs, and also sulphureous and chalybeate springs. Of the wild animals we have already spoken, nor is it necessary to say much of bison, and buffaloes, and wild horses, in reckoning on the permanent resources of a settled country. Here, too, among other delicacies, may be found the far-famed canvass-back duck, and a species of tortoise, not much inferior to the true West Indian or genuine Aldermanic turtle. These, however, are small matters; and the book contains much that is really important to be known, though we by no means advise any one to pack up his alls and be jogging to Texas, without farther examination. All that is here set before emigrants, with every appearance of probability, and which there is no natural obstacle to gainsay, has been, we ought to remember, promised over and over again to emigrants to South Australia, and the Swan River settlements, or wherever a great Company has land to sell.

In describing the three great natural divisions of the soil of Texas, the emigrant has been furnished with a general guide to direct him in pitching his tent, or erecting his log-house, in conformity with his previous habits and ultimate views. If the native of a southern clime, devoted to tropical agriculture, and anxious to obtain quick and large returns from capital, he will find a suitable field of operation on the alluvial lands of the coast, or the rich "bottoms" of the Red River. If accustomed to a more temperate clime, and the mixed pursuit of farming and stock-raising, he will be quite at home on the rolling prairies. If transplanted from the keen and vigorous north, from a land where the aid of manufacturing industry has been called in to assist the endeavours of the grower of wheat, and the breeder of sheep and cattle, his proper resting-place will be in the bracing neighbourhood of the north-western high lands, where tender pasturage awaits the importation of the Merino, and streams, rapid and perennial, invite the erection of mills and the introduction of machinery.

Cattle and swine, and, indeed, horses and mules, may be reared everywhere, with an absence of trouble and expense almost incredible. So favourable is the climate, and so abundant the provision which Nature has made, that little attention is requisite beyond such precautions as may be necessary to prevent them from straying away or becoming wild. For horses and cattle, the prairie-grasses and the cane-brakes offer a never-failing supply of provender; and the "mast" of the woods, with the native ground-pea, and various nutritious roots, will long afford unbought subsistence to hogs. Even salt is ready at hand for the preservation of animal health.

Live stock may be introduced from the United States, purchased in the country, or procured cheap from the Mexicans on the Rio Grande. The increase is more rapid than in colder climes; the produce is earlier; and, allowing for all casualties, stock generally will double their numbers every two years, without any exaction of care or cost. It is not unusual for the first calf to be brought forth when the mother is but fourteen or fifteen months old. Domestic animals fatten very fast; and the beef and pork are of first-rate quality. The increase obtained by a Texan farmer from two pigs amounted to forty in ten months; and this is a fair example of the multiplication of stock. To prepare hogs for market, they should be taken from the woods in autumn, when fattened by the wild nuts, or mast, and fed for a few weeks on Indian corn, which imparts solidity to the flesh, and whiteness and firmness to the lard. Without this preparatory feeding, the flesh will be soft and oily, and hard to keep, though not deficient in flavour for present use.

There will always be a large consumption of beef and pork, together with butter, milk, lard, and poultry, in the towns, and among the lowland planters, who restrict themselves chiefly to the cultivation of cotton and sugar. A ready market offers, also, in Louisiana, besides the demand that will arise in Mexico, Cuba, and the West India Islands. All the Indian corn and other bread stuffs will, for a long period, be consumed in the country, and obtain a profitable sale there, owing to the great influx of emigrants. Settlers with small capital usually sell the oxen, which are serviceable for draught, and retain the cows, so that in a very few years they have, in stock alone, ample means of rustic independence.

It has been said, and not without reason, that it will cost more to raise a brood of chickens in Texas, than an equal number of cattle. The one is feeble and dependent, and confined to the precincts of the house; its natural means of sustenance are soon exhausted; and it must be protected and provided with food. The others range abroad; are nourished and defended by their respective dams, feeding on the untilled and ungarnered harvests of nature; and are very soon competent to protect and support themselves.

Although horses thrive well on the natural pastures, they will, if worked hard, require some grain. The district of the Lower Brazos is reputed to be unfavourable to the health of these animals, owing, probably, to the numbers of insects in the summer. The wool of the Mexican sheep is of an inferior quality; but this may be attributed to neglect in breeding, and to the predominance of prickly shrubs in the plains where the flocks of the interior feed. The flesh of the sheep reared in the northern and western parts of Texas, is tender and well-flavoured; and the skill and industry of the Anglo-American farmer will soon effect an improvement in the fleece. Mr. Flower, an English agriculturist, who settled, in 1817, on the prairie lands of Illinois, by the introduction of Merino and Saxony rams, produced, from the descendants of the country ewes, fleeces of as fine wool as those of the original imported stock. A few flocks of sheep have been introduced lately into Texas, and, by their rapid increase, rich fleeces, and delicate mutton, show that they will remunerate the owners. One flock which had been driven as far into the interior as Austin, appeared with their lambs in good condition in the month of January, many of them being fit for the butcher. Goats multiply rapidly, requiring no other attention than what is necessary to prevent them from becoming wild, and to protect them from the wolves in the distant settlements. The prairies are burnt over twice a-year: in midsummer, and about the opening of winter. Immediately after the burning, the grass springs up, so that there is a nearly constant supply throughout the year. It is a common saying of the inhabitants, that, in the cold and stubborn North, man lives for the beast; but in Texas the beast lives for man. A climate that almost renders house shelter unnecessary, and a soil that approaches to the character of an ever-abundant meadow, warrant the observation. Artificial grasses have been beneficially introduced in the prairies of the Western States; and there is no reason to fear that they would fail in Texas, where the most luxuriant gramina are indigenous. Live stock, with cotton and sugar, are destined to form the great staples of the country. Cattle, horses, and mules are driven from Eastern Texas overland to Natchez, Natchitoches, and New Orleans, at a trifling cost, as grass is plentiful, and the drivers carry provisions, shoot game, and "camp out."

The most healthy and pleasant portions of Texas are in the region of Nacogdoches, the rolling country between the Brazos and the Colorado; southward and westward of the latter river—high up on the Brazos and its branches, to "Robertson's Colony," and in "Beale's Grant," near the Rio Grande. The new administrative divisions of the Republic keep pace with the progress of the settlements; and the extension of counties being coincident with the spread of population, the boundaries of thirty-two were defined by law at the close of the Session of Congress in the spring of 1840. Commencing eastward from the Sabine on the Gulf of Mexico, I shall notice those characteristics of the several counties that are calculated to interest the emigrant pausing upon the choice of a "location."

These counties are respectively described. Some of them are already thinly settled, but the greater proportion are still almost, or altogether, without inhabitants—save perhaps here and there on the river banks. Mr. Kennedy has obtained some original Journals of Surveys, which enable him to describe extensive and fine regions which are still comparatively unknown, and which complete the topography of Texas. He protests his anxiety to avoid exaggeration, or tempting his unwary countrymen from their homes, "to endure the bitterness of disappointment on an alien soil"; and thus again sets forth the superiority of Texas as a field for emigrants over any other part of North America.

In the selection of land, settlers will always be more or less influenced by the habits and associations of the country they have left; therefore, emigrants from a low-lying district are likely to prefer the level region of Texas, while those who have from infancy breathed the mountain air, will direct their steps towards the highlands. For a similar reason, some will prefer a wooded section, and others an open or lightly-timbered prairie. For the emigrant of small capital, or the European settler unused to a warm climate, and the laborious process of "clearing" forest-land, the upland prairie, backed by a timbered and perennial water-course, offers by far the most eligible "location."

To hew out a farm from the heart of the primeval forest, is a ponderous and life-consuming task, even for the American backwoodsman, accustomed to wield the axe from boyhood, and to trust for subsistence to the unerring rifle. Alas! for the European, if above the condition of a daily labourer, who is constrained to engage in the unwonted and depressing toil! Year may follow year, and find him struggling with difficulties which he is destined never to overcome. By dint of the severest and most irksome drudgery, he is enabled to reclaim a mere patch from the wilderness, and that over-spread with unsightly stumps, and encircled by burned and blackened trees. In this disheartening pursuit he wastes the flower of his manhood. If the same process be performed on an extensive scale, by the aid of hired labour, the expense of clearing frequently exceeds the value of the land when cleared. To all these drawbacks must be added the diseases incidental to a residence amidst the shades of the newly opened forest, where the vegetable accumulations of ages are suddenly exposed to the beams of a scorching sun, and where heaps of levelled timber are left to rot upon the ground. There, the atmosphere is inevitably tainted with noxious exhalations, which soon blanch the ruddiest cheek, and palsy the most vigorous arm.

On the prairies, Nature has prepared the soil for the husbandman, who has only to enclose his farm and insert the plough-share, which there encounters no obstacle. The labour of cultivation is consequently easy. A heavy plough and a strong team are required the first year, to break up the tough sward and turn over the soil. The Indian corn is dropped in the furrows and covered with a hoe, which, with an occasional light ploughing to clear away the weeds, is the only labour bestowed upon it, until it is fit to gather. It must be understood, however, that the crop raised in this manner will not reach an average quantity, although it arrives very opportunely to meet the necessities of the settler. By turning the grass down, exposing the roots to the sun, and leaving the soil undisturbed, the sward becomes mellowed in a single season, and, while undergoing the process of decomposition, affords nourishment to the growing corn. In the ensuing spring the roots of the wild grass are completely rotted, and the plough passes through a rich light mould fit for all the purposes of husbandry. The ordinary operations of farming may now be conducted in the usual way, and the labour of cultivating a light soil, unencumbered with rocks or stumps, is so trifling that the farmer has sufficient time to improve his land and buildings. On a level plain of rich mould, the plough may be managed by a stripling; on newly-cleared timber-lands, it requires strength and skill, the share must be sharpened frequently, and is often broken, and, at the best, the work advances slowly. The superior facility of working open land; the saving in the wear of farming implements; the economy of time; and, of course, the greater degree of certainty in the farmer's calculations, with the comparative exemption from local disease, give a pre-eminence to the prairie over the timbered land not to be materially reduced by any inconvenience that may be occasioned by an inadequate supply of wood. It would be sounder economy for a farmer to settle in the midst of a prairie, and draw his fuel and fencewood five miles, than to undertake the clearing of a farm in the forest. According to an experienced American authority, the agriculturists of Illinois have become aware of the fact; and there have been numerous instances of farmers in that rich and improving state, who, having purchased a small piece of woodland for its timber, have selected their farms at a distance, on the prairie. Supposing the soil of both to be of equal quality, a labourer can cultivate two-thirds more of prairie than of timbered land: the returns are larger, and the capital to be invested less. The soil of the rolling prairies of Texas is a deep black loam, mixed with sand in various proportions—not certainly so rich as the timbered alluvions of the Brazos, which have a soil formed by the decomposition of vegetable matter to the depth of more than ten feet—but valuable for all the purposes of agriculture, as well as for grazing. With wood, water; a boundless range for stock of all descriptions; a propitious climate, and fertile plains, free from the obstruction of timber or stone, what can the husbandman desire more? Nature has lavished her bounties with the munificence of an indulgent parent: it only remains for man to show himself worthy of her favours, by the due application of his energies, mental and corporeal, and the temperate use of the means of enjoyment placed at his disposal. For a sensual, indolent, uninquiring race, the bowers of a second Eden would bloom in vain.

To British and German settlers, who shrink from the employment of slave-labour, and desire, above all things, a healthy and only moderately hot locality in which to settle, the Rolling districts of the Republic certainly present great attraction. The climate of these intermediate regions is the finest in Texas; the country is not densely wooded, and the soil is fertile. The undulating plains and prairies are open, generally well-watered, and ready at once to yield their riches to the emigrant, without the long labour of clearing, required in taking in the forests in which are scattered the new clearings of Canada. This extensive district is considered to be peculiarly well adapted for the rearing of stock, for which the Level territory of Texas, the adjoining States of America, and the West India Islands, offer a ready market. The rearing of sheep has already been successfully tried in the mountainous regions, and promises fairly.

It is surely, after so much experience of the tricks of land-jobbers, unnecessary to warn emigrants against their arts, and to enjoin the necessity of extreme caution, at every step which they take, after they may have pondered the expedience of embarking for Galveston or San Luis. And to these ports, if present prospects hold, we may expect to see British vessels as frequently chartered as to Port Philip, Adelaide, or New Zealand.

A very large portion of Mr. Kennedy's work is devoted to an elaborate history of the young Republic, comprehending a retrospect of the previous history of Spanish America, and of the Mexican Federal Republic; the revolt of the Texan colonists; their vigorous struggle, which was not at all righteous either in pretext or conduct, whether to the Mexicans or Indians; and the final settlement of a country now formally admitted into the family of Independent States.

The constitution of Texas resembles that of the United States, save that Texas is an integral instead of a federal republic, an element which, it is believed, will give energy and compactness to the government, and ward off some of the inconveniences and dangers which are believed to attend the working of the federal system. The President is chosen for three years only, instead of four, as in the United States; and is not eligible to be re-elected until three years have elapsed after his past period of office. The Houses of Legislature having chosen their respective Speakers, these appoint a number of standing committees to superintend different branches of the public service,—as roads and bridges, naval affairs, ways and means, post-office, &c. &c. The salaries of the officials are on the frugal scale of the neighbouring republic. There are already sixty post-offices established in Texas, many of them small and very irregular concerns, no doubt; but the fact shows the go-ahead spirit of the people. There are now twelve newspapers: another feature borrowed from the mother-country, viz. the United States; England being called, as we said above, the grand-mother. The common law of England has been adopted in the administration of justice, where it is not at variance with the acts of the Texan Congress; and the republic is divided into five judicial circuits. The Supreme Court is to be held at Austin, the intended capital and seat of the government. Free Trade, in the widest sense, is, at present, the maxim of the young republic, which lays itself out to invite the commerce of Europe and of all the world. The Customs—for there are duties—are still comparatively unproductive; and the principal sources of revenue are land dues, and sales of national lands, and of town lots. Mr. Kennedy states that—

The tariff is, however, light; in 1840, 15 per cent. ad valorem was levied on all taxed articles except wines, malt liquor, and spirits. Recent accounts state that, in consequence of the depreciation of the currency to one-third of its nominal value, those articles which had been previously charged an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. were to pay 45, with the exception of sugar, coffee, salt, and steel, which were to remain as before. To facilitate certain financial arrangements with France, a special act has been passed to permit the introduction of French wines free of duty. Each emigrant is permitted to introduce farming utensils and furniture in use to the amount of 500 dollars, and all books free of duty. Mechanics are likewise permitted to introduce suitable tools to the amount of 500 dollars: indeed the Texan Government is sedulous in providing inducements for settlers. By act of January 26th, 1839, a citizen of Texas could hold his or her house, 50 acres of land, improvements to the value of 500 dollars, furniture to the value of 200 dollars, improvements in trade or husbandry to the value of 50 dollars, five cows, one yoke of oxen or one horse, twenty hogs and a year's provisions, "independent of any writ of execution or fieri facias."

Those who propose to send goods to Texas would do well to consult Mr. Kennedy's book at length, the Texan legislature having passed some special acts to protect the citizens from being cheated by fraudulent or extortionating foreign merchants. These young legislators have already, in adopting direct taxation, set an admirable example to the oldest and most highly civilized states of Europe:—

By a law passed on the 16th of January, 1840, every citizen was called upon to pay for the support of the Government, in proportion to his wealth. The provisions of the law operate lightly on mechanics and labourers; its pressure is chiefly felt by the great land speculators, one of whom, however, Mr. S. Williams, of Galveston, introduced the bill. The collection of the direct taxes was assigned to the Sheriff.

The working of this law may, no doubt, at the outset, be attended with some inconvenience to individuals, but its principle is so sound as amply to atone for this. A Committee of Finance, in its Report to the Senate,

Laid down the principle that "the public revenue should be contributed in a direct ratio to the amount of property, no matter of what it consisted, whether real, personal, or mixed, which each citizen had to be protected: in other words, the possessor of 100,000 dollars should pay one hundred times as much for its protection as the possessor of 1000 dollars paid." This position being assumed, they proceeded to consider what was "the most just, equal, and cheap mode of obtaining from each citizen his necessary tax, or contribution, for the support of Government. In a government constituted like theirs, where all were cultivators of the earth, without any manufactures to foster, and without a mercantile revenue, the Committee" contended "that the public revenues should be derived from a direct tax on all the property of the citizen, of every species and description whatsoever."

The committee set forth the several grounds on which they objected to a tariff. In the first place, they held indirect taxation to be anti-republican. The argument that it was necessary "to inveigle, or delude, the citizens out of a tax, might well apply to despotic governments, where the people were intentionally kept in ignorance, but it attacked and overturned the main principle of Republicanism—the capacity of the people for self-government. How could the people be capable of self-government, unless they possessed a knowledge of the modus operandi of government in all its departments and ramifications, and unless they felt a willingness to contribute their just proportions for the support of government—fairly, equally, and directly!"

Nothing can be better in theory than the views of taxation unfolded by the Committee, whatever the result may be. The landholders, not the cultivators nor labourers, are considered not only the fittest but the sole legitimate subjects of taxation. It is said in this Report, and ought to be promulgated for the benefit of European great proprietors:—

A land-tax of the kind above-mentioned is, in the opinion of your committee, loudly and imperatively called for. Such an one will save the necessity of the odious, and to us suicidal tariff system.

Of the dark chapter of slave-holding, Mr. Kennedy makes the best he can. Texas required capitalists, wealthy settlers. In it, land was rich and abundant, and labour scarce and dear. In the Southern United States, a negro field labourer, it is computed, realizes to his owner five hundred dollars per annum, without injury to his health, in cotton planting and raising Indian corn. Now, argues Mr. Kennedy,

A planter with fifty negroes, procuring from their labour a yearly income of £5,000, is not easily to be argued into the relinquishment of a right which the law and usage of his birth-place have always recognised. As to approaching the planters, or people of the south, with threats and vituperation, that can be productive of nothing save unmitigated mischief. Much exasperation has grown out of this mode of interference already, wholly unredeemed by beneficial results. Unless foreigners are prepared to effect by force of arms the emancipation of the negroes in the United States and Texas, they will do well to abstain from exaggerated statements and intemperate language; they can only hope to make an impression by the use of moral dissuaves, and especially by addressing themselves to the question in its economical aspect, bearing in mind the wants of a new country, every emigrant to which is expected to bring with him an addition to its resources, in labour or capital—the introduction of negroes being considered equivalent to the latter.

With the exception of the low line of the coast, particularly the rich tract adjoining the Brazos, the labours of tropical agriculture may be performed by whites without detriment to health. In the less salubrious districts, the soil is peculiarly adapted to cultivation by steam power, for the application of which, an ingenious American engineer, now in London, has obtained a patent. The machinery, he alleges, is capable of performing nearly all the labour required on cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco estates, besides clearing forest land. If such machinery can be effective anywhere, it must be on the alluvial lands of Texas, where the surface is level and the earth free from stones. At all events, the experiment, which is recommended by a great saving of expense, is worthy of a trial.

The demand for slave-labour decreasing in proportion to the introduction of free, which is much better, by interdicting the latter, the field is left open exclusively to the former: yet this is the way in which anti-slavery advocates propose to promote their principles in Texas, whose inhabitants they essay to influence, not by reason and moderate language, but by calumny and invective.

The whole slave population of Texas cannot, at the very utmost, I should think, amount to 10,000.

There we may leave the matter; and in, we own, no very satisfactory state. Mr. Kennedy is even less successful in rebutting the charge brought against the Texan government and people, of encouraging the African slave-trade—his main argument being, that the constitution of Texas, like that of Great Britain and the United States, declares the trade to be piracy. But what are these declarations or enactments in the face of facts; and though the number of slaves brought from Cuba into Texas has certainly been much exaggerated, his apologies for the "high-spirited men," the planters of the Southern and Western States, who, when their injustice or cruelty are pointed out, are but the more confirmed in its practice, and who persist in the iniquity from "the point of honour," are not likely to conciliate those who will hear of no compromise with the accursed thing. We cannot imagine why Mr. Kennedy has permitted himself to assert that the "condition of the bulk of the Mexican population is inferior to that of the slaves in America," unless in emulation of the old assertions of the Gladstones and Sandons of a former generation, who went insolently and scoffingly to say, that the slaves, on their plantations in the West Indies, were in a much better condition than the half-starved manufacturers and labourers of Britain and Ireland.

The state of Religion and Education in Texas hardly, as yet, admits of description, though there are, in the towns of Galveston and Houston, places of worship connected with all the sects prevalent in the United States; and Congress has laid the foundation of a public system of education by allotting land, in each county, for the maintenance of primary schools. The government endeavours to restrain gaming; but the favourite amusements of the Southern United States—races and gambling—seem to be prevalent; and we fear that the citizens display rather the morals and manners of the Slave States, than those of the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers.

It is not to be expected that internal communication can as yet have made much progress; but some improvements, both in steam-navigation and in railways, have been made; and more are projected in the energetic go-ahead spirit of the native country of the settlers. There are already above a dozen new places, named towns, and placed very widely apart, besides double the number of older stations, some of them, as Galveston and Houston, now reckoning a considerable population. In Galveston, Mr. Kennedy states,

In 1836, there was hardly one arrival in a month of shipping at the port. In 1837, there were but seven houses on the island. In May 1839, there were thirty sail of vessels in the harbour at one time; three steamers plying regularly between it and New Orleans, and the same number between it and Houston. A brig arrived from Boston (a voyage of 3000 miles,) with 150 tons of ice, to cool the beverage of the citizens, and otherwise minister to their comfort. There were about 300 houses, sprinkled over a large surface, and a closely-packed population of more than 2000 souls. Two wharfs were in progress, and a pier and mole commenced. The public buildings, which were, as might be expected, on a small scale, were a custom-house, court-house, gaol, commissariat and naval storehouse, market, magazine, armoury, arsenal, and hospital. Two hôtels were in existence, and three in progress. There were three large warehouses, and fifteen retail stores, six licensed taverns and coffee-houses, two printing-offices, reading-rooms, consul's, lawyers', doctors', notaries-public, and magistrates' offices; druggists', confectioners', and fruit stores; bakeries; slaughter and oyster-houses; and shops occupied by carpenters, masons, painters and glaziers, cement and wooden cistern-makers, turners, cabinet-makers, ship-joiners and plumbers, sail-makers and riggers, tin and sheet iron manufacturers, black-smiths, gun-smiths and armourers, watch and trinket menders, saddle and harness-makers, cordwainers, tailors, milliners and dressmakers, barbers; also boarding houses and private houses, and several lumber yards, replete with materials to build more.

The site of Austin, the capital of the Republic, and intended to be the future seat of the government, was chosen for the sake of its salubrious climate and commercial advantages. In 1839 it was laid off; and in 1840, it contained four hundred houses; and churches and hôtels were rapidly rising—though probably on a small scale—and two newspapers were published. The situation of the town on the river Colorado is said to be fine and picturesque; and when the communication is opened between Santa Fé and the ports of Texas, and between the Red River country and Matamoros, Austin, which, like ancient Rome, is built on seven hills, will form the point of intersection to the two great lines. The leading towns in Texas are already incorporated according to the municipal system of the United States. The Texans are beginning to speculate on attracting the overland trade between Mexico and the United States, carried on from St. Louis in the Missouri to Santa Fé in New Mexico. Through this channel, Mr. Kennedy, who sometimes seems to forget to kill his bear before he sells the skin, promises our manufacturers the trade direct, which is at present in the hands of the merchants of Philadelphia. Yet here is a subject well deserving consideration, perhaps a direct "British object." Mr. Kennedy says:—

When Texas is in possession of the traffic, the requisite manufactures will be shipped to her ports in European vessels; thus securing lucrative employment to the ship-owners, merchants, and manufacturers of Europe. The French have made tempting overtures to the Texan Government, on condition of obtaining exclusive privileges in the trade, while people in this country are echoing the calumnies of the pro-tariff States of the American Union against Texas, and denouncing her attempts to raise the funds necessary to restore her depreciated currency, the direct effect of which restoration would be to open a new and highly productive field of enterprise to the capital and operative industry of Britain.

Unless the grossest folly should govern the movements of both, the enjoyment of peace and prosperity by Texas will be productive of the most signal benefits to Mexico and England. The energies of an enlightened people will show the Mexicans the value of the gifts which Nature has lavished upon her soil; by position and example that people will rescue them from the consequences of a barbarous policy; and English manufactories—with the principles of free trade predominant—will supply untaxed clothing for the naked millions that have pined in hopeless indigence since the days of Cortez.

So be it!

In copious Appendices, Mr. Kennedy has published at length the Constitution of the Mexican United States, and that of Texas, with many other documents, which considerably swell his book. We shall content ourselves with a small selection from the general provisions of the constitution of Texas. They are framed after a Georgian planter's own heart:—

Sec. 6. All free white persons who shall emigrate to this Republic, and who shall, after a residence of six months, make oath before some competent authority that he intends to reside permanently in the same, and shall swear to support this Constitution, and that he will bear true allegiance to the Republic of Texas, shall be entitled to all the privileges of citizenship.

Sec. 9. All persons of colour who were slaves for life previous to their emigration to Texas, and who are now held in bondage, shall remain in the like state of servitude: Provided, the said slave shall be the bona fide property of the person so holding said slave as aforesaid. Congress shall pass no laws to prohibit emigrants from bringing their slaves into the Republic with them, and holding them by the same tenure by which such slaves were held in the United States; nor shall Congress have power to emancipate slaves; nor shall any slave-holder be allowed to emancipate his or her slave or slaves without the consent of Congress, unless he or she shall send his or her slave or slaves without the limits of the Republic. No free person of African descent, either in whole or in part, shall be permitted to reside permanently in the Republic without the consent of Congress; and the importation or admission of Africans or negroes into this Republic, excepting from the United States of America, is for ever prohibited, and declared to be piracy.

Slavery was never before so openly laid in the fundamental laws of any country. Even the practically, as we fear, inoperative provision against the African trade was probably meant to conciliate the slave-holders and slave-breeders of the Southern States of the American Union.

With these formidable exceptions, the constitutional laws of the Republic are free and just. Universal Suffrage (for the whites) is established. Elections are by ballot, and all ministers of the gospel, of whatever denomination, are excluded from the Executive and the Legislative Assemblies, for the same sufficient and decorous reasons alleged in most countries for their exclusion.

It is to be regretted that the plan of Mr. Kennedy's work excluded personal narrative, and almost any notice whatever of what he saw and observed during his brief residence in Texas: this, together with evident one-sidedness, excellent as the motives may be which induce him to conciliate the regard of the young Republic, and lead it into friendly relations with his own country, makes him, if not an unsafe, yet an unsatisfactory guide to emigrants, who would require to look much more rigidly and minutely into the matter, before committing their fortunes on any report of Texas that has yet appeared in England. To statesmen, to merchants and shipowners, and to all who wish to see England prospering by extended commerce, and strengthened by new alliances, as well as to the mere reader for information concerning a state remarkable and almost unique in the history of commonwealths, the work will prove interesting and instructive.

QUACKLEBOROUGH ELECTION: A MYSTERY.

RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED TO THE AUTHOR OF "THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, A HISTORY."

BRIGHTLY, in the slanting rays of the declining July sun, shine the windows of the Inn named "The Bold Dragoon," whose effigy, grim-stupid, pard-bearded, swings heaven-high, on creaking hinge, in the evening breeze. The Bold Dragoon, we say, principal inn of this stirring town of Quackleborough: stirring, and also party-divided, for amidst the dull repose of nations, one thing is specially notable in these early June days; that time-worn Lord Gandermere has at length resigned his place in the House of the People's Assembly, and lo! the fearfullest election-struggle for this famed town of Quackleborough is at hand.

Amid the melancholy wreck of human dubitations, one thing remains indubitable: that thirst is dry, and will have a quenching!—if not with aristocratic draught of claret or champagne, then with ale or cider; with or without a toast. Understand this moreover,—that the page of history is not wanting in instances of men, who, down fever-parched throats, have poured mere water:—water, from well or spring; yea, in times of frightfullest desperation and drought, dipped in burning palm from the salt ocean-stream itself. For, doubt not this,—that thirst is dry and will have a quenching. So now, beneath shade of whispering elms, in cool garden of this inn, named the Bold Dragoon, ale-drugged, half-inbriate, repose some scores of our Quackleborough electors, pipe in mouth, mug in hand, talking, shouting, and singing: singing, and also swearing!—oaths suppressed and not suppressed; challenges given and received; ale-potent combatants separated per force by unsparing blows of peace-demanding, row-exciting staff of constable, named special. And as the day wanes the noise becomes ever shriller, and the clamour for pipes and ale more vehement. Such an act of jollification!—conceive it well;—smoke as of Tophet,—confusion as of Babel,—noise as of the crack of Doom!

Thus they. Amid which dim-stinking haze, busy, careful-visaged, not without self-importance, from bench to bench, from house to garden, with quick-silent step, walks red-whiskered Skrivins, portly host of this inn of the Bold Dragoon, Quackleborough chief house of public entertainment; blubber-lipped Skrivins, once lean waiter, now fat landlord, of the Bold Dragoon! Quick-silent walks he, with carefullest eye, seeing that all cups are duly filled, that no measure of liquor pass unregistered. Above all things, thou careful host, beware least ale-valour inflame thy guests to acts of violence, and veritable onslaught: which may lead to consequences. Nevertheless, consider this; that over-ready interference and call for constables were also unwise; for shouting and quarrelling dry men's throats, which must needs be moistened from thy fast flowing butts. Between dread of broken windows, and love of pelf, such uncertain wavering is there.—A delicate business!—requiring tact.

NO. XC.—VOL. VIII.

Beautiful, with gracefullest carriage, amid such mad-compotative host, as a spirit of mercy ministering to souls in Tartarus, appearest thou "well-ankled" Barbara Hutchings, famed barmaid of the Bold Dragoon, and also brother's orphan child to red-whiskered host. Beautiful exceedingly, and not unconscious of thy beauty! For, doubt not this; that sun-bright eyes are ever regardful of their own perfections. Beauty, sly-modest, unconscious-seeming, knows that she excels; with wonderfullest art conceals her art; feigns not to understand that a bright halo of loveliness, heart-enthraling, love-compelling, distinguishes her from the homely daughters of Eve; in whose bosoms envy or admiration burns strongest. Be this as it may, history specially notices one thing; that hot-thirsty electors, in elm-shadowed garden of Bold Dragoon assembled, party-divided, mad-bibulous, (so to speak,) are nevertheless ever agreed in this: that Barbara's eyes are bright, soft-lustrous, not without roguishness; whose sly-bashful glances entice more guests to the Tap than the goodness of the liquor. Beautiful, with veiled light, mild-beaming, 'neath curtain of darkest fringe, roam the soft-lustrous eyes from bench to bench, with watchfullest attention, looking for signal of inverted mug, held high in air by ale-desiring guest. For, consider this;—that amid the Tartarus-din of many throats, a call for replenished cup might well pass unheeded. Graceful, from bench to bench, with ample can white-foaming, blue ribbon circling slenderest waist, with fairy step, trips the maid of the Bold Dragoon, not without sly speech and eye-winking jest from admiring toppers. Lo! fat butcher Dobson, rude-amorous, offers incivility to Barbara;—seizes her hand;—wishes her to sit on greasy knee. Angry maiden repulses him; calls for help. Whereupon, thou blubberlipped Skrivins,—"Hands off!" say the blubber lips. Offended host adds moreover this—"Liquor, not lassies, for thee!—Beer, not Barbara, for butchers! Them's my sentiments, sir." Rebuke, loud-spoken, heard by all by-standers: heard, and also repeated, with deafening iteration. Fat greasy Dobson, crest-fallen, mutters vaguely; retreats abashed into the house; retires also from farther notice of this history.

But, indeed, other matters are notable on this early June evening. In principal room of Bold Dragoon, anxious, toil-worn, with manifest despondency, around long oak table, are seated committee of management of popular candidate Dalton; People's-Friend Dalton! Cheap-corn Dalton, who will lose his election on the morrow, for lack of voters. Lack of voters from lack of money to buy them withal? Be this as it may, one thing is indubitable: that on the morrow's eve we close the lists of the Poll, and of Electors unpollled, (dead or alive) the carefullest search can find not more than twenty-five. Of which number we count fourteen on our side, and for the rest that there has been foul play, who doubts? Juggled by the enemy! outbid by the Fortunatus purse of hot-aristocrat young Gandermere, who has already a preponderance of four, and so we lose the game by one. Miserable! That this pitiful unit of mortality should stand between us and success! Our hopes of those voters from a distance, who never arrive, (who never intended to arrive?) and the cunning lure of cheap corn; have turned out so ill!—Well may the committee despair. Grim-silent chairman examines once more his list of electors; rings for tenth tumbler of brandy and water. Members confer despondingly; proposals listened to, and not listened to; counsel and counter counsel: the poor ship labours!

Of aid from man, such fast-failing hope is there. Of aid from man, we say, but from woman? Lo! Barbara enters unperceived, with hot-potent draught, as chairman of committee, tipsy-grandiloquent, not without tears, declares that they are come to a still-stand; that for lack of one voter, blue cockades must be trampled under foot. Bright-witted maiden hears and understands;—understands, and also resolves!—with cherished gratitude remembers this: that People's-Friend Dalton did once avert well-merited punishment from brother Thomas; guilty of the blood of pheasants! Fierce affray with Lord Gandermere's forest rangers; flaw in indictment discovered by sharp London attorney, employed by People's-Friend Dalton; aged mother's dying hour comforted by presence of repentant son. In Barbara's heart such grateful remembrance is cherished; remembrance, and also desire to repay the debt. But from young maiden's aid what hope is there, for, alas! she has no vote! But has influence;—has a favoured lover;—who will do what he can;—who, for true love's sake, will lend his aid.

And lo! to love-trusting maiden's gaze, amid snow-wreathed clouds sun-gilded in the west, gorgeous, triumphant-waving, fair omen of success, a banner is unfolded, bearing upon azure field, in letters of Iris-tint, this legend, "Amor vincit omnia!"—"Love unconquered ever!"

With earliest beam of returning sun, quick-stealthy, with fluttering hopes, not without self-confidence, from sleepless couch arises the maiden of the grateful heart. Cunningly she avoids the creaking board on stairs; house-door opened with carefullest silence; questions from late-returning revellers answered vaguely; riot-exhausted town passed through with nimblest haste, and the open country gained. And now four miles of dust-encumbered road ere the maiden's journey end! Onward, with aching feet, with heart half doubting of success, without pause speeds the maid of the Bold Dragoon; thinking of many things: thinking, and also scheming. For that she has a scheme who doubts? Onward, without rest or delay! Four long-drawn dust-encumbered miles, and the village of Long-Straggleton gained at last; Long-Straggleton, winding, league-long village, where dwell twenty of hot aristocrat Gandermere's voters. Of which number we count some seven or more unpollled, who will march in an hour for Quackle-borough. Plans known to Barbara; who intends that they shall not all march.

Through such long-tedious, straggling village, toil-worn, with straight-forward step, not without unwished for greeting from passing acquaintance, with short reply, and half-concealed face, the maiden speeds. Now halts she at door of straw-roofed cottage: vine-clad cottage, garden-surrounded, clear river bordered, where dwells young Hopper, thriving miller of Straggleton; over whom Barbara has influence;—who secretly favours the cause of People's-Friend Dalton, but must vote against him;—Tenant of hot-aristocrat Gandermere;—late discovered flaw in lease!—threat of instant ejectment!

Grim-sullen, in holyday trim, with orange cockade in hat, flour-whitened garments laid aside, in silent mill, paces Hopper, conscience-galled, threat-compelled, waiting for summons to march; which may, or may not, be obeyed. Grim-sullen walks he, in silent mill, pondering many things. Specially considers this:—how busy neighbours may regard such base tergiversation. To sacrifice interest for conscience'-sake is good; so is quiet possession of mill, and profitable crushing of grains. In doubting miller's mind, between promptings of honest heart, and dread of ejectment, such fierce conflict is there. During which uncertain struggle a knock at the door! Whereupon thou threat-compelled miller of Straggleton? "Ready!" replies the threat-compelled:—decides against conscience; admits the visitor.

As iron-bound criminal, death-doomed, drop-devoted, (so to speak,) expectant of last summons, hearing instead, glad tidings of unhoped for reprieve;—in such manner changes the grim-sullen aspect of Hopper, Long-Straggleton miller, when Barbara, loved maiden, unexpected visitor, appears before his sight; Barbara, maid of the soft-lustrous eyes!—which may, or may not, look kindly upon his suit. Choose, miller of Straggleton—The maid, or the mill!—For to be master of both thy destiny suffers thee not. Brief time for decision. Cruel maiden, calm-inexorable, with down-cast eyes, has one hand on the door; offers with the other cockade of blue. Thy choice, wavering Long-Straggleton miller! Barbara's eyes, unveiled, love-glancing, mild-upbraiding, are raised upon the waverer. Bright lightning-volley, love-winged! Victory!—People's-Friend Dalton for ever! Orange cockade torn off, and trampled under foot; blue badge of liberty fastened upon love-conquered miller's bosom by Barbara's hands; tempting proximity of lips!—with or without design; love-tempered box on the ear from blushing maiden's palm.

And now why should the pen of history loiter?—"PEOPLES'-FRIEND DALTON, 270, HOT-ARISTOCRAT GANDERMERE, 269."—Victory secured by thy vote, love-vanquished miller of Straggleton! Which may lead to consequences? To ejectment from profit-grinding mill? Sharp London attorney again! Who affirms that there is no flaw in lease: affirms, and also proves it in courts of law. Undisturbed possession of mill, and profitable crushing of grains. Vine clad cottage not without a mistress! Soft-lustrous eyes, love beaming, care-dispelling, making the heart glad with pure sunshine of faithfullest affection.

Happy miller of Straggleton, carolling from morn till eve, to the ceaseless beat of profit-grinding mill,—let this be the burden of thy song,— “Amor vincit omnia!”

GIBBIE STE'ENSON THE MISER.

CHAPTER I.

I CANNOT begin my little sketch of Gibbie Ste'enson, till I say a few words of my grandfather, from whom I got it. He was a herd-boy in the year “'45;” and but for his mother, who imprisoned him in an out-house, he would have been off with the Highlanders to do what he could for Prince Charlie. Many were the stories he had about the “rising,” and used to tell them with all the enthusiasm of youth. He was quite satisfied it was best for the country, in every respect, that the enterprise of the chevalier failed; but it was plain that all his feelings were enlisted on the side of the adventurer. I happened to be his favourite and his bed-fellow, and came in for my full share of his old-world stories, which were neither few nor uninteresting. It makes me smile yet, when I remember, how he used to run down the tales I met with in books: no matter of what kind, or by whom written, they were denounced as “trash and baggage, and lies from end to end.” The philosophy of his criticism was hidden from me at the time; but there was one advantage I took of it even then. When indisposed to gratify me with a new story, or the recital of an old one, I usually obtained my wish, by asking leave to tell him a fine one I had read in such a book. He was wont to fire at this, and let off his customary volleys against the “book baggage,” and begin one of his own, by drawing up his shoulders, and pulling down his nightcap a piece.

Gibbie Ste'enson the miser, who was a school-fellow of his own, afforded matter for many a sketch; and I came at last to think of Gibbie as a man whom I had actually known. Even yet, the picture I formed of him, is vivid and complete. None of Scott's or Shakspeare's characters stand out half so steadily or life-like before my imagination. My grandfather, I presume, had not given me a set and chronological history of him; for the order in which the materials are arranged in my mind, and in which they always occur to me, is anything but regular or sustained. I shall endeavour, however, to break the ill-assorted chain, and put its links in their proper places.

Gibbie Ste'enson was scarcely weaned when his father died. His mother contrived to make a livelihood from the bit of ground attached to her cottage, and by acting as a kind of cow-doctor, and as an attendant upon lying-in women. She was a birkie bustling body, but honest and shrewd withal, and bent on amassing as much of the world as she could. A variety of prudential maxims was completely under her control, and generally in active service. Yet few beggars passed her door without their pittance; and she had the character of being an obliging neighbour and a steady friend. Gibbie was turned of seven when he came to the parish school. A new scholar is always an object of some interest, but Gibbie created quite a sensation. He had on a jacket of hoddan grey, which reached to his hurdies, and hung about him like a sack. His trousers were of the same material, and a world too wide for his long raw shanks; and, but for a broad lap at the bottom, his feet would have disappeared in them altogether. The entire structure of his dress spoke as plainly as cloth could speak, that an intention was formed against posterity; and that the future would be saddled with the old clothes of the past. He had a cap to match, but no neckerchief; and in short, was of a piece, from top to toe, with a drab complexion, and flaxen hair, and a knife-like expression of countenance. His mother entered the school with him on a Monday morning in February 1743, as far as my grandfather could recollect. The confused hum instantly ceased, and nothing was heard for a time, but the clomp, clomp, of Gibbie's heavily tacketed shoes, as his parent led him up to where the master stood.

“Here's Gibbie t'ye, sir,” said Mrs. Stevenson, better known by the name of Cow Katy; “and I hope ye'll do your best wi' him. He's gayin gleg; and I'm thinking he'll just drink in the lair.”

“Few come with sic a drowth,” answered the master, ironically.

A roar of laughter from the whole school followed, and Katy turned about and scolded at them as “ill-bred nowt;” but her words were swallowed up in the general uproar. The master, half angry, half pleased, tried to calm the tumult, but without effect. He took Gibbie out of her hand and set him down on a seat by himself; and partly coaxing, partly forcing, Mrs. Stevenson herself, conducted her out of the school into a little by-room he had, amidst the deafening and uncontrollable laughter of fifty pair of lungs. He remained fully ten minutes away,—the time was not so precious then as it is now,—appeasing Mrs. Stevenson, and receiving her peremptory instructions about Gibbie. This was too precious an opportunity to be lost. Scarcely was the master's back turned, when a dozen faces, in every possible state of contortion, were grinning at poor Gibbie. Of course he could not feel quite at home, and in fact, was at an utter loss what to do with himself. The death-heads multiplied about him; and he sat like a condemned and sheepish criminal staring at the strange appearances around him “Cow Gibbie," cries one; "Mealy-mou'ed Gibbie," shouts another; "Samuel Side-pouches," cried a third; and one cried this, and another that term of reproach, till flesh and blood could stand it no longer, and Gibbie set up a grin, that took the field at once to itself. A terrible explosion of mirth ensued, but Gibbie kept twisting at them every variety of face he was master of. A boy, who was the ringleader of the mischief, stole in behind Gibbie, and emptied his ink-horn on the victim's head. The deep colouring which was instantly given to Gibbie's sketches, was felt and answered by all. But Gibbie cut the exhibition short by springing to his feet, and rushing like an infuriated goat on his tormentor. Gibbie had him down in a moment, and would no doubt have slaked his vengeance on him, had not prompt assistance been rendered. Exasperated beyond all measure, he gave general battle to his persecutors, and both gave and received some hearty kicks and strokes. The master came in during the fray, and a general dispersion immediately followed. Gibbie was now staring and foaming like a raised bull; and, bolting past the master, made for the door and ran off. "After him!" shouted the head of the fierce democracy. Never was command more eagerly obeyed. A whole pack in full cry set out after the delinquent. Gibbie was evidently making it a life-and-death matter; for, heavy shoes and all, he kept the start he had got, till one of the boys cried to a man who was coming forward to "keep him." The man seeing at once how matters stood, laid hold of Gibbie, at the expense of some skin, till his pursuers came up. The truant, exhausted and breathless, made an ineffectual effort or two, and then permitted himself to be led back. As he gathered breath, however, and as they came near the house of correction, Gibbie began to wrestle and plunge furiously. Any ground he yielded now was locomotively given; and the bustle and clamour became tremendous, as they pulled and shoved him in at the school door. After some stern remonstrances and threatenings on the part of the master, a basin of water was brought, and Gibbie was ordered to wash his face, which, with sweat and rage, and ink, was scarcely human. He was then set on the middle of a form, with some of the strongest boys on either side of him as a guard. There he sat sulkily for some time, till the persecution began again in wry faces, and nick-names, and nips and scratches. The best temper would have broken under such annoyances, and how could Gibbie's stand? An unsparing thrust from a pin made him spring from his seat with a loud yell, that made everything stop. "Ye villains!" cried the molested boy, grinding his teeth like a handsaw, and looking fiercely on his antagonists. Nobody, of course, was doing anything to him; and there being twenty witnesses to one against Gibbie, he could not expect any reparation. He was ordered to sit down and keep quiet; but Gibbie seeing all hope of peace or justice at an end, began the defensive, and left rain-bows all around him. "Gibbie Ste'enson! master! O! Gibbie Ste'enson!" was shouting every now and as Gibbie added a new sufferer to his list, or favoured an old one with a fresh demonstration. The master lost patience at last, and put Gibbie into the desk by himself. The school at length dismissed, and Gibbie had to fight and kick his way through a batch of boys, who had suffered from his bony fingers through the day. Sore and weary Gibbie got home, and neither scolds, nor strokes, nor bribes, could induce Gibbie to go back to the seat of learning. His mother managed, in her own way, to get the alphabet into him in the course of a year; and by another, he could hammer out some words in the "wee spell." About the close of the third, in the month of November 1746, Gibbie once more made his appearance at the parish school. He was now a tall boy of ten, with long sinewy arms, and a gaunt muscular frame, that bent slightly at the shoulders, arising probably from the domestic drudgery he was compelled to perform. The nature of his mother's avocations called her often out for whole days and nights; and Gibbie, in her absence, was cook, and dairymaid, and washerwoman, and everything. His dress remained unchanged, with the exception of a large letting-down of the lap of his trousers, and the cuffs of his jacket, to keep up with his legs and arms which had shot out immensely. The body of his upper garment, as we have said, was of sufficient length and circumference to meet the demands of manhood if he reached it; and its texture promised to battle successfully with the tear and wear of twenty winters at least. A considerable number of his original enemies had died out, or left the school, for the curriculum of education in those days was short; but they had bequeathed their spirit to their successors, for a variety of petty annoyances were immediately set on foot against him. After a few victorious battles, however, he established a name that protected him. Things now went on smoothly, and Gibbie was permitted to take a part in the diversions of his school-fellows. It was soon remarked that he seldom indulged in any amusement for its own sake, and usually tried to have a stake connected with it. His favourite games were the winning ones of the bowls, pins, and buttons; and he generally contrived to play with those who were younger, or less dexterous, than himself. He did not hesitate to cheat when an opportunity presented itself; and when charged with it, took the fashionable mode of clearing his reputation by a challenge. His stock of small wares accumulated on his hands, and he sold out among the boys, getting small coins or other equivalents in return. No solicitation, attention, or flattery, could induce him to part with anything gratuitously; and when he trusted, which was seldom the case, he persecuted his debtor till he paid,—only one was known to escape, and not till he had sustained a sound thrashing. The gains of Gibbie in this traffic were considerable, and as carefully hoarded, as if they had been the revenue of a kingdom. Even his mother was denied a share in his profits; and no one knew the general depository that held them. If his parent took a few pins out of his sleeve over night, she got no peace till they were replaced; and when she put one of his buttons on his own jacket, it was instantly cut off and put back amongst its companions. It mattered not that she scolded, and threatened, and expatiated on the expense of his schooling, and food, and clothes, and lodging; Gibbie's sole answer was an inexorable grumph. He came, and went to the school during three successive winters, and left it without having made a single friend. His progress in learning was small. He had reached the Proverbs class, but could neither write nor cast accounts.

CHAPTER II.

Mrs. Stevenson was subject to attacks of rheumatism; and the infirmities of a premature old age were fast setting in upon her. She had exercised a calling for twelve years, which exposed her to inclemencies of weather, and irregularity of sleep and diet; and these agencies were beginning to kythe upon her constitution. By hard scraping and saving she had amassed upwards of twenty pounds, which in those days was reckoned a considerable fortune. She wisely resolved to confine her professional exertions for the future to the more immediate neighbourhood, and occupy herself with her cow and the small pendicle she rented. Gibbie was in consequence hired out to a sheep farmer, near Pariahholm. The food of farm servants at that time was of the coarsest description. The only kitchen allowed to dinner, which usually consisted of great broth, made thick with potatoes and vegetables, was occasionally an egg, or a bit of braxy ham. The sharp eye of Gibbie discovered even here a source of gain. He hoarded his eggs and pieces of meat till they amounted to a disposable quantity, and had them sent or taken to Douglas and sold. He went out also in the summer and moonlight nights and gathered stray wool among the hills; and it was said he sometimes cut, or pulled, patches of the fleece from the ewes that he found asleep or in the fold. He set lines in the water too, and snares in every direction; and every trout and hare was converted, if possible, into money; and if not, they were kept till they wasted, for he never gave anything away. The reprimand of his master had no other effect than to make him more wary. He was threatened with dismissal, but still he continued. There was one bond which knit his master to him, and that was Gibbie's handiness. He could do anything, and refused to do nothing. He could milk the cows, or wash the dishes, or make the food, or build a dyke or an outhouse, or repair the farming utensils. Whatever was behind, Gibbie brought up; and his untiring strength, and even skill, in some things, made him a valuable servant. Before every term Gibbie gave in his resignation, and managed to get an advance of wages. Not a farthing of his fee was spent. The same hoddan grey suit was first let down, and then eked, story after story, in the legs and arms, and all the rest was left as it originally came from the hands of his provident mother. The only change in his dress was a cap of sheep-skin, which he had got from his master for doing a piece of extra hard work. Nothing was too mean for Gibbie to undertake, if it offered the slightest recompence.

He would help out the huxter-wives with their stalls on a fair-day, or hold a horse, or run an errand, or do anything he was bidden, however menial, if a consideration was given. The gibes of the country lasses, or the taunts of the farm lads, had no more effect upon him, than if they had been addressed to a person with whom he had nothing to do. The whisky was cheap then, but Gibbie drank none of it, except what he got for nothing. A scheme was entered into by some shepherds at a Douglas market to get Gibbie intoxicated, and then inveigle him into as much expense as they could. Gibbie drank their whisky and eat their buns, but not a farthing would he spend. They laid hands upon him to rifle his pockets, but he fought like a tiger and made his escape. "Gibbie the miser," had long been in every child's mouth; but Gibbie heeded it not, or only answered them with his usual grumph. Sometimes it expressed contempt, sometimes anger, sometimes envy, and sometimes even satisfaction, if not delight. Those who knew him could readily distinguish the one from the other. He had now been five years in his first place, when an express arrived that his mother was dying. The humph he gave on receiving this intelligence was noted as expressive of joy.

"Come away, Gibbie," said his mother as he entered, "and come near me; for I want to speak to you."

"What are you wanting, mither?" said the unfeeling son; "d'ye think ye're dying?"

"Yes, Gibbie; the grips o' death are on me, Lord hae mercy on my soul."

"Where did ye put the siller, mither?" returned the miser, without noticing her statement, or her exclamation.

"O Gibbie, Gibbie, my son! what's siller when death comes,—the grave?"

"Where is't?" interrupted the heartless lad.

"It's where it's safe,—but what is't now? Though it were twenty times mair, wad death gang by for't?"

"He's no get the offer," retorted the son.

"O Gibbie, Gibbie! dinna break my heart," exclaimed Mrs. Stevenson. O man, think less o' the world and mair o' your Maker. It's grieved me lang to see you. Wad ye try and pray wi' me, Gibbie? I think it wad do my heart good if I heard ye pray.

"I'll pray nane; where's the siller?"

"I'll tell ye if ye pray."

"Where is't first?"

"The minister has't. O, pray now!"

"How muckle's o't?"

"But will ye no' pray?"

"Is there thretty pound o't?"

"O pray wi' me, Gibbie, and I'll tell ye, my dear."

"There should be thretty-three, if ye've done right."

"Whatever's o't ye'll get it; but pray wi' me."

"Did John Park pay the cheese?"

"No, hinny; but"—

"There'll be nae buts about it; he maun pay."

"I forgi'd him't; he's poor, and a sma' family."

"A sma' devil! he maun pay."

"O Gibbie, Gibbie, will ye gi'e o'er and no break?"

"What wad I gi'e o'er for? Is'n't it but right that folk should get their ain? What business had he eating cheese if he couldna pay for't?"

"I'm to blame," cried the agonized woman, in a passion of tears, "O God! I'm to blame, for bringing him up the way I did,—I nurtured him for the world, and not for thee,—I sowed the wind, and I've reaped the whirlwind. O my God! my God!"

The only reply on the part of her son was a sullen humph, which was instantly followed up by a demand how much money there was.

"There's twenty-five pound ten," replied his mother, at last, with a deep groan that came from the bottom of her heart. The son ran over his fingers as if counting something, and then exclaimed—

"There's eight pound awanting o' what I was making o't. What have ye done wi't?"

"It's there as it is," said the afflicted and now irritated woman. "It was my ain making, and naeboddy has ony business what's o't, or what I did wi't."

The effort, and the conflicting emotions within her, brought on a suspension of life; and it was sometime ere she came out of it. As nature rallied, and consciousness returned, she asked, in an anxious voice, and feeling all about her,—

"Where's my son? Are ye there, Gibbie?" she heard his humph; and desired to have his hand. He gave it with some reluctance.

"It's the last time," said she, "your mother's hand'll be in yours. I aencethought as ye think, but a death-bed's opened my een. O Gibbie, Gibbie, my son, my son! will ye promise to mind death,—will ye promise to pray night and morning,—and read your Bible,—and get claes and gang to the kirk? will ye promise that, and let me die in peace,—will ye, Gibbie, will ye?"

He answered the appeal by withdrawing his hand, and uttering a dogged humph.

"Ye'll no promise then?" said the dying woman, clasping her hands. "O God, will ye count the blame mine; and soften his heart by the hammer and the fire o' thy spirit, that he may see what the world is, and grip by the Cross,—wilt thou, God! wilt thou?"

Her strength failed, and her heart filled, and she stopt, and sunk into a swoon. A neighbour applied some gruel to her lips, and bathed her temples, and she gradually recovered again. She seemed as if she wished to speak once more to her son, but utterance was denied; and in a short time she drew up her feet and went the way of all the earth. Scarcely was the breath out, when Gibbie set off to the minister and lifted the money. To save expenses, he made a coffin with his own hands, and blackened it with soot. Funeral services were then universal, and dredgies very common: but Gibbie had neither.

"It was a flinging away o' siller," he said, "for nae end; and if folk didna like to come to the burial, they might stay away."

On the day of the interment, the chief mourner was in his customary dress, with a stripe of linen blackened with ink, about his sheep-skin cap. Some of the neighbours gathered out for decency sake, and a few joined the procession in the town; but never had such a funeral been seen in the parish.

It wanted two months of the term, but Gibbie made it out; and went during the night and did what was necessary about the pendicle. He then took possession of it, and hired himself out for all kinds of work. His reputation was established as a good worker, and he got plenty to do. In the spring and harvest seasons, it was no uncommon sight to see the miser sowing or reaping his ground in the night-time. He would often work during successive nights at home, to keep his day's wages entire. Nothing that would sell, he eat or drank; and it was a mystery to many how he lived at all. He was now a full-formed man of five-and-twenty, with muscles like ropes in his face and all over his body. The expression of his countenance was proverbially repulsive, with a hungry craving look in it. The neck stretched forward whether he walked or sat, and the eyes were continually seeking about in the socket, and now and then made a dead stand for a moment, and then quivered and glistened, and began their usual motion again. I remember, the first time I saw a hyæna in his cage, that Gibbie's eyes occurred to me vividly. He was never known to shave, but gave a sort of pruning occasionally to his beard and whiskers with a pair of scissors. His hair and skin were nearly of the same colour; and it was said, that his head at a little distance resembled a lump of dried pipe-clay. He was of that ambiguous look also, that strangers could not tell whether he was old or comparatively young. When he stood erect, he was fully six feet, but the stoop in his shoulders gave him the appearance of a man of five feet nine. Many were the tales that were circulated about him, some false and some true, but few indeed in his favour. He fought once for a man who was ill-used at a market, and risked his own life to save a boy from drowning. It was said his mother's ghost haunted him; and it was alleged he had bargained with the devil about his soul. My grandfather believed some of these extravagancies, and entered into these details with deep interest and awe. He had the times and places, and the witnesses' names, at his finger ends; and used to make our flesh creep by their recital. There was one circumstance, however, which illustrated Gibbie's character, of which there was no doubt. A heavy spate came down the water one Sabbath morning in autumn, which flooded and was carrying off a hay rick which belonged to the miser. It was his custom to lie long on that day; and when he arose about his usual time, he saw his hay moving slowly off. Out he ran, with only his trousers on, and plunged in after it. The water had reached his neck ere he reached the rick. He thrust in and twisted his hands about it as far up as he could reach, and made several desperate struggles to pull it towards the bank; but the river got the mastery, and bore them both down before it. The alarm was soon given, and dozens of persons came running in all directions to see the strange spectacle. A few pitied, but most laughed, at the perilous situation of the miser. "Let him drown!" cried some. "His siller 'll do somebody guid!" cried others. "It's a judgment on him!" cried a third party. "Let Providence get its will, and the deil his ain!" shouted a fourth. "He'll be bleezing down by in five minutes, and the hay 'll help!" exclaimed a drunken tailor from the town. But a better spirit was manifested by others, who ran for ropes and flung them in to Gibbie; but some were too short, and others missed their aim. Every one declared, however, that the infatuated man seemed more anxious to save his hay than himself.

"We'll maybe wile her into the holm," cried the miser, shivering with cold; "for God's sake, help to get her into the holm!"

By a strenuous effort on Gibbie's part, and a favourable turn of the stream, into the holm, on the north side of the village, the rick went, rolling about and its proprietor with it. He was soon in shallow water, and came, pushing the hay before him, to the dry ground.

"Ye've had a narrow escape, man," said James Paterson the elder; "and I hope it 'll do ye guid."

"I'm could ye now at ony rate," replied Gibbie; "but if I had been a minute langer, she was lost."

"It's neither your hay nor your body, man, I'm speaking about," interposed James; "it's your soul—your immortal soul, man; ye live like a brute!"

The miser gave a surly hump, and continued to push at the rick till it was fairly out of water. An incredibly small portion had been lost, for it was firmly thatched and roped above, and the portion taken away by the current was wholly from beneath.

"It's safe enough now," said a number of voices; "the water's going back—let it stand till the morn."

"Let it stand till the morn!" echoed Gibbie, with a look of utter astonishment; "the present only is ours,—it's a work o' necessity. Will ony o' ye tak' up a backfu', and I'll gie ye—I'll be obliged t'ye."

"Put your hand out at your peril, man!" cried elder Paterson, in a tone of indignation and authority; "will ye break the Lord's day afore our very een? Gang down on your knees, man, and thank your Maker for what he's done."

"There's a time for a' things," responded Gibbie, in a surly resolute tone; "and the time just now is to save, and not destroy."

While he spoke, he began to untie the thatch ropes, amidst the grumbling and rebukes of many around him. He made no further answer to their remonstrances, but set off with a burden which might have served any two men in the parish. On the dismissal of the church in the afternoon, the feeling rose so high that several stones were flung at him, and one of them hit him smartly on the cheek. His bent shoulders stood erect in a moment, his teeth sawed in his mouth, and the veins on his forehead became fearfully distinct. The crowd fell back, for they knew the strength and resoluteness of the man. No one had the hardi-hood to repeat the offence. James Paterson, however, began a new system of attack, by reading aloud the law of Moses respecting the Sabbath; and the fate of the man who gathered sticks on that day, and many other appropriate passages in the prophets and the apostles. Gibbie humphed to them all, and wrought on.

"What can we expect from a sow but a grumph," said James; at last, and angrily closed the book; "and wherefore should I cast pearls before swine! But I'll tell ye what, man: this day 'll rise up in judgment against ye,—the very hay 'll be a witness, and the water that's away to the sea 'll come back to the judgment seat."

Shaking with emotion, the old elder left the spot, and a number followed him; and Gibbie proceeded with his labour as if nothing had happened. Back and back he came and went, and by nightfall he completed his task, in spite of every counsel and threat that was offered him.

CHAPTER III.

On the Tuesday following, the miser was missed from his work. Wednesday came, and he was still absent. The farmer, for whom he was working at the time, went to Gibbie's house, and found him a-bed and in a strong fever. A surgeon was called, who pronounced him to be in a dangerous state. The minister came and tried, in the most kindly manner, to awaken the sick man to a sense of his situation. Gibbie was obdurate and refused to speak.

"It is my duty then to tell you," said the clergyman, "that if you die in your present condition, your portion will be the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched."

"I'm no' deeing," growled the miser.

"The doctor tells me you are, Gibbie," replied the minister.

"He's telling a lie," exclaimed the patient, raising himself on his elbow; "I'm getting fast better. Ye needna think to fright me wi' death."

"But death will come,—sooner or later it will come,—come to us all. It is appointed unto men once to die, and after that the judgment. Are you prepared for the judgment?"

"There's waur folk than me," muttered the miser between his teeth.

"Though you were the best man, Gibbie, that ever lived," urged the minister, "that would not save you. Out of Christ there is no salvation."

"Weel, weel, Christ be't!" consented the miser.

"But that is not enough, Gibbie," pursued his admonisher; "You must be in Christ,—you must feel that you are a great sinner,—and you must feel that the blood of Christ alone can wash out your guilt,—and you must cry to God for pardon through him,—and you must have God's Holy Spirit to change your heart and make you a new creature, so that you can truly say, 'Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none in all the earth whom I desire besides thee.' You must feel all this ere you be in Christ,—and if you be not in Christ, you must die in your sins,—and if you die in your sins, you must go to the lake that burneth for ever and ever."

The miser gave a humph, and reached over for a mug of water that stood by his bedside.

"There is no water in hell," said the minister.

"How ken ye?" asked the miser.

"A rich man went there, and he could not get a drop," answered the clergyman.

"Wha brought word?" inquired Gibbie.

"God!—who knows all things," returned the minister. "I'll read you what he says."

Ere he finished the parable of the "Rich man and Lazarus," the miser had turned his face towards the wall. Without offering any comment on what he had read, the minister turned up Manasseh's case, and recited it aloud. A silence ensued. The man was evidently affected.

"Will you pray, Gibbie," said the clergyman affectionately, "and humble yourself before God? He is waiting on you, and will speak peace to your soul."

Gibbie made no answer.

"Shall I pray for you, then?" resumed the servant of God.

Still no answer was made, and the clergyman went on, and on concluding prayer, he asked—"Do you think, Gibbie, you could give up all for Christ?"

A stern humph announced the state of his feelings.

"Then I have to say," continued the pastor with solemn energy, "except ye be willing to leave houses and lands, and gold and silver, and count them but dross in comparison of Christ, ye are none of his."

"I'm no seeking," replied the miser.

"Have ye resolved, then, to make gold your God?"

"Yes! it's my Lord and my God," roared the miserable man; "and touch it if ye daur. Confound ye a'! wad ye tak my siller frae me?"

The unhappy and deluded creature sprang up in his bed as he spoke, and was about to jump out of it, when the clergyman left the house with a sorrowful heart at what he had witnessed.

James Paterson went up the next day, but the door was barred, and he could receive no answer from Gibbie. On the day following, the minister and James went together, but the door remained bolted, and all within was silent.

"He is dead, I doubt," said the minister.

"I doubt it," said the elder, "we'd better get the neighbours and break up the door."

"Try't!" roared a voice from within.

"Let us in Gibbie," cried James, on recovering from the start he had sustained—"it's me and the minister."

Neither threats nor entreaties could force another syllable from Gibbie, and they had to go back as they came. In a few days the miser appeared with a stick in his hand, and wasted to a shadow. He soon began to work, and gradually recovered strength, but his illness left a cough behind it which ultimately terminated in asthma. November came on, and he set out, as usual, to Edinburgh, to deposit his earnings for the year in the bank. On these occasions he never slept till he returned, and he performed the journey without spending a farthing. When he got beyond the district where he was known, he begged his way; and it was said he commonly brought home as much food as lasted him for a considerable period. George the Third had for some time been seated on the throne, and the war with France, which began under his predecessor, was still carried on with great vigour, and with various success. The Stamp Act, for taxing America, had been passed, and the Americans had treated it with the utmost indignity. A revolt was expected, and in due time a revolt came. Many were the rumours and false reports which arose out of these sources. The newspaper press had scarcely felt its way, as yet, into the smaller and remoter districts, and hence the inventive and wonder-seeking found an ample field on which to exercise their talents. An alarm was circulated that the French had landed in England, and that the banks had stopped payment. The rumour reached Gibbie's ears, and he set off immediately for Edinburgh. Back again he came, and things went on with him as usual for a few days. On the eighth night after his return, he was awakened by a loud noise at the door. The door fell in, and six men with bludgeons, and blackened faces, and old clothes, entered. Gibbie sprang to the floor, and seizing a large stick, demanded their errand.

"Your siller!" grumbled a voice, affectedly deep.

"I've nae siller," replied Gibbie.

"We'll see that," said one of the burglars, "here's a chest I've got my hands on by chance. Where's the key, Goodman?"

A lounge from Gibbie's stick was the answer, and six heavy blows were instantly levelled at Gibbie. Two of them fell on his head, and he cried for mercy.

"Ye'll get it," said the gruff voice that spoke first, "if ye gie up the siller peaceably; and if no, your life gangs for't."

"For Godsake, men," cried Gibbie in desperation, "dinna murder a man in his ain house. If I had siller ye wad ha'et, but as sure's death, I've nane—I've nane here—the pickle I ha'e is in the bank."

"Gie's the key!" cried the robbers.

"I've nae key," replied Gibbie, "it was lost at my mither's death."

"We'll soon mak' ane then," said one of the thieves,—"haud him till I smash the lid."

The old chest was instantly broken. A piece of turf that was smouldering in the fireplace, was stirred to give light for examining the contents of the chest. It contained the body clothes of the deceased Mrs. Stevenson, and two pairs of home-made blankets, but no money was found.

"I tell't ye there was nane!" said Gibbie, giving vent to a deep breath. "Gang away now will ye, and let folk alane. Me siller! I wish I had."

"Weel a weel," rejoined one of the house-breakers, who began to feel the clothes all over, "if we get onything, it's our ain—what's fun's fairly won!"

Gibbie trembled violently when he saw what the man was about.

"That's the thing now, Jamie—Tam I mean—cried one of those who held Gibbie, "he's shaking—it'll be sewed in about the claes."

"Here's the posie lads—here it is!" ejaculated one of the searchers.

A deep groan came from Gibbie, and he made a fearful effort to disentangle himself, but they tripped and tumbled him, and held him down. He was easily mastered, for the fever had shorn him of his locks.

"The curse o' God'll come on ye for this, ye blackguards!" roared Gibbie, in a paroxysm of anger and vexation. "Gie me my siller! Help! help! Murder! murder!"

They closed his mouth, and the search went on. Every nook and corner was ransacked, but nothing else was discovered of value. They tied their victim hand and foot, and taking all the rags and old clothes they could find, the robbers went away. They were never found out. Little sympathy was felt for Gibbie, and his loss was spoken of as a subject for mirth, rather than pity. It came out afterwards, however, that the robbery was not so extensive as was generally imagined. It was only the savings of a year that were taken away. The grand posie which Gibbie had brought from the bank, in gold guineas, was still safely beneath the hearth-stone. The fear entered his mind that it was scarcely secure even there. He thought of many other places, but could not come to a decision, till one day, while sorting about his ground, a large log of wood, which had lain there for thirty years, occurred to him as affording a safe asylum for his gold. He went down to it the first dark night, and raising it with a wooden crow from the deep bed it had made for itself, he scooped out of it an oblong hole, of sufficient depth to contain £200 in gold. After measuring the dimensions of the cavity he let it fall back into its socket, and getting a piece of dried board to fit the place, he went back the next night and committed his money, in woollen bags, to its place of safety. From that moment the log held his soul. Its image was in his mind wherever he went. He thought of it by day, and he dreamed of it by night. If a dog, or a neighbour's cow approached the spot, he kept his eye on it till it left; and any one happening to look at it as he passed, made him tremble all over. Sometimes a boy going to school would throw a stone at it, and the sound would enter into his ears as if it had been the last trumpet. An old customer-weaver went by one forenoon, and Gibbie was working near to the object of his idolatry, and stealing occasional glances at it.

"Ye're thrang, Gibbie," said the weaver, as he let down his web to rest himself; "there's fine weather for the craps."

"Yes," replied Gibbie, in a tone which indicated unwillingness to say more.

"Gat ye ever any word o' your siller?" continued the webster, with affected commiseration.

"No!" said Gibbie, continuing to work, and without raising his head.

"And never will, I doubt," pursued the weaver. Gibbie answered with his customary grumph.

"It'll be coming wi' the blin' carrier: what think ye, Gibbie?"

"Gang away wi' your wab and thrums, man, and no blether there," retorted Gibbie in a surly mood.

"I'm just takin' a rest, Gibbie; I hope there's nae harm in that. It's a warm day this, and claith's heavier than hay, as the saying is."

There was no saying of the kind, and Gibbie felt the sting which the allusion conveyed.

"Ye'll maybe fin' this hoe heavier than baith," growled Gibbie, "if ye dinna keep a clean tongue i' your head."

The weaver felt he had gone as far as he durst venture with safety, and began, for want of a better subject, to speak about the log which lay at hand.

"That log there, Gibbie——"

"What about the log?" cried Gibbie, coming up to the speaker.

"Naething,—naething; but I mind sin' it was cut down, and that's aboon thretty years sin'. I'll warrant it's rotten i' the heart by this time."

As he spoke, he went up and struck it with his ell-wand, and it uttered a dead dull sound. Gibbie could stand it no longer.

"Gang away, man," said he, giving the weaver an ill-natured push by the shoulders, "and mind your ain wark, and no disturb ither folk."

"Ye've risen aff your wrang end this morning, I think, Gibbie," said the weaver, shouldering his web, and going off. "Aweel, guid morning, Gibbie, and thank ye for the crack we've had; and I hope, Gibbie, ye'll get word o' your siller yet; and lang life to you, Gibbie, for ye wad be muckle missed. But there's nae saying how soon troubles and fevers may come, for a' that. Aweel, guid morning, Gibbie."

His tormentor went away chuckling to himself; and, after a stealthy look or two at the log, the miser resumed his labour.

Year after year went by, and every year enlarged and strengthened the ruling passion of Gibbie's heart. It was its natural course. The ivy had clasped trunk and bough, and was drinking his life blood. His original trousers had fallen away piecemeal, for they were made up of fifty pieces at last, and their successors were composed of a sow hide and a calf skin. The cats supplied him with vests, and an old pair of blankets, dyed with broom, furnished him with successive arms to his jacket, whose body was still in the land of the living. He had contracted a fondness for snuff, but, except one half ounce, he was never known to have purchased any. On market-days, he would go up to strangers and ask them for a pinch,—having previously prepared his thumb and two forefingers, by pressing them on a large button which he kept in his pocket. Woe to the box into which these fingers entered! He used the first pinch on the spot, and then dipped again, and took as much away as would have served a moderate snuffer for two days. No man gave him his box twice, except it was nearly empty, or mixed with pepper, to cheat the niggard. The progress of avarice within him was marked by many external symbols. His looks told it. His skin became furrowed like a beehive, and dry and brown as a hare's back: his eyes were far down into his head, and constantly directed to the ground in search of pins, or bits of old iron, or castaway shoes, which even the beggar had thrown off. Everything was taken up which would wear, or eat, or sell. His lungs were now deeply asthmatic, and most people thought he would not stand it much longer. He had passed his fiftieth year, but he looked like a man of eighty. A shock of paralysis deprived him of the use of his left arm. But another shock was before him, which was worse than all: It had been a heavy winter of snow, and a sudden thaw coming on about the beginning of March, the water became flooded to an unparalleled extent. Much mischief was done, and, among other things, the log was gone. Rooted to the spot, the miser stood, on discovering his loss. What was to be done? Down the water side he went, scrutinizing every object which the flood had cast on the banks; but nowhere was the log to be seen which contained his all. He went as far as the Clyde, but without success. Another round was taken, which occupied several months. He waded into the pools, and felt the recesses in the banks with a large pole. The inquiries put to him were evaded, or answered with a fretful humph; and it was generally concluded he had gone beside himself. Twice he narrowly escaped drowning, but still he prosecuted his search. He slept near the river in any out-house he found, and began his work again as soon as daylight appeared. There was one house he passed, whose mistress guessed what he sought after. She came out and asked him if he had lost anything; but Gibbie made her no answer. "Come away in, then," said the woman, "and get yourself warmed, and something to eat, for it's a cauld job ye're at, whatever ye're seeking for." Gibbie followed, and she prepared him a hearty meal, and baked a large bannock, and put a couple of guineas into it, and gave it to Gibbie when he left. He thanked her, and went away back to the river, and began his former occupation. Little did the miser think of the treasure which his bannock contained, when he gave it to a man's horse, during the day, for taking him across the water. Providence seemed to be fighting against him, and he against Providence. It was about the middle of May when he reached Bothwell Bridge by the course of the river, and then he turned and went back the way he came; but asking now at every one he met, if they had seen or heard of a log, which he described to them. None had seen or heard of it. After a violent struggle with himself, the miser offered a white shilling to any one who should find it out. His bribe rose at last to "twenty white shillings," but never went higher. "Twenty white shillings!" he would cry, as he passed along; "think o' that, folk—only think o' that! Twenty white shillings for that dead stick!—tween-ty white shillings!" His mind became affected, and he would occasionally break out into curses against the water, and strike it with his pole, till he fell from exhaustion. In his ravings, he let out the nature of his loss, and the news went like wildfire through the country. He now attacked every one he met, and cried for a halfpenny in such piteous tones, that few had the heart to refuse him. His whole time was spent between begging and searching about the river. He was a pitiful object with his ragged dress, and haggard looks, and withered arm hanging by his side, and the other grasping the long pole, and himself speaking to the river, at one time in beseeching tones, and then bursting out against it in a wild volley of oaths. Strangers, who came upon him unawares, fled with precipitation and awe from his presence; and, as he usually pursued to beg, or rather extort, a halfpenny from them, several persons were seriously injured by the fright they sustained.

On the following winter, the miserable nuisance was removed. He was found dead one morning by the water side. His right hand was thrust beneath the rags of skin on his breast, and within it was clenched a piece of woollen cloth, which contained upwards of five pounds in shillings and half-crowns. Poor man! he died as he lived, with his god at his heart. There are hopes of the drunkard—none of the miser!

SONNETS TO —————

I.

I NEVER asked for words of thine to prove
Thy deep—thy fond devotion unto me;
(I long had marked it, and an answering love Slowly awakened in my heart to thee.)
My watchful eye could read it in thy glance,
That ever brightened up when I came near;
And if my hand met thine amid the dance,
The start—the flushing cheek—have told how dear
My presence was to thee: and still, though nought
Came from thy lips to warrant such belief,
Yet my quick ear, unknown to thee, hath caught
The secret sigh that gave thy heart relief,
And upon mine its stolen echoes fell—
Revealing the fond truth thy lips were slow to tell.

II.

At length it seemed as if a spell were broken,
And silence from thy lips unloosed her chain,
And words arose (such words as then were spoken
I ne'er had heard,—I ne'er shall hear again!)
My bosom beat with uncontroll'd emotion,
Whilst thou, in whispers tremulous and low
As the soft wind that stirs the aspen bough,
Breathed forth the tale of long concealed devotion!
Twas only, then, I knew the depth—the force—
Of that long love, which silence could not hide!—
Strong as the mountain torrent in its course,
And gentle as the flowers upon its side!
'Twas then, and only then that thou didst know
My heart was thine alone, with all it could bestow!

SHAKSPEARIAN RAMBLES, AND RAMBLING REMARKS AND REMINISCENCES, CULLED FROM OUR SKETCH-BOOK.

BY H. CURLING, HALF-PAY 52D LIGHT INFANTRY.

WHAT immense interest do the historical plays of our Shakspeare lend to every spot of earth in this fair island, which he has graced by ever so slight a mention! From boyhood up to this present sweet spring of 1841, it has been occasionally my luck to wander and ramble almost all over merry England; and from that hour in which I first purloined a stray volume of the wondrous Will, from the hanging shelves of the library of a village pedagogue, and which volume contained those warlike acts of the fourth, fifth, and sixth Harry's lives, how have I gloated upon, and delighted in, every forest, glade, field, copse, and dingle, which my mind's-eye could by possibility identify or assimilate, in any possible way, with any one of Shakspeare's historical plays! I have travelled "in other lands afar" also; but, apart from the love of one's own country, there is, I am certain, no author who can have thrown such delicious interest over the land of his birth as our immortal bard: nay, it is a fact that even he himself cannot make the feeling tell, when he renders in music some fearful battle, "so fought, so followed, and so fairly won," by us islanders, upon the grassy carpet of some foreign plain. I have "put on" towards Calais; visited Agincourt; before Angiers have I stood for hours; at pleasure have I lain near Orleans; railed at fortune in Ardenne wood; and have felt, in such locality, "more than I'll say, or you believe;" but I have never experienced, in any of these foreign scenes, the full force of the whereabouts of the bard's Personæ, as I have had them come home to me on English ground, "in our park-like England." Who ever wandered through one of those deep and rutty forest-roads, flanked on either hand by fern-clad o'erhanging banks, the old oak boughs sprawling and coiling just above your head; each bank, too, crested with moss-clad and half dilapidated park paling, and this in Warwickshire, in Gloucestershire, Yorkshire, or Oxfordshire;—who, I say, in such locality, does not look for the very personages of these dramas, habited as when they lived, to people the very scene? Then, again, in Kent, "the civillest part of all our isle," who passes Gad's Hill, and looks not around him to peer into those copes (cut up and cleared as the scene is) with fresh interest every time he traverses that road? Go thou towards Warwick, loiter about those towers, wander into the plaisance, and clamber up to the keep: see then if you do not become identified with Shakspeare, and none else. To me, then, whatever of our counties he hath graced by mention, or laid one of his scenes in, that county is thrice blessed,—nay, the blessing extends to every ruin and old building therein situate; and all and everything pertaining to the noble, the beautiful, and the picturesque, he has essentially made his own. Thus, when he gives us in Gloucestershire "a hall in Shallow's house," "a goodly dwelling and a rich," with its orchard and its garden, "where they do nothing but eat, and make good cheer," each old Elizabethan-looking mansion we stumble upon, with its avenue and parterre, seems as though it was actually tenanted by a Master Robert Shallow, a Silence, and a serving-man Davy; whilst, in the neighbouring and secluded hamlet, we look for the lineal descendants of such heroes as Ralph Mouldy, Simon Shadow, Thomas Wart, and Francis Feeble, together with that most perfect of clodpoles, Peter Bullcalf of the Green.

Then, for towns, give me such places as Coventry, Tewkesbury, Warwick, and Shrewsbury: I can spend weeks in looking over, wandering, and peeping about their old haunts, and discovering their neglected and built-up remains, from day to day, and at various times o' the day: at early morn, whilst "the country cocks do crow," I love to sniff the neighbouring air of some suburban residence of the native burgher of former days; at mid-day to ferret out the broken arch of a cloister, or stumble upon some half-hidden, long-forgotten Abbot's kitchen; at eve, again, to loiter about and observe the appearance of the narrow by-streets of the city, with their houses sunken and aslant, almost untenanted, and their date of occupation as nearly worn out as their walls; their upper stories beetling o'er, and every room within perhaps containing a whole volume of romance in the lives and fortunes of their succeeding inmates. Then, at night, I love to sleep in the almost forgotten apartment of an ancient and now out-of-the-way hostel, a room that hath been long perhaps given over and unused; its dingy ceiling ready to crack your caput, with its huge traversing oaken beam; and its undulating floor, threatening to capsize your equilibrium as you pace along; the moon shining through the diamond-paned lattice upon the time-honoured and rent curtains of the rickety bedstead, as you lie in a dreamy state, "twixt sleeping and waking," violently carried away, as it were, and transported back headlong, some three hundred and odd years, into the abyss of time. 'Tis then you are filled with the idea of "farmers from the weald of Kent" having great charge; carriers and travellers met and molested, rifled and swindled by such companions as Gadshill and his "gentlemen of the shade." You dream of parcel-gilt goblets, trunk hose, and basket-hilted rapiers, swash-buckler oaths, and pottlepot toasts. You are acquainted, and hail-fellow, with Nym and Ned Poins; and you see Old Jack, sweet Jack Falstaff, and his royal Hal, with even the attending Francis, complete in feature and in mein; or, peradventure, becoming more warlike in your imaginations and conceits, you fancy yourself actually upon the march, with that ill-furnished and worse-appointed (though splendidly manœuvred) battalion, levied in those stirring times, and billeted, en route, some where or other 'twixt Shrewsbury and Sutton-Col-field; or, perchance, the guest of mine host of St. Albans, or the red-nosed innkeeper at Daintry.

Your traveller, however, who is wont to indulge and recreate himself in these (perhaps ridiculous), imaginings and researches, will do well to pursue them alone, unless he possess a sufficiency of philosophy to render him full proof against the ridicule and misunderstanding of most of the comrades he would pitch upon, for the sake of companionship, en route, and also other annoyances that are sure to interfere with his trip, and make total shipwreck of all the enjoyment of his favourite pursuit. In our exploratory rambles, ere we had become sufficiently awake and wary, we have experienced frequently the truth of this remark; and as often resolved,—from having been turned from our purpose entirely, passing unregarded all those places of interest we had resolved to become acquainted with, as much from the goodfellowship consequent upon falling in with old comrades, and allowing their influence to overthrow our romance, as their actual laughter and contempt for such pursuits,—to turn misanthrope for the nonce, and go forth alone. I remember once being inveigled into joining a party of young fellows, who were most anxious to view Warwick castle; and from the anxiety they displayed, to catch a first sight of these towers, you might have imagined each individual a near relative of Jonathan Oldbuck himself. The circumstance, however, of having been to see the lion of the shire, seemed to them all that was required or necessary; and, when after entering the gateway, we suddenly came upon the beauteous scene, and beheld before us that gatehouse with its towers and flanking walls, so unrivalled, I should think, throughout the world, my comrades were full-cry, myself actually pressed into the sport also, and away we went, with “hark and whoop, and wild halloo,” right through the gateway, and up to the principal entrance, in the full enjoyment of a game of leapfrog. Such was the delight of the pastime, and its consequent excitement to our party, that I firmly believe they voted Warwick castle at the devil for interrupting them in the midst of their boisterous glee. I found it, indeed, so utterly impossible to view and contemplate these interesting objects, so accompanied, that I rather favoured the notion; and, after having hurried through, we left the castle, making our way into the town of Warwick, where we were billeted, after the same lively fashion. I remember, also, that as we were merely halting for the day in the pleasant town of Warwick, after we had thus seen the castle, my companions roared lustily for their cavalry, in order also to peruse the castle of Kenilworth, which is some ten miles distant: we mounted, therefore, and galloped helter skelter to that interesting spot—devil take the hindmost, was the order of the march—and we tried, and successfully proved the speed of our horses in divers well-contested races, ere we reached the castle. To dismount, gain admittance to the ruins, scramble over every part of the mouldering towers and walls, and try who could attain the most perilous and highest pinnacle of the ruined building, was the work of an incredibly short space of time; and then, the end of the excursion was fully answered—we had been to Kenilworth, a spot of so much interest, and which it was now in our power to aver and swear by as having actually seen; “for to have been to Cumnor, and not tasted a cup at the Bonny Black Bear,” says Sir Walter, “were to avouch one’s self utterly indifferent as to reputation as a traveller”—and thus thought our party. For mine own part, I love to be bon camarado with all men; and, therefore, whatever party I happen to fall in with, always fall in with the humour thereof—putting my own feelings and fancies quietly in my pocket. The gents, who thus consorted me, although not a jot troubled with my own feelings of admiration for the mouldering tower, or the deeds of other days, were yet fellows of some soul: they were of the very breed of men who, in the olden times, had garrisoned and fought in such strongholds as the one we were thus visiting: they were nearly all that remains to us of the men-at-arms and chivalry of England—jolly subs, of a marching-regiment, careless, reckless, daring youths: and like young Warwick’s sum-up of his tastes and accomplishments in the Temple Gardens, and his recapitulation of those matters which his judgment might be relied on, so might they have worded their peculiar dispositions.

Between two hawks, which flies the higher pitch;
Between two dogs, which hath the deeper mouth;
Between two blades, which hath the better temper;
Between two horses, which doth bear him best;
Between two girls, which hath the merrier eye,— they had, perhaps, some shallow spirit of judgment; but, for any sympathy with the feelings of the antiquary and the tourist, or knowledge of the different points of interest in such hallowed precincts—

Good faith, they were no wiser than a daw.

Having thus, in one day, seen and done so much, our party returned after the same fashion. We left the achievement of Guy’s Cliff (and other noteworthy objects which lay in our way back) to other travellers; as it was voted by these “headlong cavaliers” a bore to undergo so much lionizing in one day. It was also voted, “never merry world” in the town of Warwick: the place was too dull, and dead in look; too melancholy and insipid; all the pretty girls had evidently emigrated to the lively Leamington; and, accordingly, we cut the mess-dinner, held, for that day, at the principal inn; and, hiring a fly, escaped thither. At Leamington, then, in all the delight of mirth, we lounged about amongst the congregated water-drinkers and pleasure-seekers of this fashionable resort; dined at eight o’ the clock; smoked our Havannahs; drained our flagons; sallied out for a spree; and ran a muck through the town, startling, with “dire yell,” the peaceful inhabitants from their slumbers, and enjoying, what is termed by such blades, a regular spree. Morning’s dawn found them making their way back to their billets, time enough to don their blue coats and rapiers, swallow their breakfast, and fall in for the morning’s march towards Manchester. Such “glimpse of the days that are over” will not suit all folks; and having seen so much—although perusal and contemplation of Warwick and Kenilworth had been thus laughed out of me—I sought out the first “pliant hour;” gained a day or two’s licence; and returned to view the neighbourhood at leisure. Indeed, a ramble in any of these before-named counties (to him who cultivates the fruits they offer) is sure to repay the wanderer. Your modern fine gentleman is now-a-days frequently to be met with on an exploratory tramp, with staff in hand, and pack on back: I have fallen in with them in all parts of England, Scotland, and Wales; yet, I know not how it is, although I have joined company with such parties a dozen times, I have seldom fallen in with companions whose style of travel at all suited my own humdrum way of going. I remember, a year or two ago, enjoying myself (after this vagabondizing fashion) in a tramp through various parts of England, straying hither and thither, wherever fancy or interest of scene might lead me; and one fine morning left the town of Gloucester, with intent to reach, ere nightfall, some high mountains which I saw looming large a-head in the morning mist, and which I knew to be the celebrated Malvern Hills. Gloucester, amongst other towns, hath favour in our sight and estimation, from the many historical recollections it conjures up; although divers little events which have there been transacted are not recollected by the half of its visitors and viewers. To many it is interesting, ’mongst other matters, from the circumstance of Richard III. having made it his place of residence, whilst he caused to be executed that foul and cruel murder upon the two young princes in the Tower. He had determined in his own mind not to be in the way whilst that business was being transacted; and as he also cared not to be very far off, lest any accident should happen on the first discovery of the deed, he set out as if purposing to visit York; but, turning his escort to the left, he made for Gloucester. ’Twas here, then, he despatched the order to Sir Robert Brackenbury, to put the young princes to death, which that officer nobly determined to have nothing at all to do with; and on which he then sent his message to deliver the keys for one night to Sir James Tyrrel. It was, also, whilst Richard was staying thus at Gloucester, that he so mortally offended his great ally the Duke of Buckingham, and by which quarrel he afterwards lost his crown and life; for ’twas at Gloucester, whilst thus lying at pleasure, that “high”-reaching Buckingham “grew circum-spect,” after “holding on” with Richard “so long untired;” and having here made bold to remind him of certain promises—

The earldom of Hereford, and those moveables—

on their being refused, with all submissive acquiescence (apparently) he requested leave to repair to his seat at Brecknock. Shakspeare gives, with his usual accuracy, the duke philosophising upon the matter thus:—

O let me think on Hastings, and be gone
To Brecknock, while my fearful head is on.

It is somewhat curious that Buckingham, according to his own relation of the matter to Morton bishop of Ely, would have struck for the crown on his own account, had he not met (as he thus put on from Gloucester) with the lady Margaret countess of Richmond; and which meeting reminded “the deep-revolving” duke that his own claim and pretensions (as descended from Edward III.) were barred by this very lady’s title, as the rightful and sole heir of John duke of Somerset, descended from John of Gaunt, and whose title, he says, he had totally forgotten, till he thus met with her on his way from Gloucester, between the towns of Worcester and Bridgenorth. At Brecknock, then, was arranged and concocted that plot which was to overthrow Richard, and which was first set in motion by the refusal of this “earldom of Hereford, and its moveables,” and which refusal was given at Gloucester, where Richard had retired to watch the business of the murder of the two young princes. Gloucester is worthy of notice and perusal on many accounts: at this time we will leave it.

Putting on, then, towards the Malvern hills, and intending to view that splendid specimen of a Roman encampment which is there to be found, and which goes by the name of the Herefordshire Beacon, I found myself ever and anon taken from my direct road by a picturesque Elizabethan residence on one hand, or the rich glade of a plantation on the other; so that it was about the time o’ the day in which your fashionables are wont to indulge themselves in the enjoyment of the morning’s meal, that I found myself staring upon a heterogeneous mass of fully-dressed beaux and belles, promenading backwards and forwards, their steps keeping time to a sort of wild-beast band, which rattled out from under the portico of Thompson’s pump-rooms, at the well-walk of Cheltenham. A gentleman, clad in a German blouze, with travel-stained feet, and carrying his wardrobe upon his back, is not precisely in fit and becoming guise to parade among so highly-dressed and gay an assemblage as is here to be usually found, even at the latter end of the season: accordingly, giving one glance at the promenaders, I struck off into the more secluded pathway, intending to pass through this new-fangled and somewhat gaudy town (albeit, I must confess it a delightful resort, when one is dressed to the level of, and prepared to figure ’mongst, its attendant beaux and belles.) However, being then on exploratory tramp, it jumped not with my humour at all; and, therefore, intending to clear the town, I sped on my way like Christian in the “Progress,” with my burthen on my back; and, inquiring out the proper road, put on towards Tewkesbury. Having shook the dust from my shoes, and congratulated myself upon nearly clearing the streets of Cheltenham, I began to sniff the coller air of the Cotswold hills on my right, and went forward rejoicing, in the full resolve, that the very first road-side inn, which in any way fell in with my notions of cleanliness and style, should furnish me forth a fragrant cup of bohea, a new-laid egg, and a rasher of bacon, by way of breakfast.

Whilst making up my mind to some such indulgence, I quickly came upon a second edition of drums and trumpet-sounds, and also into the same water-drinking plaisance, peopled with cavaliers and ladies fair, "neat, trimly dress'd," and fresh as bride and bridegroom; the which elegant and rapidly sprung-up region rejoices in the name of Pitville. In midst of the alleys and umbrageous walks, in which I had become mazed, and nearly lost my way, two well-known friends, darting out of an intersecting avenue, came suddenly all-athwart, and nearly capized me. After mutual recognition, and making out whither bound, they proposed, (with proviso of returning to their lodgment hard by to breakfast with them,) as they had an inkling to visit and see the company assembled at Malvern Wells, to doff their satin waist-coats; their watches, chains, and ouches; strap on their packs; and trudge a-foot there: in brief, we agreed, and they kept promise. After breakfasting, therefore, we started together, and, ere long, came in sight of the town of Tewkesbury. Tewkesbury hath a sound: 'tis a neighbourhood we venerate, on account of the before-mentioned weakness which doth, in truth, come o'er and trouble us whenever in such vicinity; and forthwith are we lost to this latter age of mediocrity, far gone and retrograded into the seventh heaven of remembrance of those desperate acts and deeds, chronicled and immortalized by wondrous Will, in certain scenes, headed "Fields of battle and plains, near Tewkesbury," &c. &c., and "Clarence comes again"—"perjured Clarence, that stabb'd me on the field of Tewkesbury;" and I, accordingly, suggested to my fellow-travellers the propriety of making a slight detour, in order to view the identical spot on which the battle was fought, and which is called by the common and popular herd, even unto this day, the Bloody Field. Notwithstanding, however, a bumpkin assuring us the Bloody Field lay only a quarter of a mile from the road, I might as well have tried to impress upon them the necessity of making a detour all round Gloucestershire with pease in their brogues. Towards the field they resolved not to trudge a foot; and thus outvoted, I was fairly done out of the field of Tewkesbury. "Set roast-beef and plum-pudding beside the pit o' Tophet, (says the old Scotch wife,) and an Englishman will make a spring at it." My companions were resolved to halt for dinner in this town, as they had promenaded far enough for that time, they affirmed: and it was not without considerable difficulty that I persuaded them to turn out of their path, in order to view the ancient church of the town, and which, indeed, none ought to pass without inspecting. Here they found matter of amusement and edification, which highly diverted them, although I much doubt whether they would have greatly cared if the whole edifice, with its venerable towers and steeple, had been toppled o'er, and buried five fathoms below the bed of the Severn. The diversion afforded was furnished by the old crab, who here officiated as exhibitor of the church and its antiquities; and as the explanatory guidance he insisted upon affording was as singular as his appearance, I will give it in his own words, ever and anon drawn out and commenced anew by the queries of the viewing party.

"That tomb there," he began, "is the monument of the Duke of Clarence, as was drowned arter his own particular desire in a butt of Malmesbury Madeira, because he held a particular love for that liquor.' 'Ah! I see,' observed one of his auditors; 'the same who fought here near your town, during the dispute of the Roses.' 'No such thing,' said the old chap, bluntly; 'he warn't there.' 'How is that?' observed another of the party. 'He warn't there, I tell'e, at all. He warn't there no how.' 'Why, man, is not this according to your own version? he who was murdered in the tower.' 'Drowned in Malmesbury, I told'e; I said nothin' about the tower, did I? Very well, it's all the same; and this is the tomb of the very Clarence who stabbed young Edward after the battle here.'"

False, fleeting, perjured, Clarence,
That stabbed me on the field of Tewkesbury.

Something of a new light seemed to strike the old chap, and he grew less positive on the subject; there appeared to be a passage in this Duke's history in which he had figured so near at home, and yet he had shown his monument almost from first to second childhood, and not known on't. "'Why, sure, as you say as he killed the young prince in the battle, he must have been there: it's odd that too; I can't exactly decide somehow; it arn't in the book. Here, now, this is the tomb of the Black Prince; p'raps 'tis, p'raps 'tarn't; howsever, we names it as such hereabouts; though, p'raps, you'll tell us a different story. Them's old grave-stones as your walking upon: very old, you can't read 'em, or make out the dates, you see; but them's all been accounted for, and owned, since I've belonged here, by a many folks as have come to see the church; and so has them ere courts-of-arms there, over them pews. There, that's Lord De le Spenserses arms; and that 'ere figure of the man in armour over there at the top, that's one of the De le Spenserses too: you may see that he's been touch'd-up, that chap, and mollified. Ah! it's more pity to see how they have mollified this church, even in my time—it's much changed since I first know'd it; a strange antic church it's been, and, for my part, I like it best in its antic state.' 'Who's tomb is that?' 'What, that 'un, with Hujus Loci on it?' 'Yes, that one; how do you translate that Hujus Loci, you mention?' 'How do I translate Hujus Loci?—(looking askance at a person who could ask such a question, and with immense self-satisfaction)—how do I translate Hujus Loci? Why, John Barrington of this town: can't you translate that? There, there's a stone at your foot, as have been owned in my time. The Duke of Buckingham came one day to see the church, and owned him directly he seed him. I never saw such a great man as the duke in all my life; he certainly was the very biggest 'un I ever clapp'd eyes on, in all my born days. I worked for the woman—' 'What in the name of heaven are you talking about—what woman do you mean?' 'What woman? why his wife I'm speaking about; I'm a stocking-weaver, and I made her four pair of stockings whilst they staid in town here. There, that's the monument of my Lord Wenlock, as was killed at the battle of Tewkesbury. The Duke of Gloucester, arterwards Richard the Third, as was arterwards surnamed 'Skewer the Lion,' (because he once killed one of those beasts, and was so crooked and audacious,) cut him over the nob with his battle-axe, and split him down the middle as easily as I could split a herring.' 'What was that for?' 'Why, because he was a traitor—it's in the book; he wouldn't bring up his men, and come on when he was invited; he was a rank traitor.' 'Oh, then, you think it was not exactly from personal fear and nervousness, but rather "the malady of not marking"—a sort of ——— tingling, or deafness to his instructions—a disinclination to the side he was enlisted on, which caused him to hang back?' 'Yes—no—dom it all! I tell you, he was afraid to come on, and wouldn't bring up his men; the duke see'd it, and was mortal angry: a terrible audacious man was the duke, as I've heard say, couldn't abide a body as served him like that—so he rode slap at 'im, and knocked 's brains out.' 'Very good.' 'Here, now, here's a tomb I respects more than all on 'em put together; it's the monument of John ——— of this town. I know'd 'im well, and a more respectable man I never see before or since; he held several high situations in this town, but I can't say exactly what they all were, for I never exactly know'd—but one on 'em was parish-clerk. This here monument is the imaciated monk's heffigy. There's one on 'em (they tell me) in almost every cathedral in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, besides the Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Man, as we used to have it in the harticles of war; he's a hembler, also, of immorality. This stone-coffin on my right here, contains the body of the Bishop of Worcester; and this one here, the corps of the Habbot of Evesham; this other one here, as I now places my hand on, I heard tell (for mind ye, it arn't in the book) contains the mortal remains of the Bishop of Gloucester; them others I spoke of before, I know for certain, contains the very bodies I told you of, because I seed 'em opened with my own eyes thirty years aback.' 'Ah, indeed! and what did you find?' 'Why, we found bones—nothin' else; and them all blow'd away into dust, as soon as ever we offered to look—the air had such effect on 'em; however, you see, I'm sure of my men in these two, though I arn't in that one—I always likes to be correct—and it's just thirty years ago since I seed 'em, with my own eyes, blow all away like the smoke of that ere cigar you're a smokin' on: and that minds me, we don't allow no tobacco smoked in church; so I shall fine you sixpence for that when all's done. Ah! it's true enough, that's full thirty years; and I've been here full eighty.' 'Indeed! why you don't look so old as that?' 'Ah! but I am, though.' 'What, and lived all your life in these parts?' 'No, I've been away some times to be sure; I was away in the wars. 'Ah, indeed! then you've been a soldier; what wars are you speaking of—York and Lancaster?' 'What wars! why the American wars is what I am speaking of.' 'You served, then, in America, did you?' 'No, not I; never was there in all my life; rather too 'cute for that too.' 'Why, you told us just now, that you was absent in the American wars, didn't you?' 'Well, suppose I did, I warn't telling no lie; I wur absent—I wur absent in the North Gloucester Militia. There them's Saxon pillars; and that's a monument of a farmer in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when they worked for a penny a day and a pipe of tobacco. These hopenings up at top, running all along like a gallery, is where the nuns used to come along to say their prayers. This here is the Duke of Gloucester's tomb; him as killed the Duke of Clarence in the butt of Malsbury wine, and knock'd out Lord Wenlock's brains with a battle-axe.' 'Why was he buried at Tewkesbury?' 'Why was he buried here? Why, where else would you bury him, I should like to know; he war a Roman Catholic, warn't he?' 'What has that to do with it?' 'Why, warn't this here a Roman Catholic Church in these days?' 'True, I had forgotten that, and it certainly accounts for the circumstance, as well as for everything else you have told us; but, then there's "maudlin Clarence and his Malmsey butt,"—what did they bury him here for?' 'Why, for the same reason to be sure; warn't his religion same as 'tother's? warn't he Roman too, think'e?' 'Well, but still, methinks, they need not have brought them 'all this way?' 'Why, dang it all! warn't this here a Roman Catholic Church?' 'Oh, ah! true again; and I suppose the only one in the kingdom in those days?' 'I can't say as to that; most likely it was so; there's a plenty on 'em now, at all events, in every part of the country. This here little picture is much admired, and so 's them windows.' 'Who was the painter of this picture?' 'Why, his name's on the top there; don't you see it?' 'Ecce Homo—ah! I see: a good artist in his day, I dare be sworn.'

We complimented the old chap on the accuracy of his descriptions, and the account he rendered, and presented him with a remuneration therefor, and which he condescended to accept with the grunt of a hog. We then left him, with a caution to insert "in the book," for the benefit of future visitors, the fact of Clarence having been present in the field of Tewkesbury, at the time he stabbed the young Prince Edward. After having dined, we then managed another start, and made our way along that pleasant road towards Upton. My comrades were now fairly into their work; and, swore they would keep it up till they reached the Malvern hills. They felt delighted at being in Tom Jones's country, they said; and all the powers of York and Lancaster, with lascivious Edward, perjured George, and mis-shapen Dick, were pitched to the devil. They resolved, in the gaiety of their hearts, to badger the host of the inn at Upton, by requesting an introduction to Sophia's muff; and swaggered into the bar, clamouring loudly for the sapient Partridge and Mistress Waters. A bustling old dame quickly answered to their call, and forthwith showed them into an apartment, which she affirmed was the very one in which Tom Jones ought to have slept; and, opening a cupboard, produced a little worn-out, moth-devoured remnant of sable, which she was ready to depose, upon oath, was the identical muff Sophia left upon the counterpane of the bed before their eyes. "I can, you see, produce the muff you asked for, gentlemen," said she; "and, what's more, I will show you the very room in which Fielding stayed whilst he wrote the account of those veritable transactions which occurred in this inn. I will also show you, down stairs, the very kitchen-fire before which Mrs. Honour contrasted her beef-steak fista, beside those pieces of alabaster which Sophia displayed, when she stepped up to the hearth to warm her lovely hands. I can produce, also, our post-boy Dick, who is the grandson of that very postilion Mrs. Honour so rudely denominated 'fellow,' and bestowed so many, 'marry-come-ups upon;' and, what is more, I am not ashamed to confess that I am the vulgar landlady, and I can produce myself." We descended, accordingly, with our vulgar landlady, into the cuisine, and were introduced to all these curious matters; after which we requested the honour of being allowed to partake of a cup of her tea, which we saw preparing in the bar; during the enjoyment of which beverage, we questioned and cross-examined her very closely upon the transactions at her inn on that eventful night: we made her particularly describe Sophia, who, she affirmed, was one of the most lovely and elegant creatures ever looked upon; but of Jones she spoke in terms beyond all praise,—she affirmed that he was a capital fellow; none of your perfect heroes, such as you read of now-a-days, but just such a fellow as you really meet with in the world, and well worth a lady's eye. She allowed that he was a little bit too gay; and, from her account of his behaviour, and the buxom appearance she carried at that time, we had no doubt but that Jones had paid her more than one compliment, notwithstanding the influence of the glances of Mrs. Waters: indeed, we learned many little matters, which, as Fielding has not put down in his history, we think, perhaps, it would be as well to omit mentioning here.

After tea, we bade adieu to our landlady, and wended on towards Malvern. Some short distance of our route lay along "the gentle Severn's sedgy bank," and then we struck into the more intricate road, where the apple and pear-trees growing on either hand, their branches nearly meet overhead, and almost in "bacchanal profusion reeled to earth." The moon shone out brightly, covering the whole country with a flood of silver light, as we emerged upon that long straight road, which may be said to be the commencement of the Malvern hills. They who have travelled this delightful road, have, doubtless, admired the beauty of the surrounding scene, which in a clear moonlight night was even more romantic. Before us lay the long gentle ascent towards those splendid hills, which frowned and towered to the very skies: on the ridge to the left, in the distance, was to be seen the lines of the encampment of the Herefordshire beacon; and, to the right, lay the town of Great Malvern, which, dotting the base of the enormous mountain, rearing its dark mass behind it, looked more like a flock of sheep at pasture, than a good sized village. In the lowlands we traversed, the country is beautifully wooded, with an occasional patch of wild-looking common or waste land, with here and there one of the regular old-style farm-houses, or a better sort of cottage, with its ample porch, its massive chimneys, and diamond-paned windows. The country looks a perfect garden in these parts; and, approaching as it does towards the cider country, the intermixture of the apple and pear, with the oak and the elm, is vastly pleasing to the eye. The bright and inconstant moon shone out like a ball of fire, and "tipping with silver all these fruit-tree tops," at the same time displayed the surrounding county, clear as on a sunshiny and brilliant day. "Man's o'erlaboured sense repaired itself by rest."—As we passed along, we could not help feeling that we were on classic ground: here had been the whereabouts of the hastily levied powers of the deadly feuds of the Roses, when trenching war channelled these fields, and the flowerets around were bruised by the "armed hoofs of hostile forces:" here, also, to look deeper into the abyss of time, the Roman legions had ta'en their stand; and these frowning and majestic hills had been worked on by the pick and the spade, and trenched and garrisoned by the short-sworded soldiery of the seven-hilled city. My comrades also talked scholarly and wisely. The spirit of Fielding, they said, walked abroad, and they cursed this age of mediocrity, and sighed for something in the shape of adventure: they even affirmed that they would have willingly taken their chance of endamage in purse and person; and, like Ensign Pattypan, Lieutenant Tripe, and the gallant Major Sturgeon, have consented to be stopped, robbed, and stripped, by a single highwayman, could they but have restored the breed to this latter age. They, however, encountered neither the highwaymen of the days of Turpin and Jack Sheppard, nor the clerks of St. Nicholas of a former date; but, trudging on in safety, soon began to ascend the zigzag road up through the plantation, to the house formerly kept by Old Steers, and known by the name of the Old Well-house. Here, upon making good an entrance, we found the great rambling mansion almost "kept itself," and were informed that not a single visitor was there remaining: the season had been untoward and short; the old landlord had died and was forgotten; the place was voted melancholy; and but few visitors frequented it. In early youth, when the table d'hôte was in its glory, I had oftentimes been a guest here: in those pleasant days a long and well-covered board, extending from end to end of the capacious dining-room, was resorted to by all the rank and fashion of the country, who, in turn, were visitors here too; an old Welch harper (infirm and withered as the last minstrel) sat near the door of this dining-room; and the hum of the conversation of the festive board, and the clatter of the knives and forks, was accompanied by the melody of his strings. The very last time of dining in that room, I remember to have sat next the glorious Mrs. Siddons. The apartment was now, however, unfurnished and uncomfortable-looking, showing desolation where I had seen such plenty. We, therefore, called for bed-candles; and my fellow-travellers, in high dudgeon and disgust, ordered a post-chaise to be sent for, from the town of Great Malvern, to convey them early next morning back to Cheltenham; swearing they would, in future, stick to the promenade and the billiard-tables of that pleasant place, and not again, in a hurry, consent to be inveigled into a country walk. We bade farewell, therefore, over night; and, after breakfast, next morning, I left the Well-house, by the drawbridge which crosses the fosse in rear of the building, and takes you upon the hill, as it were, out of the two-pair window. I visited the Camp hill, and all the different beacons, and looked from their tops upon the Welsh mountains; and then, stepping across the trench which divides the counties of Worcestershire and Herefordshire, put on towards Wales.

SLAVERY AND THE INTERNAL SLAVE-TRADE IN THE UNITED STATES, &c. &c.*

WE have here a Report, sent by the Executive Committee of the American Anti-Slavery Society to the General Anti-Slavery Convention, held last summer in London, which was attended by delegates from America, and different parts of Europe. The accounts of recent travellers in the United States have partly prepared the public for the painful disclosures contained in this Report, which is made in a reply to a series of queries; yet the half has not been told in amount, though the facts are of precisely the same character as those found in Stuart's Residence, Abdy's Travels, &c. &c. There is here, however, an entirely new chapter, and one which ought to be studied by British subjects: that is Texas, recognised the other day by Lord Palmerston as an independent state, and which is about to become one of the most thriving slave markets in the world, whether the supply shall come direct from Africa, from Cuba, or from the United States. The slave-trade between Texas and Africa is now regularly carried on; and it is asserted in this Report, that part of that trade is through the territory of the United States. Every new account tends to show how deeply rooted, how widely ramified, is the principle which perpetuates slavery in all the States, and even in those where it has long been nominally abolished. We learn that "large numbers of Northern church-members, and not a few Northern clergymen, are actually owners of slaves in the South." When we read paragraphs like the following, Abolition becomes hopeless, save from some violent internal convulsion:—

Northern ministers and theological professors have sons and daughters married at the south, and owning large slave properties. So with elders, deacons, class-leaders, and private members generally. There is scarcely a family in the free states which has not some relative residing at the south, usually married. Many a son, too, of northern religious parents, is to be found on southern plantations, flourishing the whip of the overseer. This extensive family connexion with the south has a tendency to make northern professing Christians very loath to speak aught against southern "institutions."

Again, there is an almost infinite variety of business relations between the north and the south.

Almost every trade and handicraft pursued in the north, has its market at the south. Thus members of churches, equally with other classes of persons in the free states, are connected in business with the south, and are of course interested in preserving the amicable relations between the two sections of the union, and strongly tempted to refrain from everything that will offend slaveholders. They are too far-sighted not to discover that any movement at the north against slavery, must materially affect business intercourse with the south; and hence they are constantly plied with motives urging them to be silent on the subject of slavery, and not only to be silent themselves, but to endeavour to keep all others so.

Besides business and other connexions already mentioned, the friendly relations and social intercourse which are constantly maintained between the citizens of the free and the slave states, are as largely participated in by the religious as by any other class.

Thousands of Christian families at the north entertain visitors from the south during the summer, many of whom are themselves entertained in turn as visitors in the south during the winter. The strongest social attachments not unfrequently exist between northern and southern families, who are in no wise related. And surely this sort of intercourse between the inhabitants of such widely separated portions of our common country is, when contemplated as an illustration of human friendship, a delightful spectacle. But the aspect in which we are called to view it is certainly more painful than pleasing. Its tendency has been to blind northern Christians to the enormities and guilt of slavery, and even when not wholly blinded, the entanglements of social etiquette have restrained them from speaking out in the language of faithful rebuke. They feel that this would be a sort of breach of faith to their southern friends, a betrayal of the confidence reposed in them, and an ungrateful requital of the hospitalities which have been showered upon them. Unworthy as such feelings are, they are entertained, and have no small influence in closing the mouths, if not the minds, of professing Christians in the free states, against the claims of the slave. Strange, indeed, that Christians should not have learned that first lesson of the religion of Christ, that duty is not created by smiles nor annihilated by frowns.

Lastly, northern ministers have a strong interest in the slave states. Not a few of them are natives of the slave states, some of whom still hold slaves; others have married wives with slave dowers; others contemplate a future settlement or sojourn there. A variety of causes may bring about such an event. Their health may fail, and render a visit or removal to the south indispensable, or they may receive a tempting call, or from some other cause they may one day become residents of the south. It behoves them, therefore, to stand either uncommitted on the question of slavery, or committed on the wrong side.

From these observations it is evident that there are numerous temptations operating upon professing Christians in the north, to become implicated in the guilt of slaveholding. That they should be so often found apologizing for the slaveholder, welcoming him to the communion, and inviting him to the pulpit, while they close it against him who would plead for the slave, can be accounted for upon the plainest principles of human nature.

In conclusion, we would say, that though a multitude of professing Christians at the north are implicated in the guilt of slaveholding, there is a large number of honourable exceptions both among individuals and societies.

* "Slavery and the Internal Slave Trade in the United States," &c. &c. London: Ward & Co.

We must give this extract from a shrewd commentary upon those merciful laws which, in the United States, protect the life and limbs of the slave :—

After declaring that he who is "guilty of wilfully and maliciously killing a slave, shall suffer the same punishment as if he had killed a freeman;" the act concludes thus—"Provided always, this act shall not extend to the person killing a slave outlawed by virtue of any act of assembly of this state; or to any slave in the act of resistance to his lawful overseer, or master, or to any slave dying under moderate correction." Reader, look at this proviso. 1. It gives free license to all persons to kill outlawed slaves. Well, what is an outlawed slave? A slave who runs away, lurks in swamps, &c., and kills a dog, or any other domestic animal, to keep himself from starving, is subject to a proclamation of outlawry (Haywood's Manual, 521;) and then whoever finds him may shoot him, tear him in pieces with dogs, burn him to death over a slow fire, or kill him by any other tortures. 2. The proviso grants full license to a master to kill his slave, if the slave resist him. The North Carolina bench has decided that this law contemplates not only actual resistance to punishment, &c., but also offering to resist. (Stroud's Sketch, 37.) If, for example, a slave undergoing the process of branding should resist, by pushing aside the burning stamp; or, if wrought up to frenzy by the torture of the lash, he should catch and hold it fast; or if he break loose from his master and run, refusing to stop at his command; or if he refuse to be flogged, or struggle to keep his clothes on while his master is trying to strip him; if, in these, or any one of a hundred other ways he resist, or offer, or threaten to resist the infliction; or, if the master attempt the violation of the slave's wife, and the husband resist his attempts without the least effort to injure him, but merely to shield his wife from his assaults, this law does not merely permit, but it authorizes, the master to murder the slave on the spot!

The brutality of these two provisos brands its authors as barbarians. But the third cause of exemption could not be outdone by the legislation of fiends. "DYING under MODERATE correction!" MODERATE correction and DEATH—cause and effect! "Provided ALWAYS," says the law, "this act shall not extend to any slave dying under moderate correction!" Here is a formal proclamation of impunity to murder—an express pledge of acquittal to all slaveholders who wish to murder their slaves, a legal absolution—an indulgence granted before the commission of the crime! Look at the phraseology. Nothing is said of maimings, dismemberments, skull-fractures, of severe bruising, or lacerations, or even of floggings; but a word is used, the common-parlance import of which is, slight chastisement; it is not even whipping, but "correction." And, as if hypocrisy and malignity were on the rack to outwit each other, even that weak word must be still further diluted—so "moderate" is added; and, to crown the climax, compounded of absurdity, hypocrisy, and cold-blooded murder, the legal definition of "moderate correction" is covertly given; which is, any punishment that kills the victim.

The codes of the different slave states we conceive among the best illustrations that can be given of the effects of slavery upon slave owners:—

The following legal penalties are, by the laws of slave states, attached to the various acts of slaves therein described. If more than seven slaves are found together in any road, without a white person in company, the penalty is twenty lashes a-piece.

For visiting a plantation without a written pass, ten lashes; for letting loose a boat from where it was made fast, thirty-nine lashes for the first offence; and for the second, "shall have cut off from his head one ear;" for keeping or carrying a club, thirty-nine lashes; for having any article for sale, without a ticket from his master, ten lashes; for travelling in any other than "the most usual and accustomed road," when going alone to any place, ty lashes; for travelling in the night, without a pass, forty lashes; for being found in another person's negro-quarters, forty lashes; for hunting with dogs in the woods, thirty lashes; for being on horseback, without the written permission of his master, twenty-five lashes; for riding or going abroad in the night, or riding horses in the daytime, without leave, a slave may be whipped, cropped, or branded in the cheek with the letter R, or otherwise punished, not extending to life, or so as to render him unfit for labour. The laws referred to may be found by consulting 2 Brevard's Digest, 228, 243, 246; Haywood's Manual, 78, chap. xiii. pp. 518, 529; 1 Virginia Revised Code, 722, 723; Prince's Digest, 454; 2 Missouri Laws, 741; Mississippi Revised Code, 371. Laws similar to these exist throughout the southern slave code.

The laws of slave states inflict capital punishment on slaves for a variety of crimes, for which, if their masters commit them, the legal penalty is merely imprisonment. Judge Stroud, in his "Sketch of the Laws of Slavery," says, that by the laws of Virginia, there are "seventy-one crimes for which slaves are capitally punished, though in none of these are whites punished in a manner more severe than by imprisonment in the penitentiary."

In reply to the question—"What provision is made for the education of the slaves?" we find among those provisions the following laws, which directly forbid, under severe penalties, the education of slaves:—

A law of South Carolina, passed in 1800, authorizes the infliction of twenty lashes on every slave found in an assembly convened for the purpose of "mental instruction," held in a confined or secret place, although in the presence of a white. Another law imposes a fine of £100 on any person who may teach a slave to write. An act of Virginia, of 1829, declares every meeting of slaves at any school, by day or night, for instruction in reading or writing, an unlawful assembly; and any Justice may inflict twenty lashes on each slave found in such school.

In North Carolina, to teach a slave to read or write, or to sell or give him any book (Bible not excepted) or pamphlet, is punished with thirty-nine lashes, or imprisonment if the offender be a free negro, but if a white, then with a fine of 200 dollars. The reason for this law assigned in its preamble is, that "teaching slaves to read and write, tends to excite dissatisfaction in their minds, and to produce insurrection and rebellion."

In Georgia, if a white teach a free negro or slave to read or write, he is fined 500 dollars, and imprisoned at the discretion of the court; if the offender be a coloured man, bond or free, he is to be fined or whipped at the discretion of the court. Of course a father may be flogged for teaching his own child. This barbarous law was enacted in 1829.

In Louisiana, the penalty for teaching slaves to read or write, is one year's imprisonment.

These are specimens of the efforts made by the slave-state legislatures, to enslave the minds of their victims; and we have surely no reason to hope that their souls are regarded with more compassion. Religion, indeed, appears to be considered almost as dangerous, by slave-owners, as education. It is here stated, that two millions of coloured people in America cannot read; but neither are they allowed to be orally instructed in their religious duties:—

In Georgia, any justice of the peace may, at his discretion, break up any religious assembly of slaves, and may order each slave present to be "corrected without trial, by receiving, on the bare back, twenty-five stripes with a whip, switch, or cow-skin."

In South Carolina, slaves may not meet together for the purpose of "religious worship" before sunrise, or after sunset, unless the majority of the meeting be composed of white persons, under the penalty of "twenty lashes well laid on." As it will be rather difficult for the slave to divine, before he goes to the meeting, how many blacks, and how many whites will be present, and of course which element will have the "majority," a due regard for his back will keep him from the meeting.

In Virginia, all evening meetings of slaves at any meeting-house, are unequivocally forbidden.

In Mississippi, the law permits the master to suffer his slave to attend the preaching of a white minister.

It is very evident that, when public opinion tolerates such laws, it will not tolerate the general religious instruction of the slaves.

The slave-trade flourishes in the capital, Washington, under the very eyes of the Congress; and we have this specimen of the advertisements which, openly and regularly, appear in the journals of that city:—

Cash for five hundred Negroes, including both sexes, from ten to twenty-five years of age. Persons having likely servants to dispose of, will find it their interest to give us a call, as we will give higher prices in cash than any other purchaser who is now or may hereafter come into the market.

FRANKLIN & AMFIELD, Alexandria.

Cash for three hundred Negroes.—The highest cash-price will be given by the subscriber, for negroes of both sexes, from the ages of twelve to twenty-eight.

WILLIAM H. WILLIAMS, Washington.

Cash for four hundred Negroes, including both sexes, from twelve to twenty-five years of age.

JAMES H. BIRCH, Washington City.

Cash for Negroes.—We will at all times give the highest prices in cash for likely young negroes of both sexes, from ten to thirty years of age.

J. W. NEIL & Co., Washington.

Here we find three traders in the district, advertising in one day for twelve hundred negroes, and a fourth offering to buy an indefinite number.

In a later number of the Intelligencer, we find the following:—

Cash for Negroes.—I will give the highest price for likely negroes from ten to twenty-five years of age.

GEORGE KEPHART.

Cash for Negroes.—I will give cash and liberal prices for any number of young and likely negroes, from eight to forty years of age. Persons having negroes to dispose of will find it to their advantage to give me a call at my residence on the corner of Seventh Street and Maryland Avenue, and opposite Mr. Williams' private jail.

WILLIAM H. RICHARDS.

Cash for Negroes.—The subscriber wishes to purchase a number of negroes for the Louisiana and Mississippi market. Himself or an agent at all times can be found at his jail on Seventh Street.

WM. H. WILLIAMS.

The unhappy beings purchased by these traders in human flesh, men and women, and children of eight years old, are sent to the south, either overland in coffees, or by sea, in crowded slavers. Fostered by Congress, these traders lose all sense of shame; and we have in the National Intelligencer, the following announcement of the regular departure of three slavers, belonging to a single factory:—

Alexandria and New Orleans Packets.—Brig Tribune, Samuel C. Bush, master, will sail as above on the 1st January; brig Isaac Franklin, Wm. Smith, master, on the 15th January; brig Uncas, Nath. Boush, master, on the 1st February. They will continue to leave this port on the 1st and 15th of each month, throughout the shipping season. Servants that are intended to be shipped, will, at any time, be received for safe-keeping at twenty-five cents a-day.

JOHN AMFIELD, Alexandria.

This infamous advertisement, of the regular sailing of three slavers, and the offer of the use of the factory prison, appears in one of the principal journals of the United States. Its proprietor has several times been chosen printer to Congress, and there is no reason for believing that he has ever lost the vote of a northern member for this prostitution of his columns.

But the climax of infamy is still untold. This trade in blood; this buying, imprisoning, and exporting of boys and girls eight years old; this tearing asunder of husbands and wives, parents and children, is all legalized in virtue of authority delegated by Congress!! The 249th page of the laws of the city of Washington, is polluted by the following enactment, bearing date 28th July, 1838:—

"For a LICENSE to trade or traffic in slaves for profit, four hundred dollars."

The following is from the "Anti-Slavery Manual," p. 114:—

One of the private prisons in Washington, used for keeping slaves, is owned by W. Robey, who is also engaged in the trade. In May 1834, a gentleman visited it, and fell into conversation with the overseer of the pen. He heard the clanking of chains within the pen. "Oh," said the overseer, himself a slave, "I have seen fifty or seventy slaves taken out of the pen, and the males chained together in pairs, and drove off to the south; and how they would cry, and groan, and take on, and wring their hands, but the driver would put on the whip, and tell them to shut up; so that they would go off, and bear it as well as they could."

Franklin and Amfield alone shipped to New Orleans, during the year 1835, according to their own statement, not less than one thousand slaves. They own brigs of about 160 to 200 tons burthen, running regularly every thirty days, during the trading season, to New Orleans, and carrying about one slave to the ton.

Facts of this sort might be multiplied to a great extent; but it is needless. No one now disputes them, though many still vindicate the practices exposed. They become like the pious lady, of whom we read in this Report, who said, "I am a slave-holder, and I glory in it." The advertisements for the recovery, dead or alive, of runaway slaves, beat the above. We shall give a few specimens of them:—

See the Newbern (North Carolina) Spectator, January 5, 1838, for the following:—

Ran away, from the subscriber, a negro man, named Sampson. Should he resist in being taken, so that violence is necessary to arrest him, I will not hold any person liable for damages should the slave be killed.

ENOCH FOX,

Jones County, North Carolina.

From the Charleston (South Carolina) Courier, February 20, 1836:—

Three hundred dollars Reward.—Ran away, from the subscriber, in November last, his two negro men, named Billy and Pompey. Billy in all probability may resist; in that event, fifty dollars will be paid for his head.

From the Newbern (North Carolina) Spectator, December 2, 1836:—

Two hundred dollars Reward.—Ran away, from the subscriber, negro Ben., also one by the name of Rigdon. I will give the reward of one hundred dollars for each of the above negroes, or for the killing of them, so that I can see them.

W. D. COBB.

Some of the scenes depicted in the Report become almost ludicrously horrible. They resemble the wild mirth of the maniac. In the capital of Virginia, a traveller lately witnessed an auction of slaves, where the eloquent vender absolutely rivalled Tattersall in a similar walk, if brute animals may be substituted for immortal beings:—

Monday next, at 9 A.M., at public sale, the slaves whose names follow, all negroes of the first quality—namely, Betsy, a negro-woman, twenty-three years of age, with her child Caesar, three years old: an excellent cook, washer, and ironer; warranted healthy. Julia, a mulatto girl, aged thirteen, robust and active, a good field-labourer; with the exception of a slight defect in the left eye, she is without fault. "Let us proceed, gentlemen," cried the seller of human flesh, in a stentorian voice; "let us proceed—a woman for sale!"

"An excellent woman; not a fault! and a little boy in the bargain. How much for the mother and child—250 dollars; very well, sir, 250 to begin. Some one has bid 250. Truly, gentlemen, they sell cattle for a larger price; 250! look at these, eyes, examine these limbs—shall I say 260! Thanks, gentlemen, some one has bid 260. It seems to me that I heard 275;—go on, gentlemen; I have never sold such a bargain. How! 280 for the best cook, the best washer, and the best dressmaker in Virginia! Must I sell her for the miserable price of 280! 300; two gentlemen have said 300. Very well, gentlemen; I am happy to see you begin to warm a little. Some one bid 310—310, going—330—335—340—340, going. Upon my honour, gentlemen, it is indeed a sacrifice to lose so good a cook; a great bargain for 340 dollars. Reflect upon it a little, and do not forget there is a little boy in the bargain.”

Here our auctioneer was interrupted in his harangue by one of his customers, a man whose appearance had inspired me, from the first moment, with a feeling of horror, and who, with the indifference and sang froid of an assassin, made to him the following observation—“As for the negro child, it is good for nothing; it is not worth a day’s nourishment; and if I have the mother, I will give away the child very quick; the first bidder will be able to have it at a cheap bargain.”

I glanced at the unfortunate mother, anxious to see what effect this barbarous proposal would have upon her. She did not speak, but a profound sadness was impressed on her countenance. The little innocent which she held in her arms, fixed his large eyes on her, as if saying, “Mamma, why do you weep!” Then he turned towards the witnesses of this heart-rending scene, with an impression that seemed to ask, what they had done to his mother to make her weep so bitterly. No, never will this moment ever escape my memory; it has confirmed me for all my life in the horror that I already felt at this infamous traffic. The auction continued, and finally the crier, striking a heavy blow with a hammer, pronounced the award to Mr. —, for 360 dollars. The victim descended from the table, and was led away by the purchaser. The other slaves were sold in the same manner as poor Betsy. Julia was sold at 326 dollars, and Augustus at 105. They both fell to the same individual who had purchased the former lot.

Such is an imperfect view of the American internal slave-trade; a system fraught with outrages, pollutions, and woes unutterable.

We shall close these revolting and ominous details with the picture of a slave-breeder of the United States, which follows some remarks on the brutal and debasing licentiousness which is ever the concomitant of slavery:—

What must be the demoralizing, the brutalizing, influence upon slave-holders, of being habitually engaged in breeding and raising human beings for sale! Compared even with soul-driving, it exceeds in vileness. While the slave-trader only buys and sells, retaining possession no longer than till he can reach the market, the breeder is engaged in the protracted process of raising human stock. He selects his “breeders”—he encourages licentiousness—he rewards amalgamation—he punishes sterility—he coolly calculates upon the profits of fecundity—takes vengeance for miscarriages—and holds mothers accountable for the continued life and health of their offspring. On the head of the new-born child he sets its future price. He trains it in premeditated ignorance, he feeds it for the same purpose for which he feeds his swine—for the shambles. From the day of its birth he contemplates the hour when he shall separate it from the mother who bore it: for that hour of yet keener pangs did its mother pass through the anguish of its birth. When that hour comes, the long-determined deed is done. The master proceeds about it deliberately—no entreaties or tears can surprise him into pity. The mother’s frenzied cry, the boy’s mute look of despair, move him not. He tears them asunder, handcuffs the victim, and consigns him to the soul-driver. Who can doubt whether, in all this long and complicated process of villany, there is not more to sear conscience, blunt sensibility, and transform man into a demon, far more than can be found in the slave trade itself! Does the trader buy!—the master sells. Does the trader drive men and women like cattle!—the master breeds them like cattle. Does the trader separate families!—the master does the same. Does the trader sell in lots to suit purchasers!—so does the master. But here the parallel stops, and the transcendent vileness of the master towers alone; for while the trader deals with strangers, the master is perpetrating these outrages upon those whom he has reared from their birth; in some cases upon the companions of his own boyhood—in others on the children of the woman—or, perchance, the woman herself who nursed his infancy—and often, worst of all, on his own offspring.

Need we ask what must be the effects of such practices, steadily pursued, upon the slave-holder’s heart! And there is his wife, who lives in the midst of all this, connives at it, and co-operates in it—what must she become! And their children, who are the playmates of the little “cattle,” and yet are so accustomed to seeing them torn from their parents and sold, as to be unmoved by their cries! What proficients must they become in the execrable villanies of the husband and father!

But if in this aspect the slave-breeder is an object of just abhorrence, in another view he strongly excites our pity; for he is himself the victim of fears scarcely less harrowing than those to which he subjects the slave. His fears have their origin in the danger of insurrections. “A dreadful sound is in his ears,” which no heroism can hush, which will not be wholly silenced by the uproar of revelry, and which breaks often upon the stillness of the night in tones of thunder.

GENORA; OR, THE GRAVE-ROBBER.

A GERMAN LEGEND.

BEAUTY, as yet unwedded—matrons pure,
With smiling households blest—to you the Muse,
In reverent homage, thus inscribes her song;
Her song that tells of strange mysterious things
To truth pertaining, such as gentle hearts
May love to know; and, knowing, treasure deep
In their fair memories. No loftier meed
Need poet ask; and I, a bard unknown,
Perchance uncredited, yet, ne’ertheless,
Presuming on attention, never yet
By you to Poesy denied, begin:—

Some centuries since, there dwelt, beside the Rhine,
In Cologne city, by the minster there,
A fair and noble lady, o’er whose brow

Three years of wedded life and love had past,
And left her childless; yet, for this, her lord,
The brave Count Albert, loved her not the less:
But, tender husband, as he was, essayed
To soften ills high Heaven alone may cure.

But, sooth to say,
This fair and gentle creature longed to bear
A mother’s honoured name; and oft, with tears,
Low bending ‘fore the Holy Virgin’s shrine,
Like Syrian Rachel, patriarch Jacob’s wife,
Cried, weeping—“Give me children, or I die!”
Thus passed she many a day, e’en till desire,
Though angel-pure, unsatisfied, had spread
The marble’s paleness on her lovely cheek;

And dimmed the brightness of her radiant eye :
For who shall tell, save woman, woman's heart,
That, childless, longs for offspring more than earth,
Parch'd by the summer, doth for cooling rain.

Let none condemn her. Though her prayers arose Awhile unanswered, Heaven's withholding hand
Is blest, as the bestowing ; nor denies Fulfilment to our wishes, but for good.

One night, while slumber sealed her tearful eye
And gave her bosom's sorrow to repose,
She dreamt that, walking by the river's side,
(Twas in the flowery season of the Spring,)
A strain of richest music from the skies
Burst sudden on her ear ; and, as she stood,
Deep-wondering at the sound, an angel-band,
With palms and wreaths of living green, drew nigh.
Above them, on a cloud of purple light,
In majesty serene, the Virgin sat,
Sweet-smiling, and, with words of gracious love,
Bade her approach ; then placed within her hand
A strange mysterious gift—a human skull,
From which grew roses three, in choicest bloom.
Take this, the Virgin Mother said, and know
Thy prayers are answered. Woman loved, farewell !
Then, upward rising, slowly disappeared.

She woke with fear, and to her husband told
The awful vision. He, with not less fear,
Heard the recital ; and, at earliest dawn,
With care oppress'd, hied to the hermitage
That, rock-built, overlooks the country round
For many a league, and to the holy man,
There dwelling, told the dream, and begged his skill
It to interpret. The deep-thoughted sage Heard him with wonder, and, as hermits wont,
With prayer beseeched the gracious ear of Heaven
In their behalf ; then, rising from his knee,
Like one with truth inspired, to Albert said :—
This dream relates to death, and joys beyond
The darksome grave. Now, son, my counsel take :
Prepare thee for the worst, if worse that be
Which is high blessedness and joy supreme :
This to thy wife vouchsafed by her who bore
Heaven's blessed One, is not foretold in vain.

He heard with sorrow—for he loved her well ;
Then to his home returned, where, bathed in tears,
He found his gentle spouse, and cheered her heart
With other words than those the hermit told.

Some few weeks passed, when, on his wedding day,
Yearly by Albert kept, a goodly feast ;
Whilst in his lordly halls a hundred guests
Assembled, sat and quaffed Enjoyment's bowl,
The fair Genora sudden drooped and died ;
Was mourned and buried ; and the city poured
Her thousands to behold the hearse of one
So loved and honoured : for her dream had gained Attention universal, and her name
Was numbered with the blest. I need not tell
How Albert sorrowed : gentle hearts will frame
His wretched state, and save the sad recital.

Now, in Cologne, from unremembered time,
It was a custom, and it may be vain,
But so it was, that every matron wore
Her wedding ring down with her to the grave.
This well the sexton knew,—a sordid wretch,
Whose cold and flinty bosom proof to fear,
Insensible to pity, and the tears
With which afflicted love bedews the dead,— Knew and resolved to gain. There are who deem
The dead as worthless, valueless, and vile ;
But he was one who robbed them in the tomb.

As rung the minster chimes their midnight peal,
Mournful and sweet, the onward march of time,

Forth from his dwelling near the robber stole,
Close-wrapt and cautious, to his helpless prey.
Beneath his ample cloak a covered lamp
He held secure, with fitting implements
To work his black and traitorous design.
Reach'd now the portal of the holy place,
He stood attentive, lest some straggler near Might spy his motion and the watch alarm.
So stands the wolf beside the fleecy fold,
To scent if shepherds by their charge abide :
They absent, o'er the pales the monster springs,
And bears his prize, some hapless lamb, away.
All silent slept the city ; not a sound
Broke on his ear of revelry or grief ;
The watch was slumbering, or perchance retired ;
And so, assured of secrecy, he turned
The key, and, entering, left the door unlocked.

Down the long, dark, and narrow aisles he trod,
Still hung with sables for the honoured dead ;
By pictures rich, from which devoutest saints
Frowned sternly on his sacrilege abhorred ;
By sculptured marbles, from whose life-like forms
Looks, more than human, seemed to cry, " Forbear !"
Ummoved, unterrified, he past, and sought
The stairs descending to the vaults beneath,
Within whose darkness drear and desolate
The sad remains of many an age reposed
On massy shelves of cold, damp, dripping stone—
Age, youth, and beauty in their coffins lay ;
Some fresh as yesterday, whilst others fall'n
Beneath Corruption's hand, to sight disclosed,
Their bare and bleached bones. Rich burghers here
Lay rotting in their pride municipal ;
Whilst high above, as though in mockery,
Black tattered banners and escutcheons told
Of doughty chiefs who fought in Palestine—
Their warring 'gainst the Saracen, what time
Enthusiast Peter roused the Christian world
From apathy supine to frantic rage,
And led her myriads to the Asian shore,
Ignobly there to suffer and to die.

Headless of all, unfearing, undismayed—
For gloomy death is guilt's security—
He onward passed, with firm determined step,
To where, within the furthestmost recess,
Beneath an empty niche, Genora lay ;
Upon an antique tomb, so old they say,
As is the minster, they had placed the dead :
It was the founder's ; and upon the stone
The sculptor's hand had traced this simple line—
" I sleep to be awakened ;" and no more.

Here stopped the guilty wretch, and straight prepared
To gain the object of his black design.
High in the niche he set the blazing lamp,
Threw by his cloak, and from the coffin plucked
The wreath of roses which her husband fond
Had placed there in memorial of his love ;
Unscrewed the lid, and from her finger drew
The pledge and promise of unbroken vows ;
Unbroke of all save by destroying Death.
And now his hasty hand had well-nigh closed
The rich-wrought chest for ever, when his eye
Caught the bright glitter of a golden chain
That, from her pale and lovely neck, fell down
Upon her bosom, ending with a cross,—
The symbol of her faith ; for, when she died,
Her weeping husband gave her to the grave
With all her jewels. " Ha !" the robber cried,
As he beheld the unexpected prize,
" Shall this inherit darkness ?" and anew
Prepared him for more spoil, and straight removed
The garnished lid that to full view disclosed
The still, cold, breathless, pale, and helpless dead.
Oh, sight to melt a fiend ! and from his heart
Force out compassion, ineffectual here.
All other vices have their estimate
Still measured by repletion, more or less ;

Lust palls in his possession ; Hatred's foot
 Stamps not for ever on her prostrate foe ;
 And e'en Revenge, red-eyed, malignant, stays
 His butchery when Horror cries, "No more !"
 But Avarice is like the hungry grave,
 Insatiable, remorseless ! and the wretch
 Who there stands craving is her vilest slave.
 What is to him the helplessness of death,
 And what to him that coffin'd angel there ?
 He sees not, hears not, though the sweetest flower
 That ever bloom'd in life's fair garden lies Outstretched and perished—beautiful she looked
 As chisell'd marble ere the breath of Time
 Hath blown upon its loveliness, and dimm'd
 The virgin freshness of its faultless form.
 Her long fair hair, in twining ringlets, fell Down round her shoulders, and, to fancy, seem'd
 Like corn bespread with dew-drops, ere the sun
 Hath call'd the glittering sparkles to the skies.
 For here and there, about her silky locks,
 Were wreath'd pearls shining, yea, the very same
 That graced her spousals, when, the hoary head
 Of age attendant whispered, "Never yet
 Have I till now beheld so fair a bride !"
 And straightway blessed her, yea, and she was blessed.

But to our story :—In his eager haste
 To seize the gold, the villain overthrew
 The coffin lid, that on the hollow floor
 Sounded like thunder, when the angry gods
 Take cognizance of sin, and through the vaults,
 Beneath and round him, echoing long and loud,
 Wakened the dead ; (so seeming ;) and her eye
 Fell on the wretch that close beside her stood,
 Unconscious of his object and her fate !

But he, the robber of the grave, writhed, ahrunk,
 And reeled, by terror smitten, to the door ;
 And, rushing headlong up the darkened stairs,
 Struck his bare brow against a jutting stone,
 Pillar, or buttress, of the edifice ;
 Thence, stunned and staggering, down the marble steps
 Rolled on the floor a bleeding, lifeless corpse.
 Some say heaven smote him with her vengeful fires,
 A monument of sacrilege abhorred ;
 For they who found him on the morrow told
 His face was blackened, as by lightning scathed,
 As his clenched hand still held the wedding ring.

And now, as from a dream, the buried woke,
 Arose, threw off her grave clothes, seized the lamp
 That still burnt brightly in the niche above,
 And left the vault to darkness and to death.

Meanwhile, within his hall, her sorrowing lord
 Sat waiting for the morrow's rising sun,
 To leave Cologne for ever : grief his heart
 Had wasted utterly, and on his brow
 Stamped the dark image of the fiend, Despair ;
 And, whilst his faithful servants mourned their loss,
 And strove, in vain, to comfort their dear lord,
 He, all absorbed in sorrow, restless rose
 And paced the sounding floor ; and now he drew Towards the lattice, whose sight overlooked
 The not far distant pile, within whose walls
 His life and love in death's embraces lay.

Lured by the night—for sorrow ever loves
 Her shades congenial—he his mansion left,
 And, unattended, wandered on to where

The cemetery of the minster spread
 Its full green bosom to the shining moon ;
 And, entering on its path, he stood beside
 A monument on which creative Art
 Had placed a lesson for the sons of Grief ;
 For there, erect, sweet-smiling Virtue stood,
 And pointed drooping Sorrow to the skies ;
 Whilst Hope, her fair attending minister,
 Beguiled his pains, and chid away his fears.

There, as the mourner stood, with tearful eye
 Fixed on the portal of that holy place,
 He saw, or thought he saw—for grief is nurse
 To strange imaginations, true and false—
 A figure, like an angel, from the door
 Step out in the broad moonlight, gaze around,
 Then rush close past him down the avenue ;
 All noiselessly her hasty footsteps fell
 As snow upon the waters, and as swift
 As flashing light she vanished from his view.
 Deep-wondering and amazed, awhile he stood
 To see who next might follow ; for he deem'd
 That form divine had fitting company,
 Guardian, or guide angelic ; but no more
 Spirit or angel from the portal came.

Amaz'd, yet undismayed—for sorrow knows
 No fear when all she loves is lost—he stood
 Awhile deep musing, then towards his home
 He turned, and slowly left the sacred place ;
 And now, whilst yet afar, his eye descried
 His late dark mansion lit with many a light,
 As though for Joy's espousals, and his ear
 Caught the strange sounds of frantic merriment,
 Wild laughter's gathering voice, and sobs, and shrieks,
 And sounds of footsteps hurrying to and fro ;
 Doubting which, he stands, and questions much
 If all be not a dream, until renewed,
 Out bursts afresh the frantic echoing cries,
 Quick uttered and repeated. On he flew,
 By anger firm and indignation fired,
 Towards the door, whose entrance, wide agape,
 Told sight, as well as hearing, the abuse
 Of misplaced confidence and trust betrayed.
 Not long debate asks punishment, when wrong
 Is able to redress, so in he ran,
 Drew his bright sword, and rushed amid the throng.

Not he who saw (Ezekiel, prophet holy) in the walls
 Of God's own temple, black idolatry,
 When Israel's elders to the Towers obscure
 Of Moab burnt their incense, wilder stood,
 Or suffered more amazement ; there, as round
 Her frantic maidens stood, or knelt, or lay—
 For joy wears aspects strange and various—Sat his own dear Genora, clad as when
 She died within his arms, or seem'd to die.
 Down from his outstretched arm his gleaming sword Fell to the ground, and hurrying, staggering on,
 O'ercome by glad astonishment, he sunk,
 Full mute and senseless, at the lost one's feet.

Pass we his quick recovery, to tell
 Their joyous greeting, like as when above
 Death-sundered spirits meet, whilst welcome fills
 The starry courts of heaven. The coming day
 Beheld them kneeling at the altar's base,
 Afresh united ; and the Virgin's gift,
 Symbolical of life from death, was shown
 In three fair babes, the Roses of her dream.

CARLYLE'S LECTURES ON HEROES AND HERO-WORSHIP.*

ABOUT a twelvemonth since, Mr. Carlyle delivered six lectures in London, of which the theme was Great Men; the Greatest Men that have illustrated the human race. To methodise his subject, he chose, in the first place, to consider the Hero as a Divinity, the northern Odin forming the type—a personage whose existence is so problematical as easily to admit of mysticism and conjectural speculation. In the second lecture, the Hero is considered as a Prophet; and Mahomet is the specimen selected: not the vulgar Mahound, Terrible, Antichrist—or other Incarnation of the Evil Principle, of Christendom; but a noble personage, full of all great and heroic qualities, whom Mr. Carlyle, fervently admiring himself, would almost persuade his readers to worship. It is true that, in a subsequent lecture, he expresses some doubts and misgivings about the genuine character of the Prophet-Hero; but luckily they did not occur sooner, as that would have spoiled the effect of the lecture, which, as it stands, is highly stimulating. The Hero is next considered as a Poet—the examples being, DANTE and SHAKESPEARE; of whom the most definite thing said is, “As in Homer we may construe old Greece, so in Shakspeare and Dante, after thousands of years, what our modern Europe was in Faith and Practice will still be legible. Dante has given us the Faith, or soul; Shakspeare, in a not less noble way, has given us the Practice, or body. This latter also we were to have; a man was sent for it, the man Shakspeare. . . . The Christian Faith, which was the theme of Dante’s song, had produced this practical life, which Shakspeare was to sing.” This refers to what Mr. Carlyle calls “the chivalry-way of life.”

The Hero as Priest, or rather as a Reformer, is treated of in the characters of Luther and Knox; the first of whom is considered as a Hero indeed, one on whom the destinies of the whole world rested. There is deep moral grandeur in the following passage, which is moreover, like all the lecturer’s best things, plainly and directly spoken:—

The Diet of Worms, Luther’s appearance there on the 17th of April, 1521, may be considered as the greatest scene in Modern European History; the point, indeed, from which the whole subsequent history of civilization takes its rise. After multiplied negotiations, disputations, it had come to this. The young Emperor Charles Fifth, with all the Princes of Germany, Papal nuncios, dignitaries spiritual and temporal, are assembled there; Luther is to appear and answer for himself, whether he will recant or not. The world’s pomp and power sit there on this hand: on that, stands up for God’s Truth, one man, Hans Luther the poor miner’s Son. Friends had reminded him of Huss, advised him not to go; he would not be advised. A large company of friends rode out to meet him, with still more earnest warnings; he answered, “Were there as many Devils in Worms as there are roof-tiles, I would on.” The people, on the morrow, as he went to the Hall of the Diet, crowded the windows and housetops, some of them calling out to him, in solemn words, not to recant: “Whosoever denieth me before men!” they cried to him,—as in a kind of solemn petition and adjuration. Was it not in reality our petition too, the petition of the whole world, lying in dark bondage of soul, paralysed under a black spectral Nightmare and triple-hatted Chimera, calling itself Father in God, and what not! “Free us; it rests with thee; desert us not!” Luther did not desert us. His speech, of two hours, distinguished itself by its respectful, wise and honest tone; submissive to whatsoever could lawfully claim submission, not submissive to any more than that. His writings, he said, were partly his own, partly derived from the Word of God. As to what was his own, human infirmity entered into it; unguarded anger, blindness, many things doubtless which it were a blessing for him could he abolish altogether. But as to what stood on sound truth and the Word of God, he could not recant it. How could he! “Confute me,” he concluded, “by proofs of Scripture, or else by plain just arguments: I cannot recant otherwise. For it is neither safe nor prudent to do aught against conscience. Here stand I; I can do no other: God assist me!”—It is, as we say, the greatest moment in the Modern History of Men. English Puritanism, England and its Parliaments, Americas, and vast work these two centuries; French Revolution, Europe and its work everywhere at present: the germ of it all lay there: had Luther in that moment done other, it had all been otherwise! The European World was asking him: Am I to sink ever lower into falsehood, stagnant putrescence, loathsome accursed death; or, with whatever paroxysm, to cast the falsehoods out of me, and be cured and live!

John Knox and his labours, are somewhat at a discount just now, when we are hearing on every side of a “too much reformation,” and “ultra-Protestantism;” and though the passage we mean to cite is not equal, either in originality, or in racy and peculiar Carlylium to much of the Lectures, we select it partly to serve our own purpose. The lecturer is speaking of Puritanism, and picturesquely describing the embarkation of the Pilgrim Fathers in the Mayflower:—

These men, I think, had a work! The weak thing, weaker than a child, becomes strong one day, if it be a true thing. Puritanism was only despicable, laughable then; but nobody can manage to laugh at it now. Puritanism has got weapons and sinews; it has fire-arms, war-navies; it has cunning in its ten fingers, strength in its right arm: it can steer ships, fell forests, remove mountains;—it is one of the strongest things under this sun at present!

In the history of Scotland too, I can find properly but one epoch: we may say, it contains nothing of world-interest as all but this Reformation by Knox. A poor barren country, full of continual broils, dissensions, massacres; a people in the last state of rudeness and destitution, little better perhaps than Ireland at this day. Hungry fierce barons, not so much as able to form any arrangement with each other how to divide what they fleeced from these poor drudges. . . .

This that Knox did for his Nation, I say, we may really call a resurrection as from death. It was not a smooth business; but it was welcome surely, and cheap at that price, had it been far rougher. On the whole, cheap at any price;—as life is. The people began to live: they needed first of all to do that, at what cost and costs soever. Scotch Literature and Thought, Scotch Industry; James Watt, David Hume, Walter Scott, Robert Burns: I find Knox and the Reformation acting in the heart’s core of every one of these persons and phenomena; I find that without the Reformation they would not have been. Or what of Scotland! The Puritanism of Scotland became that of England, of New England. A tumult in the High Church of Edinburgh spread into a universal battle and struggle over all these realms ; —there came out, after fifty years struggling, what we all call the 'Glorious Revolution,' a Habeas-Corpus Act, Free Parliaments, and much else !—Alas, is it not too true what we said, That many men in the van do always, like Russian soldiers, march into the ditch of Schwiednitz, and fill it up with their dead bodies, that the rear may pass over them dry-shod, and gain the honour ! How many earnest rugged Cromwells, Knoxes, poor Peasant Covenanters, wrestling, battling for very life, in rough miry places, have to struggle, and suffer, and fall, greatly censured, benighted,—before a beautiful Revolution of Eighty-eight can step over them in official pumps and silk-stockings, with universal three-times-three !

It seems to me hard measure that this Scottish man, now after three hundred years, should have to plead like a culprit before the world ; intrinsically for having been, in such way as it was then possible to be, the bravest of all Scotchmen ! Had he been a poor Half-and-half, he could have crouched into the corner, like so many others ; Scotland had not been delivered ; and Knox had been without blame. He is the one Scotchman to whom, of all others, his country and the world owe a debt. He has to plead that Scotland would forgive him for having been worth to it any million 'unblameable' Scotchmen that need no forgiveness ! He bared his breast to the battle ; had to row in French galleys, wander forlorn in exile, in clouds and storms ; was censured, shot at through his windows ; had a right sore fighting life : if this world were his place of recompense, he had made but a bad venture of it. I cannot apologize for Knox. To him it is very indifferent, these two hundred and fifty years or more, what men say of him. But we, having got above all those details of his battle, and living now in clearness on the fruits of his victory, we for our own sake ought to look through the rumours and controversies enveloping the man, into the man himself.

For one thing, I will remark that this post of Prophet to his Nation was not of his seeking ; Knox had lived forty years quietly obscure, before he became conspicuous.

Our primary characteristic of a Hero, that he is sincere, applies emphatically to Knox. It is not denied anywhere that this, whatever might be his other qualities or faults, is among the truest of men. With a singular instinct he holds to the truth and fact ; the truth alone is there for him, the rest a mere shadow and deceptive nonentity.

He is an instance to us how a man, by sincerity itself, becomes heroic : it is the grand gift he has. We find in Knox a good honest intellectual talent, no transcendent one ;—a narrow, inconsiderable man, as compared with Luther : but in heartfelt instinctive adherence to truth, in sincerity, as we say, he has no superior ; nay, one might ask, What equal he has ! The heart of him is of the true Prophet cast. "He lies there," said the Earl of Morton at his grave, "who never feared the face of man." He resembles more than any of the moderns, an Old-Hebrew Prophet. The same inflexibility, intolerance, rigid narrow-looking adherence to God's truth, stern rebuke in the name of God to all that forsake truth : an Old-Hebrew Prophet in the guise of an Edinburgh Minister of the Sixteenth Century. We are to take him for that ; not require him to be other.

Knox's conduct to Queen Mary, the harsh visits he used to make in her own palace, to reprove her there, have been much commented upon. Such cruelty, such coarseness fills us with indignation. On reading the actual narrative of the business, what Knox said, and what Knox meant, I must say one's tragic feeling is rather disappointed. They are not so coarse, these speeches ; they seem to me about as fine as the circumstances would permit ! Knox was not there to do the courtier ; he came on another errand. Whoever, reading these colloquies of his with the Queen, thinks they are vulgar insolences of a plebeian priest to a delicate high lady, mistakes the purport and essence of them altogether. It was unfortunately not possible to be polite with the Queen of Scotland, unless one proved untrue to the Nation and Cause of Scotland. A man who did not wish to see the land of his birth made a hunting-field for intriguing ambitious Guises, and the Cause of God trampled under foot of Falsehoods, Formulas, and the Devil's Cause, had no method of making himself agreeable ! "Better that women weep," said Morton, "than that bearded men be forced to weep." Knox was the constitutional opposition-party in Scotland : the Nobles of the country, called by their station to take that post, were not found in it ; Knox had to go, or no one. The hapless Queen ;—but the still more hapless Country, if she were made happy ! Mary herself was not without sharpness enough, among her other qualities : "Who are you," said she once, "that presume to school the nobles and sovereign of this realm !"—"Madam, a subject born within the same," answered he. Reasonably answered ! If the 'subject' have truth to speak, it is not the 'subject's' footing that will fail him here.

We are tempted to go farther, but resist. It is enough that the appreciation of the Reformer is, in our opinion, as just, as the Vindication is triumphant. Knox is accused of wishing to set up a Theocracy in Scotland ; but, then, it was not a despotism of Synods and Assemblies that he meant by "Thy kingdom come."

He did mean that Kings and Prime Ministers, and all manner of persons, in public or private, diplomatising or whatever else they might be doing, should walk according to the Gospel of Christ, and understand that this was their Law, supreme over all laws. He hoped once to see such a thing realized ; and the Petition, Thy Kingdom come, no longer an empty word. He was sore grieved when he saw greedy worldly Barons clutch hold of the Church's property ; when he expostulated that it was not secular property, that it was spiritual property, and should be turned to true churchly uses, education, schools, worship.

The Hero as a Man of Letters, is represented by JOHNSON, BURNS, and ROUSSEAU ; and as a King, by CROMWELL and NAPOLEON. Of Cromwell, the Lecturer is neither the advocate nor apologist. There is, according to him, nothing to extenuate, nothing to vindicate. Cromwell should not have been other than he was, or done other than he did ; not that the end justified the means, but that the means also were right. "Free parliament," "right of election," and all such "constitutional formulas," are regarded with contempt ; and might become right in "the Hero as a King." Yet even this estimate of the great Regicide and Usurper is error on the good side.

Mr. Carlyle has often spoken of Burns, and never better than when of him, or than here ; and with all those crank sayings that are repeated, and re-repeated, till one becomes a little tired withal, iteration on this theme never wearies. But Johnson is a fresher topic ; and there is less exaggeration either in the sentiments or the language in which Johnson and Burns are described, than in the portraits of the more illustrious heroes.

As for Johnson, I have always considered him to be, by nature, one of our great English souls. A strong and noble man ; so much left undeveloped in him to the last : in a kindlier element what might he not have been,—Poet, Priest, sovereign Ruler ! On the whole, a man must not complain of his 'element,' of his 'time,' or the like ; it is thriftless work doing so. His time is bad : well then, he is there to make it better !—Johnson's youth was poor, isolated, hopeless, very miserable. Indeed, it does not seem possible that, in any the favourable outward circumstances, Johnson's life could have been other than a painful one. The world might have had more of profitable work out of him, or less; but his effort against the world's work could never have been a light one. Nature, in return for his nobleness, had said to him, Live in an element of diseased sorrow. Nay, perhaps the sorrow and the nobleness were intimately and even inseparably connected with each other. At all events, poor Johnson had to go about girt with continual hypochondria, physical and spiritual pain. Like a Hercules with the burning Nessus'-shirt on him, which shoots in on him dull incurable misery: the Nessus'-shirt not to be stript off, which is his own natural skin! In this manner, he had to live. Figure him there, with his scrofulous diseases, with his great greedy heart, and unspeakable chaos of thoughts; stalking mournful as a stranger in this Earth; eagerly devouring what spiritual thing he could come at: school-languages and other merely grammatical stuff, if there were nothing better! The largest soul that was in all England; and provision made for it of 'fourpence halfpenny a day.' Yet a giant invincible soul; a true man's. One remembers always that story of the shoes at Oxford: the rough, seamy-faced, rawboned College Servitor stalking about, in winter-season, with his shoes worn out; how the charitable Gentleman Commoner secretly places a new pair at his door; and the rawboned Servitor, lifting them, looking at them near, with his dim eyes, with what thoughts,—pitches them out of window! Wet feet, mud, frost, hunger or what you will; but not beggary: we cannot stand beggary! Rude stubborn self-help here; a whole world of squalor, rudeness, confused misery and want, yet of nobleness and manfulness withal. It is a type of the man's life, this pitching away of the shoes. An original man;—not a secondhand, borrowing or begging man. Let us stand on our own basis, at any rate! On such shoes as we ourselves can get. On frost and mud, if you will, but honestly on that;—on the reality and substance which Nature gives us, not on the semblance, on the thing she has given another than us!—

In the following remarks on Johnson's style, Mr. Carlyle makes at once the apology of his Hero and himself:—

They are sincere words, those of his; he means things by them. A wondrous buckram style,—the best he could get to then; a measured grandiloquence, stepping or rather stalking along in a very solemn way, grown obsolete now; sometimes a tumid size of phraseology not in proportion to the contents of it: all this you will put up with. For the phraseology, tumid or not, has always something within it. So many beautiful styles, and books, with nothing in them;—a man is a malefactor to the world who writes such! They are the avoidable kind!

We should hope that no one will get alarmed at Mr. Carlyle promulgating (philosophically) latitudinarianism; at his clasping, in the wide embrace of universal charity, all the forms of ancient Paganism and idolatrous superstition; the bastard Christianity of Mahomet; and even Popery itself: seeing good in everything, save only in the utilitarianism of Bentham and Paley. He, however, places religion deeper in the heart and soul of all men than this original principle of our nature is imagined to lie, even by the most orthodox. Here is his idea of religion—

It is well said, in every sense, that a man's religion is the chief fact with regard to him; a man's, or a nation of men's. By religion I do not mean here the church-creed which he professes, the articles of faith which he will sign and, in words or otherwise, assert; not this wholly, in many cases not this at all. We see men of all kinds of professed creeds attain to almost all degrees of worth or worthlessness under each or any of them. This is not what I call religion, this profession and assertion; which is often only a profession and assertion from the outworks of the man, from the mere argumentative region of him, if even so deep as that. But the thing a man does practically believe, (and this is often enough without asserting it even to himself, much less to others,) the thing a man does practically lay to heart, and know for certain, concerning his vital relations to this mysterious Universe, and his duty and destiny there, that is in all cases the primary thing for him, and creatively determines all the rest. That is his religion; or, it may be, his mere scepticism and no-religion: the manner it is in which he feels himself to be spiritually related to the Unseen World or No-world; and I say, if you tell me what that is, you tell me to a very great extent what the man is, what the kind of things he will do is. Of a man or of a nation we inquire, therefore, first of all, What religion they had? Was it Heathenism,—plurality of gods, mere sensuous representation of this Mystery of Life, and for chief recognised element therein Physical Force? Was it Christianity; faith in an Invisible, not as real only, but as the only reality; Time, through every meanest moment of it, resting on Eternity; Pagan empire of Force displaced by a nobler supremacy, that of Holiness? Was it Scepticism, uncertainty and inquiry whether there was an Unseen World, any Mystery of Life except a bad one;—doubt as to all this, or perhaps unbelief and flat denial! Answering of this question is giving us the soul of the history of the man or nation. The thoughts they had were the parents of the actions they did; their feelings were parents of their thoughts: it was the unseen spiritual in them that determined the outward and actual;—their religion, as I say, was the great fact about them.

Some speculators have a short way of accounting for the Pagan religion: mere quackery, priestcraft, and dupery, say they; no sane man ever did believe it,—merely contrived to persuade other men, not worthy of the name of sane, to believe it! It will be often our duty to protest against this sort of hypothesis about men's doings and history; and I here, on the very threshold, protest against it in reference to Paganism, and to all other isms by which man has ever for a length of time striven to walk in this world. They have all had a truth in them, or men would not have taken them up. Quackery and dupery do abound; in religions, above all in the more advanced decaying stages of religions, they have fearfully abounded: but quackery was never the originating influence in such things; it was not the health and life of such things, but their disease, the sure precursor of their being about to die! Let us never forget this. It seems to me a most mournful hypothesis, that of quackery giving birth to any faith even in savage men. Quackery gives birth to nothing; gives death to all. We shall not see into the true heart of anything, if we look merely at the quackeries of it; if we do not reject the quackeries altogether; as mere diseases, corruptions, with which our and all men's sole duty is to have done with them, to sweep them out of our thoughts as out of our practice. Man everywhere is the born enemy of lies. I find Grand Lamaism itself to have a kind of truth in it. Read the candid, clear-sighted, rather sceptical Mr. Hamilton's Travels into that country, and see. They have their belief, these poor Thibet people, that Providence sends down always an Incarnation of Himself into every generation. At bottom some belief in a kind of Pope! At bottom still better, belief that there is a Greatest Man; that he is discoverable; that, once discovered, we ought to treat him with an obedience which knows no bounds! This is the truth of Grand Lamaism; the 'discoverability' is the only error here. The Thibet Priests have methods of their own of discovering what Man is Greatest, fit to be supreme over them. Bad methods: but are they so much worse than our methods,—of understanding him to be always the eldest-born of a certain genealogy?

The discourse on Mahomet brings out these bold opinions more definitely. Of this (next to the Pope) greatest bugbear of the reformed religious world he says—

We have chosen Mahomet not as the most eminent

Prophet; but as the one we are freest to speak of. He is by no means the truest of Prophets; but I do esteem him a true one. Farther, as there is no danger of our becoming, any of us, Mahometans, I mean to say all the good of him I justly can. It is the way to get at his secret: let us try to understand what he meant with the world; what the world meant and means with him, will then be a more answerable question. Our current hypothesis about Mahomet, that he was a scheming Impostor, a Falsehood incarnate, that his religion is a mere mass of quackery and fatuity, begins really to be now untenable to any one. The lies, which well-meaning zeal has heaped round this man, are disgraceful to ourselves only. When Pococke inquired of Grotius, Where the proof was of that story of the pigeon, trained to pick peas from Mahomet's ear, and pass for an angel dictating to him! Grotius answered that there was no proof! It is really time to dismiss all that. The word this man spoke has been the life-guidance now of one hundred and eighty millions of men these twelve hundred years. These hundred and eighty millions were made by God as well as we. A greater number of God's creatures believe in Mahomet's word at this hour than in any other word whatever. Are we to suppose that it was a miserable piece of spiritual legerdemain, this which so many creatures of the Almighty have lived by and died by! I, for my part, cannot form any such supposition. I will believe most things sooner than that. One would be entirely at a loss what to think of this world at all, if quackery so grew and were sanctioned here.

Alas, such theories are very lamentable. If we would attain to knowledge of anything in God's true Creation, let us disbelieve them wholly! They are the product of an Age of Scepticism; indicate the saddest spiritual paralysis, and mere death-life of the souls of men: more godless theory, I think, was never promulgated in this Earth. A false man found a religion! Why, a false man cannot build a brick house! If he do not know and follow truly the properties of mortar, burnt clay and what else he works in, it is no house that he makes, but a rubbish-heap. It will not stand for twelve centuries, to lodge a hundred and eighty millions; it will fall straightway.

This is pushing matters far enough, but there is no retrocession. Mahomet is believed to have possessed the first and final faculty of a Hero-sincerity; without which there can be no great man.

It appears to us that Mr. Carlyle makes no distinction between the quality, which he terms sincerity, and what other people usually term energy—downright earnestness, though there should not always be integrity of purpose, guiding its strong aims. But though his meanings are not difficult to discover, to those who for a few minutes study his cypher, it is not easy to perceive any well-defined basis upon which his vague doctrines rest. In nautical language, we never get into soundings. What are people of plain understanding to make of what follows, concerning the type of every Hero, be he Prophet, original Hero, the Prophet, or Poet, or King.

Really his utterances, are they not a kind of 'revelation';—what we must call such for want of some other name! It is from the heart of the world that he comes; he is portion of the primal reality of things. God has made many revelations: but this man too, has not God made him, the latest and newest of all! The 'inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding: we must listen before all to him.

This Mahomet, then, we will in no wise consider as an Inanity and Theatricality, a poor conscious ambitious schemer; we cannot conceive him so. The rude message he delivered was a real one withal; an earnest confused voice from the unknown Deep. The man's words were not false, nor his workings here below; no Inanity and mulacrum; a fiery mass of Life cast up from the great bosom of Nature herself. To kindle the world; the world's Maker had ordered it so. Neither can the faults, imperfections, insincerities even, of Mahomet, if such were ever so well proved against him, shake this primary fact about him.

On the whole, we make too much of faults; the details of the business hide the real centre of it. Faults! The greatest of faults, I should say, is to be conscious of none. Readers of the Bible above all, one would think, might know better. Who is called there 'the man according to God's own heart! David, the Hebrew King, had fallen into sins enough; blackest crimes; there was no want of sins. And thereupon the unbelievers sneer and ask, Is this your man according to God's heart! The sneer, I must say, seems to me but a shallow one. What are faults, what are the outward details of a life; if the inner secret of it, the remorse, temptations, true, often-baffled, never-ended struggle of it, be forgotten! 'It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.'

One may be thankful to fall back upon the compact mechanical "Benthamee Philosophy," or to repose in security against the rooted moral standards of Paley, and obtain firm footing. The hazy generalities, in which Mr. Carlyle often indulges, sometimes become, in the printed page, tiresome, though no such effect may have been experienced from his verbal iteration.

This final eloquent eulogium upon the faith of Islam, is at least exempt from glaring Carlylisms of manner:—

Call it not false; look not at the falsehood of it, look at the truth of it. For these twelve centuries, it has been the religion and life-guidance of the fifth part of the whole kindred of Mankind. Above all things it has been a religion heartily believed. These Arabs believe their religion, and try to live by it! No Christians, since the early ages, or only perhaps the English Puritans in modern times, have ever stood by their Faith as the Moslem do by theirs,—believing it wholly, fronting Time with it, and Eternity with it. This night the watchman on the streets of Cairo when he cries, "Who goes!" will hear from the passenger, along with his answer, "There is no God but God." Allah akbar, Islam, sounds through the souls, and whole daily existence of these dusky millions. Zealous missionaries preach it abroad among Malays, black Papuans, brutal Idolaters;—displacing what is worse, nothing that is better or good.

To the Arab Nation it was as a birth from darkness into light; Arabia first became alive by means of it. A poor shepherd people, roaming unnoticed in its deserts since the creation of the world: a Hero-Prophet was sent down to them with a word they could believe: see, the unnoticed becomes world-notable, the small has grown world-great; within one century afterwards, Arabia is at Grenada on this hand, at Delhi on that;—glancing in valour and splendour and the light of genius, Arabia shines through long ages over a great section of the world. Belief is great, life-giving. The history of a Nation becomes fruitful, soul-elevating, great, so soon as it believes. These Arabs, the man Mahomet, and that one century,—is it not as if a spark had fallen, one spark, on a world of what seemed black unnoticeable sand; but lo, the sand proves explosive powder, blazes heaven-high from Delhi to Grenada! I said, the Great Man was always as lightning out of Heaven; the rest of men waited for him like fuel, and then they too would flame.

As purely literary sketches, the life and character of Mahomet—the "deep-hearted son of the wilderness, with his beaming black eyes"—and of Dante, "with his proud earnest nature, and moody humours"—have great beauty; but it is with BURNS, and JOHNSON, and LUTHER, and KNOX, that the lecturer is in genial brotherhood—seeing with their deep eyes, feeling with their strong hearts. About Shakspeare he has attempted more, and achieved less. The subject is beset with difficulties, and in one sense trite and exhausted. For some centuries to come it were, perhaps, best to leave it to "expressive silence." But something, if not new in idea, is very happily said; and we are more and more convinced that Wordsworth's theory, in imagining that the low humours and wild horse-play of Shakspeare were foisted in by some inferior person to please the audience in the twopenny gallery, augurs a lamentable deficiency in the Poet of the Lakes; an incompleteness of faculty, and the hardness of a dry "pint pot." Mr. Carlyle is referring to Shakspeare's delineations of great, suffering, heroic hearts—to those of Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, when he proceeds—

And now, in contrast with all this, observe his mirthfulness, his genuine overflowing love of laughter! You would say, in no point does he exaggerate but only in laughter. Fiery oburgations, words that pierce and burn, are to be found in Shakspeare: yet he is always in measure here; never what Johnson would remark as a specially 'good hater.' But his laughter seems to pour from him in floods; he heaps all manner of ridiculous nicknames on the butt, tumbles and tosses him in all sorts of horse-play; you would say, roars and laughs. And then, if not always the finest, it is always a genial laughter. Not at mere weakness, at misery or poverty; never. No man who can laugh, what we call laughing, will laugh at these things. It is some poor character only desiring to laugh, and have the credit of wit, that does so. Laughter means sympathy; good laughter is not 'the crackling of thorns under the pot.' Even at stupidity and pretension this Shakspeare does not laugh otherwise than genially. Dogberry and Verges tickle our very hearts, and we dismiss them covered with explosions of laughter: but we like the poor fellows only the better for our laughing; and hope that they will get on well there, and continue Presidents of the City-Watch.—Such laughter, like sunshine on the deep sea, is very beautiful to me.

The reader may now, if he possessed any previous knowledge of Mr. Carlyle's manner, have a fair idea of this new work. It is original in manner if not in thought, and out of the order of common-place books. There is fervour in its tone, which feels as if it came direct from the heart; and there is moral courage, though it requires more courage in our society to attack one social abuse than fifty doctrinal systems.

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE Herberts had now for above three months been denizens of the Chelsea box; Herbert meanwhile steadily pursuing the studies connected with his intended profession for five-and-a-half days in the week, and joining the fair part of his family early on Saturdays, when the happiness of a life seemed concentrated into two bright days. The arrangement had in prospect been painful to each of the three, though none of them had openly grumbled; for this sacrifice was part of the reasonable price of future happiness; nay, in the elastic mind of Violet, regret had quickly risen to hope. "Since Mr. Gryphon says so, who is so sensible, and so friendly—" She hesitated. "And you will come so early on Saturday afternoons?—and perhaps I may tempt Mrs. Herbert to walk a short way with me to meet you."

"And perhaps I may be tempted to make a run out for a breath of pure air, and to bask myself in my mother's smiles and yours on some intermediate day of the week."

"That would be such pleasure,—if Mr. Gryphon thought it right!—or perhaps whether he did or not,—he is an old gentleman and never was married."

"And the most absolute fellow in the world,—with him no make-believe law students, no macadamized or royal road to the woolsack,—tough work—hard and long—but in my case so much to sweeten it!"

"But you may surely, when you close your books, write a little note every night, just to say you are well, and love us—and good-by till Saturday. How I shall long for that day!"

"And I more—and perhaps be miserable from idle apprehensions. Yet how gladly, a year since, would I have compounded for this free and happy, and confiding, if limited, enjoyment of your society;" and as he pressed her to his breast, repining was converted into cheerful thankfulness.

Yet the first week appeared very long to every one, though lightened by the interchange of several notes, sometimes on pretence of business; and at length the rapturous reunions of Saturday and Sunday seemed cheaply purchased by the previous self-denial of the week; and enjoyment sweetened by toil, and sanctioned by self-approving conscience, possessed double zest.

It was, we are sorry to say, somewhat difficult for Mrs. Herbert to persuade Charles to lose, as he irreverently said, so much of his precious day in listening to some long hum-drum sermon, or suffering his wife to do so; yet he appeared at the church of his new neighbours, and found the sermon not so very hum-drum; and, as he walked home between the two ladies, whose appearance attracted no small portion of curiosity and admiration, he experienced somewhat of the first-felt emotions of a family-man—of one who had given hostages to society, and who thence ascribed more importance to its opinions, and became more entitled to, and tenacious of, its respect.

The history of the new family was soon understood in its outline. A lately-married couple, and a lady-like mother—probably the wife's mother—reduced in fortune, but still in respectable circumstances; lived very quietly; but were sometimes visited by carriage-people; and paid everything ready money. Birds of the air, or those who in great towns supply their place, servants, charwomen, and milkmen, carried round such matters; and none of them lessened the interest and favorable opinion created by the appearance of strangers. Though Mrs. Herbert had used a little gentle persuasion to make her son not "leave the parson in the lurch, and slip away with Sally," she only smiled when, sotto voce, over their dessert of late gooseberries, and early plums from their own garden-wall, he chanted this old ditty in Violet's ear—

"Of all the days that's in the week,
I dearly love but one day—
And that's the day that comes betwixt
The Saturday and Monday.
For then I'm drest in all my best,
To walk abroad with Sally;
O! she's the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley."

"Mother—Violet, my sweetie," said Herbert in the gayest spirits, "a new life opens up to us. We begin to discover in what the pleasures of the poor consist; and this of the Sunday rest is surely among the most exquisite. There is no real Sabbath for the rich and idle. This is almost my first true Sunday.—Mother, let me fill up your glass; surely you, whom the doctor used to allow two-and-a-half glasses of sherry every day at dinner, may still take two on Sunday."

"I shall do anything you please, Charles; but pray do not sing quite so loud. The new housemaid is a Scotch girl, and a very nice one, whom good Mrs. Linton has found for us."

"And therefore must have some sentiment—some poetry in her, and so will forgive my involuntary Sabbath breach."

"Thank you, in name of my ancestral country, Charles," said Violet; "but how come the Scotch by it?"

"Probably because they are not, like my countrymen, better fed than taught; because, instead of fat bacon and dough bullets, they have songs, tales, and ballads for their sole second course,—instead of the Sunday pudding, merely intellectual fare; and not troubling themselves too much about shoe-ties, close shaving, and patent blacking, have leisure for higher imaginings."

"I can scarce, however, thank you, Charles, for your reasons why England has never shown one finer sample of the brotherhood of Burns. But now that Mrs. Herbert has left us, do you not think she is looking quite charming? so much more alacrity of spirits and movement about her; and strength will come. She can now walk a mile without much fatigue. She has gone down stairs to superintend the Scotch girl—she is a bonnie, sonsie, golden-haired lassie, is she not?—in preparing your coffee, which she has been teaching her all the week; and so pleased Mrs. Herbert seems with every little household duty. She is quite of those women—the most charming of all—whose happy destiny is to minister to those they love; and it seems only now that she has discovered her true vocation."

This languid lady had, indeed, by the spiring of her more energetic youthful companion, soon discovered that she was both equal to, and fit for, more important duties than suffering herself to be dressed, tending exotic plants, and doing very small quantities of very delicate needlework, to the injury of her soft eyes; but neither were these pretty avocations abandoned. Mrs. Herbert was, by natural taste, and English training, a lover of order, neatness, and elegance; and her Indian habits had made her, even in her most dissipated London seasons, an early riser: a custom of incalculable advantage in a small household like what her's had become, and in which the inmates are so happy as to be able to dispense with what in England is somehow felt the bane of all domestic ease—the necessity of much adventitious help. Her servants consisted of the young countrywoman of Marion, too fresh from her native dales to have fathomed or measured accurately that awful gulf which separates the different orders of womanhood in city-life; and a middle-aged solitary Irish widow, who had acted as char-woman about the former establishment, of whom Mrs. Herbert might never have seen nor heard, save for the accident which gained the family, in its changed circumstance, a most loyal, faithful, and useful ally and follower. One night, this poor woman, when leaving her daily drudgery in Mrs. Herbert's basement floor, to return to her distant home in the city, had been rode over by the cabriolet of Sir George Lees, and seriously hurt. The humane attention of Herbert, who happened to come up as the reckless charioteer drove on, made an indelible impression upon her wigm and grateful Irish heart. Her national acuteness and affectionate curiosity about her friends' affairs had not failed to perceive what she considered the helplessness of the family at that general breaking-up, which, as is usual, had been much more freely and fully discussed in the kitchen and scullery than in the parlour; and there were disinterestedness and true generosity in the motives which led Bridget Moran to entreat Violet, or "the young mistress, his honour's own lady," that she might be retained in any and every capacity, giving Mrs. Marion, at the same time, voluble assurance that she would be "worth her morsel of mate, and was no mighty or nice ater, and her room on the flure-head, any way." Charles Herbert soon pronounced Biddy worthy of the cordon bleu. It was as fortunate for him, that he had never been, even in affectation, much of a gourmand, as for the ladies of the family, that they found so faithful a domestic, to come, at first brush, between fishmongers, butchers, and green-grocers, and their ignorance or delicacy. Their successive blunders in marketing furnished so many merry jokes to be kept over for Saturday, that Herbert almost regretted when the office of purveyor was on the third week fully devolved on their "Widow Cheerly," to the manifest improvement of the family fare, and the diminution of the weekly bills.

Mrs. Marion had made them several visits; on each occasion forwarded, as far as possible, per 'bus, and freighted, like some richly laden galliot, with things useful and things desirable; and as often had she, though only on urgent entreaty, looked into the most minute details of their economy; while to the most liberal and hearty praise she generally added a few hints for farther improvement, which were intelligently caught by the anxious young house-wife. Every indication of the new settled family was hopeful ; for though Mrs. Herbert still secretly retained her undefined horror of omnibuses, she had become a determined pedestrian ; and, to the delight of Violet, had laughed most naturally and heartily one morning, on catching herself saying, " Mary, order ' carriage ! " instead of, " Mary, get me my clogs ! " There were other hopeful signs. On the third Monday of Herbert's periodical visits home, Mr. Gryphon lost a bet of a dinner and wine to the gentleman who assisted or superintended Herbert's legal studies, taken that he would not appear before ten o'clock ; and Gryphon was pleased to lose it, when certified that the married law-student had actually appeared before nine o'clock !

" His wife must have carried him," said the shrewd, good-humoured solicitor. " These young people have sense and energy—if they have patience too, there is no fear of them. I always liked Herbert, and now I am in love with his wife."

Nor were Mrs. Herbert's mortifying anticipations of the desertion of her " dear five hundred friends " altogether realized. Adversity served to winnow the wheat from the chaff. Bulk, not value, was lost. Those whom she had liked the best came as formerly ; and of ladies of curious dispositions, and active visiting habits, with the command of a carriage, more than enough. A good many of one description of matrons—those whose hands and heads were full of disposable daughters—gave her up kindly, for it was at once. Not only had she lost her fortune, poor woman !—which for so good a creature was a sad pity—but her handsome and fashionable son had also lost his expectations, and rendered every misfortune irretrievable, by an odd, imprudent marriage with an actress or singer, or something that way, which had nigh broken his step-mother's heart. Herbert had been inveigled at the parties of those dashing Cryppes or Barkers, whose soirées were in such vogue with foreigners and the junior club men. The girl was said to be connected with the Tarbert family—most likely a natural daughter, as the Earl was a man of notorious gallantry, and as Herbert was now prosecuting him for a fortune promised with her. So matronhood, in its active sphere, gave up the Mesdames Herbert, younger and elder ; though the former, when seen, was generally allowed to be a pretty person—engaging, nay fascinating, like so many of those half-foreigners. Violet had, however, one warm patroness among the fashionable matronage. This was the Honourable Mrs. Brabazon, the wife of a general-officer now in India, —who, kept on very short allowance by the gambling propensities of her husband, was exerting all her skill and industry to repair the family fortunes, by educating three very pretty daughters for the matrimonial bazaar of Calcutta ; unable, from want of money or connexions, to afford them, advantageously, the ordinary chances of the London market. When Professor Cryppes was at the extreme height of his musical popularity, this lady, as a measure of good policy, had incurred the expense of getting lessons from him for her second daughter, who displayed decided musical taste. And she was now not slow to perceive the advantages which the instructions and example of his former pupil might afford to her family. After a few calls of vehement, peremptory friendship on her friend Mrs. Herbert, she managed to leave her girls three or four times a-week, " to amuse themselves with a little music " with Mrs. Charles ; while, with the appearance of the person conferring a kindness with the utmost delicacy, she drove out the elder, greatly-obliged lady for the airing, so necessary to her health, wherever her own business or inclination led. Violet felt most grateful for this considerate attention to Mrs. Herbert's comforts and tastes, which she laboured in some degree to requite, by her own anxious attention to the improvement of the young ladies, which she admired their mother for having had so much at heart. This system of lunching and instructing the Misses Brabazon, in requital for a drive, had gone on for a good many weeks, and appeared to be considered a fixed thing. Saturday was alone an inviolable day.

Mrs. Herbert, however, by some perversity, began to consider her airings a bondage, and to fancy Violet's share of the very frequent musical meetings a drudging task. Neither of the ladies were the most penetrating of women into double-minded motives ; yet some unpleasant surmises were arising in both their minds, to which the forwardness of the zealous Bridget, and the outspokenness of Mrs. Marion gave distinct shape. By character and position the Scotchwoman was a privileged person in the family ; and Bridget maintained an equal right, in virtue of her national humour. One sultry day, Marion arrived, just as Mrs. Herbert and her patroness returned from their customary airing ; and as Mrs. and the three Misses Brabazon and their loads of music disappeared, with many caressing and affectionate adieus, and an appointment for next day's exercise. Biddy the Irish cook and Marion had probably before this compared notes, and come to their own conclusions ; and now both agreed that Mrs. Charles was looking pale and exhausted, and, as Marion said shilpit, and that the perpetual Brabazons were smooth-faced, arrant encroachers. Marion, always welcome, had scarcely sat down with the ladies, and unloosed her bonnet strings and budget of intelligence, when Biddy, by pre-concert, entered unsummoned, to clear away the wrecks of the simple but ample luncheon of bread, butter, and homely preserves, to which the young ladies had been doing honour. She was either in a cross-humour, or else it was her cue to affect this, to her, unnatural state. She fancied her young mistress looking particularly exhausted, after the two hours' singing lessons she had been giving.

" Mrs. Brazenbones will surely be thinking of allowing the mistress a trifle board," said Biddy, winking knowingly to Marion ; " and yourself, ma'am dear, (to Violet,) something for schooling the young misses. Bless them ! but it's brave, hearty stomachs they have for the bit of white bread and butter, and lay it on handsome under the jam, as young craturs naturally will do ;—but as for the ould one, though it's not a servant's business, to be sure, to put in a word"—

"Whist, Biddy," said Violet, earnestly; afraid that Mrs. Herbert might be offended by the woman's freedom, and somewhat shocked at her zealous servitor's indelicacy, which yet had a colour of reason in it.

"Mrs. Browbazon is one of the leddies that makes their father's dochter welcome to whatever they have a mind to, come frae where it like, and at whoever's expense," said Marion humorously, but sharply withal; and Violet, lest worse might chance, glided away, to stop the tongue of Biddy, who rarely presumed to address Mrs. Herbert directly.

"So you think Mrs. Charles is looking ill, Bridget?" said Marion, leading directly to the point, and aware that she addressed the experienced "mother of seven childre, blest be their rest!" a fact of which Biddy never failed to apprise her friends and sympathizers, at least once at every interview.

"Looking ill she never did, ma'am; but looking poor she does, ma'am," replied Biddy, still apparently busy with knives and butter plates; "and small blame to her, slaving and drilling of them misses in the way she is in. Meeself would rather stand a day at the wash-tub, than be scraiming at that jingle-jangle piany."

Farther explanatory information, whatever its nature might be, was conveyed in a low confidential whisper, though as much was left to the illustrative nods and becks, as to the Queen's Anglo-Irish; and whatever it was, and though it ended in a broad grin, reciprocated by a sympathetic, broader, gladdening smile from Marion, it made Mrs. Herbert change colour, and seem thoughtful.

"I have been unpardonably thoughtless and careless, I fear," she said, as she hastened to seek her daughter, on whom, for the remainder of the day, and for many days, her looks hung in constant, tender watchfulness.—Meanwhile, she had made another happy discovery, to which she was helped by indignation at her friend Mrs. Brabazon. Her "shattered nervous system," which, for many years, had required an annual bracing at Brighton or Leamington, or wherever her fashionable physician divined that her inclination pointed for the season, and anywhere between Scarborough and Clifton, was this year wonderfully improved. It might be the quiet, the gardening, the freer enjoyment of the open air, pedestrian exercise, and her delightful domestic companionship; but whatever were the cause, the happy fact was indisputable, that Mrs. Herbert, in her adversity, was in better health and spirits than in any summer since her marriage, or for fifteen years!

"I flatter myself that I shall be able to be head nurse to our baby," said she, when, smilingly, next morning, Violet complimented her on looking so blooming, after an hour's work in the garden before breakfast. At that meal she proposed that Violet should walk with her to a neighbouring nursery, about some horticultural business.

"You forget that Mrs. Brabazon is to take you an airing to-day."

"Not that she announced that intention; but I am otherwise engaged, and cannot accept her kind offer. That encroaching woman!—so polite withal—make me her tool in converting you into a music-mistress without fees! I have learned that she has long since discharged Cryppes, if, indeed, a nobleman's father-in-law can now condescend to give lessons; at any rate, yesterday I took shame to myself, under the handsome, indirect reproaches of Marion and Biddy. Come, my dear, I am coward enough to wish to be out of the way ere Mrs. Brabazon and her young ladies appear. I never was good at saying no to any one, though quite alive to the kind of cool people, who, in all civility, will only the more encroach on one's good nature, the readier the dupe submits. Come,—I must for once and again prevent your 'musical enjoyment,' as Mrs. Brabazon terms these drudging lessons to her daughters."

"I wish any one fancied me good enough to give their daughters lessons, and to pay me for it," said Violet, half laughingly, as if feeling her way. "I should consider it no drudgery, but honourable employment; and to be able to add something to the general family stock,—that would, indeed, be happiness! If Mr. Cryppes is leaving off pupils, perhaps"——

"Do not speak of such a thing, my love," interrupted Mrs. Herbert, hastily; "my son would be more shocked than even I am by such an idea; you do not know the English world yet, my dear Violet, nor the morbid pride of many, nay, of all husbands."

Violet could not fully believe this of her own husband, who, if not always quite a philosopher in his conduct, often now spoke, and seemed to think and feel like one.

"Men make beneficial use of their talents," she replied, "without reproach or disparagement; why not women, who often so much more require to do so? A public singer I never could have been—for that nature created me unfit; but to give young girls like the Brabazons lessons in a liberal and delightful art, if, happily, I were qualified for the task:"——

"To your own girls, when we get them, my dear, and to none else, save in kindness;" and Violet, blushing in sweet consciousness, rose to get her bonnet, not ill pleased to-day to escape the fatigue of lesson-giving, while her friend continued—"I am determined that Mrs. Brabazon, at any rate, shall not swindle you out of your time so very often, and use me as the pretext. The amateurs, like you, Violet, must not injure the regular professors. If she will have her daughters highly accomplished musicians, let her pay for it; and if she cannot afford that, and maintain her present style of life, let her change it as we have done. I have sympathy with poor mothers, ambitious for the improvement of their children, but only contempt for the proud mean."

"But we speak not of them, but of honest people," said Violet, bringing the lady back to the subject at her heart. "Could it be wrong in me, for example, with some talents, and abundant leisure ——?"

"I know what you would say; I am not arguing, and do not pretend to say what is right and what is wrong in this and many other matters, though there is more wrong in society, perhaps, than I once imagined; but I know that the woman who turns her talents to any profitable purpose, is, in some occult sense—I own I do not comprehend how it is—but she is, in our society, degraded. You must have observed, what I have often heard remarked, that governesses and female teachers have fewer chances of respectable marriage than idle and less-educated, or ill-educated girls of the same rank. I neither pretend to explain nor justify; I state a simple fact, notorious in England and everywhere else.”

“Well and true—but you must submit to rule, nevertheless. And now prepare for our walk, lest Mrs. Brabazon surprise and make us captive after all.”

“But I should like the young ladies to come sometimes; I hope I do them some little good, and so little in that way is in my power.”

“Indeed, Violet, you are an arrant simpleton; but make haste, pray.”

The ladies were in the hall, sallying out as Mrs. Brabazon and her fair covey alighted at the little gate, their footman bearing the usual load of music-books.

Mrs. Herbert, who was, indeed, unless when inspired by passion, indifferently gifted with the useful power of civilly saying No, endeavoured to look gay and disengaged, but determined.

“I have issued an imperial ukase, forbidding music in this house until after tea, any day, and then only in moderation. I am not of those ladies—frequent though they be—who monopolize all the music of the house for the inmates, and who never seem to fancy that their visitors know a note. I regard music as a social pleasure; but, in the meanwhile, my daughter must forgive me for depriving her and your young ladies of its enjoyment, since it is for her good. In the present delicate state of Violet’s health, so much difficult music is, I am convinced, too exciting; besides, it makes her neglect proper exercise. She was my trainer in pedestrianism, now I mean to be hers. My son will be home to-morrow, and I must have his wife in her best looks, as well as in her finest voice: both demand repose. We can hardly invite you to walk in.”

Mrs. Brabazon was disconcerted, but could not well seem angry. The second Miss Brabazon was offended, and did not try to disguise her displeasure. She had intended to rehearse once more something in which she was almost perfect, and meant to sing that evening at a distinguished juvenile party.

“How cruel you are! my dear Mrs. Herbert,” said the mother. “My Emma will be so disappointed; she finds no voice so truly in accord with her own as that of Mrs. Charles,—neither her sisters nor her young friends. I must beg for the reversal of this decree; and I cannot let you off from your airing. Mrs. Charles must not be disappointed. It is too cruel to restrict her. Is it not, my dear Mrs. Charles?”

Before Violet could do more than smile in reply, the dashing equipage of Mrs. Burke Barker, which put to shame Mrs. Brabazon’s quiet Quaker-looking chariot, drove up to the little gate with the fury which bespoke the dignity and importance of those within.

“Two carriages at mi ladi’s dure at the same minit!” cried Biddy Moran, with a natural swell of exultation. “I hope the neighbour girls see them.”

“Professor Cryppes and his daughters,” faltered Violet, as the proud Professor, with a daughter on each arm, advanced smiling and courteously bending his head up the little garden-path. “Yes, it must be Emmy,” continued Violet to Mrs. Herbert; “is she not a lovely creature?”—and before the words were out, the young countess had broken loose from her papa, and bounded like a fawn into Violet’s arms, all dimpled smiles and graciousness.

“Ah, I see you don’t remember me—I remember you so well, though. I am Emmeline”—the countess did not add Cryppes—“They call me Lady St. Edward now—but I love you as much as ever.”

The whisper was not lost upon any one of the group of ladies, who now understood that they had in presence the thrice-fortunate heroine of the tale of scandal, which had lately interested the whole fashionable world. Their keen examination was quite as ardent as well-bred.

The Professor was hard at his daughter’s back, and tried to cover her breach of the dignity of her new station, by bowing courteously all round; and, kindly and graciously shaking hands with his pupil, as if they had parted yesterday, he proceeded in his blandest tones, and most courtly and caressing manner:—

“This is an unceremonious accost, ladies; but we are most fortunate in finding you, and in not requiring to announce ourselves. I fear, though, we have interrupted you in going out?”

“O, indeed, papa; but Violette sha’n’t go out till I renew my acquaintance with her,” said the peremptory and half-patronising little countess, sliding her arm within that of her former friend.

The Professor, as proud as a piper, though haply vowed to a different instrument, smilingly menaced the wayward girl with his fore-finger, and then, with alacrity, recovering his habitual sense of decorum, he cried—

"Allow me, Mrs. Charles, to introduce my daughter, the Countess of St. Edward, to you.—Mrs. Herbert, Lady St. Edward." Mutual stiff curtsies.

"Ha, Mrs. Brabazon, I have the honour, madam, to present my daughter, the countess of St. Edward, to you.—Emmeline, my love, the Honourable Mrs. Brabazon."

The young countess bent her head, but with a look of reserve and hauteur wonderfully well performed for one so new to her dignities. Mrs. Burke Barker had, in the meanwhile, been more in the background than suited either her tastes or opinion of her own consequence. She had an error to repair. As soon as she had paid her respects to Mrs. Herbert, she ran up to Violet, and took her hand with affected eagerness, exclaiming—

"I know not, Mrs. Charles, whether I ought to beg pardon or scold you well. Fancy, papa, that when, some-time since, I had occasion to call upon Mrs. Herbert, I did not recognise, in the lady with her, my old friend Gabrielle. It must have been you I saw with Mrs. Herbert; and my stupidity and near-sight! But, indeed, I must chide you. Why not make yourself known to me? You must have been sure that I am not the person to forget an old friend. I assure you, Mr. Barker and I talk of you very often, you were so much with us at the time he was paying his addresses to me. I daresay, ma'am, (to Mrs. Herbert,) this young lady has never told you how slyly we managed our flirtations; sometimes Barker was fancied her lover, and Herbert was mistaken for mine."

Mrs. Herbert, who fancied this a mistake indeed, had stood for a few moments in a state of vacillation. She had now no choice but to give up her walk, and to invite her visitors up stairs; for, though the Professor was profuse of apologies, no one appeared inclined to give way; and, besides, being a little womanishly curious about a future Duchess of Plantagenet, she was prepossessed both by the beauty of the girl and the natural childish fondness with which she seemed to hang about Violet. Mrs. Brabazon was included in the general invitation to walk up stairs; but as the young countess was still in disgrace, if even properly married, she drew off her forces in good order, and abandoned the field.

"Such an unbred creature for St. Edward to marry!" exclaimed the elder and sensible Miss Brabazon, as the family drove off. "He must have been bewitched—but he is a mere boy, and though an Eton boy, knows less of life, it is said, than a child."

"She is absolutely dumpy," said the tall second Miss Brabazon—drawing up her well-rounded shoulders.

"A gentleman's beauty!" said the third and prettiest. "I really wish, mamma, you would take to cramming us. Sir George Lees told me, last night, that the new Brummagem Countess was as plump as a pig, and as elastic as a puff-ball, with the prettiest foot—Did you look at her foot, Anne?" continued Miss Emma, involuntarily curving the high aristocratic instep, on which she had so often been complimented by her maid.

"The sister is a much more distinguished-looking woman," said Mrs. Brabazon, who was balancing, in her mind, the advantages and disadvantages which might attend the acquaintance of the Barkers—not to herself, for she took pride in being a self-sacrificing mother—but to her daughters.

In the mean time the Cryppes family had ascended to Mrs. Herbert's little drawing-room, Mrs. Burke Barker graciously praising and lavishing compliments on everything she saw; while the countess drew Violet into a corner, to pour into her confidential bosom the tale of her romantic love and high fortune—of her courtship—her elopement—her dresses—her excess of conjugal beatitude; and to exact a similar confidence, which was either tardily and partially accorded, or smilingly parried.

"You and Mr. Herbert are not half so much in love as Albert and I," said the little countess, at the inconclusive termination of some interrogatory.

"I think myself—I am sure I am—very much attached to my husband," said Violet, modestly blushing, and yet ashamed of the confusion into which she allowed herself to be thrown by the impetuous beauty.

"O, you are so long married now!"

"Yes, almost a year."

"That is an age:—and have you a baby?"

"Not one, I am sorry," replied Violet, laughing.

"That is a pity—Polly has none either; but I must have a baby. Mine will be heir to the dukedom. I assure you, Mrs. Charles, it is very important that I should have a baby; Barker and Neddy, you must know, won't allow me now to take horse-exercise. I had such charming scampers with a set of hussar officers who live at our hôtel. Neddy is so wise, you must know, since he became a sage femme—and Barker is so knowing. Yet it was at the riding-school St. Edward fell in love with me. He used to help me to mount, and almost kissed my toe; and he was so modest, so bashful—I used so to laugh at him, poor soul!"

"What poor soul are you laughing at there?" cried Mrs. Barker across the room, desirous to interrupt a tête-à-tête, in which she was certain her giddy sister must commit herself, though happily there was here little danger of betrayal to enemies.

"I am telling Mrs. Charles that I will bring St. Edward to visit her—and that our husbands must be great friends like ourselves. I am sure Albert will like Mr. Herbert. I remember him well—he was very handsome, and an elegant rider. Does he still have as beautiful horses as those he had down at W——?"

This was a troublesome question, but fortunately the interrogator was too much occupied with her own thoughts to pause for a reply.

"St. Edward has no stud yet himself. The family have always been remarkable for their love of horses—and I am so fond of them too. Is it not odd?"

"I can vouch for your passion for horses," returned Violet, glad to find something to say; "for I used to be in torture and doubt whether it was to be your neck or his own that the wild boy, Tom Smith, Mrs. James Stokes' groom, was to break first in your mad gallops."

The countess coloured slightly, saying, "That is so very long since—I was a sad Tomboy then, to be sure."

The Professor had advanced and heard the latter part of the conversation, and he said, in his grandissimo manner, his hand laid on his heart—

"Highly honoured as my daughter no doubt is by the noble alliance she has contracted, I flatter myself that nature's nobility is not wanting, and that the princely house into which she has been received, and where she must be appreciated, will not find her deficient in that taste for true magnificence, which ought to distinguish her order!"

Violet was tempted to exclaim "Bravo!" to her old master's speech, but she suppressed the mirthful impulse; and Mrs. Barker, perhaps thinking that her father and her sister had committed absurdities enough for one day, directing the attention of Emmeline to Mrs. Herbert's pretty nick-nackeries, set her father down to the "semi-grand," and drew Violet into a window.

"I can scarce forgive your seeming coldness to us, Mrs. Charles—we must, indeed we must, be better friends;" and she clasped the passive hand of Violet between her own palms. "Barker and Mr. Herbert were so much attached—for men—so intimate. I must insist upon breaking the ice, and having you and the St Edwards' to dine with us, en famille, on some very early day. The carriage can come for you, or I can take you up on my drive—no fear but we manage that. Where there is a will there is a way, as my poor mother says—who, by the way, sent her kindest remembrances by us, and will wait upon you very soon."

Violet could only marvel whither all this cordiality was to lead, almost certain that it could not be without some object.

"I have been so anxious to see you of late, to unboosom myself about Emmeline, whom I know you like. Grieved and shocked as Barker and I were at the rash step she has taken, and sensible as we are of the cruel suspicion and misconstruction which may be put upon the affair, or upon our share in it, we cannot forget that Emmeline is my sister, nor be insensible to the many perils by which her brilliant position is surrounded. She is, though a wife, still a child, poor dear; with much, much to learn in every way. My husband's engagements and prospects now engross so very much of my time, that I am quite unable, however desirous, to devote myself directly to Emmeline's improvement. She is, as you know is flatteringly alleged of all her family, rich in natural talent—indeed a singularly gifted creature, yet behind many inferior young ladies in the most ordinary accomplishments. I am ashamed to say she cannot even spell. These deficiencies can now only be remedied by friendship. We cannot send to school or procure a governess for the Countess St. Edward; and, in brief—for I like, as you know, to come at once to the point —it is the joint prayer and petition of Mr. Barker, my father, and myself, that our dear Mrs. Charles Herbert will take this darling of ours under her care; to no one else could we, with confidence, intrust so precious a trust."

"How do you mean, ma'am?—that I should be the instructor of the countess?"

"That you should be the preceptress, the guide, the friend, the guardian-angel, in a word, of the future Duchess of Plantagenet; and, in being so, the benefactress of her whole family: read with her, talk with her, sing with her, cultivate her mind and her manners: you are aware how important a person in society Emmeline must become, and how much, as Barker remarks, even in a public view, depends upon her being qualified to play her part with ability and distinction. Money, patronage, influence,—the Plantagenets command them all; but I know your benevolent and disinterested nature, Violet, and am come to entreat, not bribe, you to be Emmeline's friend."

"Your idea is very flattering, certainly; but, supposing I were qualified for the task you propose, my other duties—my husband"—

"Ah, I knew it would land in 'my husband,'" replied Mrs. Barker, with vivacity; "that you would be quite a pattern wife; but surely, while your husband spends nearly his whole time in chambers, you might spare a few hours at my house every, or say every alternate morning with Emmy."

"At your house?" replied Violet, taken aback.

"Yes, sure; but the carriage should be sent for you and back with you as often as you honoured us, and you would have the countess all to yourself. I am otherwise engaged in the mornings. You might have whatever masters you chose also, both for yourself and your pupil. Suffer me to call Emmeline so—you cannot refuse me."

"I must, at all events, consult my husband and Mrs. Herbert, before forming so important an engagement."

"Ungracious lady! but I will not despair of you. Conceive, too, Violet, how important such a connexion may prove to the future interests of your husband. The Plantagenets are not only in rank crème de la crème, but so enormously rich, with canals and mines, and all sorts of things in the earth and under it,—and with all manner of influence in Church and State,—that to be connected with their family assures fortune. The tutor of St. Edward's late father is now a Bishop, solely by the family interest. I shall doubt if St. Edward's tutor find equal luck, through the Duke's means at least; but I see papa is getting fidgety, and we have intruded most unconscionably on Mrs. Herbert:—what a charming, youthful-looking, lady-like person she is! Ah, you remember, long ago, into what tribulation I put you, when we kept possession of her carriage one day. She has no carriage now, poor lady! Well, Violette,—pardon the freedom, I cannot forget the old familiar name,—don't grieve and disappoint us all. This is Friday. I shall be back on Monday to carry you off to Emmeline, I hope."

"There is a dear creature!" cried the countess, kissing her friend; "you are coming to see us on Monday. Do you know, St. Edward cannot endure to see me kiss my brother Barker, nor even Polly there; so I do it the more just to tease him."

"The Plantagenets are a very undemonstrative family," said Mrs. Barker. "I believe that cake of starch—his grandam, the duchess—never kissed the poor boy in her life, nor allowed any one else; he has had a singular education."

With a profusion of cordial adieus, the party took leave, the countess kissing her hand to Violet, who stood at her window while the carriage remained in sight.

Mrs. Herbert was stunned, amused, and then meditative, over the intelligence which Violet, in all feminine haste, communicated to her.

"It gives me a better opinion of the woman's understanding that she has conceived such an idea," said Mrs. Herbert. "The countess, too, is really a sweet little creature; it were every way a pity that she should be lost."

"Could I save her? She has, indeed, many good natural points of character; but how many chances are there against her becoming either a happy or a respectable woman?"

Both ladies spent some minutes in musing, if not in thought; occupied by the same subject, though it did not precisely suggest the same reflections to each.

The silence was first broken by Mrs. Herbert. "Thank goodness, we are rid of these encroaching, almost impudent, Brabazons, any way. I could despise myself for the silliness which led me to submit to Mrs. Brabazon."

"Yet the motive is so laudable—the desire to improve her daughters."

"At the expense of your time and health. We owe justice to our neighbour, as well as affection to our children."

"Perhaps she would have paid for their lessons, had she thought I would not have been affronted," said Violet, half-laughing, again feeling her way; "which I am sure I ought not, if the reward of my labours were fairly earned."

"Why, Violet, business flows upon you. Here is the offer of another and noble pupil. What a blessing, dear Violet, you might prove to that young woman, and, through her, to a wide circle—yet the thing is impossible."

"The adjective of fools, Maman," replied Violet, who had, half in fondness, half in play, adopted her husband's caressing name for his step-mother; "though I fear that, in this instance, we that are wise must submit to it. My two hours, or four hours a-day, spent with this wayward, spoiled child, whose head is at present turned with the low flattery of her selfish family, and her mercenary servants, and with what she and they consider her amazing good fortune, could scarce even impart much greater proficiency in a showy accomplishment than she already possesses; while the only effectual teaching—"the precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little"—would indeed be impossible. How fine, by the way, are those emphatic repetitions of the prophet, who, in one verse, expounds the true principle of thorough moral education much better than all the modern treatises."

"I can easily perceive, that although love to your neighbour—and it could be no other motive that would induce you to make the required sacrifice—the attempt, if conducted on Mrs. Barker's plan, could end only in disappointment. My old maid, Jenkins—were there no other evil influence around the hoyden, simple-cunning Countess—would, in five minutes, undo your teaching and example of a week; so we will dismiss the subject. I am not sure that Charles would, upon any consideration, have consented."

"I wish he were here, then, to not consent," sighed Violet; "and he won't till to-morrow. The truth is, I have been secretly fretting all the week, and so I am sure have you, after the observation you made on his looks when he left us on Monday morning. What a changed life to poor Charles!—poring over law-books, in those dull chambers, from morn to night—reading such stuff so many hours a-day—he who, till now, spent half his time on horseback, or in the open air. What a want it must be to a man, accustomed from childhood to riding exercise, to be without a horse!—yet it seems a trifle in itself. Let us, however, be candid with each other, and say what we think of him. We will both be the better for speaking out."

"Then I must say, that I see no immediate cause for uneasiness, much less for apprehension; though, since the sultry weather has set in, Charles certainly does not look quite his former self."

"I was sure of that—he is killing himself," and Violet, already worn out, and weak in spirits, burst into tears; and while Mrs. Herbert gently soothed her, and yet permitted her passion of grief to exhaust itself, she strove to check her feelings, and at last spoke out what had for some time lain heavy on her heart.

"If we cannot contrive to make poor Charles's long tasks lighter and safer to him, by some home exertion, then you must join your entreaties to mine, that he will give up his present harrassing pursuits, and adopt some scheme of life which shall not be ruinous to his health and to the happiness of all of us. What signifies what it may be, if we are well and together. In my own poor little Jersey, in some of the new Australian colonies—where there are no convicts—we could even, with our small remaining wrecks of fortune, plant ourselves comfortably; ay, and take root and flourish again!"

"If I see that your fears are just—that Charles is really suffering in health from his close and long studies—my entreaties shall not be wanting; but until this law-suit, on which so much now depends, is determined, we are chained to London and the oar. If you are found an heiress, my love, which I do hope, as I well believe, whatever the law may decide, we may neither need to leave England, nor allow Charles to kill himself: that we shan't do, at all events."

Violet tried to smile, but shook her head, saying, "Sometimes I wish that suit had never been commenced. To think of the large sums that good, kind Marion has advanced—prodigious in her estimation, and for her circumstances, they must be—and they may never be repaid.”

“Hush, hush, my dear! You know Mrs. Marion won’t let you speak of these things—that generous poor woman! Indeed, if it ease your conscience, I may inform you, that she lately told me, in confidence, she only advanced for this suit what she intended to leave you by will—a legacy of £500; so the loss will be your’s and Charles’s, not her’s, she says, if the money is thrown away at law. But she has unbounded faith in Mr. Gryphon’s judgment; and is reassured by the advances which that shrewd gentleman has himself made for what he cannot therefore consider a forlorn hope.”

The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of the postman, who gave Irish Bridget a foreign letter, addressed to Mrs. Herbert, after Biddy had in vain, to the great amusement of the listeners, volubly endeavoured to beat him down from what she considered the exorbitant sum of 2s. 8d. “for so small a concern of a letter.”

“Bother to him! it would need to bring good news to be worth the money,” said this faithful ally, delivering the epistle, “though a black sale is on it.”

The letter, intimating an important event, came from a humble quarter: it was written by a young woman, whom, from having the highest opinion of her character and qualifications, Mrs. Herbert had some years before recommended to Lady Laura Temple, and who now ventured to announce the sudden death of the Earl of Tarbert, and the consequent deep distress of her mistress, to the only friend that, so far as the young woman knew, Lady Laura possessed on earth. Without near relations, living much abroad, and naturally of a reserved and rather haughty disposition, which disappointed hopes had not softened, Lady Laura was an instance not rare, among the higher aristocracy, of an individual with a very numerous general or visiting acquaintance, but with few or no intimates, and scarce one friend of her own rank. She had outlived the companionships of her girlhood, and had found nothing satisfactory to her mind or heart with which to replace them. When her father, after having that morning been at the Court of the Emperor, died suddenly while engaged with her in a game of chess, and before medical assistance could be obtained, her only and passionate entreaty to the physician of the embassy, as soon as she was able to speak, was, that he should give strict orders that no one should be allowed to see her—that she should be left solely to her confidential maid, until she intimated to him that she was able to endure the ceremonial of the condolence and sympathy of her friends. The dreadful shock which her nerves had received from her father, in what seemed perfect health, suddenly expiring of what was said to be disease of the heart, for a time blunted every other feeling; nor had she manifested any concern about what gave her few English friends in Vienna considerable concern. Poverty, nay, destitution, or at least dependence, was known to be her fate. The affairs of her father had long been embarrassed. His estates, on his death, went at once to the lineal male heir; and he was engaged in a lawsuit which, if it issued as was now apprehended, must still further increase his embarrassments. For some time, his salary as an ambassador had been his main dependence, and that of course terminated with his life. Letters of an unfavourable nature, received from his London agent on the day of his death, had, it was too probable, hastened the catastrophe.

The brief letter, in which some part of this intelligence was respectfully intimated by the humble, but the truest and most devoted friend that the high-born Laura now possessed, strongly affected Mrs. Herbert; and her emotion, in hastily perusing the note, alarmed Violet, who rose and hastily crossed to where she sat.

“Don’t fancy it idle or impertinent curiosity,” she said, leaning over the agitated reader; “your friend, your daughter, your sister cannot witness your grief and agitation, and affect ignorance. Does this—O tell me!—does it affect Herbert,—for nothing, sure, less than that could so distress you?”

Mrs. Herbert had before playfully remarked, that every symptom of distress which visited any of the human race with whom Violet came into contact, was at first sight imagined to be connected with her husband; that she seemed to fancy there could be no earthly suffering nor sorrow, save from real or apprehended evil to Charles.

“Not Charles, thank God! but one——; but read for yourself. . . . Poor, poor Laura! Proud, unhappy Laura! crushed in affection, ruined in fortune.”

Tears prevented her from proceeding; and Violet read the letter put into her hand with the rapidity of thought. Her proud rival, her noble cousin, her unfortunate rival, her orphan cousin, friendless in a foreign land,—an object of compassion to her own servant, who had plainly, if delicately, stated that she knew not what her lady was to do, as she must leave the hôtel which her father had rented, and probably Vienna, as soon as the remains of the earl were sent to England; and further, that cruel-hearted people, creditors of the earl, would even prevent her from taking her own jewels and other property along with her, though they were all she now had in the world. The faithful girl was not aware that, though none of the rich and aristocratic friends of the late Earl and of Lady Laura could afford to relieve her present distress, or secure her future independence, by their own means, they were too good-hearted to abandon her without a strong effort to procure her a pension,—the only mode of provision which, as they said, would not wound her delicacy, which every other offer of pecuniary assistance must do. With streaming eyes Violet laid down the letter, and turned to Mrs. Herbert, crying—

“You will go for her—you and Charles—and bring home your friend, my cousin, to us. Is she not one of ourselves now? Poor Lady Laura! so noble in spirit she is! I am sure my endeavours shall not be wanting to make her like me; and you and Charles she loves already. Where er she find such a refuge for sorrow, such hopes of consolation, as here with us?"

"You are, Violet, the best and dearest creature that ever breathed, even when you talk what the world calls nonsense. . . . But if, my love, this suit ends, as it seems more and more likely to do, though Lady Laura may have no legal claim upon you and Charles, how I could envy your power of acting as nobly by her, as she of herself would have done by you! But this, I need not say: your heart needs no prompting. You are aware of my old, foolish, ambitious schemes for Charles, which it pleased God in mercy to disappoint. Laura Temple was deeply attached to my son, who admired and revered her. It is needless to conceal from you what you must already know; but she has all a proud and delicate woman's passionate strength of character, as well as a reflecting woman's understanding. The dream my folly inspired is past with her and forgotten; and I prophesy that, of the two, she will like you the best as soon as she knows you, and is known to you: but to fetch her home to this—not poor—to this charming small residence,—this—not paltry, but what her world, and perhaps her unconscious self, must regard as this obscure, and paltry, and mean, and poverty-struck establishment—"

Mrs. Herbert emphatically shook her head.

"You take me quite aback," said Violet, with some dignity, "We can only offer what we have. If our home, with all that devoted sympathy can imagine to sweeten it, and render her lot as happy as circumstances admit, cannot be made agreeable—"

"Agreeable?" interrupted Mrs. Herbert. "Certainly a thousand times more so, in reality, than a pension and apartments in Hampton Court, under the leads, even if Laura were so fortunate as to obtain them; but what will her Grace of Fitzgrundy say?—for she is almost as formidable in May Fair, as is Mrs. Grundy herself in the city and suburbs."

"Pooh! 'tis little that Laura, if she be indeed the Laura I fancy her, will care for that contemptible scarecrow of the mean-spirited and cowardly. But, hark! that is Charles' ring;—I know it so well! Can he be worse? what has brought him to-night?" and, without waiting for reply, she ran down stairs before Bridget, who happened to be on duty, admitted her master, with welcome grinning from ear to ear.

Mrs. Herbert was for an instant uneasy; but the appearance of her son in apparently perfect health, and in evident high spirits, at once reassured her.

"How delightful to anticipate your time, this week especially, when Violet was foolishly making herself uneasy about you," said Mrs. Herbert, a little anxious to learn what particular cause had brought Charles to Chelsea.

"I am charged with a special commission—we are a family of high destinies! Go, Bridget, get me a prodigious draught of cider—your mistresses' favourite tipple—or say even small beer—for I am thirsty as the Great Desert; and only when refreshed shall undo my fardel:—and, by the way, Mr. Gryphon is to dine with you to-morrow, ladies, by self-invitation."

"Sorrow drop ov small beer, sir," said Bridget. "Sure, when you come so far to see the ladies, it shall be the wine and wather, or the brown stout, at the laste of it;" and Bridget bustled off.

"See what it is to be a man of consequence—the head of a household!" said Herbert, laughing. "When I was a fashionable and a supposed wealthy bachelor, no one cared what I ate or drank, or whether I were well or ill—"

"But, Herbert, what has given us this pleasure?—and to see you in so good spirits!—Mr. Gryphon has good news for us, perhaps," said Mrs. Herbert, while Violet still held his hand, and watched his eyes, rejoicing in his joy, but somewhat fearful about how he was to receive the news which Mrs. Herbert had to communicate.

"Gryphon has news, but not of the kind you anticipate. Would you like to resume your carriage again?—hey, mother?—to have a mansion and an establishment of servants—a stud—a library—a park?"

"You are raving, Charles; or, rather, fooling me. Who is to do all this for us?"

"Nor more nor other than the TALENTED FAMILY of Cryppes."

"Now you are joking, Charles;—a wicked jest, though—"

"Serious, on my honour!"

"Barker wishes you to engage in some of his dark concerns, perhaps?—Fie, Charles! to trifle with us," said Violet, who knew that to Mrs. Herbert some of the things of which he talked so lightly were no trifles.

"Not Barker, but Gryphon."

Both ladies raising their hands simultaneously, exclaimed, "Mr. Gryphon!"

"He, indeed!—the cautious, well-informed, astute Gryphon; nay, I may perhaps get into Parliament—your old dream, again, mother."

"I have—I have always had the highest opinion of the friendliness and judgment of Mr. Gryphon," replied the bewildered lady. "But dear Charles, don't tantalize us too far—if the whole is not some malicious pleasantry."

"Never was more true, if more serious, in the course of my life. But Mr. Gryphon will tell you all about it to-morrow. You will believe him, if not me, that I have the power of throwing law to the dogs, and becoming bear-leader to the grandson of that Most High and Potent Prince, Geoffrey Richard, Duke of Plantagenet! with liberal appointments and the most brilliant prospects, or at least promises, when my illustrious pupil passes from my guardian hands."

Mrs. Herbert again threw up her hands, and turned her meaning eyes on Violet.

"Nay, more, thrice-fortunate ladies!—while I am to have charge of the young Earl, you may have the management of the little Countess. It is a joint-stock affair. My mother first lady of the bed-chamber—my wife principal governess."

"You are forestalled, Charles," said Violet, laughing; "I have had that offer already, though perhaps from another quarter—from Mrs. Barker this very day."

"Another quarter, assuredly; for what seemed to me to be considered the main, if not indeed the only, indispensable condition of my engagement, was, that no Cryppes, nor any breathing thing connected with that clever blood, should in any shape approach my noble charge, or the 'young person' connected with him. . . . Their Graces will never be able to call Emmeline Cryppes St. Edward's wife, let the church and the law say what they please."

The affair now assumed a very different aspect in the eyes of Mrs. Herbert. At a glance she perceived ten thousand advantages, present and prospective, to her family, from such an arrangement.

"And what have you done, Charles?—what is concluded?"

"Nay, mother, that either requires a very great deal of consideration, or just none at all. But Mr. Gryphon insists upon you and Violet hearing what he has to say, before I decide. I came to warn, and promised that I was not to prejudice either of you. Mr. Gryphon is negotiator on the part of the Duke, whom I have not yet seen, and probably shall not."

"Very serious consideration, indeed, Charles, is required. This offer may change the whole complexion of your life. When I visited the splendid place the Duke has in Staffordshire, the mansion of his chamberlain was pointed out to us. He is a gentleman of estate and family himself; he lives in quite a superior style, and was in Parliament."

"O, mother, mother!" replied Herbert, laughing; "I see Gryphon will have an ally in you."

"Whoever affords you the means of honourably retrieving your fortunes, Charles, will have a most grateful friend in me."

"That is the house of Cryppes, ma'am; I assure you it is so."

"Yet that house does not command my gratitude. But, seriously, my dear son—my dearest Violet—this is a most important affair. What do you think of it?"

AN ANGLER'S LAY FOR THE MONTH OF MAY.

A jovious life the anglers lead,
Whom needy care ne'er vexeth,
And nought beyond a bush or weed
Whose quiet path perplexeth;
Who love to muse and angle ever
By glen or haugh, in brook or river.

The discontents and clamours high,
That stir the world around them,
Go babbling, like the water, by,
And leave them where they found them;
Still angling on, without a fear,
They hear them,—but they only hear.

Oh, let me, then, a-angling go,
All silly scorners scorning;
And hie where fitting waters flow
At earliest warmth of morning!
The genial rays around I feel,
And start with tackle, rod, and creel.

Though I no artful niceties heed,
A goodly rod I carry;
My well wrought line can run with speed,
No knot to make it tarry;
My rod a goodly reel hath on,
While Father Walton's rod had none.

My greedy creel is slung behind,
And belted on me gaily;
And look, how well within 'tis lined
With coating bright and scaly,— Savouring of deeds of slaughter by:
There many a victim more shall lie.

If e'er, at times, the line I'm found
In streams unlikely throwing,
It is the banks or scenes around
My angle thither drawing:
I choose the spot that smiles the fairest,
Though there the fish may swim the rarest.

The sun an angler's sport may spoil,
And load his creel the lighter,
But gives the stream a lovelier smile,
And makes the prospect brighter;
The lowly vale with gladness fills,
And lights the everlasting hills.

Thus with the rod and line I spend Industriously my leisure;
And blest are they to whom they lend,
I like me, their quiet pleasure;
Who love to muse and angle ever
By glen or haugh, in brook or river. N. C.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Dr. Trueman's Visit to Edinburgh in 1840.

By Ann Walker.

WE have been as much struck by the moral courage as by the acuteness displayed in this little book. Its author avows herself a member of the "narrow and obscure circle of the religious world of Edinburgh;" and, doing this, she presumes to tax that world (which, whatever may be its numbers and limits, contrives at all times to be tolerably conspicuous and prominent) with faults and shortcomings of a serious kind. This is done in lively and graphic dialogue, and with excellent dramatic effect. Her exhortations ought to be taken in good part; and we trust that they will be so, and fulfil the useful end for which they are intended. The plan of the work is simple enough. Dr. Trueman, an eminent divine, arrives in Edinburgh as an agent from the Missionary Society, and is lionized and fêted by the leading ladies of the religious world, who contend for his presence at their pious parties as strenuously as if the worthy Doctor were a mere worldly, musical, or poetical monster of the lion species. The scenes of the successive dialogues, of what may be called the stage direc- tions, contain of themselves much character. The second scene is in the house of a lady who is not just yet eminent in piety, but very charitable, so far as Fancy Fairs and such kind of displays are concerned; yet as luxurious and self-indulging as any mere woman of the world, and as exclusive about her table at the Bazaar, as if it had been her drawing-room and most brilliant party-night. The next scenes are laid in the dwelling of a different kind of woman. They are thus entitled:—

A drawing-room, neatly furnished, and ornamented with engravings; Henry Martyn, Gerard Noel, Cæsar Malan, Dr. Chalmers, Hall of Leicester, Edward Irving; a box on the mantelpiece, for collecting for West Indian schools; Miss Matilda Wishwell at work, Miss Prudentia Selfesteem also at work, Miss Pin, Miss Knott, Miss Needle, Miss Nett, and other friends, all engaged at different kinds of work in various parts of the room.

SCENE—An apartment with a good fire, beautiful lamps splendidly lighted with gas, a long table covered with a table-cloth, chairs all around, a great display of elegant plate, in the shape of tea-pots and coffee-pots, vases and kettles of boiling water; butter pails, richly-cut crystal, containing a variety of jellies and preserves, all sorts of bread, muffins, crumpets, soda scones; all manner of cakes, from the Victoria and Prince Albert buns, to the long-established cookie and plaited roll; on the sideboard, cold round, turkey, tongue, lobster, salads; a variety of fruit, ginger beer, lemonade, raspberry vinegar; iced water, &c.; a display of beautifully-cut crystal tumblers, glasses, &c. &c.

The above is a self-denying Tee-total entertainment, at which Dr. Trueman is expected, and at which he does arrive.—As a specimen of the work, we select a meeting of the Ladies' Society for the Gulmahawk Schools; business to commence at one o'clock, in what are called, we believe, the Religious Institution Rooms, No. 13, Queen Street. Scene,—a long table covered with green cloth, chairs and forms, paper, pens and ink, Dr. Carey's portrait on the mantelpiece, and enter Miss Trimlock:—

Miss T.—What, no one here! one o'clock was the hour appointed, with a stroke below it too, in the intimation; luckily I have brought a book with me; many's the page I have perused while waiting for those who would have had no scruples in commencing business, without ceremony, whether I was present or not, if it should so happen to suit their convenience to keep the appointed time. Mrs. Hannah More reckoned—mumbling in a voice that no one could hear, and writing a hand that no one could read, amongst the minor immoralities—to which list I, Miss Trimlock, add want of punctuality in keeping hours and appointments; but perhaps it is better I should have a little time for private meditation, and if the Lord grant me the spirit of prayer, I will pray for the amendment of myself and my sisters of the Committee.—Door opens, enter Mrs. Frisky.

Mrs. F.—How do you do, Miss Trimlock; what, here alone! Had I not my intimation with me, I would think that I had mistaken the day; really our Secretary or Treasurer, or whoever they may be, who think that they have a right to take the lead here, ought to have some consideration for the time of other people, and send the keys of the box at least, that those who are punctual may commence business.

By degrees the members drop in: Miss Diddledawdle, Lady Plumemyself, Miss Sumph, Mrs. Pleusy, Mrs. Clump, Miss Wire, Miss Tape, &c. &c.; and having lost much time, in the first place, by want of punctuality, they lose more in chattering. Much of that disjointed and very natural tittle-tattle we pass in getting to Miss Soap:—

Miss Soap.—I hope Miss Clump will be appointed to take my place next week, as a visiter to the Old Women's Society, for my sister is going to be married, and I have much to do at home.

All the Ladies at once.—Oh, who is she going to be married to! we never heard of that before.

Miss Soap.—My intended brother-in-law is Mr. Primfoot, a very good young man, of moderate fortune, and we are all much pleased with the match. I know him well, and I can answer for it, that he is a most excellent, punctual man; and I understand they are afterwards to set off on a tour to the Western Highlands, before they settle in Edinburgh for life. As some one observes, a marriage jaunt is sometimes the first and last excursion in one's life—Mrs. Flask is seized with a violent fit of coughing in the treble key of E major; she attempts to speak, but in vain, takes out her handkerchief, blows her nose, puts her hand upon her side, then recovers herself, and resumes talking.

Mrs. Flask.—Oh, it is cheering to meet with such a group of Christian friends, all so united in love to each other, and all so interested in each other's welfare.

Mrs. Clump, in the key of F sharp.—Sarah, my dear, produce your collection book; you need not be ashamed of it; were it not an unchristian phrase, I would say that you have reason to be proud of it. I suppose that most people are aware that the phrase, You need not be ashamed, is synonymous with, You have reason to be proud—The Committee are at last all assembled; the meeting being professedly religious, commences with reading a portion of Scripture, which is probably mumbled over by one of the worst readers of the Committee, who, for the time-being, may happen to be the Secretary or Treasurer of the Society. The company then sit silent, apparently absorbed in mental devotion, imploring a blessing on the present meeting, as if the spirit of prayer could descend at a signal from the Secretary.

Miss Sumph, soliloquy.—When ought I to take off my hand; I wonder if any hands are taken off yet—she peeps up with one eye—I must wait till the Secretary, or some other body rises, or at least till some of the leading members remove their hands, lift up their eyes, and show that the prayer is ended.

Miss Sensible.—Surely this is somewhat like a formal mockery. It would certainly be much better if a short-written prayer was read, and a psalm sung or said, which could deceive no one.—The business now commences, the Secretary reads the report; like most other reports, it was a vast deal too long: much repetition, and unnecessary compliments to people for merely doing what they had undertaken to do, and in some cases were paid for doing; the words, "the Committee," were repeated so often, that if compressed and separated from the real substance of the report, they would have made at least two pages of close printing.

The resolutions are at length passed, and are as follows:—

"That every lady should keep to her own department, and that their conversations with the poor should be entirely confined to religious subjects."

"That the Gulmahawk Schools ought to be the sole object of the ladies connected with this Society, and that they ought to make it their chief study and contemplation how best to obtain collections of money, tracts, books, works, &c., for this most useful Society."

"That the thanks of the Society ought to be voted to Mrs. Pursem for her unwearied exertions in extracting money out of other people's pockets, notwithstanding the insinuations of evil-minded persons that the said sums ought to have come exclusively from her own."

"That the Committee take into their consideration the expediency of voting some testimonial of their esteem to their patriotic Treasurer, Mr. Pillagewell, for his unwearied exertions in raising a fund for the education of all uneducated children of every denomination, sect, or class of society."

Miss Plausem.—A most noble, splendid, magnificent idea, worthy of the enlightened age in which we live. I should think that a gold medal, with an appropriate inscription, would be quite the thing.

Miss Trimlock.—I do not think, in the present state of our funds, that we could conscientiously appropriate any of our Society's money for this purpose.

Mrs. Doutem.—There are difficulties in everything, no doubt; but suppose, as a lady body, we subscribe for a portrait of him, done by Watson Gordon; no doubt the demands there would be for engravings of the same would more than cover the expenses.

Miss Continent.—Why, I do not know, I am a great admirer of the antique, and think a bust or statue would be more generally acceptable to a refined public, such as that of our Modern Athens.

Mrs. Stormaway.—But we must consider the style of his features, ladies. We see him generally with spectacles on his nose, and a Scotch wig, with a snuff-box in his hand; and, consider, that, before he sits for his bust, he must have off his wig, also the spectacles, and his throat uncovered. Though I dearly love the good man, I fear that he will never do in sculpture. Since my residence in Rome, my taste has been much refined in these matters.

Mrs. Smily.—But may your taste not be fastidious, or too refined, my dear madam!

Mrs. Stormaway.—Too refined! there is no danger of that, you may rest assured. Being too refined is as little to be feared as being too good.

Lady Citem.—I think we ought to consult Mr. Pillagewell himself, on that point.—All agree.

Mrs. Pursey.—But, before we decide, it will be well to consider the expense. I believe, either a bust or a portrait, done by the best artist, cannot cost less than £100.

Miss Sump.—Oh, never fear for the money! We shall each of us take a book, and, I have no doubt, that we shall soon get people glad to subscribe for so laudable a purpose.

Mrs. Doutem.—I do not know; there are so many demands upon people's money; but time will show.

Mrs. Prosy.—With your permission, ladies, I will read you a very sweet letter which I have just received from our late Secretary, Miss Scribwell, who, you know, married that worthy man, Mr. Gentle, who is settled at Dowellpore, one of our missionary stations in Gulmahawk.

All the Ladies.—That will be very interesting.

Mrs. Prosy.—Mr. Gentle is a very experienced lively Christian, and his wife, as you know, is no less so—Mrs. Prosy opens the letter, and commences reading in a voice scarcely audible from softness and sweetness.—It is addressed to the Committee, as you see, ladies. "My dearest friends"—mumbles a little—this is family matters. She expresses herself very sweetly in thoughtfulness for her safe voyage; is not that so nice!—she mumbles a little more—"You will feel for us, my beloved friends, in the sacrifice made in leaving our native country, to wander as pilgrims in a far distant land; far from the delights and comforts of home; our domestic circle; the firesides of Britain, and all the privileges so peculiarly belonging to our dear native island; but the call was plain, we had only to obey."

Mrs. Doutem interrupts.—Pray, Mrs. Prosy, will you inform me what great sacrifices have been made by Mr. and Mrs. Gentle in going out to Gulmahawk; I understand he had little or no chance of getting a church at home, and Miss Scribwell was much attached to him, and has, as far as I know, only made the sacrifice, which every woman makes when she follows her husband either to India, America, Australia, or elsewhere.

All the Ladies.—Oh! Mrs. Doutem, you are too severe. Our friend Charlotte Scribwell is a deeply spiritual Christian.

Mrs. Doutem.—I hope so; but I only deny that she has made any great sacrifice as far as I know; she refused no comfortable offers at home in order to follow Mr. Gentle.

Miss Sump.—I beg your pardon; she might have married the Rev. Mr. Chimp of Iceland.

Lady Peacemake.—In charity we are bound to believe that nothing but the best motives prompted Mr. and Mrs. Gentle to accept of their present situation at Gulmahawk. We have, alas! but too few Henry Martyns, who indeed have left all to follow Christ.

Miss Sump.—And it is certain that the Gentles have made sacrifices; for, you see, they both tell you so.

Mrs. Doutem.—Please to go on, dear Mrs. Prosy.

Mrs. Prosy mumbles over a few lines, then recommences: "But, in the midst of so many trying circumstances, we have here and there met with several cheering occurrences. A little girl, Ora Saab, has been for some months evidently showing an inquiring disposition; it is indeed a delightful task 'to teach the young idea how to shoot.' Little Ora has committed the whole of Watt's Busy Bee in English to memory, which, considering the difficulties of the English language to a Gulmahawk ear, I consider as a very great attainment; and I look forward to Ora as likely to become a very useful assistant to me, in my arduous duties of teaching; and we have reason to be thankful that our own children, lovely babes, are all that the fondest parents could desire. Already little Tommy says, 'Dearest ma, take me with you to church' and his sister, Chatty, cries to go along with him. It is delightful to see such instances of early piety."

Now, if one of the world's unspiritual ladies had ventured to put forth this, there would have been a sad outcry; and the chief merit of this book is, that the censure proceeds from a quarter at which the persons whose improvement is sought cannot possibly cavil.

Many of the Edinburgh Public Charities pass in review, and none are found without drawbacks, and need of reform and improvement. The author, for instance, while she thinks that the inmates of the Bridewell and House of Refuge require a more rousing and impressive style of preaching, also allows that they would be the better of a more liberal supply of food. We shall again extract a few sentences, almost at random:—

I could wish that the allowance of food should be increased or diminished, according to the constitution of the inmates. There is but one state of stomach supposed to exist in Charitable Institutions, and I certainly wish that some pecuniary return should be made to some of the excellent workers who labour there; but I fear, unless more money can be obtained, this plan will not be adopted.

It has often annoyed me to hear ladies, who pretend to have common sense, have the presumption to think that by mere scolding, reproof, and talk, they can force people to become good; I am only surprised that the inmates behave as well as they do under the circumstances. Think what we would feel at an advanced period of life to be torn from our homes, and all at once made to conform to a kind of boarding-school life, and nearly deprived of liberty; similar is the case with many a poor inmate of the House of Refuge; and indeed it is my opinion that ladies or gentlemen should not be considered as qualified members of Committees for charitable purposes, till they have resided for at least a week in the House of Refuge, Bridewell, Prison, Workhouse, Penitentiary, or any other place of reformation, and not take upon them to make laws and regulations until they know from experience what possibly may be the feelings of an inmate of such places.

A TEE-TOTAL BANQUET: THE SCENE AS ABOVE DESCRIBED.

Miss P. aside.—This tee-totalism is not so bad as I expected; but Lady Arabella is very rich, who can afford to give a tee-total in this style.—Dr. Trueman says grace, and Mr. Faithful takes the lower end of the table. The China herb, which cheers but not inebriates, is now ready to be poured out.

Lady A.—Tell Fanchon to bring me my vinlagrette, and the aromatic salts out of the drawing-room; I feel a slight headache.—Fanchon returns with the articles in question, and Lady Arabella forthwith applies them to her nose. Some of the opponents of the Anti-tobacco Society, on a similar emergency, would have perhaps committed the enormity of taking a snuff. How unequal seems the allotment of the good things of this world to our short-sighted limited views. The rich sickly from luxury, the poor from deprivations; the one overheated and irritated by too much warmth, the other shivering and starving from dearth of coal. Apparently all are now prepared for an attack on the good things set before them. But Mr. Faithful and Miss Humbug in vain attempt to understand the newly-invented coffee-pot. Miss Emma Humbug attempts to explain, Mr. Faithful vainly attempts to understand, he touches a wrong spring, off starts the lid, out spouts the boiling coffee; at the same moment the lid flies off from a sympathetic case of boiling water, a great fuss takes place, the table all covered with coffee grounds, tea leaves, &c.; dears! oh! oh! heard from various parts of the table. All the ladies rise; much talk ensues; much advice is given. At last it is happily discovered that no one is hurt; the consternation subsides; the gowns are wiped; fingers are held up; and the obstreperous coffee-pot and case are sent off in disgrace, and are replaced by a plain Rockingham pot and kettle of the same—the uproar ceases. This comes of tea-totalism, murmurs Miss Pendragon; however, order is re-established, and they all make an excellent meal, talking on a variety of miscellaneous subjects. Lady Arabella then rose. Mr. Faithful returned thanks, and the party adjourned to the drawing-room; and Lady Arabella, who was an excellent musician, opened the grand piano, and with her daughter, Miss Matilda Wishwell, sang that beautiful duet from Handel, "Oh Lovely Peace," and "in sweetest Harmony they Lived," and finally, "Lord remember David." Many of the company enjoyed the music very much; but Lady Arabella on this occasion thought it was better to seize the opportunity of conversing with Dr. Trueman and Mr. Faithful. Accordingly the instrument was closed, and the party seated themselves in groups in different parts of the room.

THE RATIONALE OF LADIES' SOCIETIES.

Lady Sensible.—I think my good friend Miss Pendragon threw out hints, before we went to tea, as if she thought that our associations, as we call them, of ladies, did not always adopt the most judicious means for the amelioration and moral improvement of the destitute and depraved of our own countrywomen.

Miss Lowlymind.—Oh, certainly, we have much reason to lie low in the dust, when we see how often our best efforts turn out to be folly, and how little, yea, how less than little, we can accomplish in our own strength.

Miss Selwynoramus.—And pray, ma'am, I should like to know what other means you or any other Christian lady in your wisdom could suggest, as better adapted than those adopted by our Society, for improving the moral condition of the poor? What can be better than long imprisonment, short commons, and hard work!

Lady S.—Why, I believe the solitary system has never been productive of much good.

Miss Selfesteem.—Why, ma'am, you'll allow Mrs. Fry to be of some authority, and she, you know, entirely approves of the solitary system.

Lady S.—Pardon me, Miss Selfesteem, Mrs. Fry approves of the separate, not the solitary system.

Miss L.—Far be it from me to attempt to regulate either the laws or morals of the land, but this is my own experience,

"Dumb let all other legislators be,
And only Jesus legislate for me."

Dr. T.—I must say I agree with Miss Lowlymind, in thinking that there is rather too great a tendency in the Christian world at present, to imagine that much of the great work of conversion may be accomplished by confinement, deprivations, lectures, and laws, almost amounting to severity; the natural heart is cruel, severity may harden or break the spirit; but love alone can subdue and soften the stony heart. And what was the manner of the Saviour of sinners while on earth! I own he spoke with a power no mere man ever possessed, and that circumstances are much altered, though the heart of man remains the same, since his advent upon earth. Did he command Mary Magdalene and other sinful women to be placed in solitary confinement or sent to the tread-mill, had such an instrument of punishment existed in Jerusalem in those days! No! his words were peace: "Go and sin no more. Thy sins are forgiven. He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." And even to the woman of Samaria, no word of reproach was uttered; and for the multitude who cried out, Crucify him! crucify him! he prayed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" And has he not "left us an example that we should follow his steps?"

Lady S.—I agree entirely with you, Dr. Trueman; there is too little of that heavenly spirit amongst us, which grieves when it hears of sins, and cries and sheds tears of bitter sorrow over our fallen fellow-creatures; this, no doubt, is one reason why so little fruit appears from our labours, we are all so apt to blame the wretched creatures with whom we converse, without sufficiently taking into consideration the disadvantageous circumstances in which they have been placed—not reflecting that but for the restraining grace of God, with all our advantages, we might have been worse.

Miss Selfesteem.—But surely, Lady Sensible, your good sense must point out to you the necessity of having strict rules, calculated to promote the cause of religion and morality, in every institution which ladies professing religion undertake to superintend.

Lady S.—Oh, certainly; and every gentle means taken to see them enforced; but to punish is a delicate and a doubtful matter, and, when absolutely necessary, requires to be done with great tenderness, much gentleness, great love, and with the consideration that, as in a great measure virtue is its own reward, so is vice its own punishment; and in all cases of injury and injustice done to us as private individuals, we should recall to our remembrance that text, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

We earnestly hope that Dr. Trueman's exhortation will not be without effect among the rigidly righteous.

We have no room for the family group of the Out-of-worlds, whose vanity and pride are as much in its pomps and shows as those of any unrenewed person whatever; nor for many other shrewd and clever showings-up of the Spiritual exclusives: but heartily commending the book for its spirit, its object, and its execution, we conclude with those observations on the duty of almsgiving:—

There are many who fully admit the urgency of the call upon Christians to charity or alms-deeds, yet who so limit the qualifications they require in the recipients of their bounty, that their sphere is narrow indeed: their own church—their own parish—their own dependants—and the almost sweepingly exclusive clause, perfect worth, in the objects to be relieved. To the first of these we reply, that we admit strongly that "if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel," 1 Tim. v. 8. "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith," Gal. vi. 10. To the latter we answer, "Our Heavenly Father maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust," Matt. v. 45. And we would call their attention to the important lessons taught in Matt. xviii. 32, 33. "I forgave thee all that debt—oughtest thou not therefore to have had compassion on thy fellow-servant?" and in the parable of the good Samaritan, Luke x. 29—38, we are taught to relieve misery, as we have opportunity, without regard to circumstances, sect, or party.

Thus, all the plausible and not unfounded fears of many, to countenance vice, idleness, luxury, extravagance, laziness, &c., are fully answered in the foregoing, and in many other passages of Scripture: and it is obvious, that the risk incurred of relieving the unworthy, is a less evil than that of allowing a fellow-creature to perish for want of food and raiment, because we had no opportunity of scrutinizing their character.

There is another class of objectors, orthodox-talkers—yet I much fear self-deceivers—who have almost persuaded themselves and others, that those who practice alms-giving to any amount, are in great danger of resting in “dead works,” “deeds of the law,” Rom. iii. 20., and quote the beginning of the 13th chapter of Corinthians as an apostolic warning against the danger of giving all one's goods to feed the poor.*

We are again tempted, by the remarks on the virtuous denunciation of the Widow Do-ill, a common street beggar, whose farewell entertainment is thus placed in juxtaposition with an aristocratic banquet:—

We have been informed that Widow Do-ill gave a farewell feast, on the evening preceding her departure, to her friends, at Lucky Macleek's. This coming to the ears of the rigid sticklers for economy in the poor, was made a pretence for closing their hands against street beggars. The funds employed in giving this entertainment were raised by open begging. Perhaps it was a pic-nic; but we do not speak from personal knowledge. We have been informed that, some years ago, it was customary in the city of Bath, for guests to leave their contributions on the table, for remuneration for lights and waiters; and that, in the Modern Athens, the most splendid entertainments are given upon tick,—while the ostentatious, though perhaps unconscious host, is already deeply in arrears to his creditors. The halls of entertainment, and the viands, were indeed somewhat different. In the higher circles every element was laid under contribution:—fowls of the air,—fish of the deep sea,—the deer of the forest,—the spices of Arabia,—fruits of every clime,—wines of every country, from humble port to imperial tokay,—all prepared with scientific skill, and served with luxurious taste, composed this feast. At the other feast, there was fried pork, and salt-fish, and cheese, and ale, and whisky, and tobacco-pipes. The subjects of conversation were in some respects similar, though couched in different terms; and reformers and anti-reformers mingled in both circles—in the one, the characters of the notorious charitable and uncharitable were freely discussed;—in the other, the “ups and downs of the powers that be.”

We now exhort the religious female world to look steadfastly into this mirror held up by one of themselves.

The Miscellaneous Writings of Dr. McCrie. Edited by his Son. 1 vol. 8vo., pp. 676.

These collected Remains of a popular and excellent writer consist of reprints of Biographies, Reviews, and occasional Pamphlets upon subjects connected with Ecclesiastical affairs, and principally Church Government and Discipline. The BIOGRAPHIES will permanently form the most valuable portion of the work. They are those of eminent Scottish Worthies, or illustrious Protestant Reformers of foreign countries, and are written with knowledge and love. The Reviews are chiefly of a defensive, or controversial nature, and are distinguished as much by acuteness and intellectual power as by the peculiar opinions of the writer. One Review, of great length, in which Dr. McCrie, strong in the faith, buckled on his armour, and took the field against the mighty “Wizard of the North” during the very potency of his enchantments, ought to be studied, as a corrective, by those who draw their notions of the true character of the Scottish Covenanters from the descriptions of Scott, and still more by those who take their ideas of the cavaliers from the same suspicious source. There never was a more erroneous impression of a public character conveyed to readers than that which Scott has given of the serpent-like cold-blooded Graham of Claverhouse, whom McCrie has stripped of his glossy skin, and exhibited in his natural, naked, and repulsive deformity. Though we will never believe that Scott wrote that which is perhaps the finest of his novels with malice prepense against the Covenanters and high-flying Presbyterians, there is no question that Old Mortality contains bane to the cause of truth and freedom, against which Dr. McCrie has with fervent zeal applied the antidote. This Review made so strong an impression at the time, that Mr. Scott, who had previously made up his mind to take no notice of criticism, found it necessary to defend himself; which he did indirectly in the Quarterly Review, in a Review of one of his own Romances. The controversy, from the eminence and attainments of the opponents, is one of no ordinary interest. In historical learning, and unwearied minute research, we need not say that Sir Walter Scott was no match for the author of the Life of John Knox; and one almost regrets that so much learning and ingenuity should have been spent upon an indirect and merely vindictory work. Scott and McCrie appear at this time to have been regarded as the champions of their different sides—Scott, in the Quarterly Review, attacking the Presbyterian party, in such articles as the Review of Kirkton's History of the Church of Scotland; and McCrie, in the Edinburgh Review, recriminating or defending in his notice of Turner's Life and Times.

A Pamphlet, originally published before the passing of the famous Veto Act, and entitled “What ought the General Assembly to do at the Present Crisis,” comes in pat to the times. There is one original article in the volume, in which, upon the question of the right of women to vote in the election of Ministers and Elders, Dr. McCrie takes the ungallant side; but allows (as a matter of expediency only) women to vote in those congregations where the innovation is already practised.

Whatever may have been the opinions of Dr. McCrie on the rights of Christian women, there can be no doubt that the Candlishes, Cunninghams, and Chalmerses of the Church will at once recognise the claims of the sex, since they have lately keenly canvassed them of all ages and degrees, both for money to carry on the war with the Civil Courts, and for names to swell petitions to the Queen and the Parliament, about matters which require fully as much judgment as the choice of a pastor or an elder. These Rev. Gentlemen, at least, will now grant the same freedom to women which is allowed to them in the Secession Church, where they have as much to say in the choice of a spiritual teacher as women usually have in the choice of a husband, whatever use they may make of either of these rights. It must at all events be conceded, that nothing can be more unfair, not to say insulting, than to make convenient tools of the poor women in one set of circumstances, and to treat them with exclusion and contempt in another, where their agency does not happen to be wanted for party purposes. One argument used by Dr. McCrie is, that women being in general the majority in congregations, would, if they had the right of voting, take the choice of the pastor into their own hands—“thus usurping authority over the man.” But this is plainly sophism. If the ladies are entitled to such rights at all, they must also have the ordinary rights of all majorities; nor is it very probable that they would all combine against the men. We recommend the volume as an important addition to McCrie's works.

*How very few have ever been known to impoverish themselves by giving to the poor! Dr. Coldstream, who died lately, was alleged to have done so.

The Domestic Management of the Sick-Room. By Anthony Todd Thomson, M.D., F.L.S., &c. &c. Longman & Co. Pp. 506.

This useful and instructive treatise is inscribed to the Women of Great Britain; and no better volume has for years been written for their information and guidance. A copious introduction treats of the causes and symptoms of disease; the tendencies of particular habits of life upon health; and the influences of food, air, exercise; and also of the recognition and prevention of particular diseases, and the common prognostics of disease. This introduction, though not absolutely essential to the specific directions given concerning 'the sick-room,' is indispensable to an intelligent acquaintance with the endless variety of circumstances which may arise, and with the duties which the care of the sick and convalescent demand from the nurse. Were every observer not aware of the lamentable stupidity and prejudices of regular sick-nurses, and of the ignorance and helplessness of women in the sick-room, who are otherwise what is considered well-educated and accomplished, some of the directions might be considered too minute and trifling to be placed in a printed page. But those who are most competent to judge will be the least ready to pronounce any one of them superfluous; and perhaps it is in small things that the author is really most original, and calculated to be most generally useful.

After the introduction above alluded to, the Doctor begins with the choice and furnishing of the sick-room, when the lingering nature, or particular character, of the disease makes it necessary to appropriate a room to the patient and nurse. He discusses Ventilation, Cleanliness, Quiet, Darkening, and so forth, before he reaches that important matter, the qualifications of a nurse. Her qualifications being carefully pointed out, we are next instructed in her duties in many classes of circumstances specified; and this necessarily occupies a considerable space, and forms indeed the main business of the treatise. A chapter is devoted to the management and diet of the convalescent, which, from the nurse, requires equal intelligence, and more delicacy, than the management of the sick; another to cookery for the sick and convalescent; and a concluding section, of extreme interest, treats of Mental Influences upon the body in disease and convalescence. But we shall best illustrate the nature of the work by a few specimens in different styles.

We imagine it is not yet very generally understood by the non-medical, that Erysipelas, now become so frequent, is in many cases an infectious febrile disease; yet so it is.

Erysipelas is, in many cases, an infectious febrile disease; but, like every other malady which is capable of being communicated from one person to another, it only attacks those predisposed to receive the infection. What state of body causes this predisposition is not well understood; but it is probably connected with derangement of the digestive organs, or, in other words, an irritable state of the stomach and bowels. On this account, individuals who are exposed to the infection, or who are liable to attacks of the disease, should be careful in diet, avoiding indigestible and irritating food, not indulging in excesses of any kind, and sedulously relieving the bowels; but at the same time avoiding the too free employment of purgatives.

When erysipelas appears in a house, the sick person should be separated from the healthy inmates; and after the termination of the disease, whether that be favourable or otherwise, the bedding and bed-clothes should be washed and fumigated; and the room, after fumigation, white-washed and painted. So infectious is erysipelas, that even this system of cleansing is sometimes insufficient to check the extension of the disease. In one of the wards of the Infirmary of Montrose, notwithstanding all the patients were removed, and fumigations and white-washing were adopted, the disease continued to attack every fresh patient who was placed in it; so that it, at length, became necessary to shut up the Infirmary for a considerable time.

When erysipelas has once made its attack, few diseases are more apt to recur. The best mode of guarding against this susceptibility is to invigorate the body, without inducing plethora. I have seen the tepid shower-bath most useful in such cases. A moderate share of wine may be taken, but malt liquors should be avoided.

RULES FOR THE PREVENTION OF RHEUMATISM.

Rheumatism is improperly regarded as an inflammatory affection of the joints: the pains and inflammation there stand in the same degree to the disease as the pustules or the scarlet eruption, in small-pox and in scarlet fever, do to these diseases. In rheumatism, the pains are merely the symptoms of a general disease: it is to this therefore that the attention is to be turned. There is, in every instance, a condition of plethora which constitutes the predisposition to rheumatism, and which renders cold or exposure to currents of air capable of producing the disease. With the medical treatment it is not my intention to interfere; but with respect to the prevention of the attack, or the warding off its return after it has been relieved, we would lay down the following rules:—

1. It is of the utmost importance to commence the renewal of the movements of the affected joints as early as possible after the pain is allayed. Their strength and flexibility depend solely on the early renewal of motion: on the contrary, rest tends to retard the health of the affected parts, which remain painful and stiff, and resist every movement which is attempted: the more motion is cultivated, the sooner are the limbs restored to their natural functions. Their exercise recovers the balance of the circulation, prevents effusion, aids absorption, and consequently favours flexibility. If rest be indulged, from the dread of pain, the joints and the parts surrounding them become rigid, contracted, and permanently impaired, whilst the muscles waste and lose their power of contracting.

2. Friction, and the daily use of the salt-water shower-bath,* have a powerful effect in warding off the returns of the disease.

3. Flannel next the skin is essential; but it should not be worn during the summer months. It ought not, however, to be too soon left off, nor too late resumed.

4. Acids, saccharine matters, pastry, and whatever can contribute to a dyspeptic state of the digestive organs, should be avoided; and, unless the strength be greatly reduced, water should be the only beverage.

When remission of blood has once occurred in any person, it is very apt to recur, sometimes spontaneously, sometimes on exposure to exciting causes; such, for example, as violent mental emotions, whether of a depressing or an exciting kind; the sudden stoppage of some customary evacuation, such as blood from piles; or, in females, the sudden suppression of the monthly uterine secretion, from exposure to cold or other causes. It is, therefore, of much importance for individuals subject to this species of hæmorrhage to maintain as perfect a state of mental tranquillity as possible, to keep the bowels open by exercise; and, if purgatives be required, by mild aperients, avoiding drastic cathartics and all mechanical or other irritants.

From the observations on Ventilation, we copy the following:—

Under no circumstances, it is scarcely necessary to remark, is the ventilation of the sick-room so essential as in febrile diseases of an infectious kind.* It may, however, be consolatory to those whose duty it is to attend such cases, to know, that infection communicated through the air rarely extends above a few feet from the body of the patient; and, even in the most malignant diseases, with the exception of confluent small-pox and scarlet fever of the worst kind, its influence does not exceed a few yards, if the room be well ventilated. On the contrary, if ventilation be neglected, the power of infection becomes greatly augmented from its concentration in confined and quiescent air: it even settles upon the clothes of the attendants and the furniture of the room; and these imbibe it most readily when their texture is woolly, fur, or cotton, or any loose or downy substance capable of receiving and readily retaining the air. Smooth and polished surfaces do not easily receive or retain infectious matter; consequently, the nurses and attendants, in cases of infectious diseases, should have glazed gowns, and aprons of oiled silk.

* The salt-water shower-bath is made by the addition of a quart of salt brine to three pailsful of water.

In no infectious diseases are these rules more essentially necessary than in small-pox and scarlet fever. It is well known that, if the bed-clothes of a patient labouring under either scarlet fever or small-pox be closely folded up, they will retain the infectious matter, and communicate the disease at a great distance of time; but the influence of free ventilation is so great, that medical practitioners who are attending small-pox patients, and who go from them into the open air, do not spread the disease. Indeed, all infection is weakened by dilution with air. The danger of infection is augmented if, along with bad ventilation, the atmosphere of the room be moist from any cause.

It is further consolatory to know that the infectious matter, even of the most virulent description, is not poisonous to every one who is placed within the sphere of its influence. A predisposition of the body to receive the infection must exist before it can be communicated; a condition which is augmented by fatigue and watching, defective nourishment, mental depression, or anything which can lower the vital powers. The necessity, therefore, of maintaining these by attention to rest, a sufficient quantity of good and generous diet, and cheerfulness of mind, need not be insisted upon.

In every case of infectious disease, the attendants, even in the best ventilated rooms, should stand on the windward, or that side of the sick-bed from which the current of air comes; as, by neglect of this rule, and by standing in the current which has passed over the patient, the infectious exhalations are blown upon them in a direct stream from the body of the patient. The attendants should never lean over the sick; nor should they receive their breath. The health, also, of the nurses should always be supported by a nutritious and generous diet; but not by brandy nor any other spirit.

The term infection, in its most extensive signification, implies some deleterious matter, originating from any source, and transmitted through the air, which is capable of causing diseases in the human body. When this matter is emanated from the diseased bodies of men, the term is frequently regarded as synonymous with contagion; but, in strictness of language, the latter refers only to the communication of disease by contact. Whatever may be the matter of infection, it may enter the body through the medium of the lungs, or by the saliva, or even through the surface, if the skin be abraded, or if any ulceration be present. The influence of infectious matter is evidently exerted on the nervous system, displaying itself by debility, inertness, dislike to motion, irritability and despondency of mind, and by the production of a disease similar to that of the person from whom the infectious matter has proceeded.

With the view of preventing such results, not only is it necessary to dilute the atmosphere of the room with pure air, but also to destroy the virulence of the infecting matter by chemical agents or fumigations. It is unnecessary to give any account of the numerous substances which have, at different periods, been used for this purpose; but merely to mention, that the most efficient of them, and that one which is most commonly employed, is chlorine, either simply diluted with atmospherical air, or mixed with air and moisture. The mode of extricating and employing it shall be described under the head of Fumigations. I may add here, that the substance most commonly employed as a disinfecting agent, namely, vinegar, is of very little value; and that pastilles, camphor, and other odorous matters, are worse than useless. I think I am authorized, also, in affirming, that no fumigating or disinfecting agent is equivalent to cleanliness, frequent changes of the sheets and linen of the patient, and free ventilation, for checking the propagation of infection.

Almost every individual has, at one time or other of his life, been teased and irritated by the application of leeches in the ordinary bungling way. This may seem a very simple affair; and it is often managed by females pretending to no skill whatever in nursing the sick; and yet the difference between the common mode and the best mode is very considerable; and, what is more to our purpose, also illustrative of the practical uses of this treatise:—

Leeches are seldom properly applied or managed. The part to which they are intended to be applied should be washed with a little soap and warm water, then with simple cold water, and, lastly, well dried. If the part be hot and inflamed, the leeches should be put, for a few minutes, into tepid water; and this should be done, also, when they are to be applied in the mouth, or to any part of the body warmer than the general surface; but, at all times, before they are applied, they should be dried between the folds of a clean, soft towel. The easiest and best mode of applying them is, first, to place the number to be used in a hollow, made with the points of the fingers, in a towel folded like a napkin; then so to turn the towel and the leeches upon the part where it is intended they should fix, that the towel will cover them. The hand must be kept over the towel to prevent their escape until they all bite, which usually happens in a few minutes; then the towel may be removed. By this method, twenty or thirty leeches can be applied more rapidly, and with less trouble, than two, when each leech is separately applied. If this plan, however, cannot be pursued, owing to the nature of the part to which they are to be applied, as, for example, the inner or outer angle of the eye, then the simplest method is to scratch the skin with the point of a needle, and to apply the leech to the spot moistened with the blood. When they are to be applied within the mouth, or any external cavity, each leech should be put into a large quill, with its head towards the open end, which should be applied to the part, and retained upon it until the leech is fixed, when the quill may be gently withdrawn.

Leeches should never be forcibly detached, as their teeth are apt to separate, and, being left in the wound, to cause an erysipelatous inflammation on the part. They should be permitted to drop spontaneously, which being the result of a temporary suffocation (apophysis), all muscular energy ceases in the animal, and the teeth shrinking, it drops off entire. A bread-and-water poultice, not too hot, should then be laid over the bites to encourage the bleeding. The invalid should be kept warm in bed when it is necessary to abstract a large quantity of blood. In general, the bites soon cease to bleed; but, in some instances, a copious flow takes place; and, therefore, to prevent exhaustion, the poultice should be frequently examined. This exhaustion is more likely to occur in children than in adults; and, for the same reason, leeches should not be applied upon children late in the evening, unless they are very urgently required. It is also proper, in young patients, to select for their application a part which admits of pressure; for example, a part over a bone or any other resisting medium, as it is often very difficult to staunch the bleeding when the leeches have been applied to the abdomen, or any unresisting part.

It should be generally understood that leeches will not bite, and are apt to fall off after they are fixed, if any peculiar odour be diffused through the air of the room; as, for instance, that of the vapour of hot vinegar, or the smoke from burning brown paper, or that from lighting a candle with a sulphur match, or from blowing out a candle, or tobacco smoke; neither will they bite if the person has been taking sulphur internally.

Leeches are often applied, without surgical advice, to swellings of the breast during nursing; but they are, in such a case, of little use. Indeed, as a general rule, leeches should not be applied in any case without the authority of the surgeon.

In order to preserve leeches for re-application, very little salt should be used to make them disgorge the blood; and they should be immediately afterwards thrown into clean water, which ought to be repeatedly changed, at least three or four times. Instead of salt, a little vinegar and water may be used; or the leeches may be merely stripped through the fingers, and then thrown into clean water. In order to preserve them, the vessel should be only half full of water; but the water ought to be changed once in eight days.

The manner and utility of the work may be inferred from the above extracts. It is plain, practical, and complete in details and directions; in advice and observation clear and judicious, without any alloy of professional mystery or pedantry.

The Life of Beethoven. Edited by Isaac Moscheles, Esq. 2 volumes, with Portrait, &c. &c.

This is a translation of Schindler's Biography of Beethoven, the original of which was, some months since, noticed so fully in Tait's Magazine, as to preclude us from going into the work in its English dress. Indeed, the Memoir in the Magazine was not limited to Schindler's Life, but adverted to other sources of information not then laid open to the English public. This, however, is Schindler's work at full length, with the important addition of several of Beethoven's original letters, and a number of anecdotes and traits which Mr. Moscheles has brought forward for the first time; together with gleanings from WOLKE, and the great master's pupil, RIMA.

To the lovers of music, these Memoirs have great, though melancholy, interest; nor can any one with indifference contemplate the miseries of a great artist not the less worthy of sympathy, that the source of his unhappiness was chiefly his own unregulated mind; originally, in all probability, ill-balanced, and exasperated by the fearful calamity which fell upon him so early in his career, and the many unfavourable external circumstances to which musical genius appears peculiarly exposed, among capricious princely patrons, and ignoble professional rivals. Anecdotes of Beethoven have already obtained wide circulation; and, as a specimen of the work, and a piece of fine and genial criticism, we take, in preference, this extract from the Editor's Preface. In early life, Mr. Moscheles, the pupil of Weber, became the secret worshipper of Beethoven, to whom he had the extreme delight of being introduced in 1810; but, although Beethoven was kind, their relative positions, and the eccentric habits of the master, forbade intimacy. Ten years later, after Moscheles had been for some time established in London, he was received in Vienna by Beethoven with great cordiality; and now we come to our extract:—

My feelings with respect to Beethoven's music have undergone no variation, save to become warmer. In the first half-score of years of my acquaintance with his works, he was repulsive to me as well as attractive. In each of them, while I felt my mind fascinated by the prominent idea, and my enthusiasm kindled by the flashes of his genius, his unlooked-for episodes, shrill dissonances, and bold modulations, gave me an unpleasant sensation. But how soon did I become reconciled to them! All that had appeared hard, I soon found indispensable. The gnome-like pleasantries, which at first appeared too distorted—the stormy masses of sound, which I found too chaotic—I have, in after-times, learned to love. But, while retracting my early critical exceptions, I must still maintain as my creed, that eccentricities like those of Beethoven are reconcilable with his works alone, and are dangerous models to other composers, many of whom have been wrecked in their attempts at imitation. Whether the musical world can ever recognise the most modern examples of effort to outdo Beethoven in boldness and originality of conception, I leave to future generations to decide.

But all that I have ever felt or thought of Beethoven, his elevation above all his contemporaries, and his importance to art, are so beautifully expressed by the celebrated critic, H. G. Nügel, that I shall not forbear to avail myself of a passage in one of his lectures. * * * It may be necessary to premise, that the critic considers J. S. Bach as the fountain-head of instrumental music, and ascribes its further and gradual development to C. P. E. Bach, J. Haydn, Mozart, Clementi, Cramer, Pleyel, until the art attained its climax under Beethoven at the beginning of the present century.—“Beethoven (says Nügel) appeared a hero in the art; and where shall the historian find words to depict the regeneration he produced, when the poet himself must here feel at a loss! Music had received two-fold injury in its purity of style—I mean instrumental music, unaided by the charms of vocalisation, as it had existed at the point to which it had been elevated by the Bachs. Mozart's Cantabile, as contrasted with the strict school, and Pleyel's divertimento style, had diluted and debased it; and to Beethoven, the hero, do we owe its regeneration now and for ever. Instinctively original, keenly searching for novelty, resolutely opposing antiquated forms, and freely exploring the new world which he had created not only for himself, but for all his brethren in the art, he may be said to have set to all a task, the solution of which is a constant regeneration of design and idea; thus giving full scope to the emanations of the mind. Beethoven's music wears an ever-varying aspect, bright in all its changes, yet could its language not at once become familiar to those who had lulled their higher powers to rest with the hum of Divertimentos and Fantasias, whilst on all sides the worshippers of the Cantilena were heard to exclaim, ‘And is such originality beautiful! and should there not be beauty to render originality palatable!’—little thinking that Beethoven's weapons were of a higher order, and that he conquered, not by winning over his hearers to the soft Cantilena alone, but by speaking in sounds unearthly, thrilling, penetrating, filling the soul, and carrying along—not individuals, but cities—even the whole of Europe. As to the art of pianoforte playing, that too gained a new aspect under him; running passages were set aside; the staccato style took unexpected forms in his hands. He introduced combinations of distant intervals, original in their very aspect, and heightened by peculiarities of rhythm and staccatos, absorbing in their sparkling brilliancy the Cantabile, to which they formed a glaring contrast. Unlike Steibelt, Dusseck, and some of their contemporaries, in their endeavours to draw out the tone (filés le son), Beethoven would throw it out in detached notes, thus producing the effect of a fountain gushing forth and darting its spray on all sides, well contrasting with the melodious episodes which he still preserved. But a genius like his soon found the limits of pianoforte music too narrow a sphere to move in, and he produced, in turn, works for stringed instruments, and for a whole band. Nevertheless, he never could dive into the mysteries of the science of counterpoint; had he done so, he would have trodden the path of a J. S. Bach, and his imaginative vein, as well as his creative genius, might have been checked. Let us then bow to him as the inventor, par excellence, of our era."

Our next and concluding extract shall be an illustration of princely patronage, taken direct from Schindler: Prince Nicholas von Galitzin deserves to be branded, and genius revenged, as far as the press has the power of sounding the voice of truth:—

In the beginning of the year 1824, Beethoven received from a Russian prince his first extremely flattering letter, with a request that he would write one or two instrumental Quartetts, and dedicate them to the writer. The terms proposed were highly agreeable, the condition being added, that the prince should possess both of the works to be composed for a full year as his sole property, and that, after the lapse of that time only, the master should have a right to publish them. This condition, which served to increase the loss that he eventually sustained, was not at first agreed to by Beethoven, but afterwards punctually fulfilled.

This was soon followed by a second letter to the same purport, and just as some serpents are said by their glance to fascinate their destined prey, did Beethoven, by whom adulation was in general totally disregarded, appear intoxicated by the flatteries of the Russian prince. He abandoned the composition of the Oratorio by C. Bernard, which was already begun, and set about a Quartett for Prince Nicholas von Galitzin, but before it was ready the prince applied for a second, and soon after for a third, and found means to gain over Beethoven so entirely, that he seemed to think no more of the Oratorio, of the tenth Symphony, or even of a work which he had already planned, and which was to be the grand effort of his life, the conclusion of his artistical exertions—namely—the setting Goethe's Faust to music. The musical world has to thank this man only that all these works, as well as a grand Requiem which the composer had also projected, remained unwritten, and for this he can never make amends. But let us proceed. The sum agreed on for the Quartetts, to be written for this princely Mæcenas, was 125 ducats. Beethoven, however, received from St. Petersburg nothing but letters filled with questions concerning doubtful or difficult passages in these Quartetts, to which the fullest and most circumstantial replies were immediately despatched, and it would be highly desirable, for the intelligibility of the pieces in question, that these answers should be published;* but never did he receive a single ruble. It was not till the month of December, in the year 1826, when a long illness had occasioned him considerable pecuniary embarrassment, that he applied to the prince for the stipulated sum, representing his distressed situation; but received no answer. Beethoven wrote again, and at the same time begged the Austrian ambassador and the banking-house of Stieglitz at St. Petersburg, in private letters, to make application to the prince. At length an answer arrived from the latter, that Prince Nicholas von Galitzin had gone to Persia to join the army, without leaving them any instructions to remit money to Beethoven. In this painful situation Beethoven recollected the offer made to him by the London Philharmonic Society, and wrote on the subject to Moscheles and Sir George Smart. I shall return again to this matter, and in the meantime I must be allowed to close this extraordinary case by observing, that if Prince Nicholas von Galitzin is still living, he can only hope to appease the manes of Beethoven by paying over this just debt of 125 ducats, either to some charitable institution, or to the Bonn committee for the erection of a monument to his memory.

Beethoven died early in the following year.

Musicians and dilettanti will find in this work many opinions and criticisms which they may with profit study; but the following remarks concern the entire number of auditors,—and for this reason we quote the passage. Beethoven declared one day, after one of his symphonies had been performed by an overcrowded orchestra, at the concerts of the great Musical Society of Vienna, that it never was his intention to write noisy music.

He added, that his instrumental works required an orchestra of about sixty performers only; for he was convinced that it was by such an orchestra alone that the rapidly-changing shades of expression could be adequately given, and the character and poetic subject of each movement duly preserved. That this declaration was dictated by sincere conviction will be readily admitted when I acquaint the reader that Beethoven was anxious to have his works performed in their true spirit, at the Concerts Spirituels, the orchestra of which contained something like the number of performers he had specified; and that he did not interest himself about their performance at the great music meeting. If double the amount of sixty performers displeased Beethoven, what would he have said of three or four times that number, no unusual orchestral occurrence at our music-festivals!

The next remark is Schindler's:—

To perform Beethoven's music, without regard to meaning and clearness, is hunting to death the ideas of the immortal composer. This mode of performance naturally arises out of the manifest ignorance of the sublime spirit of those works. It is at the same time the cause of their profanation, and consequently of their having too soon fallen into disuse; for the dignity and deep expression of many of the movements are sacrificed when a moderate rhythm is converted into the rhythm of dancing-time, especially if to this accelerated time be added the clang of a superabundant number of instruments. Hence may be traced the principal cause of that metamorphosis which suffices to convert a composition of lofty poetic feeling into a common prosaic piece—a transformation which the performers may literally be said to work out by the sweat of the brow.

Schindler remarks farther of Beethoven's pianoforte music:—

That pianoforte virtuosi, even of the highest rank, should have presumed to act the part of interpreters and lawgivers in Beethoven's music is a matter of regret: and all true admirers of the great master, who may wish to form a just notion of his Sonatas, either as to conception or execution, should be earnestly warned not to listen to their performance by any virtuoso who has laboured all his life on difficult passages, having only in view to improve the mechanical power of the fingers; unless, indeed, it be merely bravura movements; of which, thank Heaven, there are but few among these compositions. Beethoven truly remarked, "that a certain class of pianoforte performers seemed to lose intelligence and feeling in proportion as they gained dexterity of fingering." What can such bravura players make of the melodies of Beethoven, so simple yet so profoundly imbued with sentiment! Precisely what Liszt makes of Schubert's songs—what Paganini made of the Cantilena in Rode's concerto—and what Rubini makes of Beethoven's "Adelaide." All these, it must be acknowledged, are tasteless perversions of beautiful originals—violations of truth and right feeling in all those points in which such offences can be most sensibly felt.

New Edition of Tytler's Scotland.

The first volume of a new edition of this standard history has been published, at exactly half the price of the original edition. It is to appear in volumes, in alternate months, until concluded; and in its present size forms a well-printed and handsome library book,—not so large as to be cumbersome, nor yet so small as to be uncomfortable to the eyes, from the still minuter type in which notes are usually printed; but hitting the just medium. In a prefatory note, Mr. Tytler mentions that this edition has been carefully corrected. One volume of the new edition contains exactly the contents of one of the original edition of what is now considered the Standard History of Scotland.

1. Memoirs of Christian Females. By the Rev. James Gardner.

2. Records of Female Piety; comprising Sketches of the Lives of Women eminent for Religious Excellence. By James A. Huie.

These two works are of the same general character; and both are respectable compilations from more extended memoirs, or the writings and letters of the individuals depicted. Dr. Gardner's book is confined to women of modern times; while Mr. Huie carries his researches back to the earliest ages of Christianity. Beginning with Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, he concludes with Mrs. Wilson, the wife of the Indian missionary, who had the honour of being nearly the first Englishwoman that made an attempt to educate female Hindoo children. Both works are deserving of praise; and are likely to find a favourable reception among women, and especially with what is denominated the Religious Public.—We are rather surprised that Lady Morgan, Mrs. Jameson, Miss Martineau, and others of that bold sisterhood, have never noticed, as significant of the true condition of women and the nature of opinion concerning them, the fact placed before us in the title of these and many similar works, namely, that men almost uniformly designate the fair portion of the human creation by the general sexual appellation of Females, where it would seem absurd or ludicrous to speak of the other sex as Males. How, for example, would sound "Memoirs of Christian Males,"—Dr. Gardner's title; or "Records of Male Piety," which is Mr. Huie's; or "Accounts of Males of Genius,"—or of "Remarkable British Males,"—or "Males eminent for Religious Excellence!" The fact which we have chosen to illustrate, by the titles of Dr. Gardner's and Mr. Huie's books, conveys no reflection whatever on the authors of whom we are speaking, who merely follow the usage of society in speaking of women.

Mrs. Sigourney's Poems, Religious and Elegiac. 1 volume.

Pocahontas, and other Poems. By Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. 1 volume.

A complete edition of the poems of this favourite American poetess—the "Hemans of the New World," as she is often named—has been published by Tyas, in a very neat style. The popular poems of this lady are, we imagine, quite as well known among a certain order of English readers, as those of Mrs. Hemans herself—if not better—so speedily does the fashion of verse change and pass away. Collected volumes are always a severe ordeal to poets like Mrs. Sigourney, more distinguished by a certain mellifluous smoothness and graceful tenderness, than by originality or vigour; nor are we sure that she comes triumphantly off.

Barrett's Woman: a Poem.

This popular poem is, we suppose, out of copyright. Mr. Colburn has published a neat edition of it, to which some eloquent anonymous editor has prefixed an eulogium upon the sex, and a retrospect of what may be called the history of women.

Summer's Morning: a Poem. By Thomas Miller, Author of "A Day in the Woods," "Rural Sketches," &c. &c.

The basketmaker has excelled himself in this piece of beautiful and glowing description and poetical sentiment. The poem appears in trim so neat and summer-like, as to claim a place on the drawing-room table, independently of its intrinsic merits.

Flowers from the Holy Fathers.

We have here poetical paraphrases, on themes, selected from the writings of the FATHERS by a Roman Catholic, of which a few have previously appeared in the Catholic Magazine. They are written with elegance, in a spirit of fervent devotion, and with considerable poetic beauty and power. As a brief specimen, we select a few stanzas from the poem on a celebrated passage in St. Bernard, beginning "Non nos preterat flos temporum, coronemus nos ros, antiquum marcescant."

Gather fair flowers before they fade;
Crown thee with roses ere they pass away;
Disport thee in the chequered shade;
And seize sweet pleasure while you may.

Let slip no chance where founts of mirth
May wreath in smiles the passing hour;
And let us leave on Mother Earth
Signs of joy and merry dower.

Let us plant roses, and erect
Symbols of gladness where we go;
With pleasance be our birth-place decked,
And sweetest memory dearer grow.

Alas! how many bound desire
Within the precincts of a day;
Ask pleasure here, and aim no higher
Than rosy crowns that fade away.

To-morrow we shall die!—alas!
How darkly shall that morrow gloom:
Whilst ye have let fair virtue pass,
And fall into a fruitless tomb!

There is a Rock may not be riven—
Blossoms that may not pass away—
Seek ye that rest—it is in Heaven—
Gather its sweets while yet ye may.

Christians of every denomination must admire the sentiment of the following expressive lines, the text of which is also chosen from St. Bernard:—

An earnest, ardent will for good,
Increasing still with new desire,
Still longing more and more for food,—
Such is love's holy, heavenly fire.

Zeal for all virtue, more and more,
Is the instinctive mark to prove
That thou hast rightly learned to soar
Upon the upward wings of love!

Who does not every hour apply
Fresh fuel to increase the flame;
Who lifts not up his heart on high;—
Knoweth of love but by the name.

Who does not every day improve,
And grow more pure each forward pace,
Knows not the fire of holy love,
Nor basks within its kindly rays.

A firm resolve to welcome death
Rather than grovel back in sin;
To cling more loving to thy faith,
And every day new worth to win.

To bow before affliction's rod ;
To nurse a contrite soul apart ;—
Such are the fruits of love to God,
Within the faithful glowing heart !

As much to show the light in which Catholics consider the doctrine of penance, as for a specimen of these Poems, we select the following verses :—

My heart ran wide o'er sea and earth,
I long'd for rest and quiet peace,—
I gave the reins to boundless thought—
I search'd for it in noisy mirth,
I look'd for rest in sensual ease !—
I sought for it,—and found it not.

Soon as the airy phantom rose,
It melted from my gaze away.
It left me sad, and troubled more ;
Unseemly joy gave place to woes—
My sunshine grew a misty ray—
My brightest hopes were clouded o'er !

The deeper that I clung to earth,
The more I felt disquiet reign,
More gloom girt round my choicest glee,
For I, the while, was nursing dearth,
And hugging fast my iron chain,
Away, my God, from peace and Thee !

The more I fled from Thee, my All,
More sunk the iron in my breast ;
Thou wert my peace, and still I fled,
Deaf to the music of thy call,— Senseless to thine appeals of rest—
In seeming life, as I were dead !

Still Thou didst press me, and didst give
A penance to upbraid and chafe,
Till I should melt before thy grace—
Till I should turn to Thee and life,
And find in Thee a harbour safe—
A refuge sure, and resting-place !

Then didst Thou give my heart increase
Of will and power, of love and light,
That like a mighty river flows :
Then did my heart recover peace ;
And, turning from a world's despite,
In Thee, my God, found calm repose !

new popular form for One Shilling.]

The Fluctuations of Trade ; or, The Secret of foreseeing when Prices are going to Rise or Fall. By H. J. Wright, Esq.

The professed object (how far soever it may be accomplished by this pamphlet) is shown by an exposition of the power and workings of the Bank of England, principally as the operations of that great establishment affect prices.

Labour's Wrongs and Labour's Remedy ; or, The Age of Might and the Age of Right. By J. F.
Bray.

A well-meaning man, imbued with both the good and the evil of Socialism, has given the world his ideas on many of the points which at present agitate society.
There is but too much cause for the complaints and grievances he enumerates ; but we are not so sure as to the remedies he suggests.

Records of Wesleyan Life.

This is a religious tale, chiefly intended to illustrate the peculiar habits of the Methodists in domestic life, in their church discipline, and in their social relations.

Family Recollections and National Progress. By Miss Goldie, Author of "Truth and Opinion."

The first part of this little work is devoted to reminiscences which will delight all natives of Scotland, of the olden time. Under the title National Progress, Miss Goldie indulges in various, moral, metaphysical, and theological lucubrations of a somewhat discursive kind.

Four Lectures on Spiritual Christianity, delivered in the Hanover Street Rooms. By Isaac Taylor.

These lectures were delivered at the request of the Committee of the London City Mission. Their subjects are—1st, The exterior characteristics of Spiritual Christianity ; 2d, The Truths peculiar to Spiritual Christianity ; 3d, The Ethical characteristics of Spiritual Christianity ; 4th, Spiritual Christianity the hope of the world at the present moment. The discourses fully maintain the previous high reputation of the lecturer, as a bold and adventurous thinker, within a certain range. We have been most attracted by the Fourth Lecture, though unwilling to augur so gloomily of the results of mere civilisation as the lecturer does.

The Philosophy of Death. By John Reid, Surgeon, Markinch.

This work is strictly medical and statistical, which we mention, as the title might mislead. The subject is fertile ; and the writer has collected and arranged many valuable facts bearing upon it, and gives a history of those diseases in particular which are generally followed by death, with the symptoms which mark its approach.
The work is composed in a popular style, and is highly creditable to the intelligence, and professional attainments of the author.

Last Thoughts on War. By Thomas Thrusch.

The author of this work, from conscientious conviction that war, whether defensive or offensive, is opposed to the will of God, as revealed in the Gospel, many years since resigned his commission as a captain in the navy, in a letter addressed to George the Fourth. That letter is here republished by him, in his eighty-first year, together with others on the same subject, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury. It is impossible not to be impressed by the earnestness with which this Christian veteran implores the divine blessing upon his humble endeavours to solemnly warn his countrymen against the atrocities and miseries of a system which he, with the Quakers and some other religious sects, believe to be opposed to the spirit of the gospel of Christ.

Familiar Introduction to the History of Insects.

By Edward Newman, F.L.S.

We have here a complete popular treatise, begun some years since, and now brought to a happy conclusion. It is a kind of first book on Entomology, but may answer every purpose to nine-tenths of students. They are taught the art of preserving and classifying insects, as well as their history and physiology. The book is published by Van Voorst, which is enough as to the accuracy and beauty of its illustrative butter-flies, moths, and beetles. How many wonders does it unfold of the habits and instincts of the most minute individuals of the animated creation !

Memoir of a pious Sunday school-girl ; written by her

NEW NOVELS AND ROMANCES.

Of these indispensable necessities of life among the middle and higher classes of English society, the present season has been remarkably prolific. We shall name a few of the best; and

I. Waldemar, an Historical Romance. By M. Ingemann. 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

The author is a Danish writer of eminence among his own countrymen. His romance is translated by a young lady, who has been for some years residing in Denmark; and it has had the advantage besides of passing through the hands of a competent editor. M. Ingemann has been called the "Danish Scott." He is undoubtedly of the school founded by Scott; though, making every allowance for the disadvantages attending a translation, at a considerable distance below his great prototype. The work is, however, far above mediocrity; and from the variety of incident and character, it is entertaining. It will, moreover, convey to the English reader some knowledge of the history of Denmark at a remote but exciting crisis, and also an idea of Danish manners and of its popular ancient literature. The countrymen of M. Ingemann must still be susceptible of impressions from the supernatural, for which those of Scott have grown too frigid and matter-of-fact, or else the author has been too daring in the employment of diablerie.

II. Carleton's Fawn of Spring-Vale, Clarinet, and other Tales. 3 vols. Curry & Co. Dublin.

Some of these stories, by the author of the inimitable "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," have already appeared in The Dublin University Magazine; but the "Fawn of Spring-Vale," the longest tale, and that on which it is evident the author has bestowed the greatest pains, appears for the first time. It is a Tale of Love and Woe, framed on the greatest-misery principle, but fraught with beauty and delicacy, and displaying the workings of the passion in a mind of morbid sensibility, with the elaborate minuteness of Richardson's dissections of the female heart. The tone is however unhealthy; of which the author seems aware, as in the preface he states, that the Tale is meant as a warning to the young and fair against an excess of sensibility, and the foolish indulgence of a first love. The warning, however, is more prominent in the preface than in the course of the story; which fairly wears out the reader's sympathies, by taxing them, if not too vehemently, yet far too long.

III. Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans. By Thomas James Serle, author of "The Merchant of London," &c. &c. 2 vols. Colburn.

The author has given dramatic interest to this delightful romance by making the relater of the story the contemporary, the survivor, and the early enthusiastic lover of the inspired and heroic maid, of whose actions he was the eye-witness. The narrative, which opens charmingly with sweet pictures of the girlhood of Jeanne, and the peasant family group by which she is surrounded, becomes somewhat languid during her repeatedly baffled attempts of accomplishing her grand object, of reaching the King of France on her Heaven-directed mission; but that accomplished, the interest, human and superhuman, seldom flags, until that catastrophe, which is at the least as deep a stain upon English annals as the captivity of Napoleon in St. Helena. Mr.

Serle follows in the outline of his narrative the account which French historians and chroniclers have given of the Maid of Orleans; filling that up, from a rich and even poetical imagination. If there be an original and essential difference between the Gauls and the Teutonic race, there is nothing in literature in which the dissimilitude is more conspicuous than in the views which Voltaire on the one hand, and Schiller and Southey on the other, have taken of the character and history of the Maid of Orleans. Mr. Serle, we need not say, has taken the same pure, holy, and ennobling view as the German dramatist and the English poet. His romance we recommend as fitted to warm and ameliorate the heart, while it gently excites and amuses the fancy.

IV. The Marriage Mart; or, Society in India. By an Indian Officer. 2 vols. Colburn.

The frame-work of these clever and lively sketches is of the simplest description. An amiable and beautiful young lady, Helen Sandys, is shipped off for the MARRIAGE MART, and thrown into society of all kinds which can afford the author a favourable opportunity of depicting Anglo-Indian character and habits of life; which he does with spirit and fidelity. Nor are the Sketches confined to Indian officers and civilians, with their respective womankind, brats, and ayahs. They embrace the scenery and customs of Hindostan, and whatever of the picturesque and novel meets the eye of the newly-arrived European. Some of the Indian officers and civilians, old stagers, are evidently pictures from the life, and capably hit ones.

PAMPHLETS.

CONSTITUTION of the CHURCH of SCOTLAND, as ESTABLISHED at the REVOLUTION. By Alexander Peterkin, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts. [This pamphlet is pat to the time. The true constitution and functions of the Kirk are exemplified in the most satisfactory manner, by acts of Parliament, and the recorded proceedings of the Church itself. These, which are actual transcripts of the several acts of Parliament, minutes of the General Assembly, and other documents, are introduced by a historical preface, which is, in complexion, "Presbyterian true blue." But the most important part of the pamphlet, at this crisis, is that which explains the powers and functions of the Lord High Commissioner, her Majesty's representative in the Assembly. These appear larger and more direct in their operation than is generally understood.]

SUPPLEMENT to the SECOND EDITION of WADE'S BRITISH HISTORY, CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED. [This Supplement to a valuable work contains several useful tables, and a large addition to the chronology.]

SCHEME of the LONDON LIBRARY. By W. D. Christie, Esq., Barrister.

OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES' REFORM in BANKRUPTCY, &c. By an Accountant. [A pamphlet containing some useful suggestions, connected with a matter which still greatly requires reform.]

HINTS on a NEW SYSTEM of PRISON DISCIPLINE. [This writer says, that as all systems that torture the body have failed to reclaim criminals, he would change the plan and torture the mind, by setting the uneducated to the A, B, C, and the better educated to geometry, languages, &c., obliging all to learn by heart, and repeat things,—thus "torturing their minds," not their bodies. He would not allow them the indulgence of manual labour, but reform them by the dread of being again sent to "those detestable school-prisons."]

STATEMENT of the SATISFACTORY RESULTS of EMIGRATION to CANADA, for the GUIDANCE of EMIGRANTS, with a Map.

STAMMERING and other IMPEDIMENTS of SPEECH CURED by SURGICAL OPERATIONS on the THROAT. By James Yearsley. [This pamphlet, the substance of a paper read before the Westminster Medical Society, seems curious; but we do not pretend to give any opinion on its merits. The illustrative cases are numerous, and it looks like candour to find acknowledged that many of them have turned out failures.]

LEICESTER GOAL. By A. Balance, Esq., of the Middle Temple. [The author of this dialogue, who does not seem to know the difference between a gaol and a goal, as he uniformly employs the latter word to designate the place of Mr. Baines' confinement, means to show himself a dexterous special pleader and deep casuist, while he is in reality what we forbear to designate. Or, does he employ the term goal for gaol in a punning sense, as designating the place at which every conscientious Dissenter in these times should aim, and which every passing week more of their number are reaching? Leicester goal will certainly prove the starting-post for a different kind of race, if matters are longer carried on with the high hand at present held over the consciences of religious men.]

FRIENDLY HINTS to FEMALE SERVANTS. By Mrs. J. Bakewell. [A sensible little work, containing much good counsel; the only difficulty is, how it is to be impressed upon those who require it.]

A PRACTICAL INTRODUCTION to LIFE and FIRE ASSURANCE. By Thomas Millar, Accountant in Edinburgh. [This is a comprehensive work, showing the method of calculating the value of Annuities, Reversions, Assurances, Policies, Bonuses, &c. It gives a view of the distinctive features of the leading insurance-offices in England and Scotland, and many other useful matters connected with the important subject of assurance. We understand that the book is thought well of by men of business, as to the soundness of the principles and the accuracy of the tables.]

THOUGHTS on the ABUSES of the PRESENT SYSTEM of COMPETITION in ARCHITECTURE. By Henry Austin. [This professional gentleman states his complaint in a Letter to Earl de Grey. The sum and substance of his argument is, that architects degrade themselves, and lower their profession, by allowing persons totally ignorant of the difficulties of their art, to sit in judgment and pronounce upon their plans and works. In every branch of the Fine Arts, the amateurs are now the sole judges. They hold the cash and the patronage—and what can the poor artists do but submit to their crude or conceited judgments! Those who "live to please" must also "please to live."]

THE RESOURCES of AUSTRALIA. By a Colonist, &c. [This writer clearly sees the errors of the Southern and Western Settlements, of which he speaks like a sensible man. Much capital has been worse than squandered, much misery has been endured, much poverty entailed; but now that the worst is encountered, prosperity must gradually come. He speaks very favourably of Port Philip, and gives useful hints and advice to emigrants in general.]

SERIAL WORKS AND REPRINTS.

THE POEMS and PLAYS of THOMSON; CRABBE'S TALES; and Miss Sedgewick's novel, THE LINWOODS, have been added to Smith's excellent STANDARD LIBRARY. They are printed in his usual style of elegance, and at the same moderate rate.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE. Part XXXII. The Tempest.

FOX'S BOOK of MARTYRS. Part III.

JONES' OUTLINE of the ANIMAL KINGDOM. Parts XIV. and XV.

CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION for the PEOPLE. Part V. Emigration.

BRANDE'S DICTIONARY of SCIENCE and LITERATURE. Part IV.

FISHER'S ILLUSTRATED EDITION of SCOTT'S COMMENTARY on the BIBLE. [This edition appears in Parts, of which four are already published. The work needs no praise. The edition is of quarto size; handsomely printed; and elegantly illustrated with landscape or scenic engravings, taken from a series of views of places mentioned in Holy Writ.]

MRS. ELLIS'S FAMILY SECRETS; or HINTS to THOSE who WOULD MAKE HOME HAPPY. [This work is appearing in monthly numbers. What it promises to tell, were, indeed, a secret worth knowing. The three numbers we have seen, contain a simple, domestic story, illustrative of the importance of temperance, or, perhaps, in certain cases, tee-totalism, to domestic happiness. It is sensible, and of excellent tendency; though, in the present highly excited state of the public appetite, it may, perhaps, not be found sufficiently stimulating. It is embellished with neat illustrative engravings; but they, also, we fear, are in too quiet a taste for the time, though quite in harmony with the tone of the work.]

BELLS and POMEGRANATES. No. I. [This is the first Part of a dramatic poem, by Mr. Browning, the author of Paracelsus. It bears the obscure title of Pippa Passes; meaning that the heroine, Pippa, a charming Italian peasant-girl, employed at the silk-mills in the Trevisian, passes before the reader; though, in their simplicity, many readers may imagine that the pippa passes may refer to some new-fangled flourishes in the noble art of self-defence. So much for the danger of an affected or equivocal title. The opening of the poem promises well, and contains some beautiful poetry, imbued with the philosophy conspicuous in Paracelsus.]

MAGAZINE of SCIENCE. Part XXV.

FINE ARTS.

THE RHINE, ITALY, and GREECE, illustrated by a SERIES of VIEWS from DRAWINGS by BARTLETT, LEITCH, Colonel COCKBURN, &c. &c. Part I.—[This is another of the Messrs FISHERS' embellished serial works. It is well-executed, very attractive, and very cheap.]

SCENERY and ANTIQUITIES of IRELAND, Part II.—The views in this Part demand no particular notice; but we are greatly pleased to find the far-travelled American WILLIS, who composes the letter-press which accompanies the plates, telling the British people, that on the western shores of Ireland, on the coast of Antrim, Derry, Donegal, and Sligo, there is scenery as beautiful and romantic as in that Italy to which they run away in ignorance of the beauties of their own country.

SPECIMENS of ENGRAVING by the OMNIGRAPH; published by BECKER & Co. the patentees.—This invention belongs to the Arts, not to the Fine Arts. It is applied to Maps, Charts, PLANS, Surveys, &c. which, by means of it, it is stated, can be engraved with the greatest precision and expedition. In six plates we are presented with specimens of different kinds. The map of England and Wales, though on a small scale, is clear and distinct. The principle of the Omnigraph is not explained.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE last month has been a busy and eventful one in the political world.

On Friday the 30th of April, the day which had been previously fixed for the opening of the Budget, Lord John Russell, to the surprise alike of friend and foe, announced in his place in the Commons, that on the first order-day after the 31st of May, he should move a Committee of the whole House "to consider the acts relating to the trade in corn." This unexpected announcement is described, by the Whig papers, as having fallen like a bomb among the Tory M.P.'s, and as having excited proportional delight and enthusiasm among the occupants of the "Liberal" benches. At a subsequent period of the evening, Lord John announced that the change which he intended to propose was "a moderate fixed duty," and on that day week he announced its amount as follows:—on wheat, 8s. per quarter; on rye, peas, and beans, 5s.; on barley, 4s. 6d.; and on oats, 3s. 4d.

On the same evening on which the first of these announcements was made, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his Budget, and scarcely less excitement was created by its contents than by Lord John's "notice." Its substance can be very shortly stated. The deficiency of income as compared with expenditure for last year, is £1,841,000. The expenditure for the ensuing year the Chancellor calculated at £50,781,776; the income at £48,310,000; leaving a deficiency of £2,421,000 to be provided for. Several of the items, however, included in the above estimate of the expenditure—such as £180,000 of "extraordinary expenses" for Canada, and £400,000 for the expedition to China—being of a temporary character, he estimated the "permanent" deficiency at £1,700,000.

It would be impossible, within the limits of this department of the Magazine, to give a full account of the discussion, or anything more than a very meagre sketch of its general features. It was not confined to the sugar duties, but ranged over the other points in the Ministerial project, and over the whole subject of free trade. There is one thing which cannot fail to strike the attention of every reader—that not one of the speakers professed hostility to free-trade principles generally, and that many of the Tory speakers, on the contrary, declared their belief in their soundness, and confined their objections only to their "proposed application"—that is, the application which infringes on their own monopolies. As regards the sugar-duties, the main arguments relied on against the proposed alteration, were, 1st, that it would be unjust and injurious towards the Colonies, depressed under the difficulties arising from emancipation; and, 2d, that to open the market to foreign slave-grown sugar would tend to increase slavery and the slave-trade. To the first of these arguments, it is replied—that the planters received ample compensation for the "injury" inflicted by the emancipation of their negroes; that no promise, expressed or implied, was ever come under by the mother country that the enormous "protection" given to Colonial produce—a protection by which the people of this country pay the compensation money over again every four years—should be continued for ever and in all circumstances; and that the Colonists are still to be "protected" by a differential duty amounting to 50 per cent. To the second argument, regarding the encouragement which the scheme might give to slavery, it is answered—that the influence which our refusing to take the sugar of the countries referred to, exercises on the question of slavery-abolition, is, so to speak, a mere drop in the bucket; that the maintenance of the present system, on the grounds alleged, would rather have a prejudicial than a beneficial effect on that question, as being in effect a formal proclamation to all the world, that free labour has been found less profitable than slave labour; that heavier duties are about to be laid by the Brazils

(a valuable market) on our manufactures, expressly on the ground of our virtual prohibition of their sugar; that, in addition to the injury which would thus be done to the people of this country, the present system maintains, at an exorbitant price, an article essential to their comforts, and of most extensive use, and that it is not just nor reasonable to continue or to increase a heavy injustice on our own people at home, in the dubious hope of contributing a mite hereafter towards the benefit of the blacks of Brazil. It was further replied, on this head, that it was rank hypocrisy for the organs of the West India interest, the Sandons and Gladstones, the old upholders of slavery, to put forward the pretence of philanthropy, where the real motive was self-interest; and that, to be consistent, all who took this ground should insist on the exclusion of all slave produce whatever, such as our whole supply of cotton. Many of the speeches contained scarcely the slightest allusion to the sugar-duties, several of the Corn Kings, both Whig and Tory, explicitly avowing that they opposed the reduction of the duty on sugar only on the ground that they were opposed to the reduction of the duty on corn; and Mr. Aaron Chapman, the mouthpiece of the timber monopolists, took precisely similar grounds.

The debate, as to length, was unparalleled, we believe, in the annals of speechifying, the division taking place only on the eighth night. Much anxiety was felt regarding the tone which would be assumed by Sir Robert Peel, as he had more than once, on former occasions, expressed opinions favourable to propositions similar to those of the Ministry. But the event showed that he was prepared to go with his party in resisting, out-and-out, the present adoption of any and every portion of the ministerial schemes. He imitated, however, Mr. Goulburn, and all the old office-holders of his party, in studiously avoiding to commit himself regarding the "principle" of the measure; and we search in vain through his speech, filling nine columns of the Times, for any declaration which would prevent him bringing forward a sweeping alteration in the corn and timber-duties next month, or in the sugar-duties next year. The only point on which he spoke explicitly regarded his preference of a sliding to a fixed duty, on which he pompously declared he would "determinedly take his stand;" but as to the amount of duty, he could not enter into "details."—On the vote being taken, the result was—for going into a Committee of Ways and Means, 281; against it, 317;—majority against the Ministry, 36. Fourteen "agriculturalists" and West India men among the Ministerialists voted with the Tories, and eighteen staid away, nearly all of whom are known to be indisposed to support the new scheme. The Tories stuck together to a man. Amidst the noise which followed the declaration of the numbers, Lord John Russell made an announcement which neither the Members nor reporters seem to have heard, but which was published in The Globe next evening, that the course which the Ministers intended to pursue was, to take the sense of the House upon their proposal regarding the Corn Laws, and, if defeated on that point (as there is not a doubt that they will be) to appeal to the country by a dissolution.

The nature of the reception of the Ministerial project "out of doors," has not, while we write, been sufficiently developed to afford data for conjecturing the result of a general election; and this is not the place nor the time for entering into speculation on the subject. The course, however, which ought to be pursued, both now and in the event of an election, by the true friends of free trade, in the new position in which they have been placed, seems plain enough. Let them never forego for a moment the pursuit of the object they have pledged themselves to obtain; but let them not be guilty of the folly of refusing the instalment which the Whigs have been driven to offer them. The instalment, no doubt, is a small one—but it is worth having, and will not prevent us getting the rest; the motives of those who offer it are perhaps far from being disinterested—but they can help us to get it. The effect of the proposed alterations, and particularly of that on the corn-duties, will doubtless be to improve commerce generally, especially as to steadiness; and even the price of corn, sugar, or timber will, by the reductions at present contemplated, be made materially cheaper to the general body of consumers. We do not, however, regard it as by any means a matter of certainty that the scheme will be successful in raising the desired revenue. But, even were the Ministerial measure a small matter in itself, its adoption would be as the letting out of the waters,—it would be the breaking down of a formidable barrier,—the dissipation of a pernicious prestige,—the assertion of a principle capable of being worked out to great and valuable results. It is, therefore, worth having; and why should the free-traders not have it, if it can be obtained without any dereliction of principle on their part, or any injury to the greater and higher object they have in view! The motives of the Whigs in offering the gift, form no good reason for refusing it. It would have been better for them, no doubt, had they taken up the subject when their word was law in one house of the legislature, and their credit good throughout the country, than now, when they are sunk in weakness, and when the anti-monopolists are less in need of their assistance than ever before;—but it is to be remembered that they have still a large party at their heels, including a couple of hundred M.P.s, who on all occasions obsequiously say ditto to Lord John; moreover, that they are the Government,—and that they can, therefore, give some assistance in this matter; and we are glad to see that most of the Anti-Corn-Law party (the total repealers) throughout the country, have already expressed their approval of the Whig project so far as it goes. Let not the Repealers, however, deviate one hair's-breadth from the straight path they have hitherto trod, either to serve or to injure Whig or Tory. But it would be superfluous and presumptuous to offer such counsel to those who have so skillfully and energetically led the Anti-Bread-Tax agitation for the last two years—they are not the men likely for one moment to trust their cause out of their own hands into those of the Whigs, who, by blunder or betrayal, have ruined almost every cause they have taken in hand. Use them, but trust them not.

There are, it seems, some Radical Reformers who, though not partakers nor approvers of the follies of the Chartist policy, hesitate about supporting the Ministerial scheme, either directly or indirectly, on the ground that their so doing might tend to give the Whigs another lease of office, and so prolong the deadened and heartless state of political feeling, so ruinous to the cause of Progressive and Radical Reform, which has existed for the last five years. Neither the honesty nor the policy of this course are very apparent. It is long since we denounced, on the grounds both of its dishonesty and its impolicy, the proposal urged on the Radicals to go out of their way, or put their principles in abeyance, for the purpose of “keeping out the Tories;” and, on the same grounds, we would denounce any opposition to, or any refusal to support, a good measure, merely for the purpose of putting out the Whigs, especially when that support can be efficiently and consistently given accompanied by an expression of our own principles and views. But, even supposing that the free-trade agitation should have the effect of renewing the Whig lease of office, the lease could not probably be other than a very short one, while the immediate, but, far more, the prospective benefits of their measure would be left behind them. To even the most inveterate Whig-hater, then, we would say, The thing is good, and, therefore, although to keep in the Whigs may be an evil, by all means let us have it—without them if we can, with them if we must.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLE'S KIRK BILL.—The settlement of the present “troubles” of the Kirk having been abandoned as a hopeless task, first by Lord Aberdeen and then by the Marquis of Breadalbane, has been taken up by the Duke of Argyle. The Duke's Bill is slightly more “liberal” towards “the people” than the Veto Bill; but it is at the best a clumsy and valueless expedient. By the correspondence, however, read by the Duke, it appears that the Assembly's Non-Intrusion Committee are willing to accept of it as a satisfactory settlement, and that even Mr. Candlish and the rest of the “whole-hog” men—who have for the last twelve months been denouncing patronage as “a dethroning of Christ,” as “earthly, sensual, and devilish,” and have entered into a “solemn league and covenant” for its utter extirpation—have agreed to take the Duke's small instalment as payment in full. Such seems the plain meaning of a letter to his Grace from the reverend gentleman named, which begins by declaring that he and his total-abolition brethren “see clearly” that the introduction of such a measure as the Duke's “necessarily would supersede the agitation against patronage, and diminish the probability of its abolition; but” (for the sake of the “peace of the Church”) it “will meet with their hearty support!” This fresh exposure of the insincerity of the agitators is likely to be the only result of the introduction of the Duke's Bill; for there is not the slightest chance of its becoming law. Besides the opposition of the Tory peers, headed by Lords Aberdeen and Haddington, Lord Dunfermline, whose opinion on this point will carry great weight among the Whig Lords, has come forward as the opponent of any legislation on the subject, till such time as the “non-intrusion” advocates yield obedience to the law as it stands. This is broad and safe ground to stand upon for all opponents of the attempted clerical usurpation; for to concede to the Kirk even the Veto, while she maintains her present position of defiance to the civil courts, would be, in effect, to concede her claims to a supremacy above the law of the land and its appointed tribunals.

ENGLAND.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—The contest (in the last week of April) for the representation of Nottingham, rendered vacant by the death of Sir Ronald Ferguson, possessed features of considerable interest and novelty. The candidates were, Mr. Larpent, a London merchant, who stood on the principles of suffrage-extension, the ballot, and total and immediate repeal of the corn-laws; and the well-known Mr. John Walter (alleged proprietor of The Times), the principal article in whose creed—the only one indeed to which he ever voluntarily made allusion—was Repeal of the New Poor-Law. The aim of the Tories was to make the whole contest seem to turn on this single question, and so procure the aid of all the members of any party who are opposed to the “Bastille” system. For this purpose, The Times and Standard, and all the other organs of the party, strenuously proclaimed that Mr. Walter did not appear before the electors of Nottingham either as Conservative or Whig, but simply and solely as an opponent of the New Poor-Law—a question for which all others ought at that moment to be cast aside. The device succeeded. The Chartists, who, in Nottingham, possess, it is said, three hundred votes, gave an enthusiastic and active support to Walter, who, throughout the contest, was unequivocally the popular candidate, and who was ultimately returned by a considerable majority, the numbers being, at the close of the poll, (Tuesday, April 27,)—for Walter, 1983; for Larpent, 1745. There can be no doubt that the battle was fought and decided almost solely on the question of the Poor-Law; and as there were no local circumstances existing to militate against that measure peculiarly at Nottingham, the result seems decisive of the fact, that the New Poor-Law is deeply disliked by a larger portion than has yet been suspected, both of the middle and working classes of England. This is a point of no small importance; and although the Ministry will probably endeavour to push through the measure without material alteration, it is evident that the demonstration has not, in the prospect of a general election, been without its effect on not a few of the M.P.s, both Whig and Tory. Another feature of interest in this contest, was the circumstance of an open and avowed coalition between the local Chartists and Tories. Regarding the lopping off of another vote from the attenuated majority by means of which the Whigs have so long contrived to stick to their places, as fit to be rather rejoiced at than regretted, we yet cannot help lamenting and condemning the course pursued by the Nottingham Chartists on this occasion. They had before them, on the one hand, an advocate of a large extension of the Suffrage, of the Ballot, and of a repeal of the Bread-Tax, and who has, on former occasions, shown himself sincere and independent in the assertion of his principles; on the other, they had an avowed bread-taxer, a known opponent of each and all of the "five points" for the pursuit of which they profess to have abandoned every other object, and whose sole recommendation to their favour consisted in his opposition to the New Poor-Law. Now, admitting all that has been charged against that measure—admitting that in its operation it is cruel, harsh, and irritating—still we would ask, is it more harsh, and cruel, and unjust, than the Bread-Tax!—by which industry is doubly robbed—by denying it employment, and by taxing its bread. Surely it would be a more important, as well as a more worthy and manly object, for the Chartists to strive to put an end to the law which sinks the industrious working-man into pauperism, than to waste their energies in the comparatively paltry squabble as to whether the pauperised victim of the Bread-Tax shall receive the bitter and degrading pittance of the parish in his own hovel or in the workhouse. But the Chartists of Nottingham oppose the man who, by enlarging the field of their labour and untaxing their bread, would preserve them in independence and comfort, and befool themselves by eagerly supporting him who—while maintaining the law which, by robbing them at once of their right to sell their labour, and of its due reward, degrades them into paupers, and strikes down their independence—would grant them, as his only kindness, the pitiful boon of "out-door relief." Give us the man who would do what he could to prevent paupers being made, rather than him who having for his own profit helped to make paupers, would force the parish to be a little more liberal and a little more indulgent to them than it might otherwise be inclined.

"That which makes us have no need
Of physic, that is physic indeed."

That is your true friendship for the poor, which, by merely refraining from robbing them, prevents them from needing the friendship and charity of their neighbours. He is your true "poor-man's friend," who would preserve to him his rights and his independence; not he who defrauds him of his bread while he is able and has opportunity to labour, and whose sympathy for him only commences when he has been degraded into a pauper.

CHINA.

The overland mail from India, whose usual time of arrival is the 10th of each month, reached London on the 6th, and was anticipated by the Paris express of the London papers on the previous day. It brought advices from Canton to February 11; Bombay, April 1; and Alexandria, April 23. The intelligence both from Egypt and India is destitute of interest: in the former country, everything awaited the return of the consuls; the latter, in many districts, still continued in a very disturbed state, and additional outbreaks were dreaded, owing to the intrigues of Persia. From China, the news, though meagre, is of such a character as sadly to belie the boastings of the Whig journals last month, as to the whole question having been "finally and satisfactorily settled." Captain Elliot and the Chinese commissioner, Keshen, having agreed on the conditions detailed in our last, would seem to have immediately set about carrying them into operation. On the 20th of January, Captain Elliot issued a circular, announcing that negotiations were "proceeding satisfactorily," but with the significant addendum of a warning to all British subjects not to return to Canton till he should pronounce it "safe and suitable." On the 1st of February, in conjunction with Commodore Bremer, he put forth a proclamation that the island of Hong Kong had become a part of the Queen of England's dominions, and all the residents therein were consequently subject to British law, but that, "pending her Majesty's further pleasure," the natives would be governed by the laws and usages of China. On the 7th, another proclamation was issued nearly to the same effect. So far all had gone well, and the two commissioners, Elliot and Keshen, had met on Hong Kong on the 27th of January, and partaken of a splendid banquet, furnished by the latter, as "a demonstration of the friendly relations existing between the two countries." That the mutual congratulations of the plenipotentiaries on the skill and success of their diplomacy was rather premature, seems sufficiently indicated by the unfortunate circumstance of their having since both been recalled by their respective governments: Elliot, apparently, for asking too little, and Keshen for granting too much. When the despatches left, it was reported, and universally believed, that the Emperor, on being told of the capture of the Bogue forts, and the subsequent negotiations, was much enraged at the "presumptuous proceedings" of the British, had positively declared that Hong Kong should not be given up, and had despatched a new commissioner, made of sterner stuff, to supersede Keshen. On May 7, Lord John Russell announced in the House of Commons, in answer to a question, that Captain Elliot had been recalled; the reason for this step, although not so stated, being, as is universally understood, the very sufficient one—that the plenipotentiary was guilty both of the fault of asking too little, and of the misfortune of not obtaining it. His successor is Sir Edward Pottinger, well known for his services in India. The conditions ceded by Keshen, and accepted by Elliot, granted, as we said in our last, but a very insignificant portion of the objects which the war was announced as undertaken to obtain; and, as the confirmation even of these has been refused by the emperor as giving too much, it may be very safely inferred that the adjustment of the dispute, which has been more than once exultingly announced as "satisfactorily settled," has not yet been attained, nor is likely to be, without some further time and trouble.

AGRICULTURE.

The weather, during the whole of April, and the first three weeks of May was, with few exceptions, highly favourable for the operations of the husbandman. The sowing was completed under the most favourable circumstances, except where slightly retarded, in the Border districts, by the difficulty of getting the turnips off the ground; and the fields are represented as everywhere promising most favourably. The lambing season, also, has, on the whole, proved above an average. The grain markets have been dull, without any material variation in price since last month. During April, the price of fat cattle fell considerably, while a slight advance has taken place in lean. These remarks apply to the different districts both of England and Scotland, nearly without exception.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

JULY, 1841.

PRESENT DUTY.

THE very agreeable surprise prepared by the Government has hardly given the people time to look around them, when they are called upon to act. Fortunately, the line of public duty was never more clearly defined, never less perplexed by clashing interests, than at present. Were nothing more to be gained than merely keeping in the Whigs that they might proceed upon the unmeaning policy of the last five years, we should not consider it worth while to bestow a thought upon the coming contest. But circumstances have materially changed. There is renewed hope; and much at stake, in the furtherance or retardation, for, it may be, a series of years, of great and tangible measures of improvement, essential to the prosperity of the country, and to the wellbeing of every family in it. We, of course, except that limited class who directly profit by those abuses which are undermining the strength of England, while they inflict an immeasurable amount of suffering upon the People. Our present, our urgent, and immediate duty is therefore to seize the opportunity offered. This is applicable to Reformers of all grades, and of every varying shade of opinion. Since the memorable defeat of the Duke of Wellington, on the Reform measure, and the dissolution which followed the resignation of the Tory Ministry, the duty of electors has never been so simple. The Whigs distinctly promise a great and tangible good,—and much greater advantages are involved in the principle of the revolution contemplated by their amended Fiscal scheme,—while the Tories, so far as has yet appeared, shelter themselves under specious generalities, where they do not openly defend the existing abuses. Their wary leader, on the idea, as some one has humorously said, of a coaxing nurse with a wayward child, bids us “shut our eyes, and open our mouths, and see what luck will send us;” but the Tories, as a party, promise nothing, and for the good reason that they are aware the time has arrived when, if rulers promise, they will be forced to keep their word. They will concede nothing; and affect to treat the people as ignorant or mad in their demands for the abolition of the Corn Tax, and a change in that monopoly system under which they have thriven, whatever the nation has suffered. Many of them frankly avow as much; and whether they avow it or not, they will grapple their pillage to the last; die in the last ditch in defence of their right to tax our food, as they had nearly done in their struggle to retain the monopoly of legislation, which gave them the power to govern the country for their own aggrandizement.

A successful inroad was ten years ago made by a willing government and a determined people upon the Legislation Monopoly. The people are, in nearly similar circumstances, again called upon to make a similar energetic assault. The same inveterate opposition may be anticipated, or hostility even more pertinacious; for of what comparative value was the monopoly of legislation to the landed aristocracy, and the East and West India interests, save as it offered an easy and safe means of putting their hands into other people's pockets?

It is for an onslaught, and it may be a final one, upon this most precious privilege, originally obtained through the corrupt monopoly of legislation, that the electoral body, that the whole people, are now called upon to man themselves. The Reform Bill, by breaking up, to a considerable extent, class legislation, armed us against class monopolies. We are now called to make trial of our strength—to prove our weapon; nor is there a doubt of its being, if promptly and dexterously employed, effectual for defence. It were, however, as idle as unwise, to underrate the strength of the enemy. It is still great; and it is put forth under skilful generalship. There are no weakening intestine divisions in the camp of the Tories. Like a dishonest trustee, with an oppressed and wronged suitor, they are in a condition to battle us, and keep us out of our rights, with our own money: nor will it be spared. This cannot last for ever,—nor for any long period, unless the people choose to submit to it. A combination of untoward circumstances, which are mainly to be imputed to the imbecility which has long prevailed in Whig counsels, is at present against us, and temporarily favours the unholy league of the combined monopolists; but opposition must give way, we would fain hope speedily, if we really will it.

To this great object every effort should now be bent; nor is an hour to be lost. Our enemies, long and silently recruiting strength, after their defeat in 1830, are already in the field, in force not to be despised by a prudent antagonist. Like the maniac in the access of his malady, desperation lends them preternatural strength; and though a protracted struggle must induce eventual exhaustion, it may also give temporary power to the madman to do a world of mischief to himself as well as to others.

We say himself, for we have never yet taken the question of the Corn Laws into consideration without looking to the real interests of the landowners; of the lunatics themselves, who, under a pitiable hallucination, cannot perceive that though not the first and greatest victims, their Order, their descendants, must, as surely as that two and two make four, be the ultimate sufferers from a system which has crippled the energies, and inflicted cruel wrong upon the most industrious and enterprising nation on the face of the earth. What figure among the aristocracies of Europe would English landowners make, if again reduced, by the decay of manufactures, to their original condition; left in their glory with their retainers, their peasantry, and their priests? If their understanding were not darkened by intense selfishness, though they may have no heart for mercy, no conscience for justice, they might yet reflect upon the amazing wealth, the unequalled splendour and luxury, to which the industry and skill of their humbler fellow-citizens have elevated them. What without this were the value of their acres any more than those of the Russian or Hungarian noble? And now in riches and luxury, what nobility can vie with that of England! If they do not know, all the world besides is well aware, that the far-spread roots of their prosperity lie in the workshops and shipping ports of their country; in its manufactures and commerce. If they cannot feel gratitude, let them of their selfish interests learn prudence. They cannot kill and eat the goose—fit emblem for those who have been their dupes!—and continue to gather its golden eggs. Some of the more intelligent and right-minded of the order now perceive this; and some of those who do not, yet conscientiously feel and own that they have no right to tax the food of their countrymen for their own exclusive benefit.

But whatever course the Tories and Monopolists may pursue, the present duty of the electors, and of the non-electors,—of every man, woman, and child who lives by bread, and uses sugar,—is very plain. It is to speak for, to canvass for, to vote for, the candidate who frankly pledges himself to the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and all other food-taxes; but on the understanding, that if this cannot all at once be carried, he will support the present Ministers in obtaining the instalment of justice which they have specified. This distinct pledge should by no means exclude those other important measures of reform which, if delayed, are never to be abandoned. Civil and religious liberty are vague phrases, often used to deceive; but there is meaning attached to the specific measures of Household or Universal Suffrage, of the Ballot, and the Abolition of Church Rates.

It is the further duty of electors, and of every one entitled to the franchise, though not yet enjoying it, to see that candidates understand the true nature of their duties as representatives of the people, and the object of the important trust delegated to them; and that they be pledged not only to the fulfilment of their general duties, as these may arise, but to specific measures. There is still great fallacy among Liberal candidates, and among Reformers holding the franchise, on the matter of pledging. The solemn covenant between a Member of Parliament and a constituency appears to be the only one for which no guarantees, no formal ratification, are considered necessary. Some candidates, otherwise liberal and perfectly honest, are offended by being asked to pledge themselves, as if it were an impeachment of their probity, or an insult to their personal honour; yet the same men give receipts for trifling sums of money, sign bonds and marriage-contracts, and submit to all the formalities and ceremonies which have been devised to bind them to the fulfilment of their duty in other concerns, though no suspicion whatever exists that individually such guarantees are required from them. No man considers it an insult for his friend to require his pledge or bond, and security to it also, for repayment of a loan; no man considers it an insult if the woman whom he courts will not trust solely to his honour, and refuses his addresses until he takes all the pledges attending the customs of marriage. Every covenant whatever requires some kind of open or formal ratification, save and except that by which, in past times, a set of honourable gentlemen sought to serve or to glorify themselves, while pretending to do the people's business. But there is here fallacy within fallacy. The idea is, that the functions of a Member of Parliament are precisely analogous to those of a hired and learned counsel with the client whose case he conducts, (instructed by the way, and sharply looked after too, by an able attorney,) or of the surgeon, who is called in to heal a fractured limb, and who, in virtue of his professional skill, and our confidence in him, allows us no voice in a matter about which, deeply as we are interested in the result, we can have no knowledge. But between these cases there is no analogy whatever. The true idea of what a Member of Parliament ought to be, is already much better understood among the electors than by Candidates. He is simply, taken at his best, an able and well-qualified individual, chosen to perform, by delegation, those important public duties which a large aggregate body could not so well perform for itself, in concert with other similarly qualified individuals, who are delegated by other aggregate bodies, until the entire interests and intelligence of the country is fairly represented in the National Legislative Assembly. And what is there in the nature of these honourable and important obligations more than in those recognised by any other civil contract, that should make a man think himself insulted if he is required to pledge himself openly to their fulfilment? This doctrine should be comprehended by every constituency, and inculcated upon every candidate for liberal suffrage. Wincing on this point either betrays ignorance, or is a very bad symptom. Open pledging in candidates is as requisite to pure representation as secret voting in electors.

In the coming hot contest, the candidate, (especially if he be one who has already entitled himself to public confidence by independence and consistent liberality of principle,) who advocates the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws, and Free Trade, which are the great immediate objects, without departing from any formerly avowed principle of improvement, is the man most eminently entitled to the suffrage of Reformers. Such a candidate will no more shrink from giving proper pledges, than the man who knows that he acts more honourably in giving his friend legal and proper guarantees for the discharge of a debt, than in having him trust to his honour. This sort of man we reckon, a first-rate candidate, worthy to be classed with the élite of the first Reform Parliament, and with the small and precious remnant of the second. We hope that there may be many such in the next Parliament. But failing these, second and third, and even fourth-rate candidates, professing liberalism, though really trimmers and self-seekers, are infinitely, at this juncture, to be preferred to even honest and respectable Tories, if they are Monopolists. If not the men of our trust, they are the men for our turn. Nor is the choice of electors at this time likely to be so much hampered and narrowed by mere ministerial hacks and time-servers as it has been in past elections; unless where the constituencies, to gain an advantage, choose quietly to submit to Treasury dictation. At all events improper new candidates will not, at present, be thrust down our throats by the Whigs; and the old stagers, however objectionable in many respects, may safely be allowed to walk the course once more in their new character of Anti-monopolists and Free-traders, where better men cannot be carried.

We have the consolation, such as it is, of knowing the worst of them; and if quite willing to be false to the people, they will, at all events, be true to the party whose interests for the time—and we hope for a long time—are knit up with those of the people. The old cry, “Do not divide the liberal interest!” has a more intelligible meaning now than when it signified, “Do not, to carry an honest and independent Reformer, deprive the Government of a shuffling and subservient tool.” The Liberals are amalgamating; and this time the advances and courtship came from the Whigs. This is as it should be; and it is our duty to receive them cordially. If they could not longer exist as a party without doing something for the People, and so courted them, they have also the power of serving the People; and their new course is so evidently that of common sense, and common sagacity, that we must believe them in earnest, to the extent at least of their tardily avowed Free-trade convictions.

Would that we saw the result of the coming election as clearly as we do the duty of the electors! We may hope for a majority on the right side; yet we dare not count upon it, though well aware that the larger the majority, the nearer we are to our great object. Next to speedy victory, and perhaps less fallacious in the results, is effectually to cripple the enemy, and that is in our power; and it will be our loss and our shame if that power is not put forth in every legitimate way.

Having done our duty, every man of us, electors and non-electors, Ultra-radicals and Chartists—for there is at this time but one common interest among Reformers; although the Tories should come in, maimed and halting, with a slender majority of from ten to twenty or thirty votes, there is no cause for discouragement. Ultimate victory is but a question of time, and may be the more complete if, having been fiercely striven for, it is hardly won. We have always had much faith in the uses of a powerful and united Opposition. For the last six years, or indeed since the passing of the Reform Bill, there has been no Opposition. A few Radicals feebly opposed bad measures, and proposed good ones, until they became dispirited and the country disgusted; while the Tories enabled the Whigs to carry every bad measure they chose, and to oppose every good one. In the Reformed Parliament there have been parties, but no legitimate Opposition. This constitutional force is probably about to be reorganised, and upon a broader basis than ever before,—resting in future upon the whole people instead of the Whig party. We flatter ourselves, besides, that the elements of healing are to be found in the concussion which has already driven the different sections of Reformers into sudden union, and which has visibly inspirited the Radical party, and softened without subduing, or turning from their purpose, the more rational of the Chartists. Now that the time for action has come, we rejoice to see this important party acting as we were warranted to believe of men whose general objects are so worthy of respect. They will at least have the good sense not to punish themselves and hurt a good cause, to be temporarily revenged on their imagined enemies, the Whigs. Are the Tories and Monopolists less their enemies?

VERSES

OCCASIONED BY A LATE DECISION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—MAY 1841.

By a Clergyman of the Church of England.

SOFT breathed the gales o'er Borthwick's woodland bowers,

Bright glow'd her broomy banks with opening flowers,
Clear down her valley stole the quiet rill,
Beneath the russet steep of fir-crown'd hill;
While on the opposing slope, from blossom'd screen,
Her modest manse was half-retiring seen:—
The peaceful church, the village school, were near,
The giant Fortress frowning in the rear,—
While closing far the “long-withdrawing vale,”
The hazy Pentlands raised their foreheads pale.

Such was the day—(not many years have flow'n,)—
When with a friend emerging from the town,
To this sweet scene my ready steps I bent,
To live a priest, in “measureless content.”
With cultur'd mind, yet with no sickly taste
Beyond the rustic home, where he was placed,—

Their guide, adviser, friend, he dwelt among
His people—prized alike by old and young.

In our wild walks, which varied themes beguile,
Each passing peasant had a word or smile;
Each ruddy urchin had a nod or look,
That mingled kindness e'en with a rebuke;
Familiar with them all, free, not severe,
His was the love that knew to cast out fear;
Yet no respect was wanting,—you could see
They in His servant felt the Diety.

O what a day that was!—while Nature round
In human bosoms a true mirror found,
And not a sunbeam, quivering leaf, or bird,
But some responsive feeling met, and stirred!

Nature is still the same—the breezes still Wave the new broom-buds scenting from the hill.

Still round these walls, deserted of their lord,
The fruit-trees blossom, and his skill record;
Nature is still the same—but man's fell breath
O'er that sweet scene has scattered seeds of death;
Hae, with a withering blight, its beauty soiled,
And human bosoms of fair peace despoiled!

The old, who winter's snows could fearless tread,
To gather from his lips of life the bread;
The young, to whom his precepts, if severe,
Alone his mild example could endear;
E'en the school-children, on God's holy day,
Who round him knelt, and learnt from him to pray—
All feel their spirits sunk in some dread gloom,
As 'twere precursor of the General Doom:
'There needs no prophet's lore to have it proved,
A people mourn whose teachers are removed!

O was it well religious hands, but rude,
Of non-intrusionists, should here extrude!
*Say, if the people's voice can render vain
A legal entrance, may it not retain?
And what requir'd his exile?—did the charm
Of social pleasures stricter rules disarm,
And wile him on to a disgraceful end,
Which we might pity, but could not defend?*
O no! a purer life, without pretence,
Ne'er graced devotion and beneficence!
Might not some pity then, some melting ruth,
Stay you, stern Ministers of rigid truth!
Might not the dread of greater ills to flow
From dear bonds ruptured, by so fierce a blow,
Than from a speak, imagin'd more than seen,
Thrown on your faith—not worth the pains to clean—
Have made you pause, ere, reckless, thus recall
Those long-laid lions, sleeping by the wall,
Which, once awaken'd, now will not be staid,
But rend e'en you who roused them to your aid.

Yet is it heresy, is it, indeed,
A sin unpardon'd 'gainst your Calvin's creed,
To say, that God's great kingdom will embrace
Advancing good, throughout all time and space,—
That in its progress evil will decay,
As fades night's darkness in the solar ray!
Man from the first, the triumph saw begun,
But chiefly, when the Father sent the Son:—
And when to end! The good already far Exceeding evil, ne'er can find a bar!
Is this a heresy!—if 'tis, 'twere best
Proclaim it not in Gath,—but let it rest;
Men left alone may stir it not,—but turn
Their eyes once to it,—and your bonds they spurn,—
And hail, however Churchmen may impede,
This, this alone, as the true Christian creed.

O was it wise,—when many a home was blest
With prayers that well'd from this pure sainted breast,
When to the holy table he has led
Many to share the hallow'd cup and bread,
And sooth'd the spirit penitent from crime,
At the dread hour that bids "Farewell to Time;"*—
Say was it wise to stamp on him a brand,
That makes your savour stink throughout the land!

* The title of one of Mr. Wright's religious works.

[To our southern readers it may be necessary to explain, that this poem refers to an episode in the extraordinary proceedings of the late memorable General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. After certain brief and rather inquisitorial proceedings in an inferior ecclesiastical court, it has pleased that venerable body, or a majority of them, to eject from his living one of their brethren, who, as a truly good and religious man, and an exemplary parish minister, it is enough to say, has been faithfully portrayed by the writer of the above poem. The grounds of charge were certain passages found in religious works which he had given to the world many years ago—some of them having been published for nearly twenty years without offence, until these late unhappy times of the Kirk. One of his works—"THE MORNING AND EVENING SACRIFICE"—is now in a tenth or twelfth edition, and has long formed a kind of Book of Common Prayer in guiding the devotions of half the families of Scotland. We believe, however, that no offence against high Calvinistic doctrines has been found in it; nor were the proceedings against its author able to mar his usefulness, or estrange from him the affections of his parishioners, whose sympathies have been vividly called forth by what they considered the persecution of their faithful and esteemed minister. His flock were probably much abler to judge of the effect of his pious ministrations upon their own hearts, and of the influence of his example, than of nice polemic distinctions, or the soundness of his theological opinions;—of the religious and benevolent life of their beloved pastor, than of those philosophical speculations in his books, out of which a constructive heresy has been fished by a band of clerical agitators. Mr. Wright has been a meek, perhaps, in the circumstances, a too meek, too forbearing sufferer; and his case has excited much quiet sympathy among the laity, and also among a respectable body of the clergy of Scotland, who see not only grievous individual hardship, but deep injury to the cause of religion, and to the Presbyterian Church, in this violent divorce from his people, of a minister to whom they were, and are, warmly attached. How is the public, which cannot be made to understand constructive heresies, or mystical theology, to reconcile this proceeding with that flaming regard for the independence and rights of "the Christian people," which this party in the Kirk profess?—Ed.

To hurl your thunders upon one, fir'd deep
In Scotland's heart, that wondering can but weep;
In the great name of Him you call your Head,
(O sacred name profan'd!) to earth to tread
A jewel richer far than all your tribe!
Deem ye your Head will hold it as a bribe,
While to the mind He bore, your eyes are dim!
That with mouth-worship you can honour Him!
And fear you not, while o'er your heads you feel
Your Church's ancient fabric rock and reel;
Say, fear you not, to prove, in the event,
Your tabernacle spoil'd, your cords all rent!
Ah! if to persecution you resort,
Your tent, your curtains, soon the whirlwind's sport,
No more will be stretch'd forth, set up no more.
Ye shall not prosper; and your flocks before
The evening wolf will flee, the forest lion's roar!

If prayer can from our land such doom avert,
For you, and for the Zion of his heart,
Your victim's prayers prefer'd are on record:
The prophet-martyr thus addressed his Lord:—
"If upon this, or any future day,
Injustice, malice, shall beset my way;
If any of my brethren render ill,
Let me submit, O Lord, to thy high will!
Whate'er my suffering, may I bear my part
Meekly, nor curse my neighbour in my heart;
But still remembering against thee, my God,
My sins are many, let me kiss the rod;
May others, at my hand, forgiveness gain,
Such as from Thee, I trust, for Christ's sake, to obtain."

Such are, I deem his feelings at this hour,
Though whate'er can embitter them, ye pour
Into his cup,—still he will say of you—
"Father, forgive!—they know not what they do!"
And while his quiet spirit seeks repose
In a kind Providence, from fears and woes,
That shield will never fail him! He must leave
The scenes, indeed, where, morning, noon, and eve,
He pray'd, and liv'd, and mus'd, as might befit
That best good life, as he has painted it:
Yet will some refuge for his honoured age
Open in peaceful bower or hermitage,
Where, when the labour of the day is done,
The even come, his wages duly won,
Then will he gently fall asleep, and find
Elsewhere associates of more kindred mind.

Then, now malign'd, as if they bore a stain,
His precious works shall after him remain,—
Remain, to sweeten and compose mankind,
When holy feuds are given to the wind;
O'er temperate times to exercise control,
And raise their "LIVING TEMPLE"† in the soul;
Remain, to sink into the hearts of those
Who yet "will blush their fathers were his foes;"
When happier lights on Christian spirits fall;
And charity expands, and God is "all in all!"—R. M.

THE HAIRY-MUG MANIA, OR PUSSY-PUPPY-ISM.

HOLLA! What the deuce! Has the metropolis of the Land of Cakes been metamorphosed? Is it no longer Edinburgh, but Naumburg, or Merseburg, or Heidelberg, or Schwarzburg, or what other outlandish uncivilized dirty German burg? Or has some luckless colony of youthful Saxe-Coburg-Gotha-ists been banished from Court to "Auld-Reekie," as to a second Jericho, till their beards grow? Whew—whew—one, two, three, four, five, six—but whisht!—talking "braid Scots," the dear Doric, as I am a sinner! Another covey, partly military—whisht, again—English and Irish, every soul of them, as I am a true Scotsman! Not a foreigner amongst them after all! What the devil can the fellows mean by this anti-national, disgusting disfigurement of physiognomy? But what comes next? Oh, ye unsophisticated natives of the mountains, and glens, and valleys of Scotland—and oh, ye equally dounce, decent, yet withal martial and valour-loving denizens of the towns called provincial!—you will never credit it!—yet, as I am a living man! there goes a whole regiment of Dragoons—British Dragoons—each man with a horrid unshaven upper lip, and looking as ugly, though not so old as Blucher. Who can have ventured to recommend this foreign and foolish disguise of British soldiers? Or how comes it to be tolerated either by officers or privates? Is their courage of such questionable quality as to require the adventitious aid of such barbarism, in order, by frightening, to avoid fighting the foe? If so, oh fierce (looking) warriors! may I venture to ask whether the heroes of the Peninsula or Waterloo fought any the worse for not having a tuft of hair below their noses, or ran away from the opponents who had? Truly no; the hare-hearted and the hair-lipped were one. Then confound all such foreign frippery: it must be put a stop to; for I, Hercules Hameower, opine we are not Chinese to be tamely transformed into Tartars, or into the likeness of any other barbarians, whether Huns, Vandals, or Goths.

Such were my half-mental, half-expressed ejaculations on arriving in

Edina, Scotia's darling seat,

after an absence of a couple of twelvemonths, and while beginning a short stroll previous to doing justice to the "sheep's head and trotters" I had ordered at the inn where the coach had deposited me. With astonishment and dismay did I look on the "bearded pards" in the mingled crowd of Prince's Street, and then in a patriotic passion seek the more retired and leisurely promenade of George Street; but, alas, to say!—this was "out of the frying-pan into the fire;" for there, on every side, under the nose of George the Fourth, "the most perfect, (and clean-shaved) of English gentlemen"—and brushing the skirts of William Pitt, the beardless "Premier youth," and the most smooth-faced and smooth-tongued of Statesmen—flowed a full tide of moustachoeed monkeys, of foreign and fiercely feline aspect. So I, per force, continued my unpleasant cogitations. There they go, black, red, brown, and grey—the moustaches I mean—and each owner thereof looking Fierce as ten furies—terrible as Hell.

Nicely oiled and combed, these same hairy appendages have been, yea most carefully toiletted, and they are now, I suppose, brought out to be aired and dusted previous to repairing to the dinner and tea tables. Waes me, waes me! After this, what awful abominations may not become fashionable? Are such unchristian-looking creatures really permitted within the confines of a drawing-room? Oh, ye Scottish—ye British fair ones—do ye allow, with shut eyes, the dipping and swimming of these oily and dusty monstrosities within your cherished china; or in what other way do ye escape the unavoidable loathing which would take place on a fair view of the said cat-like immersion, and the consequent drenching and dripping of the hirsute snout? Can it be possible that such tabby-looking puppies are permitted to essay courtship, or that the soft whisper of love could pass unsoiled and unpolluted through these filthy hair sieves? Forbid it, Heaven! But if it be otherwise—if ye, O lovely daughters of Edina, have hitherto only eschewed the evil by closing your eyes—I entreat of you to open them, to attack it seriously, and to tolerate it no longer. Think, only think! no courtship could be closed with a lover so bestially disfigured. A kiss! Good heavens, you might as well stuff your fair and delicate nostrils with a soap-brush!

So closed my soliloquy; and, urged by indignant disgust, I hastened to take "mine ease in mine inn," in the hope of quieting my vexed spirit by escaping from the cause of vexation. But, lo! in the public room were—three pairs of moustaches taking soup! A curse, "not loud, but deep,"—a waiter overturned,—and I was on my way to a retired sanctum in the classic confines of the Old Flesh Market Close. A beef-steak, such as only the denizens of that dusky retreat can produce, aided by two tumblers of whisky-toddy, rather of the largest and stiffest order, (while the attendant faces displayed only a moderate stibble,) having somewhat restored my equanimity, I forthwith called a meeting of some of my influential friends, when certain sanative measures were, after due deliberation, resolved on. The result of these deliberations, I cannot doubt, will, by and by, be seen and fully appreciated by a grateful public; and, as the first step to so desirable an end, I have now to promulgate the following

THE ANTI-HAIRY-MUG SOCIETY.

His Royal Highness PRINCE ALBERT, Patron.
SIR HERCULES HAMEOWER, President.

Directors.

Sir J. SPITFREE, Lord Mayor.

I. P. DOMINORUM, President of the Judges.

The other Judges ex officio.

The DEAN of the BAREFACED Faculty.

Deacon SHAVEALL, of the Barber Incorporation.

&c. &c. &c.

Mr. STYPTIC SEARINGIRON, Barber-Surgeon to the Society.

RULES.

- I. Males and Females are equally admissible as Members; and are earnestly requested to come forward at an early period to enrol their names in the Society. Every Female of respectable character is admissible at once; but Male candidates must previously make affidavit to their abhorrence of the Hairy-Mug mania.
- II. Female Members to be each provided with a pair of scissors, to be used, on all occasions, against such Hairy Mugs as may be discovered in drawing-rooms, and the interior of houses.
- III. Each male member to be provided with a blunt pen-knife, or a piece of sharp hoop, for the purpose of abating the Hairy-Mug nuisance out of doors, and also in ball-rooms, assembly-rooms, and other public places. Two or three of the Members always to act together, and in concert, so as to perform their operations both with neatness and expedition. Scraping is recommended as being preferable to any other mode, and the most effectual; and it may be done by lamp-light as well, and perhaps better, than in day-light. Singeing also approved.

N.B. In case of any accident in the performance of an operation, such as too great seal producing a hare-lip, or the want of a lip, or nose-tip, the case must be submitted to the treatment of Mr. Styptic Searingiron, the barber-surgeon.

High-school boys, and other well-disposed youths, will be paid, from the Society's funds, a PENNY EACH, for following behind the obnoxious animals (wherever seen) and shouting loudly "Hairy Mug! Hairy Mug!" so as to make the Members aware of their approach.

HERCULES HAMBOWER, Prova.

EDINBURGH, 21st June, 1841.

A RESIDENCE IN THE AZORES.*

Two gentlemen of the name of Bullar spent the winter of 1838-9, and the summer of 1839, in cruising among the Azores, or in making tours and short exploratory excursions into the interior of those islands. The one was an invalid, who went to the Azores in search of a warm and equable climate; his companion an M.D., and probably the brother of the invalid. They kept a regular journal, and have made a delightful addition to those numerous light and easy chit-chat narratives of travel, which are becoming so agreeable a feature in modern literature. Familiar as the name of this group of islands has long been to English ears, the scene of their travels and remarks is still comparatively new. Even on so late an occasion as that of the missing President steamer, many, otherwise well-informed persons, among us, were at a loss about the island of Fayal, one of the Azores, to which it was hoped the unfortunate vessel had repaired, and in the port of which, Horta, there is now a depôt of coal for the use, in a strait, of the Atlantic steamers. Yet, in the orange season, there has, for many years, been a considerable direct trade between London and St. Michael's and some of the other islands. The Azorean archipelago is divided into three groups: the western, including Flores and Corvo; and the central group, Fayal, Pico, St. George, Graciosa, and Terceira. The third is at the south-east extremity, and consists of the largest island of the whole, namely, St. Michael's with St. Mary's. These islands, we need scarcely say, are under the dominion of Portugal, from which they are distant about eight hundred miles. They are of volcanic formation, and their general aspect is exceedingly bold and picturesque. The Azores are still liable to tremendous visitations, and particularly to sudden and violent storms of wind and rain; yet the climate, though humid, is, upon the whole, equable and mild, and the soil is naturally extremely fertile, yielding an easy abundance to the mass of the native population, whose condition, as it is here represented, may, in several respects, excite the envy of the more intelligent hard-worked labourers of highly civilized countries. The name of the archipelago is said to be derived from the number of hawks which constantly hover about the lofty cones and cliffs of the islands, and which were named by the natives, at the period of the discovery of the group, Açores. The Azores have been colonized from Portugal and Spain, and our travellers traced Moorish blood in some of them. The inhabitants are now estimated at about 250,000, which is not a fifth part of what the islands, if moderately well cultivated, might maintain. Feudal tenures still exist there in unmitigated deformity. The large estates of the Morgados, or squires, are strictly entailed; and the tenants are subjected to all the tyranny, extortion, and capricious annoyance which marked the worst periods of the system in other countries. They, consequently, live on from hand to mouth without industry, and caring little for improvements in husbandry, from which they would derive no personal or permanent advantage. England receives the greater part of the exported produce of these islands, which consists principally of oranges and lemons, with a small quantity of wine and brandy, for which, hardware, woollen and cotton cloths, and other things, are sent in return. The islands have also some trade with the mother country, and latterly, in coarse linens and wine, with Brazil and the United States of America. The United States have a consul at Ponta Delgada, in St. Michael's. This is the largest town in the islands, though the seat of the insular government, which is confided to a governor-general, with two lieutenant-governors, is at Angra in Terceira.

* A Winter in the Azores; and a Summer at the Baths of the Furnas. By Joseph Bullar, M.D., and John Bullar of Lincoln's Inn. 2 vols. octavo, with Illustrations. London: John Van Voorst.

For the Azores, the invalid and his companion embarked at Cowes, in a fruit-vessel, in the middle of November, 1838. The discomforts of a voyage in a St. Michael's fruiterer may be left to the reader's imagination. They are graphically described, in a way which gives the reader some stomachic qualms, closely resembling incipient seasickness. Yet, in salt-water phraseology, the "passengers got their victuals," and, in spite of every hardship, enjoyed good health. The captain of the fruiterer must have been a rare bird in the St. Michael's trade. He had been a student of Shakespeare and Milton in his day, and had sat up night after night to read the Waverley Novels; yet he was still a true sailor. Nautical ideas on points of etiquette, or nicety, are illustrated as completely by the following brief anecdote of him, as they could be by a long dissertation:—

At breakfast this morning a long lurch brought down a black mangy hair-brush into the little boy's tea. The boy looked meek, and held up his basin for a fresh supply. "What now! I suppose your stomach, then's, too delicate to drink that after my hair-brush has been in it, eh?" The boy's contrite silence said, "Yes."

One or both the authors of the journal (for their respective shares are not discriminated) has a fine eye for scenery, and a lively feeling of the beautiful and picturesque in natural objects. Of this the volumes afford numerous proofs. They, or he, longed for a gale, if not a storm, in the Atlantic, and enjoyed their wish to their hearts' content. On the fifth of December the ever-welcome sound of "land" was heard; and on the sixth they landed at Ponta Delgada, encountering considerable difficulty, if not danger, from the heavy surf through which they were dexterously piloted by the jabbering, screaming, Portuguese boatmen. But—

Notwithstanding all their apparent confusion they manage their boats skilfully, and are admitted to be excellent boatmen: they swim, too, like fish. "If de wave fill de boat, mare," was Peter the Italian mate's parting advice, "you catch hold of a Portugee, and stick to him: you no be drowned."

The first question we were asked on going into the custom-house of St. Michael's, was, "Has Mr. Thomson (or some such remarkably named individual) arrived in England?"

The propounder of this simple yet difficult problem was a grave stolid little man, of some forty years of age, who looked up for a reply to his question with all the confiding simplicity of a child; and who, on hearing the unexpected answer, that we really could not say, seemed surprised and almost annoyed at so humiliating a confession of ignorance in the affairs of our own nation.

They had letters to the hospitable American consul, who next night carried them to a ball, given upon the occasion of the heiress of a deceased morgado coming of age; that is, having reached her twelfth year, when, by law, a young Azorean lady is entitled to take possession of her entailed property, and to marry. We hear nothing of the lady of the night; but obtain a lively idea of the festivities. They went at the early hour of seven, and found the ball-rooms quite full, and dancing begun.

The house, which was one of the largest in the place, resembled externally the hôtels in the Faubourg St. Germain. It was built on two sides of a quadrangular court-yard, one end of which was occupied by stables, and the other by a high wall and gateway. In the hall a heap of bare-footed servants and link boys, mixed up with liveried men, women, lanterns, and jack-booted postilions, sat and lounged and laughed.

Two servants waited at the door, and with tapers in their hands ushered each visiter to the gallery outside the ball-rooms. The suite of rooms was spacious, and the furniture, which was all in good taste, was Persian. So far as the dress and the dancing went, I might have fancied myself in an English or French ball-room, and was a little disappointed to see no peculiarity of national costume; and instead of fandangos or boleros, or Spanish or Moorish dances of any kind, to find about forty couples figuring away at the first set of quadrilles, and finishing with a promenade, just as they would have done on English ground. There was excellent music, pianos, fiddles, flutes, and fifes; there were glittering chandeliers, bright candelabra, vases of flowers, shining mirrors; there were gay uniforms, bullion epaulettes, long moustachios, of black, sandy, or red; young dandies with long locks, and old gentlemen with stars and orders; there were judges, priests, and barons. What more could be wanted to make a ball all that a ball should be!

The hair of the younger ladies was turned up behind, and fell in front in large and luxuriant ringlets. So far they resembled my countrywomen; but their complexions and cast of features were very different. "Pretty girls," light-haired, fair, airy beings, such as England is so abundantly blessed with, there were none; but the proportion of really handsome women was great.

Some would have made pictures: their hair, black, glossy, and luxuriant; their eyes full, dark, and "unfathomable," (altogether different from the black sparkling eye, which seems to reflect at once the light which falls upon it.) They had fine teeth which their full lips easily disclosed, and were generally of middle height, well-proportioned, and rather tending to embonpoint. I saw none of those very small waists which so many English women attain to, by great endurance and much patient suffering.

The ladies were lively, talkative, and good-tempered, with intelligent foreheads. They kissed acquaintances of their own sex, on recognising them, and used the fan like the Spaniards; keeping it in incessant motion, opening and shutting it, and turning it in a thousand different ways, so easily, and, as it seemed, unconsciously, with such a concealment of their art, as was most graceful. Many of the younger ones had learned English, and spoke it fluently. Their pronunciation was remarkably good. . . .

There were the usual proportion of ladies past their prime, with turbans, birds of Paradise, and shining silks; and a due sprinkling of conspicuous-looking young men, who had happily not attained that age when "man suspects himself a fool." One custom differed from ours, and showed much kindness of feeling. A group of women-servants with their heads covered with white kerchiefs were lying upon a part of the staircase, from which they could look at the dancers over the heads of those who stood at the door, and thus they shared in the pleasures of the family.

The barbarism of opening a ball at the hour of six, and permitting the bare-footed servants to have a peep of the amusements of their masters and mistresses, we leave to the mercy of the refined English reader. The state of social manners in these islands, in many points resembles what was general in England some centuries ago; and, particularly, in the abundant leisure enjoyed by all classes. Every other day is a holiday in the Azores; and the shop-keepers deliberately lock up their shops, and go away to their dinners or their amusements. Competition has not there encroached on indolent enjoyment. Religion and morals are much in the same condition as they were in most Roman Catholic countries before the influence of the French revolution had been felt, either in reforming manners or teaching the priesthood to look more strictly after their flocks, and to assume the decent cloak of hypocrisy themselves. The English in Ponta Delgada have a chapel, to which they give but irregular attendance. There are a good many English in the place, several of them medical men. Sunday is the market-day, as in other Catholic countries; and our author remarks:—

There is as little appearance of religion, as in a Protestant country on week days, or as in Hyde Park or the Zoological gardens on fine Sunday afternoons. All the market-people, however, attend mass either before or after they sell their goods.

Went into one of the Catholic churches, where was a crowd of men, with no particular look of devotion in their faces. We soon perceived that the elections were going on, of "select men," who are to choose members for the Cortes. The scribes and vote-takers were sitting in the middle of the church, round a table covered with scarlet cloth. There were priests quietly and narrowly watching all that went forward, and a small crowd of bystanders looking over the shoulders of those who sat at the table. The priests sit here officially. They are supposed to know every individual in their parish, and therefore to be able to detect personations—a deception very likely to be practised, where the suffrage is what is called, universal.

In the corner of the church an aged man was burning the old ballot-papers, by applying a candle to a heap that lay on the stone floor, and when they were burned he quenched the sparks with a few handfuls of holy water from the marble basin.

The streets of Ponta Delgada resemble the narrow streets of many of the old cities on the Continent.

The basement of the houses is used for shops, storehouses, or stables. The shops are lighted from the door, and have no windows. There is consequently none of the gay variety of shop-fronts seen in England, but open doors display counters and shelves of wares inside. The signs for the different trades are hung out of these doorways. At one door, for instance, you see a dozen strips of printed cottons tied to a small stick, and fluttering like the ribbons on a recruiting sergeant's hat. This tells you that a linen-draper stands ready inside with tape and cottons.

Farther on, a small bundle of fagots, a bunch of onions, a few roots of garlic, and two or three candles dangle from another stick, and denote a grocer. A shoemaker's sign is a bunch of leather shreds; and a hatter's is a painted hat. A butcher ties up a bundle of empty sausage skins, or a rude drawing of an ox having his horn sawed off, the saw as large as the man who uses it. Over a milkman's door hangs a crooked red cow, such as may be seen in alleys in London. A green bough of faya, which resembles a branch of Arbutus, indicates a wine shop, and, by the addition of a sprig of box, you learn that spirits are sold there. Such was the custom in England, when the proverb was made that "good wine requires no bush." In other shops you see a small board suspended from a little stick, with Portuguese words signifying "good wine and spirits," coarsely painted on it. The names of the shopkeepers are not over their doors, as with us.

The first floor windows, immediately above the shops and stores, are very generally furnished with small wooden balconies of trellis-work, like that in our dairy windows, which is painted dull red, green, or white. Neat iron balconies are fixed before some of the windows of the larger houses. The eaves project considerably, and the corner tile is frequently shaped like a bird with outspread wings, or is made to turn up into a long point.

Shoemakers sit at work in their door-ways: in others, tailors squat, while the goose is seen in the street on a smouldering pan of charcoal. Those whom I saw sitting on a bench inside, seemed to have shaken off that constitutional melancholy which has been attributed to them, and to be indulging in obstreperous mirth. A few vehicles resembling somewhat the old race of hack cabs in London, hung on a long carriage with upright springs, and drawn by two small, spirited horses, with postilions in jack-boots, and men in dull liveries, swinging on behind, clattered through the streets with the rattle and jingle of empty post-chaises. Two ladies sat in some of these, dressed in by-gone European fashions; others had a single occupant. Some were closed in by heavy leather flaps and aprons, having two glazed holes, on a level with the rider's eyes.

Pigs and donkeys there were in abundance; the swine unusually large and fat, and the donkeys varying from those wizened and wasted forms that ruddle-men, small green-grocers, and "weary" itinerant knife-grinders, belabour and overload in England, to sleek and spirited animals of a size and strength they never attain in our colder climate.

There are fountains in the streets, with tanks by their sides, where asses stop to drink; and these, like market-places, are spots where foreigners generally find amusement. The water is carried in barrels, and in pitchers of red pottery; the barrels, which are long and narrow, are frequently slung in pairs over the back of an ass; and the pitchers, which are made in the island, and, being porous, like the Indian gurglets, act in summer-time as water-coolers, possess as much beauty of form as some of those in the British Museum from the ruins of Herculaneum. The water of St. Michael's is peculiarly delicate and pure.

Such is the out-door aspect of Ponta Delgada. Two newspapers are published in it, affording a vent to ill-nature, or advocating the interests of the respective parties of the "Cats" and the "Pigs:" the latter being the Tories, or that party attached to the Constitution of Don Pedro; and the Cats the Radicals, who "want something more."

One of the authors of this narrative must be an expert draughtsman, and his drawings of costume have received ample justice from the wood-engravings, which partake of the beauty of all those published by Mr. VAN VOORST. Some of the designs represent the Carapuça; the very unwieldy and fantastic head-gear worn by the men of St. Michael's. It consists of every variety of material, according to the taste or circumstances of the wearer, but the form is alike in all ranks. It looks exceedingly awkward to strangers, but has its uses during the violent transitions of weather, and the heavy rains to which the Azores are liable. The women of St. Michael's wear heavy blue cloth cloaks with the stiffened hoods drawn over their heads, exactly like those worn by the Irish peasant women when seen at mass or market some years ago, and in many localities still. Neither men nor women of the common class wear shoes, save on great occasions. This our author considers a great beauty, and in that climate no hardship. The "better orders" of both sexes wear the post-dated dresses of Europe, many years in the rear of fashion. The children in the country are not over-burdened with clothing of any sort, nor does the climate require it. Among the reforms of Don Pedro, who suppressed the monasteries, in order, it is said, to restore public morals,—sadly deteriorated by the practices of those privileged nests of the vices—schools were established, where the children of the poor are taught free, and many parents are now availing themselves of the advantage. The children seen at a school visited by the Messrs. Bullar, appeared cheerful and intelligent, and not so awkward and loutish in their demeanour as poor English children. They were moderately well dressed. We are certainly, whatever may be the cause or causes, become, as a people, either the most sullen and reserved, or the most gruff and boorish in manners, among the civilized families of mankind. To this fact all travellers bear testimony.

The politeness of the people here is very striking to an Englishman. A countryman will hardly ever pass you without taking off his hat, even when his load may make it a real inconvenience to him; and as there is a serious composure about their courtesy, and an apparent absence of servility, these recognitions seem like tokens of sincere good-will. I do not know that there is more downright civility of purpose about them than there is in John Bull,—very possibly there may be much less. There is certainly more varnish; and a good watch looks better in a gold case, though it may go as well in one of Britannia metal.

We are sorry to find, that in spite of the protection of the ballot, the Pigs carried the election, owing to the influence of the priests, rarely, indeed, a wholesome influence, either in Catholic or Protestant lands, and very generally exerted on the wrong side.

The horses of the Azores are few and bad, the beasts of labour and burden being generally either bullocks, or mules and asses; which last abound, of a strong and active kind, and form the ordinary monture of both ladies and gentlemen. Mounted on clever and strong, though self-willed Jacks, our travellers made frequent excursions in the environs of the town of Ponta Delgada, and visited numerous orange gardens. On asses they, also, made the journey from Ponta Delgada to Villa Franca, a town at fifteen miles distance. The road lay along mountainous ridges, through deep glens, and around cliffs overhanging the sea. The asses were found as sagacious and sure-footed, in these dangerous paths, as if they had been mules. At Villa Franca the travellers lodged with an amusing couple, for whom the English merchants had built a cottage, as a reward for the husband having saved the lives of some English sailors wrecked upon the coast. The wife, Thomazia, showed the temper of her race, by engaging in a very characteristic scolding-match with certain orange-gatherers, who had been her lodgers, and who had, by their slovenliness, incurred her displeasure. She, besides, very naturally for a landlady, wished to turn them out, to make way for better-paying lodgers.

Had an Englishwoman been in one quarter of the apparent passion, she would have exhibited for some hours afterwards, in her red and hot face, short breathing, and nervous agitation, the effects of her anger; but Thomazia was as cool and possessed after it, as if it were an every-day thing.

The house is a good specimen of a St. Michael's cottage. Below, there is one room, opening into the street, with a floor of hard earth, trodden flat and smooth by naked feet, and strewn with green rushes. In one corner is a neat clean bed, having a bolster fringed with muslin; two heavy wooden chests, like corn-bins, stand together against the wall; and there is a square piece of matting, on which the women squat by day, and the children sleep by night. A small iron lamp, ending in a crucifix, the lamp resembling those from Herculaneum, the wick of which protrudes from a small spout at one end, hangs against the wall, and gives a faint light.

In the day-time the room is lighted by the door, the upper part of which opens. A couple of pigeons fly and roost at discretion in the room,—fowls and chickens do the same; and the friend of the family, the pig, comes in and is driven out whenever the lower part of the door chances to be open. The bed and the walls are decked out with green branches of Faya, and the staircase is screened off by a thin partition of platted reeds or canes, the glossy yellow sides of which look bright by the side of the dark stone walls, which in such cottages are left in the rough, without a coating of white-wash or plaster. The room above in which we are sitting, differs from the one below in having windows at the two ends, closed with rough wooden shutters, in place of glass. Behind the lower room is a kitchen, which, like that in old-fashioned farm-houses in England, has a stone hearth about three feet from the ground, on which the very simple process of cookery in the families of the poor is carried on. Near it is a small oven for baking the bread of Indian corn, and the festival bread for Christmas and Easter. We find no inconvenience from the absence of windows, (though the shutters are chinky;) so that what in England would be felt as a serious hardship, is not here even a deprivation.

This picture gives no idea of squalid misery, nor even of discomfort, to persons with the habits of Azoreans. The travellers visited a nunnery, to see the sight, though under the pretext of purchasing artificial flowers, which the nuns make very prettily from feathers. The usual apparatus of the turning-box used at all nunnery grates, seems to have been new to them, even in description. The scenery in the neighbourhood of Villa Franca is bold and fine, and the orange tree flourishes vigorously in the sunny glens and glades, opening to the sea.

Christmas arrived, bringing few signs of winter: there were neither fires nor fire-places; and the elder and cuckoo-pint were already bursting into leaf. Christmas is the great holiday of all Catholic, of all Christian countries; and on it the stranger in the Azores may see more of the manners of the people than in many months of ordinary time. Here

The appearance of the town was like that of an English village on Sunday. Every one,—man, woman, and child,—is cleanly, neatly, or even gaily dressed; no work is going on, no asses are to be seen, even the pigs have assumed an indolent holiday expression, and everything indicates a complete cessation from all working-day occupations. The rooms of the poor are dressed out with boughs of evergreens, and some are strewn with rushes. In the afternoon, in most of the cottages of the poor, the women, girls, and little children sat cross-legged on the floor, their glossy black hair neatly arranged, shining with oil, and often fastened with high tortoise-shell combs. Some were sitting at the door-step in the sun. The balconies of the houses were occupied by women, who leaned over them and looked at the passers-by. They are fond of bright-coloured shawls, with a preference for deep yellow or crimson; and these suit well their black eyes, hair, and dark complexions. The men lounged and chatted in the streets, or vigorously gesticulated in groups round the wine-shops; while their boys were in herds at play. The women are particularly gay about the feet. One wore a tawny pair of high shoes, with bright orange tassels; others white leather resembling kid; others what had the appearance at least of white satin; and one careful damsel, whom we accidentally interrupted in the outskirts of the town, was engaged in taking off and rolling up her smart shoes and open stockings, before setting forth bare-footed on her way home. She looked very much ashamed of herself, poor soul!

In the evening we wandered out and paid Thomazia's cottage a visit. She and her children and grandchildren were sitting up in all the enjoyment of their festival. In one corner of the room was the bed, which, in every cottage and on all occasions, is perfectly clean and neat, but to-day it was decorated with a finely worked muslin valance, and a handsome coverlid of white quilted materials, on which were strewn a few flowers. The floor was spread with fresh rushes, the walls and ceiling were covered with green branches of the Faya: and in the midst of this bower, just sufficiently lighted by a small crucifix-lamp to make a picture of the cottage interior, lay and lounged the family of the Bichos. There was Antonio stretched on the rushes in his hairy strength, sound asleep. Thomazia squatted in Moorish fashion with her elbows on her knees; one of her children with his head upon her lap, lay in motionless sleep; a girl in a bright red petticoat, laughing to her baby, and quizzing the foreigners to her black-eyed sister who sat beside her, leaned upon the bed; her husband with short moustachios and olive-brown complexion, rubbed his cat, and smiled at the notice taken of the cottage; and the youngest and brownest grandchild stood on the clothes-chest in a small white shirt, wondering at us with child-like simplicity. All were merry, and all were more or less cheered with wine. They were well-pleased to be looked at and praised. All the attitudes were perfect, being the natural expressions of unfettered and healthy bodies. The single bright lamp in the dark leafy room; the strong contrasts of light and shade; the thin angular limbs, and more marked features of the older woman, compared with the rounded and feminine figure of her daughter, and the young children on the floor, altogether produced a most picturesque effect. In the day time, when talking to their neighbours or playing in the street, they all look exquisitely happy; and even the little child, who, in addition to its single white shirt, had been decked out with an orange-coloured jacket, seemed delightfully conscious that it was more smartly dressed than usual.

The sweet, juicy, refreshing orange is naturally associated with every Englishman's ideas of St. Michael's; and in all stages of its growth, from hanging amidst the dark glossy foliage, green, pale yellow, or a glowing orange red, until packed for the English market, the orange was an object of interest to the travellers. We shall cite one or two passages describing its cultivation:—

March 26.—Accompanied Senhor B—— to several of his orange gardens in the town. Many of the trees in one garden were a hundred years old, still bearing plentifully, a highly-prized thin-skinned orange, full of juice and free from pips. The thinness of the rind of a St. Michael's orange and its freedom from pips, depend on the age of the tree. The young trees, when in full vigour, bear fruit with a thick pulpy rind and an abundance of seeds; but as the vigour of the plant declines the peel becomes thinner, and the seeds gradually diminish in number until they disappear altogether. Thus the oranges that we esteem the most, are the produce of barren trees, and those which we consider the least palatable, come from plants in full vigour.

Our friend was increasing the number of his trees by layers. These usually take root at the end of two years. They are then cut off from the parent stem, and are vigorous young trees four feet high. The process of raising from seed is seldom, if ever, adopted in the Azores, on account of the very slow growth of the trees so raised. Such plants, however, are far less liable to the inroads of a worm which attacks the roots of the trees raised from layers; and frequently proves very destructive to them. The seed or "pip" of the acid orange, which we call Seville, with the sweeter kind grafted upon it, is said to produce fruit of the finest flavour. In one small garden eight trees were pointed out which had borne for two successive years a crop of oranges which was sold for thirty pounds.

The treatment of orange-trees in Fayal differs from that in St. Michael's, where, after they are planted out, they are allowed to grow as they please. In this orange-garden, the branches, by means of strings and pegs fixed in the ground, were strained away from the centre into the shape of a cup, or of the ribs of an open umbrella, turned upside down. This allows the sun to penetrate, exposes the branches to a free circulation of air, and is said to be of use in ripening the fruit. Certain it is that oranges are exported from Fayal several weeks earlier than they are from St. Michael's; and, as this cannot be attributed to greater warmth of climate, it may possibly be owing to the plan of spreading the trees to the sun. The same precautions are taken here as in St. Michael's to shield them from the winds: high walls are built round all the gardens, and the trees themselves are planted among rows of fayas, firs, and camphor trees. If it were not for these precautions, the oranges would be blown down in such numbers as to interfere with or swallow up the profits of the gardens; none of the wind-falls, or "ground-fruit," as the merchants here call them, being exported to England.

Gathering and packing the fruit is merry work, according to our authors.

Suddenly we came upon merry groups of men and boys, all busily engaged in packing oranges, in a square and open plot of ground. They were gathered round a goodly pile of the fresh fruit, sitting on heaps of the dry calyx-leaves of the Indian corn, in which each orange is wrapped before it is placed in the boxes. Near these circles of laughing Azoreans, who sat at their work and kept up a continual cross-fire of rapid repartee as they quickly filled the orange cases, were a party of children, whose business it was to prepare the husks for the men, who used them in packing. These youngsters, who were playing at their work like the children of a larger growth that sat by their side, were with much difficulty kept in order by an elderly man, who shook his head and a long stick, whenever they flagged or idled.

A quantity of the leaves being heaped together near the packers, the operation began. A child handed to a workman who squatted by the heap of fruit, a prepared husk; this was rapidly snatched from the child, wrapped round the orange by an intermediate workman, passed by the feeder to the next, who, (sitting with the chest between his legs,) placed it in the orange-box with amazing rapidity, took a second and a third and a fourth as fast as his hands could move, and the feeders could supply him, until at length the chest was filled to overflowing, and was ready to be nailed up. Two men then handed it to the carpenter, who bent over the orange-chest several thin boards, secured them with a willow band, pressed it with his naked foot as he sawed off the ragged ends of the boards; and finally despatched it to the ass, which stood ready for lading. Two chests were slung across his back, by means of cords crossed in a figure of eight, both were well-secured by straps under his belly, the driver took his goad, pricked his beast, and uttering the never-ending cry "Sackaiao," trudged off to the town.

The orange-trees in this garden cover the sides of a glen or ravine, like that of the Dargle, but somewhat less steep: they are of some age, and have lost the stiff clumpy form of the younger trees. Some idea of the rich beauty of the scene may be formed by imagining the trees of the Dargle to be magnificent shrubs loaded with orange-fruit, and mixed with lofty arbutuses:—

Groves whose rich fruit, burnish'd with golden rind,
Hung amiable,—and of delicious taste.

In one part, scores of children were scattered among the branches, gathering fruit into small baskets, hallooing, laughing, practically joking, and finally emptying their gatherings into the larger baskets underneath the trees, which, when filled, were slowly borne away to the packing-place, and bowled out upon the great heap. Many large orange-trees on the steep sides of the glen lay on the ground uprooted, either from their load of fruit, the high winds, or the weight of the boys; four, five, and even six of whom will climb the branches at the same time; and as the soil is very light, and the roots are superficial, (and the fall of a tree, perhaps, not unamusing,) down the trees come. They are allowed to lie where they fall; and those which had evidently fallen many years ago were still alive, and bearing good crops. The oranges are not ripe until March or April, nor are they eaten generally by the people here until that time; the boys, however, that pick them, are marked exceptions. The young children of Villa Franca are now almost universally of a yellow tint, as if saturated with orange-juice.

As the import duty is not paid on the quantity of oranges, but levied by the size of the box in which they are packed, the more that can be squeezed into a box the better, however the fruit may be injured.

Above 120,000 large and small chests of oranges were shipped for England in 1839, and 315 boxes of lemons, amounting, in estimated value, to above £115,000. A labourer in the orange gardens earns from sixpence to eightpence a-day; but the number of holidays considerably decreases the amount of his yearly wages, and leaves the Azorean peasant not more in the year than the Irish labourer, if so much.

In a visit to the country residence of the American consul, which is in a beautiful and commanding situation in the valley of the Furnas,—i. e. of the Caverns,—the travellers first saw those hot baths which form the great attraction of the valley to visitors and invalids, and to which, considering the nature of the population, great numbers of persons, sick and healthy, are drawn every season. At the distance of many yards, the vapour of the hot springs may be seen ascending to the height of twenty or thirty feet. In some of them the water is soapy or creamy; in others slightly sulphureous. The principal spring is sulphureous.

It bubbles up through a loose bottom of broken rock; and the column of water in the centre, like the small Icelandic Geysers, described by Dr. Henderson, is usually three feet high, gradually lessening towards its edges until it merely ripples and undulates on the margin of the basin.

Suppose a conglomeration of half-a-dozen London New River Company fire-plugs spouting up their water into a large shallow basin, well furred with white stony matter; and then suppose this huge basin set on some enormous hidden fire, and made to boil at a rapid rate, and you will have as good an idea as I can convey to you, of the principal caldeira in this valley. But you will still want the concomitants that give something like sublimity to the boiling caldron of the Furnas. You must possess yourself with a feeling of insecurity,—you must imagine that it is just possible that the crust on which you stand may give way and divulge the hidden force below; for the ground trembles, and a pumping sound, like that of a powerful engine at a distance far below you, is going on with great regularity of movement, impressing you with the conviction that the ebullition on the surface of the ground is only the result of this pumping, and that the power at work beneath your feet, would, if it were not for the vents you see about you, blow up the whole surface on which you stand. So great indeed, formerly, was the fear of the islanders in general, that at one time, none but the natives of the valley came to this place; and it was not until the intelligence and enterprise of the father of the present Vice-Consul of the United States had brought him to the spot, and had thereby gradually weakened the prejudices which the citizens entertained against it, that his example was followed, until at length the Furnas became what it now is, the Baden Baden of the Island of St. Michael.

At a little distance from the principal caldeira is a deep smoking circular pit, in the bottom of which you see water boiling furiously; not, as in the other, running over in any quantity, but continually spouting up, and falling back, to be re-boiled. This has been but twelve months in visible operation. One day a long explosion was heard, and on coming to examine what damage had been done, the villagers found this new caldron: its cover had been violently blown off by the pent-up steam.

Clambering a little further, we came to the entrance of what looked like a deep and dark cave, and from the bottom of this is thrown up and down, without ceasing, boiling mud, of the consistency and colour of the creamy scrapings of Piccadilly.

The ground is hot; every here and there boiling water and hissing steam ooze up through holes in the clay, like those made by worms on muddy English shores, and you stand in warm vapour, tainted with sulphureted hydrogen gas.

One of the journalists, probably the Invalid, praises the invigorating qualities of the luxurious bath which he enjoyed, which united pleasures of many kinds. The following description might almost tempt invalids to make the voyage to St. Michael's:—

While bathing, our man cooked eggs for us in one of the small boiling springs, and we afterwards went to the iron-spring for a draught. This flows from a stone spout into a hollow stone basin, and then trickles down a bank into a stream below: it has a strong but not disagreeable iron flavour, effervesces slightly, and is extremely grateful and refreshing. The bath and the spring seemed the two things best suited to the outside and inside of man, on first rising from his bed; natural luxuries when in health, natural remedies when sick;—luxuries without after-pain, remedies without misery in taking them;—both which evils seem to be inseparable from the luxuries and the remedies of our own invention. Most invalids feel that before breakfast existence is burdensome; but this bath and draught of liquid iron were as a breakfast in producing serenity and happiness, and were more than a breakfast in giving warmth and briskness, and a feeling of health as of the flowing of younger blood through the veins; and instead of destroying the power of making another, they rather increased it manifold.

After breakfast, we mounted asses and rode to see more hot springs on the shore of the lake we had passed yesterday.

Close by these springs, an English gentleman, a member of the Yacht Squadron, has bought several hundred acres of land, with the intention (it is said) of building a house upon it.

The evening was so cold, that we were glad to sit round some blazing logs of wood, and drink to the memory of the old year, in punch, concocted by a master's hand. The lemons were of a very fragrant kind, just picked from the tree. There was a freshness in their acidity, and a youth in their aroma, justifying Schiller's eulogy—

Herb ist das Lebens Innerster Kern.

The difference between these fresh-gathered lemons and those we get in England, is about as great as that between fresh and bottled gooseberries.

St. Michael's has made rapid advances in comfort within the last twenty years,—or since that blessed era to all the world—the Peace! Then, glass in the windows was a luxury almost unknown; now, the windows of all but the poorest class are glazed; and, though they want many of those things necessary to our English ideas of comfort, chill poverty is unknown among them. The travellers hint, that though the repression of vice was the ostensible motive of Don Pedro for dilapidating the convents and religious houses, he mainly wished, in his necessities, to confiscate their property, and seize their revenues for his own purposes. Yet the lives of the priests are allowed to have been exceedingly dissolute; nor do their morals appear to be much amended by the late sweeping and severe reforms. The nuns of Villa Franca were in so unruly and discreditable a state, that commissioners were sent from Lisbon to search the convent, and to examine the nuns. They took up their abode within the convent one night, and were never more heard of. The story is not vouched for, though the use of the knife and the poison-bowl is not unknown in the Azores. The suppression of the monasteries and religious houses have had the usual distressing effects among the poor, who were partly or wholly supported by them.

There was a gay carnival at Villa Franca while the travellers were there, of which the principal amusement was, persons of all ages squirting and flicking water at each other. A sermon, which was preached at the commencement of Lent, and which appears a very rare event, created as great a sensation in the town as a Camp-meeting in the Back Woods. This Revival was followed by a religious procession. Of these exhibitions, the journalists remark—

To an unaccustomed Protestant eye they are often grotesque and ridiculous; but the people here regard them as very beautiful, and, in general, seem serious and reverential when they pass. And yet even to a Protestant, the scene in the square, when the image of Christ first made its appearance, was striking. The square is a large one, having the church of Misericordia and the adjoining hospital on the western side, and the principal church, with its esplanade and long flight of steps on the north. On these steps, between one and two hundred women, dressed in the indigo cloak of the country, and having their heads tastefully covered with white handkerchiefs, coloured shawls, or dark hoods, quietly knelt in attitudes of prayer. Men behind them, and children, scattered everywhere, were on their knees, with heads uncovered and their hands clasped before them. In the square below, and on the long steps of the church, with their solemn prayerful faces, all converging to one common centre, the same gay assembly as that on the steps and esplanade knelt in silence. The day was as bright as an unclouded sun could make it; and the stillness at this moment was like midnight. Associating as we do the hum and bustle of confusion with a large assemblage of persons, there is an impressive solemnity in a crowd suddenly motionless and mute. All—from the silver-headed old man to sleek curly-pated boys—waited in reverential attitudes, with a show of mute submissiveness, which impressed me by its apparent sincerity. But the sensation was a transient one; for no sooner had the image disappeared, than instantly the five hundred dumb figures quickly rose, covered their heads with scarlet caps and blue carapuças, and as suddenly resumed their every-day gesticulating gossip; while the crashing church bell once more rung out its clanking jargon, as if to sympathize with the nasal jabber in the square underneath.

This is the time for general confession. A woman, who came to-day with her sick child, had just returned from "making a clean breast" in the principal church. She confesses once a year; others confess twice; others three times; and those, she said, who were "very good," four times. I asked her what questions the priest put to her. She laughed, hesitated, and at length said that he inquired whether she was faithful to her husband! what lies she had told in the past twelve months! what she had stolen, and of whom? whether she had slandered others! and how often she had cursed and sworn, or called on the "diable!" All this she told him, I fancy, without mental reservation, and appeared light-hearted and relieved.

Although we are now in Lent, and people above the common sort wear black, small attention seems to be paid to the observance of a fast. A person living in a neighbouring street, on whom we called yesterday, said, in answer to necessary questions concerning her diet, that she ate fish, flesh, fowl, and beans, with rice and wine, for her dinner, (which, in common with the people of her rank, is generally eaten at noon,) and that her breakfast and supper were, as usual, of bread and butter, fried eggs, and coffee.

"But it is Lent! does not Senhora make some little abatement in her diet?"

"Oh! dear, no," was the laughing answer: and then, to save her Catholic reputation with heretics, she added through her interpreter, "At least there is very little difference in what I eat."

Previous to the revolution, when the clergy were powerful, they looked narrowly into the habits of their flocks; and would, we were told by a Portuguese gentleman, have visited with their displeasure any undue excess during Lent; but since the new state of things, the observances are much less rigid; and flesh and wine may now be indulged in during Lent without the same fear of church censures.

The priests, however, are very strict in compelling their flock, at least once a-year, to confession: they insist on every individual confessing, until the sins of the whole inhabitants of Villa Franca, from the first untruth of the little child to the premeditated debaucheries of the worn-out row, are safely locked up in the breasts of the dozen men who form the spiritual fathers of the place. The following specimen is perhaps below the average mark of the insular priesthood:—

In our walk yesterday we were accosted by a slipshod Friar. His dress did not indicate his order. He wore a dingy linen jacket, reddish-brown fustian trousers, the extremities of which were tucked into the tops of old Wellington boots, with a hat of high antiquity, now napless and rusty; and his mouldy-looking beard, joined with a moist oystery eye and a nose of intemperate tendency to red, called to mind the Spanish proverb that "there's many an old cloak that covers a good drinker." In his sitting-room were a few books:—a well-used Breviary in four volumes, one or two Latin prayer-books, an almanac, and a Portuguese work on Christian morals. On some of the volumes was an ancient crop of green mould that had flourished for a length of time in perfect peace. A snuff-coloured cloak hung in flabby folds from the same peg with his hat and sea-green umbrellas; and below it a gallon flask of wine stood on the floor, with a goodly tumbler to drink it from. It had been made by his own hands from the grapes raised in his own garden, and was the best island-wine I had tasted in St. Michael's. He frothed it out from the flagon with a liberal hand, and with the expression of one who loved good wine, "comme fait tout homme de bien." He showed us everything in his house, from his bacon and wine-casks to the plot of flowers and sweet-herbs in the corner of his garden, and led us even to his bed, spread upon a mat on the floor, which partook of much of the slovenliness and dirt of its owner. Within arm's reach of the pillow was the plainest, and indeed the only proof of our Friar's lingering attachment to the church, in the mouth of a London porter bottle, wherein was stuck, until by constant guttering it had glued and buttressed itself to the neck, a stout fragment of one of the solid wax tapers from a neighbouring altar. Although his abode was destitute of comfort or neatness, there was at the same time no indication that the abolition of his order had plunged him into poverty.

He talked of England,—or rather of London, for that was his word for Great Britain; inquired with a sort of incredulous expression,—like Miss Tabitha Bramble when she asked the Scottish Lieutenant if his Indian squaw was a Presbyterian,—whether the English believed in Jesus Christ! in the Holy Spirit! in the Conversion of St. Paul! and looked surprised when he was told that they did. He asked if we had confession, and on the reply being made "Yes, to God, not to priests," he took his Breviary, and at once referred to the texts which he considered confirmatory of his views of confession, and of the authority of St. Peter's successor. His knowledge of England was about as extensive as our ignorance of his native place.

Our interview ended in a sturdy attack from the Friar on the unlawfulness of marriage among English clergy, pronounced with amusing gravity; and as the fact could not very well be denied, and he appeared to slight St. Paul's comparative approval of the marriage state, we ventured good-humouredly to remind him of the Catholic Padre in the Square, with his pleasant housekeeper and family of young children; and then left him at his door to digest the discrepancies between the theory and practice of a celibate life with priests of vigorous constitutions.

Dr. Bullar, wherever he went, found plenty of patients, who requited his services with blessings, prayers, and the expression of boundless gratitude. These medical calls gave the travellers an opportunity of seeing the houses of some of the Morgados, which, considering the rank and presumed wealth of the owners, appear much less comfortable than the cottages of the poor. But this privileged class also is improving. One of the patients was a nun, whose state of single blessedness, even after the suppression of her order, was not very deplorable.

Her rooms were ornamented with a multitude of small images of saints, in glass cases and glazed lanterns. Her habits are perhaps a specimen of those of the middle classes here. She rose as early as six, took a very light meal at eight, hardly deserving the name of breakfast, dined at twelve on vegetables, bread, fish or fowl, with wine, supped substantially on the same kind of eatables at eight, and went to bed soon after the evening meal. Since the nuns were ejected from their convents they have been pensioned by government, and those I have met with seem to be in comfortable circumstances. She was elderly and stout, by no means coming up to the ideal of poetasters and books of beauty.

Provisions are tolerably cheap, though not in great variety, the place of meat being, as in all countries where agriculture is in a backward condition, supplied by poultry. Bread appears dear, but the people in general use Indian corn. Wages, as stated above, are what we consider low.

In January, the weather is represented as like an English October: the mornings and evenings cold, but the days fine. In March, the weather had become warm and genial; and in April the journalists began to make long excursions, and to cruise about from one island to another. Their setting out from Villa Franca gives one a favourable idea of the amiable and primitive character of the people.

Thomasia looked sad as she said her last "viva;" her gipsy-faced daughter, with a brown bantling in her arms, taught the child to make its little bow; a group at the bottom of the street waved their hands with their parting "vivas;" several heads bowed and viva'd from as many balconies and doors; the asses clattered over the paved streets, with a sharp iron jingle; the good-tempered nun, from her wooden balcony, gave a cordial good-b'ye, and asked rapidly when we should return; others whom we passed, made like inquiries of our hasty drivers.

The travellers were bound for the town of Ribiera Grande, in the neighbourhood of which there are baths high up in the mountains, in the small crater of an extinct volcano. The baths were at this season a desert solitude, the huts built for the accommodation of the visitors being all shut up. The place seemed dismal enough, until brightened by the appearance of the presiding spirit of the springs—

The merry soul herself, who came laughing and singing into the room, dispersing to the four winds of heaven the whole host of dismal with which the place was peopled. Maria is her name, varied according to circumstances, and her own imagination, into "Maria of the Caldeiras," "the Child of the Mountains," "Maria the Shepherdess," and othersuch descriptive additions in suitable abundance. She is quite a girl, a lively and excitable being, with olive complexion, quick eyes, dark hair, and fine teeth, dressed after a fashion of her own, in a round straw hat, lined with green silk, a smock frock of printed cotton, (between a petticoat and shooting jacket,) and across her shoulders she wears a white linen pocket like a game-bag, wherein she carries the keys of the baths and houses of the Caldeiras. She has taught herself to play on a guitar; has an excellent ear, is a wonderful mimic both of French and English; and sang the Marseillaise, as she had heard it from the lips of a fat-throated Englishman, as cleverly as Matthews could have done it. She said that Senhor Some-one had endeavoured to persuade her to go to England, and try her fortune there; but nothing would induce her to leave the Caldeiras, where, with her father, she will spend the remainder of her days. She could say a few words of English; and among them the emphatic sentence which expressed her determination never to leave St. Michael's; "Nao Senhor; me no go bode sheep; nao, Senhor." She is well fitted to be a guide to the beauties of the Caldeiras; and a more willing or more cheerful one it would be difficult to find.

The old father of this lively lass has the charge of these solitary baths, which do not appear nearly so inviting as those of Furnas.

In the voyage to Pico and Fayal in a Portuguese vessel, the travellers saw more of the character of the mixed part of the population of the islands. The town of Horta, (the depôt for coal,) appears rather more advanced in exterior civilisation than Ponta Delgada, the capital of St. Michael's. Between Horta and the island of Pico, constant intercourse is kept up by ferry-boats; but each of the islands retains its own physiognomy and costume, though the manners and customs are in most points almost identical. One of the travellers scaled the lofty peaks of Pico, and he gives a long and rather interesting account of the expedition, which reached even to the extreme edge of the great crater. After dawn on the second day, he and his guides and companions reached this goal, having, on their ascent, lighted a fire on the mountain side, and spent the dark hours in the open air. The view from the lofty cone of Pico was wide and magnificent, taking in many of the distant islands of the archipelago. The height of Pico has been variously estimated at from 6000 to 9000 feet.

In sailing from Horta, the journalists had for fellow-passengers two natives of the island of Corvo, who had been shipwrecked, and were now returning home to their families. When their native island came in sight, these simple-hearted islanders wept with joy. Their wives, children, and friends, who were waiting for them, received the lost men in the same vein of sad joyousness on their landing. Corvo is considered among the poorest of the Azores, and the manners of the people appear much more primitive than in St. Michael's or Fayal. There is truth and force in the following remarks:—

If poverty means the want of shoes, and mirrors, and oranges, and cane-bottomed chairs, certainly the people can boast of none of these. Their dingy clothes, too which are principally homespun, give them rather an unwealthy appearance. But they are poor only in the sense that the other islanders are poor—in wanting European luxuries. "The man," says Cobbett, "who, by his own and his family's labour, can provide a sufficiency of food and raiment, and a comfortable dwelling-place, is not a poor man." They are a hard-working people, thrown very much on their own resources; rear pigs, poultry, cows, and sheep; grow maize, wheat, potatoes, and flax; weave their own garments, cure their own bacon; and, as we do in England, import their wine. Grapes, in the middle of summer, and abundance of melons, are their luxuries. Shoes they wisely eschew; no shoemaker lives at Corvo; and the priest is the only human being there who submits to such trammels, and his antique buckled shoes were, of course, an importation. American whalers occasionally touch at Corvo for provisions, and, as is usual with ships from England and America, they in no way improve the morality of the people.

The Corvoites seem to be happy, contented, and industrious people, in good condition, strong, and well-looking. They are one large family of 900, with a priest for their father. They all live in one village. The cottages are built of stone, and stand behind low stone walls;—some are roofed with coarse tiles, others are thatched; they have no glass windows, and all are chimneyless. They are built in tiers, one above another on the side of the hill, the lanes between them being narrow, stony, and steep. We walked into the village through a small wicket-gate, that swung across the lane to keep the swine from trespassing into the fields.

We passed on to the house of the chief person in the island,—the priest of Corvo,—the Reverendissimo Senhor João Ignacio Lopez, Meritissimo Vigário na Ilha do Corvo, &c. (as a friend had written in one of his books,)—a man whose plain, honest, Wedgewood clay is perhaps more happily tempered than the most elaborate specimens of porcelain. His house stands just outside the village, and we found him in the yard before it. He welcomed us as if we had been old friends,—although we brought no letter to him, having heard that it was entirely unnecessary,—shook us heartily by the hand, and begged us to walk into his house, which he said was open to us. All this was done in right sincerity too. The very moment we entered the room, without waiting for us to unpack our own basket of provisions, or to ask or say anything more than that we would be seated, he took a chair in his hand, mounted it, and from a wooden tray which swung aloft, beyond the reach of mouse or rat, he handed down first one loaf, then another, of a holiday quality, then a cheese, and then another, begging us to eat:—

And, with blithe air of open fellowship,
Brought from his cupboard wine and stouter cheer,
Like one who would be merry.

There were barrels on the floor, and wine-bottles in his cupboard. Wine-glasses he had not, but he filled some goodly tumblers with wine, and pouring the rest into a white jug, drank it off by way of example. He was a bulky man, of about seventy, six feet in height, and somewhat bowed with years. His head was bald, having a few white locks at the sides; his eyes were moist and dim, his features massive, and expressive of quiet contentment; and every man we met with spoke well of the good old man. The boatmen called him "the father of the island," and looked up to him with respect when he spoke to them. The villagers who came into his room, seemed to regard him as the patriarch of the place: they bowed low, and kissed his hand, which he held out for the purpose.

The room in which we sat was lighted by one small window, with two stone seats in its recess. Above was the rough boarding under the tiles; three beds stood in three corners of the room, and, scattered on the floor, were stone jars, heavy chests, barrels, stools, and crockery; while a range of book-shelves, filled with volumes of Portuguese divinity, empty bottles, glasses, white jugs, and cups; and a cupboard well furnished with wine-bottles, glasses, and aged corks, clothed the walls. A twisted glass cup for holy water, and a dusty saint sitting amidst artificial flowers in a large glass lantern, indicated his religion; and his table-drawers stored with certain rare curiosities,—such as lucifer matches, the names of his few visitors, and the one Corvo watch carefully enclosed, first in its own outer case, and afterwards in sundry linen bags, pointed out his riches.

After we had accepted the hospitality of Padre Lopez, and had arranged to sleep at his house, we walked through the village. First we came to the cottage of Maurice, the elder of the two lost men, who, having met us in the way, begged we would come and see his house. It was of one story, with a flight of stone steps outside, leading to the upper room; was well floored and dry, and was divided from the bed-room by a wooden partition, fitted with shelves and drawers, which is in common use in the cottages of Flores and Corvo. At each end of the partition there is an opening, usually covered with a curtain, which leads to the beds behind. There were porter bottles and a few pieces of white and coloured crockery-ware on the shelves, and a clothes'-chest and a new chair in the room. The place below was a sort of kitchen or outhouse, where the pig came in to feed, and the fowls roosted. In it were an oven for baking bread, a hearth with smouldering wood-embers, five or six sides of well-cured bacon hanging from a beam, hides of oxen on the ground, a large hoe, a few dirty baskets, and the water-tubs.

If this be poverty, would that all the working men of Britain, who ought not to be poor, were but half so well off as Maurice. The Corvoites are a handsome race, darker in complexion than the natives of St. Michael's, but better-featured. The costume of the women is picturesque. Like some of the islands of Shetland, Corvo is, in winter, cut off for months together from all communication with the other islands.

Having visited Flores and a few of the smaller islands, the travellers once more returned to Horta, in Fayal, in order to find a vessel to take them back to St. Michael's. From Ponta Delgada it was their purpose to repair to the baths of the Furnas. During the summer months, they spent their time here much as people usually do at remote mountainous watering-places, though their objects of observation present far greater novelty. As a specimen, we select this sketch:—

June 12.—While waiting for my bath this morning, Da Costa, an old man who attends at the baths, and who, having spent upwards of eighty years of his life in this valley, is still a riser at four o'clock, and green in his old age, gave me some of the gossip of the valley. I forgot to ask him whether he was a branch of the old Portuguese family of that name—the oldest, it is said, in Portugal—which traces in direct lineal descent from Donna Eva da Costa, who, according to Portuguese heralds and those who quiz them, took her name from Adam's Costa, or side. Da Costa's gossip, or Pepino's, rather, for by reason of a certain prolixity of nose his neighbours have nicknamed him Pepino or Cucumber, and according to the national love for nicknames, he is more frequently called by that name—was about his pastors, who seem neither "to take nor point the way to heaven," but to lead, like the rest of their fraternity in the island, immoral lives. The result of old Pepino's experience was, that generally speaking, there was not so much marrying in the Furnas as when he was a boy; that as for the priests, each one was a Cœlebs in search of a wife, and that the difficulty of finding was not great; that the padre of the village had one wife; but that the curate, like the woman of Samaria, had had many, and she that he then had was not his wife. He spoke lightly of their habits, as if he was not conscious of any impropriety in the priest following the example of his neighbours; could duly distinguish between the man and the office; and took off his carapuça with all politeness to the brawny curate, who shortly afterwards emerged, in heavy cloak and white napkins, from his luxurious warm bath, and mounting his ass, pricked homeward.

The peasants of Furnas are as proud of their valley as the Neapolitans are of their burning mountain: they will fight for its honour, though they do not like to exchange hard blows.

Unless, as we hope and believe, society is pressing on to some higher point than it has ever yet attained, or even soberly dreamed of, one might be tempted to cast a longing look back to those "good old times" when the Church of Rome petted, caressed, and amused the poor of its flock, and while it fleeced them, at least cheated them agreeably,—to cast a longing look to times when the manners of England very nearly resembled those still found existing in such countries as these islands in the Atlantic. There are great evils in the intermediate state. The festival of Whitsuntide is succeeded, at Ponta Delgada, by that of the Holy Ghost, which lasts for seven weeks, and is celebrated in every parish. It is thus described by Dr. Webster of the United States, who has published a very minute account of St. Michael's:—

On each Sunday, during high mass, the priest places a crown of silver on the head, and a sceptre in the hand, of a peasant previously elected by the people. He is proclaimed "Emperador," and is conducted to a seat beneath a canopy, prepared for him on one side of the church, where he sits during the remainder of the service. On leaving the church, the crowd attends him, strewing the roads along which he passes with flowers, and, in return, he bestows his blessings upon them by flourishing his consecrated sceptre.

"It is usual for the emperador to have his cottage repaired, painted, and white-washed, if he can afford it, or decorated with branches of myrtle and flowers, to receive the numerous guests who return with him to the church, to dance and sing till late at night. The crown and sceptre are always deposited in the best room in the house, on a salver of silver, and tapers are kept burning about them. The dancing and singing are repeated every Sunday evening. In every parish, there is a rude stone building erected in the most public road, the floor of which is elevated some feet from the ground and an open arch on each side supports the roof. On the last, or seventh Sunday, of this festival, the emperador, early in the morning, takes his seat in this "theatro," as it is called; a table is placed before him, on which are bread and wine, and on his right and left are two or three of his particular friends. He remains here till night, during which time the pious bring offerings of bread, wine, eggs, and poultry, to be blessed by him. A certain portion of these is divided among the donors, and the remainder distributed in the evening to the poor. On the same day the populace elect the emperador for the ensuing year, to whom the crown and sceptre are delivered; he takes them home, and deposits them in a room prepared for their reception. The house of the emperador elect is open every Sunday till the next festival, on which he is publicly crowned and proclaimed; during this time it is the weekly resort of all his friends and acquaintance, who engage in dancing, singing, and various rustic games."

"The consummate worldly wisdom," remarks Mr. Bullar, "is unquestionable with which the church of Rome adapts herself to popular habits and manners, however various, making herself all things to all men, so that she may win them. Here all the amusements of the poor are intimately connected with their religion. From one end of the year to another, there is a series of religious processions and observances, embodying, in a rude way enough, the great events in the life of our Saviour, or circumstances, often entirely fabulous, in the history of saints. At one time, every boy is armed with a squirt to celebrate one event, or with a hammer to mark another, and now these dances are going on for a couple of months in remembrance of a third. Similar scenes were once passing in England, the traces alone of which now exist, hidden in a few customs and observances, whose origin is only known to the antiquary. But with all our progress in riches and in science, what recreations are there in the nineteenth century for that large class, the laborious and untaught, who need amusement, and will have some kind or other! There are a few manly games for strong and active young men; and for the rest, fairs and mountebanks, dancers on tightropes, drinking-booths, stalls of figs and gingerbread, travelling circuses, locomotive theatres, horse-racing, with such in-door amusements as gin-shops, beer-shops, and public-house taps most abundantly supply.

On other festivals, food in considerable quantities and wine is distributed among the poor, under the superintendence of the priests; and not in the sordid and disgusting manner in which a miserable dole is sometimes thrown to the degraded poor of this "highly civilized country," but with every appliance which may conciliate the regard and refine the feelings of the recipients of the boon. The scene is not only as little offensive and humiliating as such distributions can be made, but lively and agreeable. A temporary tabernacle or chapel of canvass was erected in the street, with the usual Popish accessories of tapers and tinsel ornaments.

From each corner of the chapel, which filled the body of the street, two rows of tables stretched down each side of the foot-pavement, a distance of five hundred yards. The tables were planks of deal, resting on empty tubs at equal distances asunder. In each tub branches of the common yellow broom were stuck; and the planks, as well as the altar, were afterwards covered with white linen cloths.

The table-cloths having been spread, the ceremony of laying the dinner began. The allowance to each person consisted of five loaves, two pounds of raw beef, and a pint of wine, in a bottle of red pottery corked with a bunch of flowers. At the end of the long line of planks, the loaves, meat, and wine were handed out in basketfuls to about thirty basket-bearers. Each basket had two handles, with a man at each handle, who, with large napkins tied round the left arm, marched up the lane between the tables. The bearers were preceded by two musicians, dressed in coarse flowing gowns of whity-brown serge, with belcher handkerchiefs of glazed cotton tied tightly over their heads, and hanging down their backs. They much resembled the grotesque calico-dressed men, who are occasionally to be seen carrying broad advertisements through the streets of London. One of these banged a crazy drum, and the other shook the empty hoop of a tambourine. In front of the merry-andrew musicians, or huddled with the procession, a languid, knock-kneed youth, dressed like the two musicians, lounged along with a faded crimson banner, on which a dove was embroidered, to represent the "Holy Spirit." The three chanted as they walked, in strong nasal tones, approaching almost to a yell;—

Ass intoned to ass

Harmonic twang! of leather, horn, and brass;

Such as from bellowing lungs the enthusiast blows;

High sounds, attempered to the vocal nose.

When the basket-bearers were ready, "the band" struck up, and the procession proceeded at a leisurely pace to walk up the lane in a column. This was repeated until the whole tables were spread.

In the midst of this scene, it was highly entertaining to see our acting landlord, triton among the minnows. On this occasion, besides a napkin on his arm neatly fringed with lace, he bore a wand of office, in the shape of three feet of sugar-cane, with which he worried all little boys who came within his reach. Did an urchin impudently peep into the bread-basket, Thomas was ready with his cane; did a child creep under the tables into holy ground,—into the lane set apart for the carriers,—Thomas's eyes immediately spied him. He was evidently the great authority on all the little points of Whitsunday management. He was at the head of the procession, bustling along with mincing steps, turning back to see that the people followed, perspiring, hallooing to some offender in front, patronising some inoffensive being in the crowd, or petrifying turbulent boys.

"Human nature is much the same all over the world," especially human nature in brief authority.

The journalists are candid and charitable in their judgment of the Catholics of the Azores, believing them sincere and undoubting in their faith, whatever its errors may be, and punctual and serious in the observances which it enjoins. "Some Protestants," one of them remarks, "have told me they are formalists. . . . Unhappily any form of religion, even the simplest, may be made formal; and men may rely on doctrines as firmly as on the inerest ritual observances."

In the end of July, the Invalid and his companion finally left St. Michael's for Lisbon in a large Portuguese trader. Some of the reflections to which the objects which they saw in this foreign vessel gave rise, carry a deep moral, at the present moment, to those who desire to see England's prosperity increase on the only sure foundation—extended commerce, the free markets of the whole world. The Journalist states:—

I am more impressed with the wealth and resources of England since I left it; but I am less surprised at them. The compass of this Portuguese vessel was made at Wapping; the quadrant in Holborn; the knives are stamped "sheer steel;" the bell for the watch, and the iron of the windlass, are from an English foundry; the captain uses an English watch, and calculates by John Hamilton Moore's "Seaman's complete daily assistant;" "Sailmaker" is stamped on one of the sails, and the passengers are dressed in Manchester prints or Leeds cloth. Everywhere it is the same; you meet in the solitary mountain paths of these almost unknown islands a pedlar with two square boxes slung on each side of his ass, and see him in the villages tempting the women with the bright handkerchiefs and gay prints from Manchester. In the obscurest village the neat blue-paper needle-case from Birmingham hangs from a string at a cottage doorway, to tell that English needles are sold within; and in crossing in an open boat between two of the remotest islands, Flores and Corvo, an English sailmaker's name and residence were printed legibly on the sail. V—tells me that the other evening he had just landed in a fishing hamlet,—a lonely place at the mouth of a deep ravine which parts two gloomy mountain ridges,—when his reveries were disturbed by a fellow-passenger, who having caught sight of some village girls, suddenly exclaimed, "Look, those are all my prints!"

Lisbon, Cintra, Mafra, and the other remarkable places in that neighbourhood, are too well known to detain us; nor need we be arrested even by Mr. Beckford's fairy palace of Montserrat, now lying, it is aptly said, "like the broken toy of a spoiled child of fortune." Byron, as a young man, fitly moralised on these ruins, and pointed his moral by a just reflection on the mistaken way in which the possessor had sought happiness; and then "the poet went his way, and in a few years did the same." But if Lisbon and Cintra are become stale and unprofitable, the young Queen of Portugal remains an object of great interest to her allies; and of her we have this passing but satisfactory glimpse:—

Cintra, Thursday, August 8.—In passing the palace this morning, two small open carriages, drawn by four mules, and preceded by two outriders, drove into the yard, the first of which contained the Queen of Portugal and her husband, Prince Ferdinand of Coburg, who, by the birth of a prince, has acquired the right of being styled King of Portugal; the second, his father and some other relatives, who are visiting the Court. I walked into the court-yard to see the queen alight. No attendants from the palace were waiting for her, but the king gave her his arm up the steps. Before I saw her face, and recognised her as the queen, I thought she was a woman of that age which is so well defined by the three short words, "fat, fair, and forty," but her face, which is both fat and fair, undeceived me, and proved her to be still quite young. Her expression was good-tempered; she was very plainly dressed in an unadorned straw bonnet and light silk pelisse, of becoming colours, and looked quiet but unqueen-like. The king, a tall, graceful young man, with light German hair, healthy juvenile colour, and long legs, reminds you of a prepossessing young Englishman leaving Eton for college. He is said to be very devoted to his queen, and to mix but little with the Portuguese nobles. There was nothing in the carriages, mules, attendants, or principal personages, which marked their rank; everything was plain, private, and slovenly; and I am told that it is the habit of the queen to omit ceremony, and to be much seen. Is this wise in the present day? That was a safe reply of a Spanish minister to the king.—"Omit this affair; it is but a ceremony." "A ceremony! why, Sire, you are yourself a ceremony."

The travellers, after visiting Mafra, and witnessing a bull-fight, which, as here described, must be a very exciting spectacle, came to London by steam. In an Appendix, the adaptation of the climate of St. Michael's for invalids, and especially for those labouring under incipient pulmonary affections, is fully discussed. There is also a complete analysis of the waters of the hot-baths of the Furnas, with many useful observations, and information valuable to persons who mean to visit the Azores. These islands are not unlikely, we imagine, to obtain, even through the agency of these volumes, an accession of visitors, English and American. In this Appendix, we prize above everything, the sensible remarks on the thoughtless or selfish cruelty, so often practised, of sending abroad individuals, far gone in consumption, to suffer, pine, and die in exile; by this means not only hastening their days, but subjecting them to discomfort, suffering, and privation, which persons in robust health could not easily encounter. In the early stages of consumption, judicious change of climate, a long voyage, and a protracted residence in a favourable locality may be of much advantage; but as to ten in every twenty of those sent away—in the name of common sense and common humanity, suffer the doomed victims to die at home in peace!

We now take leave of this lively and agreeable narrative, grateful to the intelligent authors for the information and entertainment they have afforded to us, and all who love leisurely to enjoy some of the best pleasures of foreign travel by their own snug firesides. Such travellers bring us the best foreign luxuries procurable. In extending our knowledge of our kind, they enlarge our love and charity.

MORE LIGHT ON THE DANUBE.

LETTER I.

Vienna, — — —

ANOTHER week will see me on my way to the Lower Danube; what then can I write you on the external features of this city, that has not been said a hundred times before? Why tell you that the Prater is as verdant as ever—that in other capitals you lounge in a dusty park, but that in Old Vindabona you plunge from a stirring suburb into the recesses of a vast forest,—that Domaiera, the Birn and the Sperrl re-echo the dulcet hilarity of Strauss and the long-drawn impassioned breathings of Lanner? Yet, as you insist on a leaf of my scrap-book, here goes.

The heterogeneousness of the inhabitants of London and Paris is from the influx of foreigners: but the odd mixture of German, Italian, Slavonic, and I know not how many other races in Vienna, is almost all generated within the limits of the monarchy. Masses, rubbing against each other, get their asperities smoothed in the contact; but the characteristics of various nationalities remain in Vienna in tolerable strength, and do not seem likely soon to disappear by any process of attrition. There goes the German—honest, good-natured and laborious; the Hungarian—proud, insolent, lazy, hospitable, generous, and sincere; and the plausible Slovak—his eye twinkling with the prospect of seizing, by a knowledge of human nature, what others attain by slower means.

How curious, again, is the meeting of nations that labour and enjoy! In Paris the Germans and the English are more numerous than any other foreigners. The former toil, drudge, save their littles to make a mickle. The latter, whatever they may be at home, are in Paris generally loungers and consumers of the fruits of the earth. The Hungarian's errand in Vienna is to spend money: the Italian's to make it. The Hungarian you meet at Mr. A. B.'s is one of the squirearchy of his country, whose name is legion; or a military man, whiling away his furlough amid the excitements of a gay capital. The Italian you meet at Mr. C. D.'s is a painter, a sculptor, a musician, or an employé; and there is scarcely to be found an idle man among the twenty thousand of his fellow-countrymen who inhabit the metropolis.

The Hungarian nobility of the higher class are, in appearance and habits, completely identified with their German brethren; but it is in the middle nobility that we recognise the swarthy complexion, the haughty air, and features more or less of a Mongolian cast. The Hungarians and native Germans are mutually proud of each other, and mutually dislike each other. I never knew a Hungarian who was not in his heart pleased with the idea, that the King of Hungary was also an emperor, whose lands, broad and wide, occupied so large a space in the map of Europe; and I never knew an Austrian proper who was not proud of Hungary and the Hungarians, in spite of all their defects; but he characterizes their hauteur as Dummstolz; and on going into Hungary finds himself contemptuously designated as a Schwabe.

The Hungarian of the above description herds with his fellow-countrymen, and preserves to the end of his stay his character of foreigner: visits assiduously places of public resort; preferring the theatre and ball-room to the museum or picture-gallery, and, as the French say, mène une vie de Café. His money done, he is soon on the road for his own gespanuschaft, as the citizens of Vienna will ever be shy of giving credit to Hungarians until still more sweeping reforms in the laws affecting Hungarian property take place.

Of all men living in Vienna the Bohemians carry off the palm for acuteness and ingenuity. The relation of Bohemia to the Austrian Empire has some resemblance to that of Scotland to the Colonies of Britain in the supply of mariners to the Vessel of State. The population of Bohemia is a ninth part of that of the whole empire; but I dare say that a fourth of the bureaucracy of Austria is Bohemian. To account for this we must take into consideration the great number of men of sharp intellect, good education, and scanty fortune, that annually leave that country.

The population of Scotland is about a ninth of that of the United Kingdom. The Scot is well educated. He has less loose cash than his brother John Bull; and, consequently, prefers the sweets of office to the costly incense of the hustings and the senate; and from his love of travel, and his aptitude for research in foreign countries, is well suited for distant employments. How few (comparatively speaking) of those who have made themselves illustrious in the Imperial Parliament, from the days of Bolingbroke to our own, have come from the north of the Tweed; but how the Malcolms, the Elphinstones, the Munroes, and the Burnes' crowd the records of Indian Statesmanship!

Napoleon is represented to have said that the controlling political power in Austria lay not in the Emperor, but in thirty or forty great nobles. If such was his view, we must consider it erroneous. The power that controls the political tendencies of Austria is that of the mass of the bureaucracy; and the minister that best conciliates this element, supposing him not to be disagreeable to the sovereign, will have the securest tenure of power. Consequently, looking at the proportion of Bohemian to other employés in the departments of public service, the influence exercised by this singularly sagacious people over the destinies of the monarchy may be duly appreciated.

The Bohemians cultivate literature and the fine arts; are excellent soldiers and politicians; insolent to their inferiors and fond of booting to their superiors. In one quality, however, they are, in common with other Slavonic races, deficient, viz. sincerity and straightforwardness. An anecdote is related, illustrative of the slyness of the Bohemians.

mian as compared with the simple honesty of the German, and the candid unscrupulousness of the Hungarian. During the late war, three soldiers, of each of these three nations, met in the parlour of a French inn, over the chimney-piece of which hung a watch. When they had gone, the German said, "That is a good watch, I wish I had bought it." "I am sorry I did not take it," said the Hungarian. "I have it in my pocket," said the Bohemian.

The Academy of Oriental Languages, which was founded by Maria Teresa, nearly a century ago, is one of the most interesting institutions in Vienna. Austria had long borne the brunt of Ottoman warfare, and had successfully rolled back the tide of Islam ambition, destined never more to menace Christendom. She had felt the great inconvenience of having Raya interpreters at the Internunciatura at Constantinople, who, even admitting their honesty, could not be expected to do their duty with that independence and fearlessness as to consequences, which exigencies often demand in dealing with an arbitrary or corrupt Divan, in consequence of their being subjects of the Porte, and, of course, at the mercy of the Local Government.

This Institution has fully answered the purpose intended, and has sent forth a long and brilliant list of orientalisés, who have not only rendered the position of the Internunciatura an independent one, but several of whom, with Von Hammer at their head, have cultivated the flowers of Osmanli literature with the most distinguished success. The academical course lasts five years. At the head of the Institution is a director, assisted by two prefects, who are also professors—three professors and four teachers; and the objects of instruction are as follows:—Through all the five years, religious knowledge, the French and Turkish languages, drawing, dancing, and writing; in addition to which they are taught, during the first year, philosophy and mathematics; during the second year, natural philosophy and history; during the third year, international law, Arabic and history; during the fifth, statistics, political knowledge, the constitution of the Ottoman empire, Italian, Modern Greek, Arabic, Persian, and riding.

This is, strictly speaking, a political institution, and in immediate connexion with the Chancery of State in Vienna. Young men that distinguish themselves are sent to the Internunciatura at Constantinople as Sprach knaben, or, as the French call them, jeunes de langue, where they have an opportunity of acquiring, in addition to a finish in the languages, a practical acquaintance with the character and institutions of orientals; and from this body of students are recruited the consuls and interpreters throughout the East, as well as the attachés to the Internunciatura at Constantinople and the Chancery of State in Vienna. The most active share in the affairs of Turkey has latterly been taken by Baron Testa, and M. Honsard. The former is now first interpreter at Constantinople, and the latter is Aulic Counsellor, attached to the Chancery of State, and was interpreter to the Emperor (Hof Dalmetscher) during the temporary retirement of Baron von Hammer.

It is really remarkable that, seeing what Austria, France, and Russia do in this respect, England should possess (as regards the Turkish Empire) no institution of the above description. Far be it from us to deny that, as moral schools, our English universities are entitled to rank very high; but it is to be regretted that, although the government of a large portion of the globe falls to the lot of the English aristocracy, and although the diplomacy of England often is, and always ought to be, preponderating,—the acquisition of those branches of technical knowledge (if I may so express myself) which are most essential to a politician, should not begin until the studies of the university are abandoned.

Three centuries ago, a knowledge of Latin and Greek was the most essential part of education; for these languages were the keys to almost all the polite literature then in existence; and the former in particular, was the language of the theologian, the politician, and the man of science. But now that England, Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, each possesses a noble native literature; and now that England has vital interests at stake in every part of the world, it certainly seems to be a crack-brained system to prefer the study of two dead languages; ay, and more crack-brained still, the study of the prosody of two dead languages, to that of those now in all the vigour of existence.

In calling attention to what Austria has done in this respect, let us not shut our eyes to the efforts of our great oriental rival, Russia; and a little illustration of her perseverance, and the wise liberality she displays in the education of those she sends to the East, would better become our publicists than a Niagara of frothy declamation.

It is now some twenty summers since Count Nesselrode founded the Academy of Oriental Languages of St Petersburg, upon the model of that in Vienna, as far as regards the course of study: the regulations as to entrance being less restrictive. Its success has given birth to an affiliated institution in Odessa. Persian was, during the first year of its rise, most attended to, in consequence of the wants of the civil and military services in Georgia and the Transcaucasian provinces, and, subsequently, from its being as it were, the Lingua Franca of Central Asia; and lastly, but not least, from Turkish being so extensively recruited from that language. Every opportunity was given for familiar intercourse; and the pupils might be said to have lived with Persians, at the head of whom was the learned and celebrated Meerza Jafar Toptschibascheff. As to the Arabic language, the grand source and resource of all oriental religion and science of the Islam régime, let the following circumstance prove that the importance of cultivating it, not only for itself, but for the large space it occupies in the Persian language, and still larger in the Turkish, is fully appreciated at St Petersburg.

A son of M. de Frähn, the oriental academician, was secretary to the Russian Mission in Egypt, and at Cairo studied under Sheik Mohammed ben Saad ben Suleyman Ayad el Tantowy, who was, even in the Mosque of El Aghar, considered an oracle of learning, and, without exception, the greatest master of the Arabic language in the greatest seat of Arabic literature. Young Frähn being compelled to return to Russia on account of his health, stated the qualifications of the Sheikh to his father; who applied to Count Nesselrode, and out came an imperial rescript, empowering Count Medem, the Consul-general in Egypt, immediately to offer Sheikh Mohammed a handsome salary for life, and the payment of all expenses to St. Petersburg, where he now is attached to the Arabic Department of the Academy of Oriental Languages.

Not only for a political, but also for a commercial career have these studies been considered requisite; of which we have a striking proof in the fact that, in 1839, the Emperor caused six places to be opened in the Oriental Academy of Odessa, for young men who distinguish themselves in the Oriental Academy of Taganrog. They are to be clothed, fed, and educated at the public expense.

Now, when are we to see a beginning of something of this kind in England? No doubt that a Ukase is more easy of attainment than a Vote of the House of Commons. Between the salutary control exercised over the public expenditure, the clamours of those hungry for place, and the fierceness of opposing factions, this most important branch of public education is woefully neglected. The necessity of a remedy for this state of things must, however, force itself upon the attention of the government and the country. The first care ought to be to procure a body of men as interpreters, attachés, and consuls. There is no occasion for bursaries for young merchants. Commerce may safely be left to take care of herself, as the great increase in our Turkish and Central Asian trade clearly proves.

It is amusing to see the misconceptions of French and German writers on this subject, who never draw a line of distinction between the policy of a government and the efforts of individual merchants, and seem never able to learn that "all that commerce wants is to be let alone." We have just been reading in the Augsburg Gazette, an article which bears the well-known mark of H. Heine, containing a furious attack against England for attempting to grasp the monopoly of the trade of Syria; and then follows Pückler Muskau, the prince of battered beaux and ci-devant jeunes hommes, who thinks to requite the drubbings of our insular reviewers by declaring that the "commercial tyranny of England is more oppressive than the military tyranny of Napoleon ever was"!

LETTER II.

Pancsova, ———

The lions of the Danube have been so amply described that I pass them in silence. You are by this time pretty well aware, that Pesth has a pleasant casino; that Peterwardein is the Gibraltar of Hungary; and that Demir Capu is the Turkish for Iron Gate. Come, then, with me to the nooks and corners, and we may, at some future time, find our way to the sauber welt of the Frusca Gora.

Cast your eye upon the map of the basin of the Danube, and you will find Pancsova situated on its left bank, a little below its junction with the Save. Having been roaming in the Banat, this place, with its umbrageous trees and the Servian mountains across the river filling up the background, seems to me delightful, compared with the pinquid tameness of the country I have left.

I am on the confines of Turkey; but the order of civilisation seems inverted. I was amused with the nomade features of Hungary, and jolted to death on their so-called roads, for which nothing but the unbounded hospitality and kindness of its inhabitants can atone. I found the Banat, which was for some time under the improving government of Maria Teresa, better than Hungary, and the military frontiers in every respect superior to the Banat.

Pancsova is one of the neatest towns on the military frontiers. The town-hall is a newly built, large, and handsome edifice; and the best proof of the prosperity of the place is, that many houses are in course of construction, some of them in the Palladian style of architecture, and with a very fair quantity of well-distributed ornament. Almost all new buildings in Hungary are in this style; because a run over to Venice or Vicenza is within the reach of every student; whereas the formation of the taste upon the models of Grecian architecture to be found in more remote cities, is not easily attainable by the majority of young men who devote themselves to this career.

The late General of this town and district died of a surfeit of Morrison's pills. The consumption of these drugs almost surpasses belief. There is scarcely a sickly or hypochondriac person from the Hill of Presburg to the Iron Gates who has not swallowed large quantities of them; and as the advertisements state that too many of them cannot be taken, some persons have, from first to last, swallowed a couple of thousands. Being curious to know the cause of this extensive consumption, I asked an anti-Morrisonian for an explanation: "Why," said he, "you must know that the Anglomania is nowhere stronger than in Hungary. Whatever comes from England, many of us think, must needs be perfect. Dr. Morrison is indebted to his high office for the immense sale of his pills. People say, the government would not have appointed him to so responsible a situation as President of the British College if his medical talents had not been of a high order." On hearing this, I fell a-laughing; and a pro-Morrisonian, desirous of throwing some more light on the subject, stated, that the government did not appoint such officers, and appealed to me, asking, whether the said functionary was not elected by, and in the enjoyment of, the confidence of the faculty at large. This misconception renewed my merriment, and I lost no time in explaining that the British College of Health and the British College of Physicians were not identical.

Outside of the town of Pancsova is a noble gr of forest trees, a proof of the great depth of the alluvial soil here. In the interior parts of the Banat, trees grow well for fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years, and then die away. The cause of this is, that the earth, although rich, is only from three to six feet thick, with sand or cold clay below. Geologists say, that all lower Hungary was formerly a sea or lake; and as soon as the roots descend to the substratum, in which they can find no nourishment, rottenness appears on the top branches, and gradually descends.

LETTER III.

Semlin, ———

The road between Pancsova and Semlin goes over a tract of country which appeared to be periodically under water; and the keeper of one of the wooden guard-houses, which are built upon lofty piles, assured me that in winter he could get to the neighbouring villages only by means of a boat. Half an hour before sunset I arrived at the station-house on the Danube, opposite Semlin.

What a peculiar and refreshing enjoyment there is in the first quarter of an hour's gaze upon a mass of water, half a mile in breadth, rushing rapidly along. I can well conceive the joy expressed by many old travellers on arriving at the bank of some mighty storied stream, where the pleasures of association were enhanced by those derivable from the contemplation of the grandest natural feature of a champagne country. Long before coming here, how often, on looking at the map of the south-east of Europe, have my eyes been fascinated by this confluence of waters. The Danube, to which the Drave and the Theiss have already paid their ample tribute, here mingles with the Save, and becomes a river of the first magnitude.

As I jumped into the boat that was to bear me across, I gave full swing to my feelings on the occasion. "Here," I exclaimed to myself, "is the meeting of waters from the Carpathians, the Alps, the Cordilleras of the Adriatic, and the black peaks of the Balkan. What a mighty scope for commercial enterprise through the agency of steam! Away, then, with unnecessary restrictions! away with the patents and privileges of steam-navigation companies, who take half an age to learn that two and two do not make four in the arithmetic of tariffs." My eyes here caught the battlements and minarets of Belgrade, gilded by the setting sun. Quarantine, too, comes in with its interruptions to trade. "What!" exclaims some one, "would you infect us with plague?" "No; annihilate, extirpate the plague by the purification of streets and houses, and other sanitary measures; but not by quarantine; or if you have a quarantine at all, a few days' purgatory are quite sufficient. Your mode of treating the plague is short-sighted and selfish. It is just as if a town were on fire, and instead of attempting to extinguish it, an inhabitant were to run away, and say, it is sufficient for me to save myself." Austria, notwithstanding her vis inertiae, is still in advance of France and Russia in these respects.

Next to the pleasing contemplation of the bloodless triumphs of British commerce, and the multiplication of the means of intercourse at home by railroads, and abroad by ocean and river steam navigation, no subject affords scope for more interesting reflection than the opening and extension of commerce on the dark rolling Danube by the same potent means. If Ratisbon be the western, and Galatz the eastern extremity of this great German Turkish artery, Semlin is fairly entitled to be considered its centre; and we entertain the conviction, that this now wretched town might easily, from its favoured position, become a city of great wealth and population.

No part of Europe is so favoured with natural highways as the south of Hungary; and yet commerce is at a very low ebb. This arises partly from the political and fiscal separation from Austria; partly from the difficulty attending a communication with the sea, and partly from the little respect in which trade and traders are held in consequence of Hungary being still an unfederalised country, and altogether devoid of an opulent, intelligent, and influential middle class. Yet the manifold advantages to be derived from such means as were available, forced themselves from time to time on public attention. So far back as the year 1790, we find that a company was formed with the intention of transporting the Banat wheat down to the Black Sea; and four large armed brigs were built for the purpose. Magazines were erected in Pancsova and Great Bekserek for storing and preparing the grain for shipment. But the difficulties that attended the passage of the Iron Gates turned out to be insurmountable. The vessels were dashed against the rocks even at full water.

The obstacles that interposed themselves by this route led to an attempt to open an outlet by the Adriatic. On reference to the map, it will be seen that by going up the river Save, from Semlin, you have a straight line of water-communication to Sissek, which is, within a, comparatively speaking, short distance from Fiume. Over that part of the intervening country, which is mountainous, the state constructed the celebrated Louisen Strasse, or road called after Maria Louisa, between the years 1801 and 1812, under the inspection of Baron Bukassowitz; it is eighty-five miles long, and from the ingenuity and solidity with which the terraces and embankments are constructed, though it may not vie with those made in later years over the high Alps, is nevertheless one of the best specimens of road-making in the empire.

The trade of the port of Fiume and of the Save generally, has been gradually increasing; but it is to steam navigation, and to the improvement of the communications between Sissek and Carlstadt that we are principally to look for its more rapid development. The directors of the Danube Steam Company, going upon the principle that the animation of the feeders of the Danube must have a favourable effect on the trade of the main stream, caused one of their steamers, the Arch-Duchess Sophia, to make a trial voyage on the Save, in the month of September, 1838, which was crowned with complete success, since the vessel ascended to Sissek without any difficulty. The river is not free from snags, or trees, sticking in the bottom of the river, and inclined downwards by the current : but this could be obviated by the snag chambers, as used in America.

The Theiss is another tributary of the Danube, on which a successful steam experiment has been tried under the auspices of Count Szecheny, to whom Hungary owes so much in the way of improvement. This great river intersects nearly the whole of the kingdom, from north to south. The upper part could never be navigable for steamers, in consequence of the country through which it flows being flat, and inundated for many miles in breadth ; thus rendering regulation by embankment impossible. From Szolnok to Szegedin, the river might be rendered navigable by some outlay ; but it is only between the latter town and Semlin that steam has been tried, and only here that it could be at all available in the present abject state of Hungarian commerce ; for Szegedin is the largest town on the Theiss, which is here joined by the Maras, a considerable river which takes its rise in the Carpathians, on the frontiers of Moldavia, and after collecting the greater part of the waters of Transylvania, increases the volume of the Theiss sufficiently to permit large river steamers to navigate it from this town downwards to its confluence with the Danube at Titel, a short distance above Semlin.

Thus then, four great steam highways have their point of arrival and departure at Semlin : the Upper Danube, the Lower Danube, the Save, and the Theiss. Were, therefore, commercial reforms to take place in Hungary, this is the natural entrepôt of the lower central Danube.

The inns of Semlin are, without exception, bad. The rooms are full of filth, and empty of furniture, and masters and servants indulge in the most bare-faced cheating. On going into the parlour of the Eagle, I found a lieutenant polishing the bones of a wild duck at one end of the table, and at the other sat a gentleman whose ruddy nose and good-humoured nerveless smile denoted a fondness for the juice of the grape, and certainly seitel after seitel of red Syrmian wine disappeared with tolerable rapidity.

We entered into conversation, and I found him to be a Greek dealer, born in Thesiapal, but settled at Pancsova. On hearing that I was an Englishman, he expressed a wish to hear as much of England as possible ; and appeared thunderstruck when I told him that London had nearly a million of inhabitants, being 400,000 more than the population of the whole of the Banat.

I have always found it interesting to note the misconceptions of natives regarding foreign countries. This individual had of course learned five languages with his mother's milk ; and, therefore, thought that the inhabitants of such a country as England must know ten at least ; for when I told him that the majority of the people in England knew nothing but English, he said somewhat contemptuously,—“ Oh ! you told me the fair side of the English character, but you did not tell me that the people were so ignorant.” He then good-humouredly warned me against any attempt at bouncing. I pointed out how unnecessary other languages were for England itself, but that all languages could be learned in London.

“ Can Wallachian be learned in London ? ”

“ I have my doubts about Wallachian, but— ”

“ Can Magyar be learned in London ? ”

“ I suspect not. ”

“ Can Servian be learned in London ? ”

“ I confess, I don't think that anybody in London teaches Servian ; but— ”

“ There again, you travellers are always making statements unfounded on fact : I have mentioned three leading languages, and nobody in your great city knows anything about them. ”

LETTER IV.

To create commerce, it is not enough that rivers have sufficient volume of water and be sufficiently free from obstacles to navigation. Their shores must produce, to a necessary extent, the means of exchange ; and in this respect no portion of the basin of the Danube is more highly favoured than Servia, Slavonia, and the Banat.

The staple productions of these countries are corn, wine, and tobacco ; and every bounty of nature conspires to reward the industrious cultivator with abundant harvests of the best quality. The soil of the Banat is the richest alluvion ; and, placed midway between the equator and the Pole, that is to say, lying between 44° 27' and 46° 15' north latitude, is under the same parallel as Lombardy and the Bordelais.

Central and Southern Hungary would appear to be well suited to the cultivation of tobacco ; considerable quantities are sometimes sent to Trieste, and the exportation would increase were more care taken in its cultivation and manufacture. Several landed proprietors, however, have proposed to get some skilful cultivators from Cuba and Virginia, in which case Hungary might supply a large portion of Europe with tobacco. Even lately, Baron Siva has contracted with the French government to furnish a supply, the profits on which are estimated at £150,000.

Various calculations have been made with regard to the amount of the tobacco production of Hungary : but I subjoin a statement, prepared by a gentleman well versed in the agricultural statistics of this country, which, from the assurances of various intelligent individuals, I am disposed to think must come nearer the truth than any yet published.

If the cheapness of this plant produce on the one hand a little money to the landed proprietors of Hungary, it is, on the other hand, a great curse, from the amount of valuable time which the ir-moderate indulgence in smoking filches from the aggregate disposable labour of the country ; for, be it peasant or be it squire, the pipe is never out of his mouth. In Germany and Holland, smoking is certainly carried far enough, but in Hungary it is truly offensive ; for black teeth, bad breaths, and rooms with a pestilential atmosphere, meet you everywhere.

Old Father Danube is as well entitled to be represented with a periwig of grapes as his brother, the Rhine. The wines of Hungary have long been famous, but little drunk abroad, with the exception of Tokay, or rather of certain other wines of the Hegyalla, which pass by that name in foreign countries. Hungary has a right merry bacchanalian climate. Schiller, or Syrmian wine, is in the same parallel of latitude as Claret. Oedenburger as Burgundy ; and a line run westwards from Tokay would almost touch the vineyards of Champagne.

Ivan Casplovich remarks in his quaint way, "that the four principal wines of Hungary are cultivated by the four principal nations in it ; that is to say, the Slavonians cultivate the Schiller ; Germans, the Oedenburger and Ruster ; Magyars, Tokay ; and Wallachians, Menesher."

Good Carlowitzer Schiller is the best Syrmian wine, and, like good sherry, it is sweet, bitter, and nutty ; being the opposite of Tokay, which is palatable from the delightful manner in which the qualities of sweet, sour, and fruity are commingled.

Syrmium, which produces the Schiller wine, is the line of mountains skirting the right bank of the Danube, before its junction with the Save, and can boast of a vintage producing altogether 800,000 almers of wine, which is for the most part very good. The best finds its way into the cellars of the emperor and the archbishop : I tasted some at the table of this truly hospitable and virtuous prelate, which I am sure would in London be prized as highly as the finest sherry or Madeira that ever crossed the Bay of Biscay. Some laudable efforts have been made at Pesth to make this and other Hungarian wines known in foreign countries, through the instrumentality of a society constituted for the purpose ; but it will be long before any considerable increase in the amount of exports may be looked for.

The great granary of the Austrian empire is the Banat. Only think of a district 8000 square miles in extent, superior in soil to that of the Carme of Gowrie in Scotland. The delicious white bread of Vienna, which is so famous, is made of the Banat wheat, which is shipped at Beksakerek and other ports, and then slowly dragged up the Danube to Wieselburg, near Presburg, where a crowd of speculators come to select and purchase the corn needed for the consumption of Lower Austria and Styria.

Little advantage is derived from this vast territorial wealth. Vast tracks of land are uncultivated. It would be easy for the proprietors to get settlers from the more populous parts of Hungary, or from Germany : but as a latent fear exists that if political troubles should arise, or the law should be altered as to the proportions of produce to be claimed by peasant and proprietor, the latter prefer cultivating a portion on their own account to cultivating all by the instrumentality of the peasants.

Through all the Banat there is a great desire for English manufactures ; and there cannot be a doubt that if Hungary, with a population of twelve millions, were to pay its fair share of that taxation which presses so heavily on the twenty-four millions that inhabit the other parts of the Austrian empire, and that as a natural consequence its customs-tariff were to undergo reductions, a most extensive commerce might be the result. As regards the English corn-laws, the circumstance that we have hitherto for the most part been supplied with grain from Southern Russia, is certainly a stumbling block in the way of a change that would please all parties ; but the grain production of Wallachia and Moldavia has been developed in so remarkable a manner, that Galatz bids fair to rival Odessa as a corn depôt. Were a vigorous monarch, or minister, to lay the barbarous feudal constitution of Hungary on the shelf, and were the Iron Gates to be effectually opened, the value of land in Hungary would be doubled in ten years. The Danube would soon wear the smile of prosperity, and the manufactures of England would penetrate to the most distant recesses of Servia and Bosnia.

TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST.*

We have here a genuine personal narrative far more interesting than most of the modern popular nautical fictions, and not much less entertaining. The work is an American republication, to which Mr. Moxon was advised by "some officers of old standing in the British navy," who entertained a favourable opinion of its merits, and probable usefulness in improving the condition of the seamen of the mercantile navy. And truly that of the United States appears to require sweeping reform ; and it is but too probable, nay, it is absolutely certain, that the British mercantile service, as regards the moral improvement, comfort, and health of the common seamen, is in no better condition. This was lately painfully shown in Captain Sleigh's valuable treatise.

The author of the Personal Narrative is a young gentleman of Boston, of respectable family and connections, who had just finished his education at the American Cambridge, when, for some reason or another, either to make trial of his powers of endurance, or to prove his steadiness, he undertook a two-years' voyage as a common sailor before the mast ; which venture he manfully completed ; having displayed, in various trying circumstances, no ordinary manhood, and borne up against no ordinary hardships and difficulties to any young man, but particularly to one so nurtured.

In the adventures of this young navigator, there was no make-believe work, no playing at sailors, and no alleviation whatever of the common seaman's hard lot. The captain and the inferior officers of the vessel made no outward distinction whatever between him and his companions in the fore-castle; and, indeed, the attempt would only have made his condition worse, with his hearty, but jealous and rough-spun shipmates. Nor did his captain, who appears a true specimen of the harsh, ill-tempered, and tyrannical Yankee skipper, show any disposition to recollect his education or early habits, or to show him indulgence. It was so much the better, as without seeing and suffering all that was to be seen and endured, the author would have known less, and been much less qualified to present the hard life of a common sailor as it really is,—“the light and the dark together;” and this is his main design, and one which, in the narrative, he has fulfilled with singular fidelity, and the intuitive skill of genius. He sailed in the brig Pilgrim, on her voyage from Boston to the Western coast of America, round Cape Horn; and had, on embarking, little, or rather no knowledge of a seaman's duties. They got out of port on a Saturday, and next day the captain stood forth in the character which he maintained to the last, even exceeding at times the promise of his opening speech. The next day, Sunday, after a hard day's work at getting everything on board in order for the voyage, the hands were divided into watches, when the captain, all the men being mustered around him, put a cigar into his mouth, and, between the puffs, dropt forth the following morsels of nautical eloquence,—

“Now, my men, we have begun a long voyage. If we get along well together, we shall have a comfortable time; if we don't, we shall have hell afloat.—All you've got to do is to obey your orders and do your duty like men—then you'll fare well enough;—if you don't, you'll fare hard enough.—I can tell you. If we pull together, you'll find me a clever fellow; if we don't, you'll find me a bloody rascal.—That's all I've got to say.—Go below, the larboard watch!”

The young sailor's miseries were not long of commencing: among them were foul weather, sea-sickness, unfitness for duty, disorder, filth, and officers without indulgence or consideration. Seamen, at least on board, have no sympathy with sickness, or with that delicacy of habit which they despise as unmanly. But the first spell was surmounted, and the young fresh-water sailor was astonished to find how heartily, after a few days, he took to cold salt beef and hard biscuit. His account of the daily and endless business of the ship, so far as it was comprehended in his own department, is minute and clear. Servant-maids say “women's work is never at an end,” and it would appear to be the same with that of seamen in the American merchant service. When nothing more can be found for them to do, they are set to pick oakum, or even to pound at the anchors, and scrape the cable-chains. Probably their officers, that is the captain, and the first and second mates, may hold in mind Isaac Watt's truthful couplet,—

For Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do.

The Sabbath at sea is accounted a day of rest, but the American sailors' catechism goes—

Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work,
And on the seventh, holystone the decks and scrape the cable.

Yet, in fine weather, there was some distinction made on Sundays. The ship was made clean, the seamen dressed themselves in their best trousers and jackets; and they had usually, on Sunday, a piece of boiled dough and molasses to eat to their pork, which they thought a pudding and called a duff, and rejoiced over as a great dainty. To give a duff twice in one week enables even a bad captain to recover his character on the homeward voyage. Those landsmen who wish to have a minute understanding of the duties of the different individuals composing the crew of a merchant vessel, with the various distinctions, privileges, and habits of each, must consult the original work, which is the most accurate and faithful picture of life at sea, of a regular day's work, and of the exigencies of bad weather, which we have ever met with. They passed Cape Horn in November, and, consequently, in comparatively moderate weather; but in the homeward voyage it was July, and, consequently, the depth of winter in these cold and stormy latitudes; and many of the horrors and sufferings of which one so painfully reads in the narratives of the old navigators, beset the voyagers. These things we shall not attempt to describe, contented with giving our readers a general idea of the lively and picturesque style of the narrative, by a few brief passages, before we touch upon the really useful portion of the work.

A SHIP UNDER FULL SAIL.

Notwithstanding all that has been said about the beauty of a ship under full sail, there are very few who have ever seen a ship, literally, under all her sail. A ship coming in or going out of port, with her ordinary sails, and perhaps two or three studding-sails, is commonly said to be under full sail; but a ship never has all her sail upon her, except when she has a light, steady breeze, very nearly, but not quite, dead aft, and so regular that it can be trusted, and is likely to last for some time. Then, with all her sails, light and heavy, and studding-sails on each side, aloft and aloft, she is the most glorious moving object in the world. Such a sight very few, even some who have been at sea a good deal, have ever beheld; for from the deck of your own vessel you cannot see her as you would a separate object.

After the Cape had been doubled on their way home, and the Falkland islands left behind, they enjoyed a long spell of good weather and favourable winds,—the whole sails were set, and we have this cheery living picture,—

In a moment the news ran through the ship that the captain was keeping her off, with her nose straight for Boston, and Cape Horn over her taffrail. It was a moment of enthusiasm. Every one was on the alert; and even the two sick men turned out to lend a hand at the halyards. The wind was now due south-west, and blowing a gale to which a vessel close-hauled could have shown no more than a single close-reefed sail; but as we were going before it, we could carry on. Accordingly, hands were sent aloft, and a reef shaken out of the top-sails, and the reefed foresail set. When we came to mast-head the topsail yards, with all hands at the halyards, we struck up “Cheerly men,” with a chorus which might have been heard half-way to Staten Land. Under her increased sail, the ship drove on through the water. Yet she could bear it well; and the captain sang out from the quarter-deck—“Another reef out of that fore-top sail, and give it to her!” Two hands sprang aloft; the frozen reef-points and earings were cast adrift, the halyards manned, and the sail gave out her increased canvas to the gale. All hands were kept on deck to watch the effect of the change. It was as much as she could well carry, and with a heavy sea astern, it took two men at the wheel to steer her. She flung the foam from her bows; the spray breaking aft as far as the gang-way. She was going at a prodigious rate. Still everything held. Preventer braces were reefed and br-taught; tackles got upon the back-stays; and each thing done to keep all snug and strong. The captain walked the deck at a rapid stride, looked aloft at the sails, and then to windward; the mate stood in the gangway rubbing his hands, and talking aloud to the ship—"Hurrah, old bucket! the Boston girls have got hold of the tow-ropes!" and the like; and we were on the fore-castle, looking to see how the spars stood it, and guessing the rate at which she was going, when the captain called out—"Mr. Brown, get up the top-mast studding-sail! what she can't carry she may drag!" The mate looked a moment, but he would let no one be before him in daring. He sprang forward—"Hurrah men! rig out the top-mast studding-sail boom! lay aloft, and I'll send the rigging up to you!"

Finding that she would bear the sail, the hands were sent below, and our watch remained on deck. Two men at the wheel had as much as they could do to keep her within three points of her course, for she steered as wild as a young colt. The mate walked the deck, looking at the sails, and then over the side to see the foam fly by her—slapping his hands upon his thighs, and talking to the ship—"Hurrah, you jade, you've got the scent!—you know where you're going!" And when she leaped over the seas, and almost out of the water, and trembled to her very keel, the spars and masts snapping and creaking,—"There she goes!—There she goes—handsomely!—As long as she cracks she holds!"—while we stood with the rigging laid down fair for letting go, and ready to take in sail and clear away, if anything went.

At one time they made a thousand miles in four days. It was like steam sailing.

If a man would learn the true secret of luxury he should take such a voyage as this; and not in the cabin of even a yacht, but, like this young hero, in the fore-castle. How the seamen did rejoice over the hot water and molasses, christened tea by the captain, and by the crew water-bewitched! But it was liquid, and hot, and with salt beef and sea-biscuit, became rare luxury. How the crew—of the earth, earthy! rejoiced over a few raw onions which the steward gave them, some from a quantity presented by a vessel which they met on their homeward voyage.

We carried them forward, stowed them away in the fore-castle, refusing to have them cooked, and ate them raw, with our beef and bread. And a glorious treat they were. The freshness and crispness of the raw onion, with the earthy taste, gave it a great relish to one who has been a long time on salt provisions. We were perfectly ravenous after them. It was like the scent of blood to a hound. We ate them at every meal, by the dozen; and filled our pockets with them, to eat in our watch on deck; and the bunches, rising in the form of a cone from the largest at the bottom to the smallest, no larger than a strawberry at the top, soon disappeared. The chief use, however, of the fresh provisions was for the men with the scurvy. One of them was able to eat, and he soon brought himself to by gnawing upon raw potatoes; but the other, by this time, was hardly able to open his mouth; and the cook took the potatoes raw, pounded them in a mortar, and gave him the juice to drink. This he swallowed, by the tea-spoonful at a time, and rinsed it about his gums and throat. The strong earthy taste and smell of this extract of the raw potato at first produced a shuddering through his whole frame, and after drinking it, an acute pain, which ran through all parts of his body; but knowing by this that it was taking strong hold, he persevered, drinking a spoonful every hour or so, and holding it a long time in his mouth; until, by the effect of this drink, and of his own restored hope, (for he had nearly given up in despair,) he became so well as to be able to move about, and open his mouth enough to eat the raw potatoes and onions pounded into a soft pulp. This course soon restored his appetite and strength; and ten days after we spoke the Solon, so rapid was his recovery, that, from lying helpless and almost hopeless in his berth, he was at the mast-head, furling a royal.

With a fine south-west wind, we passed inside of the Bermudas.

We do not decide what the fact may indicate as to the practicability of the social system; but it seems utterly impossible for a number of people to live together for any length of time at sea without quarrelling and beginning to detest each other. The natures and causes of these hatreds and jealousies may be learned from this narrative.

Thursday, Dec. 25th.—This day was Christmas, but it brought us no holiday. The only change was that we had a "plum duff" for dinner, and the crew quarrelled with the steward because he did not give us our usual allowance of molasses to eat with it. He thought the plums would be a substitute for the molasses, but we were not to be cheated out of our rights in this way.

Such are the trifles which produce quarrels on ship-board. In fact, we had been too long from port. We were getting tired of one another, and were in an irritable state, both forward and aft. Our fresh provisions were, of course, gone, and the captain had stopped our rice, so that we had nothing but salt beef and salt pork throughout the week, with the exception of a very small duff on Sunday. This added to the discontent; and a thousand little things, daily and almost hourly occurring, which no one who has not himself been on a long and tedious voyage can conceive of or properly appreciate—little wars and rumours of wars,—reports of things said in the cabin,—misunderstanding of words and looks,—apparent abuses,—brought us into a state in which everything seemed to go wrong. Every encroachment upon the time allowed for rest, appeared unnecessary. Every shifting of the studding-sails was only to "haze" the crew.

At the beginning of the voyage, the author, and another young man like himself, of superior birth and education, who was also making a first voyage, had been placed in the steerage as a sort of honorary distinction; but they petitioned to be placed in the fore-castle, and the request was granted. The character of the captain,—that individual upon whom the comfort and happiness of the crew depends quite as much as the safety of the ship, and the prosperity of the voyage,—is illustrated by the events which followed this simple transaction.

Upon our coming into the fore-castle, there was some difficulty about the uniting of the allowances of bread, by which we thought we were to lose a few pounds. This set us into a ferment. The captain would not condescend to explain, and we went aft in a body, with a Swede, the oldest and best sailor of the crew, for spokesman. The recollection of the scene that followed always brings up a smile, especially the quarter-deck dignity and eloquence of the captain. He was walking the weather side of the quarter-deck, and seeing us coming aft, stopped short in his walk, and with a voice and look intended to annihilate us, called out, "Well, what the d— do you want now!" Whereupon we stated our grievances as respectfully as we could, but he broke in upon us, saying that we were getting fat and lazy, didn't have enough to do, and that made us find fault. This provoked us, and we began to give word for word. This would never answer. He clenched his fist, stamped and swore, and sent us all forward, saying, with oaths enough interspersed to send the words home,—"Away with you! go forward every one of you! I'll haze you! I'll work you up! You don't have enough to do! If you a'n't careful, I'll make a hell of the ship! . . . You've mistaken your man! I'm F— T—, all the way from 'down east.' I've been through the mill, ground, and bolted, and come out a regular-built down-east johnny-cake, good when it's hot, but when it's cold, sour and indigestible,—and you'll find me so!" The latter part of this harangue I remember well, for it made a strong impression, and the "down-east johnny-cake" became a by-word for the rest of the voyage. So much for our petition for the redress of grievances. The matter was, however, set right; for the mate, after allowing the captain due time to cool off, explained it to him, and at night we were all called aft to hear another harangue, in which, of course, the whole blame of the misunderstanding was thrown upon us. We ventured to hint that he would not give us time to explain; but it wouldn't do. We were driven back discomfited. Thus the affair blew over, but the irritation caused by it remained; and we never had peace or a good understanding again, so long as the captain and crew remained together.

They had sailed with a mixed cargo of notions, the object of the voyage being to obtain hides and tallow, which were picked up here and there along the coast of California, and cured as they were got. Hides had become scarce at this time, and they only obtained their cargo after an unexpected delay, for which they were unprepared. The crew became more and more discontented.

In addition to, and perhaps partly as a consequence of, this state of things, there was trouble brewing on board the vessel. Our mate (as the first mate is always called, par excellence) was a worthy man;—a more honest, upright, and kind-hearted man I never saw; but he was too good for the mate of a merchantman. He was not the man to call a sailor a "son of a b—h," and knock him down with a handspike. He wanted the energy and spirit for such a voyage as ours, and for such a captain. Captain T— was a vigorous, energetic fellow: as sailors say, "he hadn't a lazy bone in him." He was made of steel and whalebone. He was a man to "toe the mark," and to make every one else step up to it. During all the time that I was with him, I never saw him sit down on deck. He was always active and driving; severe in his discipline, and expected the same of his officers. The mate not being enough of a drier for him, and being perhaps too easy with the crew, he was dissatisfied with him, became suspicious that discipline was getting relaxed, and began to interfere in everything. He drew the reins tighter; and as, in all quarrels between officers, the sailors side with the one who treats them best, he became suspicious of the crew. He saw that everything went wrong—that nothing was done "with a will;" and in his attempt to remedy the difficulty by severity, he made everything worse. We were in every respect unfortunately situated. Captain, officers, and crew, entirely unfitted for one another; and every circumstance and event was like a two-edged sword, and cut both ways. The length of the voyage, which made us dissatisfied, made the captain, at the same time, feel the necessity of order and strict discipline; and the nature of the country which caused us to feel that we had nowhere to go for redress, but were entirely at the mercy of a hard master, made the captain feel, on the other hand, that he must depend entirely upon his own resources. Severity created discontent, and signs of discontent provoked severity. Then, too, ill-treatment and dissatisfaction are no "linimenta laborum;" and many a time have I heard the sailors say, that they should not mind the length of the voyage, and the hardships, if they were only kindly treated, and if they could feel that something was done to make things lighter and easier. We felt as though our situation was a call upon our superiors to give us occasional relaxations, and to make our yoke easier. But the contrary policy was pursued. We were kept at work all day when in port; which, together with a watch at night, made us glad to turn-in as soon as we got below. Thus we got no time for reading, or—which was of more importance to us—for washing and mending our clothes.

For several days the captain seemed very much out of humour. Nothing went right or fast enough for him. He quarrelled with the cook, and threatened to flog him for throwing wood on deck; and had a dispute with the mate about reeving a Spanish burton; the mate saying that he was right, and had been taught how to do it by a man who was a sailor! This the captain took in dudgeon, and they were at swords' points at once. But his displeasure was chiefly turned against a large, heavy-moulded fellow, from the Middle states, who was called Sam. This man hesitated in his speech, and was rather slow in his motions, but was a pretty good sailor, and always seemed to do his best; but the captain took a dislike to him, thought he was surly and lazy; and "if you once give a dog a bad name"—as the sailor-phrase is—"he may as well jump overboard." The captain found fault with everything this man did, and hazed him for dropping a marline-spike from the main-yard, where he was at work. This, of course, was an accident, but it was set down against him. The captain was on board all day Friday, and everything went on hard and disagreeably. "The more you drive a man, the less he will do," was as true with us as with any other people. We worked late Friday night, and were turned to early Saturday morning. About ten o'clock, the captain ordered our new officer, Russell, who by this time had become thoroughly disliked by all the crew, to get the gig ready to take him ashore. John, the Swede, was sitting in the boat alongside, and Russell and myself were standing by the main hatchway, waiting for the captain, who was down in the hold, where the crew were at work, when we heard his voice raised in violent dispute with somebody, whether it was with the mate, or one of the crew, I could not tell; and then came blows and scuffling. I ran to the side and beckoned to John, who came up, and we leaned down the hatchway; and though we could see no one, yet we knew that the captain had the advantage, for his voice was loud and clear—

"You see your condition! You see your condition! Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?" No answer; and then came wrestling and heaving, as though the man was trying to turn him. "You may as well keep still, for I have got you," said the captain. Then came the question, "Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?"

"I never gave you any, sir," said Sam; for it was his voice that we heard, though low and half choked.

"That's not what I ask you. Will you ever be impudent to me again?"

"I never have been, sir," said Sam.

"Answer my question, or I'll make a spread eagle o. you! I'll flog you, by G—d."

"I'm no negro slave," said Sam.

"Then I'll make you one," said the captain; and he came to the hatchway, and sprang on deck, threw off his coat, and rolling up his sleeves, called out to the mate—"Seize that man up, Mr. A—! Seize him up! Make a spread eagle of him! I'll teach you all who is master aboard!"

The crew and officers followed the captain up the hatchway, and after repeated orders the mate laid hold of Sam, who made no resistance, and carried him to the gangway.

"What are you going to flog that man for, sir?" said John, the Swede, to the captain.

Upon hearing this, the captain turned upon him, but knowing him to be quick and resolute, he ordered the steward to bring the irons, and calling upon Russell to help him, went up to John.

"Let me alone," said John. "I'm willing to be put in irons. You need not use any force;" and putting out his hands, the captain slipped the irons on, and sent him aft to the quarter-deck. Sam by this time was seized up, as it is called, that is, placed against the shrouds, with his wrists made fast to the shrouds, his jacket off, and his back exposed. The captain stood on the break of the deck, a few feet from him, and a little raised, so as to have a good swing at him, and held in his hand the bight of a thick strong rope. The officers stood round, and the crew grouped together in the waist. All these preparations made me feel sick, and almost faint, angry and excited as I was. A man—a human being, made in God's likeness—fastened up a—flogged like a beast ! A man, too, whom I had lived with and eaten with for months, and knew almost as well as a brother. The first and almost uncontrollable impulse was resistance. But what was to be done ! The time for it had gone by. The two best men were fast, and there were only two beside myself, and a small boy of ten or twelve years of age. And then there were (beside the captain) three officers, steward, agent, and clerk. But beside the numbers, what is there for sailors to do ? If they resist, it is mutiny ; and if they succeed, and take the vessel, it is piracy. If they ever yield again, their punishment must come ; and if they do not yield, they are pirates for life. If a sailor resist his commander, he resists the law, and piracy or submission are his only alternatives. Bad as it was, it must be borne. It is what a sailor ships for. Swinging the rope over his head, and bending his body so as to give it full force, the captain brought it down upon the poor fellow's back. Once, twice—six times. "Will you ever give me any more of your jaw !" The man writhed with pain, but said not a word. Three times more. This was too much, and he muttered something which I could not hear ; this brought as many more as the man could stand ; when the captain ordered him to be cut down, and to go forward.

"Now for you," said the captain, making up to John, and taking his irons off. As soon as he was loose, he ran forward to the fore-castle. "Bring that man aft," shouted the captain. The second mate, who had been a shipmate of John's, stood still in the waist, and the mate walked slowly forward ; but our third officer, anxious to show his zeal, sprang forward over the windlass, and laid hold of John ; but he soon threw him from him. At this moment I would have given worlds for the power to help the poor fellow ; but it was all in vain. The captain stood on the quarter-deck, bare-headed, his eyes flashing with rage, and his face as red as blood, swinging the rope, and calling out to his officers, "Drag him aft !—Lay hold of him ! I'll sweeten him !" &c. &c. The mate now went forward and told John quietly to go aft ; and he, seeing resistance in vain, threw the blackguard third mate from him ; said he would go aft of himself ; that they should not drag him ; and went up to the gangway, and held out his hands ; but as soon as the captain began to make him fast, the indignity was too much, and he began to resist ; but the mate and Russell holding him, he was soon seized up. When he was made fast, he turned to the captain, who stood turning up his sleeves and getting ready for the blow, and asked him what he was to be flogged for. "Have I ever refused my duty, sir ! Have you ever known me to hang back, or to be insolent, or not to know my work !"

"No," said the captain, "it is not that that I flog you for ; I flog you for your interference—for asking questions."

"Can't a man ask a question here without being flogged !"

"No," shouted the captain ; "nobody shall open his mouth aboard this vessel but myself ;" and began laying the blows upon his back, swinging half round between each blow, to give it full effect. As he went on, his passion increased, and he danced about the deck, calling out as he swung the rope,—"If you want to know what I flog you for, I'll tell you. It's because I like to do it !—because I like to do it !—It suits me ! That's what I do it for !"

The man writhed under the pain, until he could endure it no longer, when he called out, with an exclamation more common among foreigners than with us—"Oh, Jesus Christ ! Oh, Jesus Christ !"

"Don't call on Jesus Christ," shouted the captain ; "he can't help you. Call on Captain T.—He's the man ! He can help you ! Jesus Christ can't help you now !"

At these words, which I never shall forget, my blood ran cold. I could look on no longer. Disgusted, sick, and horror-struck, I turned away and leaned over the rail, and looked down into the water. A few rapid thoughts of my own situation, and of the prospect of future revenge, crossed my mind ; but the falling of the blows, and the cries of the man, called me back at once. At length they ceased, and turning round, I found that the mate, at a signal from the captain, had cut him down. Almost doubled up with pain, the man walked slowly forward, and went down into the fore-castle. Every one else stood still at his post, while the captain, swelling with rage and with the importance of his achievement, walked the quarter-deck, and at each turn, as he came forward, calling out to us,—"You see your condition ! You see where I've got you all, and you know what to expect !"—"You've been mistaken in me—you didn't know what I was ! Now you know what I am !"—"I'll make you toe the mark, every soul of you, or I'll flog you all, fore and aft, from the boy, up !"—"You've got a driver over you ! Yes, a slave-driver—a negro-driver ! I'll see who'll tell me he isn't a negro slave !" With this and the like matter, equally calculated to quiet us, and to allay any apprehensions of future trouble, he entertained us for about ten minutes, when he went below. Soon after, John came aft, with his bare back covered with stripes and wales in every direction, and dreadfully swollen, and asked the steward to ask the captain to let him have some salve, or balsam, to put upon it. "No," said the captain, who heard him from below ; "tell him to put his shirt on ; that's the best thing for him ; and pull me ashore in the boat. Nobody is going to lay-up on board this vessel." He then called to Mr. Russell to take those two men, and two others, in the boat, and pull him ashore. I went for one. The two men could hardly bend their backs, and the captain called to them to "give way," "give way !" but finding they did their best, he let them alone. The agent was in the stern-sheets, but during the whole pull—a league or more—not a word was spoken. We landed ; the captain, agent, and officer went up to the house, and left us with the boat. I, and the man with me, staid near the boat, while John and Sam walked slowly away, and sat down on the rocks. They talked some time together, but at length separated, each sitting alone. I had some fears of John. He was a foreigner, and violently tempered, and under suffering ; and he had his knife with him ; and the captain was to come down alone to the boat. But nothing happened ; and we went quietly on board. The captain was probably armed, and if either of them had lifted a hand against him, they would have had nothing before them but flight, and starvation in the woods of California, or capture by the soldiers and Indian blood-hounds, whom the offer of twenty dollars would have set upon them.

After the day's work was done, we went down into the fore-castle, and ate our plain supper ; but not a word was spoken. It was Saturday night ; but there was no song—no "sweethearts and wives." A gloom was over everything. The two men lay in their berths, groaning with pain, and we all turned in—but for myself, not to sleep. A sound coming now and then from the berths of the two men, showed that they were awake, as awake they must have been, for they could hardly lie in one posture a moment ; the dim, swinging lamp of the fore-castle shed its light over the dark hole in which we lived ; and many and various reflections and purposes coursed through my mind. I thought of our situation, living under a tyranny ; of the character of the country we were in ; of the length of the voyage, and of the uncertainty attending our return to America ; and then, if we should return, of the prospect of obtaining justice and satisfaction for these poor men ; and vowed that, if God should ever give me the means, I would do something to redress the grievances, and relieve the sufferings, of that poor class of beings, of whom I then was one.

The flogging was seldom if ever alluded to by us in the fore-castle. If any one was inclined to talk about it, the others, with a delicacy which I hardly expected to find among them, always stopped him, or turned the subject. But the behaviour of the two men who were flogged toward one another, showed a delicacy and a sense of honour which would have been worthy of admiration in the highest walks of life. Sam knew that the other had suffered solely on his account; and in all his complaints, he said that if he alone had been flogged, it would have been nothing; but that he never could see that man without thinking what had been the means of bringing that disgrace upon him; and John never, by word or deed, let anything escape him to remind the other that it was by interfering to save his shipmate that he had suffered.

It were not difficult, in this entertaining narrative, to find more amusing extracts; but our object is to exhibit the daily life of a common sailor in its true colours.

Besides performing, and at length well, all the duties of a man before the mast, the voyager had a long spell of hide-curing on shore, in which some of his fellow-labourers were Sandwich Islanders, who, with New Zealanders, may now often be found either on board whalers, or other vessels in the Pacific, or in employments connected with the ordinary trade on the Western coasts of America. At San Diego, at which the Pilgrim touched, among many other places, to complete her cargo, a number of these islanders were found, who had been employed in working for some trading vessels who had just left the coast. The account given of these intelligent and amiable people is curious. They are the buffalo-hunters or the log-fellers of a new age and race.

All the hide-houses on the beach but ours were shut up; and the Sandwich Islanders, a dozen or twenty in number, who had worked for the other vessels and been paid off when they sailed, were living on the beach, keeping up a grand carnival. A Russian discovery-ship, which had been in this port a few years before, had built a large oven for baking bread, and went away, leaving it standing. This the Sandwich Islanders took possession of, and had kept ever since undisturbed. It was big enough to hold six or eight men—that is, it was as large as a ship's fore-castle, had a door at the side, and a vent-hole at top. They covered it with Oahu mats, for a carpet; stopped up the vent-hole in bad weather, and made it their head-quarters. It was now inhabited by as many as a dozen or twenty men, who lived there in complete idleness—drinking, playing cards, and carousing in every way. They bought a bullock once a week, which kept them in meat, and one of them went up to the town every day to get fruit, liquor, and provisions. Besides this, they had bought a cask of ship-bread and a barrel of flour from the Lagoda, before she sailed. There they lived, having a grand time, and caring for nobody. Captain T— was anxious to get three or four of them to come on board the Pilgrim, as we were so much diminished in numbers, and went up to the oven, and spent an hour or two in trying to negotiate with them. One of them, a finely-built, active, strong, and intelligent fellow, who was a sort of king among them, acted as spokesman. He was called Mannini,—or rather out of compliment to his known importance and influence, Mr. Mannini,—and was known all over California. Through him the captain offered them fifteen dollars a month, and one month's pay in advance; but it was like throwing pearls before swine, or, rather, carrying coals to Newcastle. So long as they had money, they would not work for fifty dollars a month; and when their money was gone they would work for ten.

"What do you do here, Mr. Mannini?" said the captain.

"Oh, we play cards, get drunk, smoke—do anything we're a mind to."

"Don't you want to come aboard and work?"

"Aole! aole make make makou i ka hana. Now, got plenty money; no good, work. Mamule, money pau—all gone. Ah! very good, work!—maikat, hana hana nei!"

"But you'll spend all your money in this way," said the captain.

"Aye! me know that. By-'em-by money pau—all gone; then Kanaka work plenty."

This was a hopeless case, and the captain left them, to wait patiently until their money was gone.

The time soon came when the Sandwich Islanders were fain to take employment on shore along with our author, Sam the flogged seaman, and a few more; one of these was an extraordinary salt-water gigantic monster, though a Frenchman. But the Sandwich Islanders are more interesting than any of the other specimens of the seamen, of all nations, that are to be found upon this coast. Of them our author says—

A considerable trade has been carried on for several years between California and the Sandwich Islands; and most of the vessels are manned with Islanders, who, as they for the most part sign no articles, leave whenever they choose, and let themselves out to cure hides at San Diego, and to supply the places of the men of the American vessels while on the coast. In this way quite a colony of them had become settled at San Diego as their head-quarters. Some of these had recently gone off in the Ayacucho and Loriotte, and the Pilgrim had taken Mr. Mannini and three others, so that there were not more than twenty left. Of these four were on pay at the Ayacucho's house, four more working with us, and the rest were living at the oven in a quiet way; for their money was nearly gone, and they must make it last until some other vessel came down to employ them.

During the four months that I lived here, I got well acquainted with all of them, and took the greatest pains to become familiar with their language, habits, and characters. Their language I could only learn orally, for they had not any books among them, though many of them had been taught to read and write by the missionaries at home. They spoke a little English: and, by a sort of compromise, a mixed language was used on the beach which could be understood by all. The long name of Sandwich Islanders is dropped, and they are called by the whites, all over the Pacific Ocean, "Kanakas," from a word in their own language which they apply to themselves, and to all South Sea Islanders, in distinction from whites, whom they call "Haole." This name, "Kanaka," they answer to, both collectively and individually. Their proper names, in their own language, being difficult to pronounce and remember, they are called by any names which the captains or crews may choose to give them. Some are called after the vessel they are in; others by common names, as Jack, Tom, Bill; and some have fancy names, as Ban-yan, Fore-top, Rope-yarn, Pelican, &c. &c. Of the four who worked at our house, one was named "Mr. Bingham," after the missionary at Oahu; another Hope, after a vessel that he had been in; a third, Tom Davis, the name of his first captain; and the fourth, Pelican, from his fancied resemblance to that bird. Then there was Lagoda-Jack, California-Bill, &c. &c. But by whatever names they might be called, they were the most interesting, intelligent, and kind-hearted people that I ever fell in with. I felt a positive attachment for almost all of them; and many of them I have, to this time, a feeling for, which would lead me to go a great way for the mere pleasure of seeing them, and which will always make me feel a strong interest in the mere name of a Sandwich Islander.

Tom Davis knew how to read, write, and cipher in common arithmetic; had been to the United States; and spoke English quite well. His education was as good as that of three-quarters of the Yankees in California, and his manners and principles a good deal better; and he was so quick of apprehension that he might have been taught navigation, and the elements of many of the sciences, with the most perfect ease. Old "Mr. Bingham" spoke very little English—almost none—and neither knew how to read nor write; but he was the best-hearted old fellow in the world. He must have been over fifty years of age, and had two of his front teeth knocked out, which was done by his parents as a sign of grief at the death of Tamahamaha, the great king of the Sandwich Islands. We used to tell him that he eat Captain Cook, and lost his teeth in that way. That was the only thing that ever made him angry. He would always be quite excited at that; and say—"Aole!" (no). "Me no eat Captain Cook! Me pikinini—small—so high—no more! My father see Captain Cook! Me—no!" None of them liked to have anything said about Captain Cook, for the sailors all believe that he was eaten, and that they cannot endure to be taunted with.—"New Zealand Kanaka eat white man;—Sandwich Island Kanaka,—no. Sandwich Island Kanaka ua like pu na haole—all 'e same a' you!"

Mr. Bingham was a sort of patriarch among them, and was always treated with great respect, though he had not the education and energy which gave Mr. Mannini his power over them. I have spent hours in talking with this old fellow about Tamahamaha, the Charlemagne of the Sandwich Islands; his son and successor, Riho Riho, who died in England, and was brought to Oahu in the frigate Blonde, Captain Lord Byron, and whose funeral he remembered perfectly; and also about the customs of his country in his boyhood, and the changes which had been made by the missionaries. He never would allow that human beings had been eaten there; and, indeed, it always seemed like an insult to tell so affectionate, intelligent, and civilized a class of men, that such barbarities had been practised in their own country within the recollection of many of them. Certainly, the history of no people on the globe can show anything like so rapid an advance. I would have trusted my life and my fortunes in the hands of any one of these people; and certainly, had I wished for a favour or act of sacrifice, I would have gone to them all, in turn, before I should have applied to one of my own countrymen on the coast, and should have expected to have seen it done, before my own countrymen had got half through counting the cost. Their customs and manner of treating one another, show a simple, primitive generosity, which is truly delightful; and which is often a reproach to our own people. Whatever one has, they all have. Money, food, clothes, they share with one another; even to the last piece of tobacco to put in their pipes. I once heard old Mr. Bingham say, with the highest indignation, to a Yankee trader who was trying to persuade him to keep his money to himself—"No! We no all 'e same a' you!—Suppose one got money, all got money. You;—suppose one got money—lock him up in chest.—No good!"—"Kanaka all 'e same a' one!" This principle they carry so far, that none of them will eat anything in sight of others, without offering it all round. I have seen one of them break a biscuit, which had been given him, into five parts, at a time when I knew he was on a very short allowance, as there was but little to eat on the beach.

My favourite among all of them, and one who was liked by both officers and men, and by whomever he had anything to do with, was Hope. He was an intelligent, kind-hearted little fellow, and I never saw him angry, though I knew him for more than a year, and have seen him imposed upon by white people, and abused by insolent officers of vessels. He was always civil, and always ready, and never forgot a benefit. I once took care of him when he was ill, getting medicines from the ship's chests, when no captain or officer would do anything for him; and he never forgot it. Every Kanaka has one particular friend, whom he considers himself bound to do everything for, and with whom he has a sort of contract,—an alliance offensive and defensive,—and for whom he will often make the greatest sacrifices. This friend they call aikane; and for such did Hope adopt me. I do not believe I could have wanted anything which he had, that he would not have given me. In return for this, I was always his friend among the Americans, and used to teach him letters and numbers; for he left home before he had learned how to read. He was very curious about Boston, (as they call the United States;) asking many questions about the houses, the people, &c., and always wished to have the pictures in books explained to him. They were all astonishingly quick in catching at explanations; and many things which I had thought it utterly impossible to make them understand, they often seized in an instant, and asked questions which showed that they knew enough to make them wish to go farther. The pictures of steam-boats and railroad-cars, in the columns of some newspapers which I had, gave me great difficulty to explain. The grading of the road, the rails, the construction of the carriages, they could easily understand; but the motion produced by steam was a little too refined for them.

A map of the world, which I once showed them, kept their attention for hours; those who knew how to read pointing out the places, and referring to me for the distances. I remember being much amused with a question which Hope asked me. Pointing to the large irregular place which is always left blank, round the poles, to denote that it is undiscovered, he looked up and asked—"Pau?" (Done! ended!)

The system of naming the streets and numbering the houses, they easily understood, and the utility of it. They had a great desire to see America, but were afraid of doubling Cape Horn, for they suffer much in cold weather, and had heard dreadful accounts of the Cape, from those of their number who had been round it.

They smoke a great deal, though not much at a time; using pipes with large bowls, and very short stems, or no stems at all. These they light, and putting them to their mouths, take a long draught, getting their mouths as full as they can hold, and their cheeks distended, and then let it slowly out through their mouths and nostrils. The pipe is then passed to others, who draw in the same manner—one pipe-full serving for half-a-dozen. They never take short, continuous draughts, like Europeans; but one of these "Oahu puffs," as the sailors call them, serves for an hour or two, until some one else lights his pipe, and it is passed round in the same manner. Each Kanaka on the beach had a pipe, flint, steel, tinder, a hand of tobacco, and a jack-knife, which he always carried about with him.

That which strikes a stranger most peculiarly, is their style of singing. They run on, in a low, guttural, monotonous sort of chant, their lips and tongue seeming hardly to move, and the sounds apparently modulated solely in the throat. There is very little tune to it, and the words, so far as I could learn, are extempore. They sing about persons and things which are around them, and adopt this method when they do not wish to be understood by any but themselves; and it is very effectual, for with the most careful attention, I never could detect a word that I knew. I have often heard Mr. Mannini, who was the most noted improvisatori among them, sing for an hour together, when at work in the midst of Americans and Englishmen; and, by the occasional shouts and laughter of the Kanakas, who were at a distance, it was evident that he was singing about the different men that he was at work with. They have great powers of ridicule, and are excellent mimics; many of them discovering and imitating the peculiarities of our own people, before we had seen them ourselves.

When the hide-curing was completed, and the vessels about to sail from the coast, there was a joyous breaking-up and leave-taking among the seamen, of which we have this animated description:—

The night before the vessels were ready to sail, all the Europeans united and had an entertainment at the Rosa's hide-house, and we had songs of every nation and tongue. A German gave us "Och! mein lieber Augustin!" the three Frenchmen roared through the Marseilles Hymn; the English and Scotchmen gave us "Rule Britannia," and "Wha'll be King but Charlie!" the Italians and Spaniards screamed through some national affairs, for which I was none the wiser; and we three Yankees made an attempt at the "Star-spangled Banner." After these national tributes had been paid, the Austrian gave us a very pretty little love song, and the Frenchmen sang a spirited thing called "Sentinelle! O prenez garde à vous!" and then followed the mélange which might have been expected. When I left them, the aquadiente and annisou was pretty well in their heads, and they were all singing and talking at once, and their peculiar national oaths were getting as plenty as pronouns.

The next day, the two vessels got under weigh for the windward, and left us in quiet possession of the beach. Our numbers were somewhat enlarged by the opening of the new houses, and the society of the beach a little changed. In charge of the Catalina's house was an old Scotchman, who, like most of his countrymen, had a pretty good education, and, like many of them, was rather pragmatical, and had a ludicrously solemn conceit. He employed his time in taking care of his pigs, chickens, turkeys, dogs, &c., and in smoking his long pipe. Everything was as neat as a pin in the house, and he was as regular in his hours as a chronometer, but as he kept very much by himself, was not a great addition to our society. He hardly spent a cent all the time he was on the beach, and the others said he was no shipmate. He had been a petty officer on board the British frigate Dublin, Capt. Lord James Townshend, and had great ideas of his own importance. The man in charge of the Rosa's house was an Austrian by birth, but spoke, read, and wrote four languages with ease and correctness. German was his native tongue; but being born near the borders of Italy, and having sailed out of Genoa, the Italian was almost as familiar to him as his own language. He was six years on board of an English man-of-war, where he learned to speak our language with ease, and also to read and write it. He had been several years in Spanish vessels, and had acquired that language so well, that he could read any books in it. He was between forty and fifty years of age, and was a singular mixture of the man-of-war's-man and Puritan. He talked a great deal about propriety and steadiness, and gave good advice to the youngsters and Kanakas, but seldom went up to the town without coming down "three sheets in the wind." One holiday, he and old Robert (the Scotchman from the Catalina) went up to the town, and got so cozy, talking over old stories, and giving one another good advice, that they came down, double-backed, on a horse, and both rolled off into the sand as soon as the horse stopped. This put an end to their pretensions, and they never heard the last of it from the rest of the men. On the night of the entertainment at the Rosa's house, I saw old Schmidt (that was the Austrian's name) standing up by a hog's-head, holding on by both hands, and calling out to himself—"Hold on, Schmidt! hold on, my good fellow, or you'll be on your back!" Still, he was an intelligent, good-natured old fellow, and had a chest-full of books, which he willingly lent me to read. In the same house with him was a Frenchman and an Englishman; the latter a regular-built man-of-war Jack! a thorough seaman, a hearty, generous fellow, and, at the same time, a drunken, dissolute dog. He made it a point to get drunk once a fortnight (when he always managed to sleep on the road, and have his money stolen from him,) and to battle the Frenchman once a-week.

Our own countryman is delectable—a salt-water Andrew Fairservice. With another finished portrait, we shall take leave of this captivating narrative—this something midway between Robinson Crusoe's adventures and Dampier's voyages, which, notwithstanding the unavoidable hardship and sufferings it recounts, we should be afraid to put into the hands of any boy upon whom the enchantment of the sea had fallen.

BILL JACKSON, A TRUE ENGLISH SAILOR,

I shall always remember as the best specimen of the thorough-bred English sailor that I ever saw. He had been to sea from a boy, having served a regular apprenticeship of seven years, as all English sailors are obliged to do, and was then about four or five-and-twenty. He was tall; but you only perceived it when he was standing by the side of others, for the great breadth of his shoulders and chest made him appear but little above the middle height. His chest was as deep as it was wide; his arm like that of Hercules; and his hand, "the flat of a tar—every hair a rope-yarn." With all this, he had one of the pleasantest smiles I ever saw. His cheeks were of a handsome brown; his teeth brilliantly white; and his hair, of a raven black, waved in loose curls all over his head, and fine open forehead; and his eyes he might have sold to a duchess at the price of diamonds, for their brilliancy. As for their colour, they were like the Irishman's pig, which would not stay to be counted—every change of position and light seemed to give them a new hue; but their prevailing colour was black, or nearly so. Take him with his well-varnished black tarpaulin stuck upon the back of his head; his long locks coming down almost into his eyes; his white duck trousers and shirt; blue jacket; and black kerchief, tied loosely round his neck; and he was a fine specimen of manly beauty. On his broad chest he had stamped with India ink, "Parting moments;"—a ship ready to sail; a boat on the beach; and a girl and her sailor lover taking their farewell. Underneath were printed the initials of his own name, and two other letters, standing for some name which he knew better than I did. This was very well done, having been executed by a man who made it his business to print with India ink, for sailors, at Havre. On one of his broad arms he had the crucifixion, and on the other the sign of the "foul anchor."

He was very fond of reading, and we lent him most of the books which we had in the fore-castle, which he read and returned to us the next time we fell in with him. He had a good deal of information, and his captain said he was a perfect seaman, and worth his weight in gold on board a vessel, in fair weather and in foul. His strength must have been immense, and he had the sight of a vulture. It is strange that one should be so minute in the description of an unknown, outcast sailor, whom one may never see again, and whom no one may care to hear about; but so it is. Some people we see under no remarkable circumstances, but whom, for some reason or other, we never forget. He called himself Bill Jackson; and I know no one of all my accidental acquaintances to whom I would more gladly give a shake of the hand than to him. Whoever falls in with him, will find a handsome, hearty fellow, and a good shipmate.

SONNET.

SUGGESTED BY THE DEATH OF GENERAL HARRISON.

Thy foes, O Liberty! are hale and strong;
And raise, exultingly, their forts and fauces,
Wherein to shelter their great idol, Wrong,
Who looks through loop-holes and religious panes
Upon a prostrate world. Alas! thy friends
Have often failed to read thy truths aright;
And grieved thee by mistaking means for ends,

Till tyranny has pointed to thy light
And said: "'tis but a vapour that ascends,
Out of the swamps of life, to mock its night."
I hoped that one had risen up, of late,
To teach the monarch and his mitred slave
How pure a thing it is they fear and hate:
But he who promised this reposes in the grave.

THE GREEN GAUNTLET; OR, THE TRAITOR'S SON.

CHAPTER IV.

In the Autumn of 1796, Edmund was destined to behold, after a separation of fifteen years, a personage who, from his earliest days of boyhood, seemed to exercise a control over his destiny which he had never perfectly understood: it is unnecessary to add more to introduce the Friar John of former days, upon whose brow the march of fifty-four years had not planted a single furrow: his once jet-black hair was as yet but slightly tinged with grey; his piercing eye had not lost a scintilla of its vivid fire, nor had his robust and active frame apparently suffered the smallest decay. His greetings of Edmund were so warm, and the delight he appeared to feel at their reunion so sincere, that it awakened every sentiment of ancient regard in the heart of the generous Edmund.

The friar had long resided in Ireland, and chiefly under the roof of his friend Walter. Amidst all the dangers of the times, he had hitherto contrived to escape the open violence of the dominant party, although no man was so narrowly watched. His extensive and unostentatious charities rendered this extraordinary character the most popular of the priesthood. That there was some deep and secret understanding between his uncle and the friar, Edmund's shrewdness could not fail to observe; but the precise nature of their long and private conferences he felt a delicacy of inquiring into: he, however, saw and heard enough to convince him, that some mighty purpose was on foot; and while he wished, he almost feared to encourage that wish, that it might be a struggle for Ireland's freedom. Edmund had brooded over his personal wrongs, and those which he saw hourly inflicted on a suffering people, until his mind had lost every particle of attachment either to the throne or government. During this state of anxious suspense, the friar once more disappeared, and his absence was extended to nearly two months.

At length, one dark and stormy December night, while a raging east wind, in angry blasts, made the walls of the old castle shiver under its power, Walter and Edmund were sitting over the large turf-fire in the wainscoted parlour, pondering on the ravages of that fearful storm, which had existed, with daily increasing violence, for nearly a week, when they heard in the courtyard sounds of the well-known footsteps of the horse of friar John, who, at that late hour, was braving the midnight storm. In a few minutes, he presented himself before his friends: his opening the parlour door was followed by a blast of air, which rushed into the gloomy apartment, raising clouds of the white turf ashes from the ample hearth. Clapping his back to the door, which it required all his strength to close, he pronounced the mysterious words, "They are come!"

An unusual agitation marked the generally placid countenance of Walter at this brief announcement;

while on Edmund it produced a stare of surprise, followed by the question, "Who are come?"

The friar, with his finger on his lips, whispered, "Verbum sap.," then approaching the fire, took the hands of his friends, which he pressed with unusual energy.

"Silence for the present," said the friar, "here's the supper."

And a good and plentiful one it proved, consisting of an abundance of game and wild-fowl of the season, to which the hungry priest did due honour. His eyes seemed to glisten with some secret delight, as he looked alternately on his host and former pupil,—even with the domestics in attendance he appeared to exchange looks of joy and confidence. Edmund's mind was rapt in meditation, when his deep reveries were broken by the friar's toast, "Success to the good cause!" An expression so commonplace would not, under other circumstances, have excited peculiar notice; but the undisguised ecstasy with which the friar drank it, previously crossing his forehead with reverence, plainly showed to Edmund that it had a more than ordinary meaning. The friar seemed bursting to communicate his important intelligence; but as each blast of the howling wind roared in the wide chimney with a voice of thunder, his countenance fell, betraying a feeling of the deepest horror. Being now left to themselves, with the half-gallon jug of whisky-punch before them, the friar once more uttered the words, "They are come!" Just then the clock tolled the midnight hour.

"Oh, may the blessed dawn bring us calm! Yes, my friends, General Hoche, with a force of twelve thousand men are now in safety, anchored in Bantry Bay! Kerry, Clare, and Limerick are already on the alert, only waiting for his landing to hoist the standard of liberty, and proclaim their country's freedom. The troops from Cork and its vicinity are on the march westward; but if Providence should favour him with twelve hours' calm, he will be able to land before they reach the coast, and will then move on for the centre of the country, where he will be received with open arms and honest hearts. Wicklow, Wexford, Kildare, and Carlow, will soon be up, and carve out work enough for the garrison of Dublin. Our task must be to push on for the Shannon, and keep the passes open for him."

Thus far the padre had proceeded, directing his discourse to both, when fixing his keen eye on Edmund, he addressed him with boldness:

"Now, my dear Edmund, is your time for action. Proceed with me to the coast. The post of quarter-master-general has been reserved for you."

"For me!" cried the astonished Edmund, starting.

"Nay, start not, my son," continued the fiery zealot; "your country demands your services in the glorious cause of Ireland's freedom. Your religion, the recollection of your wrongs, all call aloud for your aid: hesitate not to obey the sacred call. France generously stretches forth the hand of power to help the righteous cause; and shall you, the child equally of France and Ireland, tamely see the foreigner reap the laurels which you should share?"

Edmund appeared abstracted and deep in thought: the wily friar proceeded:

"Honour and duty invite you, my Edmund! Reflect on the century of wrongs heaped on the noble family from whence you sprung!—rescue their ancient halls from the intruder's hoof! Think on your sainted mother's last injunction! Think on the humbled but never-disgraced GREEN GAUNTLET!"

That talismanic word struck the most sensitive chord of Edmund's heart: his fond mother's dying words recurred to his mind in all their force:

"Pursue the claims of our house, even to the death!"

The friar carried his point—Edmund was at once a REBEL.

Striding towards the window, as if the enemy were already at the gate, he exclaimed:

"Yes, the Green Gauntlet shall prevail, or be buried with the unfortunate Edmund in a soldier's grave!"

On these words, both his uncle and the friar pressed him by turns to their hearts. An old servant of the house now appeared, backed by a tall and gigantic figure, who was greeted by the friar by the name of Doyle; on a signal from whom the priest rose to withdraw, first bestowing on the huge herald a pint beaker of punch. The clock struck one ere he returned, his eyes glaring with a kind of ferocious joy. He had passed the preceding hour at a midnight meeting of a band of registered rebels of that district, held in one of the vaults of the ancient abbey adjacent, where he communicated all that has already been stated; and, having arranged with them for the junction of their force, whenever the signal should be given for the general rising, he dismissed them with a benediction on their zeal in the good cause. Anxiously were the vigils of the ardent friar kept that awful night; his heart blessed each moment of returning calm, as the hoarse wind seemed to rock itself to rest. An unbroken stillness at length prevailed, when he tried to snatch a few hours' sleep; but his uneasy slumbers were disturbed at the first dawn of light by the revival of the same relentless roaring storm. On entering the breakfast parlour, he exchanged looks of despair and disappointment with his melancholy host, whose subdued hopes were but too visibly written on his anxious countenance.

"This storm will be our ruin," said Walter, as the old castle seemed to tremble in the blast.

The priest answered with a deep sigh; and going to the window, saw, on every side, signs of the desolating hurricane; whilst far above, the heavens presented a bright unclouded azure, all below exhibited a yellow dusky haze, half obscuring the blasted heather on the bleak mountain side. The lofty pines groaning under the mighty power of the gale, all bent their tapering tops, and, like the finger of fate, pointed ominously to the West! The alternate bursts of rage and despondency which broke forth from the bosom of the agitated friar rendered him at times almost blasphemous; and when Edmund made a late appearance in the room, with that calmness of countenance which marks a manly determination of purpose, whether for good or evil, he beheld his beloved uncle bending before the fire with his face buried in his hands, and in such deep and melancholy thought, as to be almost insensible to his approach. Not so the friar: he was pacing, in hurried steps, the old oak floor of that gloomy apartment, taking momentary views of the wild extent of country before him, and struggling to suppress the sighs which seemed to rend his anxious breast. Seizing the hand of Edmund, and leading him to a window, he fixed an angry look abroad, as if he would chide the elements; and with a heart-drawn sigh, ejaculated:

"O my friend, this is a sad and sorry sight!—they will never be able to land while this infer—this inhuman storm continues. Last night I watched it, and on bended knees petitioned heaven for a calm. My prayers, I thought, were heard; and I snatched a brief and restless sleep; but, alas! the inexorable tempest, as if deriving fresh vigour from its short repose, now sweeps over the desolate land in one unceasing howling blast, to wither all our hopes! Colpoys will probably, by this time, have a fleet collected at the south-west coast, to intercept the retreat of the baffled expedition; while the troops will have reached Bantry in sufficient force to form a barrier to his progress into the interior, should Hoche daringly venture on a landing, which could only be effected by sacrificing his transports, and probably half his men. No! no!—escape, if it be yet possible, is now his better course. I must away to warn the friends of our cause against a hostile movement. One rash step, one single demonstration now, would frustrate all our plans. Let us hope that the moment of victory and independence is deferred, not lost. O Ireland! Ireland! my unhappy country!" ejaculated the priest, "the very heavens conspire to rivet your chains!"

Edmund endeavoured to soothe the feelings of his companions, even while his own heart suffered all the pangs of disappointed ambition and defeated hopes.

After a hurried breakfast, the friar mounted his pony; and, breasting the roaring storm, pursued his mountain-track towards the haunts of his oath-bound brethren, in order to prevent any outbreak under present appearances.

Edmund scarcely exchanged a word with his disconsolate uncle during the first hour from the priest's departure, when he at last ventured to ask a few questions as to the part Walter was prepared to take in that movement, which he plainly saw had been long in a state of preparation. The map of Ireland was extended on the table, and both were employed in tracing the probable line of march which Hoche would pursue in the event of his effecting a landing; a hope which neither would allow himself utterly to abandon. Just then, the noise of cavalry, galloping up the long and dreary avenue which led to the castle, caused an instantaneous alarm. Edmund ran to the entrance hall, and seeing a body of dragoons fast advancing to—wards the outer gate, hurried back to consult with his uncle as to what was to be done. Meantime, the uncle had rolled up the map, and replaced it by some music, beside which he had placed Edmund's flute,—he merely pointed to the instrument. Edmund took the hint; and while Walter ran to give apparent welcome to this unexpected military force, Edmund's loud notes resounded through the naked, lofty hall. The servants were summoned, and the doors flew back on their hinges as the detachment reached the outer gate; and while it clattered over the pavement of the desolate courtyard, Walter stood at the porch of his dwelling to receive his guests, with an air of bold confidence, and the appearance, at least, of hospitality.

The first person to present himself was the magistrate of the neighbouring town. There was an air of authority in the magistrate, as he said to the officer commanding the detachment, (which were yeomanry,) "Do your duty, sir!" which implied something serious as the cause of this armed visit. Walter assumed the most perfect composure, while a dozen of the troop, who had dismounted, took possession of the hall; and others, mounted or dismounted, as circumstances rendered necessary, took post as sentinels at every door or aperture leading from the premises. Roche led the way into the parlour; his nephew was still blowing the flute, which he took from his lips with an air of apparent astonishment, as he saw himself intruded on by the magistrate, and a brace of booted yeomanry with drawn swords. Casting a look, approaching to contempt, upon the whole party, he asked his uncle:

"To what are we indebted, sir, for the honour of these gentlemen's appearance here?"

Walter replied, that "the magistrate had not yet explained; but that he presumed he would not forget he was in the house of a gentleman, and would conduct himself as became one, whatever might be the nature of his duty."

The magistrate, thus indirectly appealed to, stated, that he came into the castle by virtue of a warrant from the Privy Council, the precise nature of which he felt it no part of his duty to disclose; but, as a preliminary measure, he must beg the gentlemen to remain where they at present were, under a guard, and to deliver to him the keys of their apartments, desks, trunks, &c. Walter, who saw the rising spirit of his nephew boiling with indignation on his crimsoned cheek, and fearing his impetuosity might do harm, sought to dissipate ill-humour on both sides by affecting an air of cheerfulness; and, with a smile, presented his keys, saying:

"These, sir, are the keys of my money-desk, my deed-box, and my wine-cellar,—all of which, relying on your honour, you are most welcome to explore; they are the only things under lock and key in this mansion: every door, apartment, chamber, and closet on the premises you will find unbarred. Edmund presented his watch, to the chain of which was attached the key of his writing-desk, observing to the magistrate, that no abstraction of his property would be submitted to by him. The magistrate, attended by the officer and the main-body of the detachment, then withdrew, leaving Walter and his nephew prisoners in their own house, guarded by two of those fellows, so admirably described by the immortal Curran when portraying such reptiles—" Ruffians in red, rammed into regimentals, and stuffed into boots." A full hour was passed in searching and ransacking every room, hole, and corner of the dilapidated building, before the magistrate reappeared in the parlour; when, returning into Walter's hands the keys with which he had been intrusted, he assured him, with that confidence a gentleman ever feels in his own veracity, that no hand but his own had touched, no other eye had seen, a single paper.

"I have taken the freedom, sir," addressing Edmund, "of removing your desk from your room, and have had it brought down here, in order to its being opened in your presence." An act of delicacy and respect, which Edmund handsomely acknowledged.

The desk, on being opened, and its contents examined, presented nothing which caused even a question, except the carefully wrapt up Green Gauntlet, which the yeomanry officer seized, being, from its colour, (in his opinion,) a damning document of treason! Edmund, however, instantly claimed it back, stating to the magistrate that it was an ancient but highly valued bauble, which had been centuries in the family from which he had sprung, and consequently no political badge of the present times. The yeoman officer was strongly tempted to resist the magistrate's order for its immediate restitution, and returned it with a protest, and a suggestion that both uncle and nephew should be removed as prisoners "on suspicion!" Had the wretch been asked on suspicion of what? his ignorance could have furnished him with no reply: it was the cant-word of the day. The magistrate greatly offended this disappointed Loyalist, by declining to act on his contemptible suggestion; and, after requesting him to withdraw his force, and mount, he held the following discourse with the parties, addressing Walter:

"You have an occasional inmate, I believe, Mr. Roche—an ecclesiastic, commonly called Friar John?"

"Yes, sir," replied Walter, "I am so happy, and feel proud, too, at calling him a relative, although a very distant one. I only regret his visits are so short in their duration."

"Where, may I ask, is he now?" inquired the magistrate.

"Gone to visit some one who, perhaps, needs his priestly offices, for aught I know."

"Humph!" muttered the magistrate. "You, sir," addressing Edmund, "I understand have been an officer in his Majesty's army?"

"I have had that honour, sir; and also of having rendered good service to his Majesty's arms."

"You are not now, I believe, in the army?"

"No, sir," answered Edmund, adding with firmness, "and never shall be!"

"My nephew, sir," interrupted the anxious uncle, "will in due time succeed to my little property, and being otherwise in perfectly independent circumstances, feels it a mark of affection and duty to bestow on me, his only relative, his society, although at the sacrifice of a profession to which, from his boyhood, he has ever done honour."

"'Twere better for all parties," mildly remarked the magistrate, "that he had continued in the service. Now, sir, it is due to you to explain, that informations of a most serious nature had been sworn to, before the Privy Council at Dublin castle, which will account to you for my hasty intrusion, and for the manner in which my sense of duty compelled me to examine your house. As far as I can form a judgment from appearances, nothing exists, on these premises, at least, to implicate you in any manner, with the heavy charges sworn to; and it may be a satisfaction to you to be assured, that my report on the result of my examination will be as just to your character as my intrusion seemed violent to you; and thus, gentlemen, I now take my leave."

Both uncle and nephew attended the magistrate to the outer gate, bowing him off with seeming respect and cordiality, greatly to the annoyance of the yeomanry and their officer.

When left to themselves to converse over the events of the last two hours, they could not but fear treason in some quarter; but what cheered Walter's spirits was, that the treachery did not exist in any part of the household, or those more immediately in their secrets; for it was but too true that, at that very moment, a large dépôt, both of arms and ammunition, was built up in the vaults of the old abbey, awaiting the general rising: a circumstance of which Edmund was, as yet, ignorant, and only known to two or three faithful domestics of the house; so that, had there been any household treason, the search, which would probably have consigned both to an ignominious death, would assuredly have been made.

Some days elapsed ere the padre returned. His first inquiries were as to the proceedings of the magistrate and the yeomanry, whose visit had been blazoned about the country by the latter, as a service of a most important, and not less dangerous, nature. On learning all that had passed at the old castle, the priest exultingly exclaimed, "Did the fools imagine that FRIAR John had lived for half a century in this world, to be caught either by his own writings, or the correspondence of friends? No, no! They may denounce me, as I learn they have done, but they shall never convict me. I fear not all the powers of government, so long as the courts of law are open; but accursed martial law has already been proclaimed in three counties, and soon will grasp the whole of unhappy Ireland in its murderous fangs! The bloody C—r—h—t—n thirsts for my life! three wretches have already been sacrificed on the scaffold to his base and coward fears. O, 'twould be a fine sight for the Orange yeomanry to see Friar John dangling betwixt heaven and earth! HA! HA! HA!" The demoniacal laugh of the friar fixed his hearers horror-bound for the instant. "I must away, my friends, but not to confirm suspicion by a base flight: no, I go to dare my accusers: circumstances may hereafter come to light which are now buried in faithful bosoms."

The self-confidence with which the friar spoke extended that confidence to his anxious hearers, who offered no opposition to the course he was prepared to take; and, in a few more hours, he was on his way to the capital; but by what route even his deeply-interested friends were left to conjecture.

True to his intention, the friar appeared before the Privy Council at Dublin, to be heard in support of his petition to the Lord-lieutenant, for a speedy investigation into the various anonymous accusations preferred against him, and which had so eagerly been caught at and entertained by the Executive, to whom he now voluntarily surrendered himself. Deep consultations took place; and no means of bribery or subornation were left untried to vamp up some evidence against the rebel priest; but so admirably had he managed to conceal all traces of his treason, that the most severe inquisition into his conduct failed to fix on him any crime of which the government could take legal cognizance. He was, consequently, dismissed. Had martial law then existed in Dublin, the fate of the friar would soon have been decided. So fierce was the spirit of cruelty and persecution which that detestable system inspired, that men who had all through their previous career moved in the superior walks of life, with the character of goodwill and humanity to all, appeared suddenly to cast off every Christian virtue, and plunge at once into the lowest state of savage brutality. ONE individual, who, in his magisterial capacity, had arrested an unfortunate schoolmaster, "on suspicion," failing to induce any of his neighbours or dependants to flog the innocent man, this monster in human shape stripped off his coat, and with his own hands tied him up and inflicted upwards of one hundred lashes on the back of his lacerated, bleeding victim, ere his muscular arm relaxed its labours. And this was the act of a HIGH SHERIFF! a gentleman! a man of family! whose loyalty was, immediately after this brutal display, rewarded with a BARONETCY!!! In what other country but afflicted, oppressed Ireland, would a man, calling himself a gentleman and a scholar, after such a deed, be received into society, much less decked with honours and rank, as the reward of his infamy? or what other government on earth, but that with which Ireland had been for ages cursed, would have dared to bestow them?

The year 1797 had been marked with the most horrible atrocities; the dreadful measure of "free quarters" for the military of all ranks, arms, and degrees, line, fencibles, militia, and, still worse, yeomanry, thus placed the people at the mercy of an army, let loose upon them with an unbounded licence for every act of outrage and cruelty—like a town taken by storm! Many an unhappy father met his death by the bayonet of a drunken ruffian, excited by liquor and depraved passion, while endeavouring to rescue his child from brutal violation. Hundreds of houses in every barony were occupied as barracks, merely on the suspicion of their owners being considered as "disloyal subjects." Plunder, murder, and rapine, were the order of the day, basely encouraged by the government to hurry on that fatal crisis which these horrid cruelties provoked. Such sickening details, however, are for the future historian to record and lament: no man, even at this more liberal and enlightened period, may dare to write the whole truth. That dark and bloody page in Ireland's history, is but one of the huge volume of her sufferings and her wrongs. Happily, the hour may be fast approaching when it shall become a sealed book; when a generous and enlightened policy may heal the wounds and cast a veil of oblivion over the past, and cement, in bonds of peace and amity, two countries, destined by nature for that real and substantial union which would impart strength, and wealth, and prosperity to each.

It required all the exertions of his uncle and his old preceptor (still his influential friend and adviser) to restrain Edmund's burning indignation at the scenes of which he was, from day to day, a witness, when men were picketted, flogged, transported, or "hung up like dogs in clusters," on the bare presumption of sedition and conspiracy.

At length, human forbearance became stretched to its utmost limits; the population of the country was absolutely dwindling daily by thousands, under the torture of the lash, the bullet, the firebrand, or the gibbet; and the maddened people, no longer controllable, burst at once into the horrors of open rebellion. The spring of 1798 witnessed the awful sight of nearly half a million sons of that soil, so richly gifted by nature with every blessing, throwing off, with their allegiance to their sovereign, all the habits of social life, and plunging recklessly into the miseries of civil war. In Leinster, Munster, Connaught, and Ulster, the risings became almost simultaneous. As a proof that the religion of the majority was not the chief bond of union, almost all the leaders of this awful movement were PROTESTANTS! and numbers of them of the high Presbyterian Church.

Amongst the first who took the field to venture life and fame in this perilous contest, was our hero Edmund. He had not been idle, during the six months preceding the outbreak, in training and organizing a force in his own neighbourhood, several hundreds of whom he had, from time to time, detached towards the vicinity of the metropolis, where it was intended the grand attack should be made.

The 23d of May, 1798, opened this dreadful drama! all sense of right or wrong then became confounded. Man, abandoning reason, acted henceforth under the influence of his worst passions. The rebel party, wound up to a pitch of desperation by years of torture and oppression, burned with wild and ungovernable revenge; not only against all who took arms to oppose them, but also against those whose fears prevented them from taking any part in the fearful contest, and whose neutrality afforded no security either from rebel or royalist. In too many instances, alas! they were made the victims of the most revolting cruelties. But the troops and yeomanry set the dreadful example; and deep and deadly was the spirit of vengeful retribution! Whole families were burnt in their houses, from which all escape was prevented by the blood-stained pikes of the infuriated rebels, whose progress could be tracked through streams of blood and smoking ruins! Edmund, who had marched towards the county of Wexford with one body, several hundreds strong, hailed the moment of his junction with the main body of the rebel army, in the hope of restraining within some bounds of discipline, the patriots of the pike and firebrand! Beside him marched the unflinching friar, whom no danger could appal, nor difficulty embarrass. He was at once the guide, the commissary, the quarter-master, and the chaplain to the brigade: every mountain-pass, and every valley, river, and stream, which lay in their course, seemed familiar to him; and, as their marches were generally made between sunset and sunrise, his services were most valuable. Walter had been left in Connaught to take advantage, with his force, of whatever success might attend the operations near Dublin.

That awful day, the events of which future ages shall read with horror, the memorable Fifth of June, 1798, arrived! The first beams of a lovely morning sun lit thousands to that bloody battlefield, which Fate had destined to be their evening grave! Various bodies of rebels from the contiguous counties kept pouring in during the preceding night; and the party-coloured columns, which at daybreak hovered over the town of New Ross, presented a mass of nearly FIFTY THOUSAND MEN, of all arms, poorly accoutred, without cavalry, with the exception of a few hundred scattered horsemen, irregularly armed and equipped; and without any other description of artillery, save a few ship-guns, plundered from the merchantmen. To oppose this powerful, but undisciplined, force, General Johnson's army consisted of about twenty battalions of infantry, line, militia, and fencibles, a brilliant train of artillery, and such a powerful and effective cavalry force, that, with the aid of that arm alone, (if wielded with the skill of modern warfare,) the defeat of the rebel force ought not to have been above an hour's task. The royalist general found it a more tedious operation. He had had an early choice of position; part of his army was in possession of the town and suburbs of New Ross, so securely posted as to defy, as it was thought, the efforts of a disorganized horde, however numerous, to dislodge them. The rebels, however, under all the disadvantages of position, and inferiority in everything but numbers, became so impatient to be led on to the attack, that their chiefs no longer attempted to restrain their impetuosity. They burst on the royalists' positions with the fury of an overwhelming torrent, sweeping before it all opposition. Column followed column in this murderous onslaught. Attacked at various points, the royal army was driven from the town at the point of the pike, after the most horrid slaughter on both sides. The bridge over the river Barrow was so choked and dammed up with the heaps of dead and dying, as to retard the pursuit of their enemy; and the rebels were for a time checked in their career of conquest by this human rampart. Had the rebel commander-in-chief known how to improve this temporary victory, or had possessed sufficient moral influence over his frantic followers, to restrain their licentiousness, the fate of Ireland would, probably, that day have been decided! But, intoxicated by their partial success, the rebels abandoned themselves to every species of sanguinary outrage. The shops and stores were burst open; wine and liquor flowed through the streets; plunder, massacre, and violation, knew no bounds during the first hours of their success; nor could they be drawn from these atrocious excesses until the return of the royal forces to the attack recalled them to their ranks for fresh slaughter.

The royalist general, anxious to retrieve the fortunes of the day, made a prudent disposition of his forces, which, notwithstanding the losses of the morning, were more than sufficient to achieve the conquest and annihilation of the rebel army; but his experience of their desperate and reckless mode of warfare convinced him, that complete victory could not be secured without farther sacrifices. General Johnson now became the assailant; and, after a brief, but bloody, contest, once more gained possession of the town, along the streets of which the blood of the rebel and the royalist streamed in one common tide. This "point d'appui" secured, the general ordered the troops to occupy positions in the surrounding neighbourhood, where the rebel army still mustered in imposing numbers, and with undaunted front. The battle was soon renewed between the main bodies of both armies, in front of the town, while various detached parties of the royal troops and the rebels were in close conflict on the flanks of either army. The British general's line presented a most formidable array. Correcting the error of the morning's battle, he no longer sought to disperse the enemy like an undisciplined mob, but proceeded, with all due caution, as if opposed to a regular army. His advance was slow, under cover of a murderous fire from his artillery. Confident in his strength and discipline, he invited, by his cautious movements, that injudicious attack of the rebels, which, in the fury of intoxication, and maddened by the hopes of another victory, they soon rashly commenced. Their centre, consisting of one solid mass, or phalanx, with a furious shout rushed onwards towards the royal ranks, heedless of the momentary loss of hundreds, swept off by continuous volleys of artillery, but whose places were quickly filled up by the rapidly advancing thousands which were eagerly pressing on from the rear to death or victory. On! on! the dreadful phalanx poured, until it pierced the royal line. In the showers of shot and bullets, friends, as well as foes, fell indiscriminately. The artillery was, for a time, silenced by command: the armies were so interwoven, that equal slaughter was inflicted on rebel and royalist by its fire. The few ships-guns which the rebels brought into the field were dragged into position, charged with every species of missile that could be collected: their fire was then poured into the royal ranks with deadly effect. When their ammunition became exhausted, the rude artillerists abandoned and overthrew their guns, resuming their more natural weapon, the powerful pike. The battle still raged in the centre with undiminished fury: it was for some time a hand-to-hand fight, and oftentimes of doubtful issue; but, an opening being presented for a charge of cavalry, one regiment of heavy dragoons performed it in a splendid style, and first turned the tide of battle. The rebels gave way in confusion; and the artillery, once more coming into play, thinned their retreating ranks by hundreds.

On the left of the rebel line, the contest was still carried on with unabated vigour. The brigade of reserve of the insurgents, during the charge of cavalry on the centre, endeavoured to turn the right flank of the royal army. They were met by a battalion of militia, about eight hundred strong, supported by a brigade of nine-pounder field-artillery. These the rebels attacked with such irresistible and desperate impetuosity, that they were carried in half an hour; but not until each of the three guns had been surrounded by the bodies of its brave defenders. This advantage gained, the whole force of the rebel brigade was poured on the devoted battalion of militia, which maintained its ground with the most heroic firmness, dealing death at every volley, even while paddling in the blood of their slain and wounded comrades.

The rebel brigade (whose movements evidently showed that it was under the guidance of a master-hand) made a feint of retreating, dragging the captured guns in triumph in its rear; but this ruse failed to draw the steady battalion from its secure position. The rebel chief, who must have known of the defeat of the centre, and his own precarious position, contemplating that, of course, a few minutes would bring reinforcements to the right, wheeled round, and, in a desperate charge, tried to destroy the remains of this gallant band; but a destructive volley welcomed his advance: the leader fell! and the white banner which he had borne throughout the fight disappeared! A shout of triumph from the reduced and almost annihilated battalion of militia followed; but in another moment the pennon of the chief, borne by himself, again waved in the air, cheered by a thousand voices. A stream of blood poured down his face, which gave a frightful interest to the countenance of the warlike leader. On foot, and bleeding, he rushed from rank to rank, inspiring his troops with fresh courage by his daring example:—it was EDMUND OF THE GREEN GAUNTLET! a musket-ball had slightly grazed his temple, wounding one of the small arteries, which bled profusely, but was unattended by danger. Aloft waved his snow-white banner, with the green gauntlet embroidered in the centre, while his sword flashed proud defiance as he led his brigade on to a fresh attack. At his side the indomitable Friar John still held his place, arrayed in priestly robes, which were girded round his loins: in his left hand he held an upraised CRUCIFIX; while, with bared and brawny arm, his right wielded a massive sword, reeking with recent carnage. He seemed to "bear a charmed life;" for, amidst the showers of bullets, he stood untouched amongst the heaps of slain, loudly cheering on the furious rebels to continued slaughter. To Edmund's war-cry of "On for the GREEN GAUNTLET!" the fiery priest responded, "ON, ON, MY BOYS, FOR THE CROSS, AND YOUR COUNTRY!"

The battalion of militia, now reduced to half its original numbers, still held its ground. Both the field-officers had been borne to the rear severely wounded; seven other officers lay on the field; yet, with the most devoted courage, it met every fresh attack with unshaken firmness: but its destruction seemed almost inevitable, when, at that awful moment, a noise like a peal of distant thunder burst on their ears, rolling onward for a few seconds, when, to their unspeakable joy and relief, two squadrons of dragoon guards came sweeping down the gently sloping hill, which they had so bravely defended. The cavalry in a moment burst upon the rebel column, which, for the while, gave way; but, rallying after the first charge, the rebels placed themselves back to back, with their formidable pikes, and in that manner retreated slowly, suffering, comparatively, but small loss from the ill-directed fire of the horsemen's carabines. The cavalry were, unfortunately, exposed to one great disadvantage on that occasion, which was the want of chain-bridles: a grievous omission in their equipment. To the rebel's pike, about a foot below the point, was affixed a small scythe-like blade, which at once hooked and cut the bridles of the cavalry, when unprovided with the chain: thus depriving the rider of all command over his horse. The animal, released from restraint, pursues a wild and dangerous course, leaving the rider at the mercy of the foe. The confusion and loss arising from this circumstance was deplorable. The rebels, having formed a square, proceeded in their retreat in excellent order, although one, and sometimes two, sides of the square were the objects of fierce attack. In this unhurried manner they retired, (exciting the admiration even of their enemies,) until, having reached the boggy ground, where the cavalry could no longer pursue, they poured out their last volley of fire-arms on the dragoons, and, with a loud cheer, took to the mountain.

When safe from pursuit, Edmund despatched one of his officers to the rebel head-quarters, from which he was now separated by a distance of a mile, for some intelligence of the main army. He had been left, for the last half hour, to fight an insulated battle, and knew not the events passing in the centre or right wing; but that the rebels had been driven from the field was but too evident. The remains of that rude army, however, were still, it appeared, in formidable numbers; and, notwithstanding the loss of many thousands, still eager for a renewal of the combat. A large body of the royal army, infantry and cavalry, appeared to be concentrated, as if for a final attack on the rebels, then only half a mile distant: everything indicated a determination to conclude the work of that bloody day, by the extermination of the rebel force, which, in its turn reckless of consequences, madly urged to be led against the enemy. The columns of the royal army advanced to the attack, at which moment it was discovered, that both the commander-in-chief of the rebels, and his second in command, were not to be found! Suspicions of treachery were whispered from rank to rank; a general panic spread around; the rebels, disheartened not so much by the sacrifices of the day, as by the apprehended treason of their leaders, wavered in opinion whether to meet the fresh attack of the royalists, or avoid it by dispersion. Meantime, the disciplined army was gradually ascending the position, unresisted by any efforts on the part of the rebels to check their advance. That their commanders had fled the field was certain; but the rebels did not then know that their flight was to escape the treason of some of their own party, who were purchased over to betray and seize them! Thus it ever was, and ever will be, in Irish conspiracies and rebellions. They apparently cannot, whether in a good or evil cause, be true to each other.

The hesitating rebels met the united attacks of the several royal brigades with dogged resolution; nor did they fly until they inflicted, even at the moment of their defeat, the most deadly vengeance. They neither asked nor gave quarter: the defeat soon became a complete rout. During the remainder of that day, every detached body of the rebel force, as fast as they fell into the hands of the royalists, were put to the sword without mercy. The inhabitants of every house, and even whole villages, in which the rebels had found an hour's shelter, were indiscriminately butchered, and their houses given to the flames! Crowds of trembling fugitives, hurrying from their burning cabins, bearing off their children or aged parents, were swept off the mountain-side by the unceasing fire of the galloper-guns, which were in constant activity. The British officers serving with the army, by whom such horrid modes of warfare had never been witnessed, sought to check this universal, unsparing carnage; but their humane efforts were exerted in vain: the work of blood and massacre went on till night threw its dark veil over the scene of butchery! The feeling of hatred to the name of Catholic and of rebel had been so strongly infused into the minds of the ignorant, unreflecting soldiers, that, with hands once steeped in blood, they knew not when or where to stop. They proved themselves, in the moment of excitement, superior to all control: neither age, nor infancy, beauty, sex, or innocence, could moderate the furious zeal of the blind and bigoted leaders from whom they took their tone! Chapels were fired while their altars smoked with the fresh blood of human victims, who had vainly sought a sanctuary under the crucifix of their God! Can there be a greater proof of the abasement of human nature, when surrendered to the despotism of military government?

Broken down in spirit, and in strength of numbers, the routed rebels sought momentary safety in rapid flight, taking such lines of march as rendered pursuit not only a hopeless, but a dangerous task.

The brigade of the Green Gauntlet, having been the last in the field of battle, had been pursued to the utmost limit pursuit became practicable, and were now enjoying, after a day of toil and danger, an interval of repose, when the unexplained absence of the commander-in-chief and his second in command reached the anxious Edmund. He saw at once the cause was, for the present, lost, and almost sunk under the shock. Without means of subsistence, or ammunition to act in a body, even if there existed any visible rallying point, the dispersion of his band of faithful followers became indispensable for their own sakes. In a country where every bog and mountain furnished hiding places for parties of tens or twenties, during daylight, his brigade could, by night marches, gradually gain their native county undiscovered; but it was with a sinking heart he gave the order. Whatever were their crimes, under the universal madness of the land, and the excitement of their wrongs, they had, in the hour of battle, proved themselves brave, and steady to his banner; and, as the evening sun declined, he saw them depart in scattered groups, under their selected leaders, with feelings of the deepest sorrow. They had fought and bled with a heroism worthy their country's cause; and what was to be their fate? He shuddered at the thought. As their shadows lengthened, and, at last, departed from his view, he sat, with his head sunk on his breast, in deep and sad reflections; from that moment the unhappy wretches must owe their precarious subsistence to plunder!—and of whom? Not the titled landlord, the wealthy squire, or the comfortable Orange yeoman. Alas, no! but of the impoverished, struggling farmer, or the poor, labouring cottier of the mountain or the glen! What crimes might not their desperate state of want and destitution produce? These thoughts cast a shade of deep melancholy over the haggard countenance of the unfortunate Edmund, which the unsubdued friar tried to dissipate. "Never despair, my son," cried he; "the fortune of war is ever capricious: 'tis theirs to-day; the next chance may be ours! Rouse yourself, my Edmund, and let me try my poor skill in surgery on that ugly-looking wound of yours; and then we'll seek a resting-place to pass this fine night in." Descending to the river's edge, the priest washed the wound, which, here freed from the coagulated blood, appeared so slight, that a pledget of rag, filleted on by one of the friar's garters, was found to be a sufficient dressing. They took the precaution to cross the Barrow, in one of the unemployed fishing-cobbles, before nightfall, and then pushed on into the county of Kilkenny. They adopted the safest track, over a desolate and untravelled ridge of mountain, in the barony of Ibercon, on each side of which ran a dark, and apparently interminable, line of bog, bounded only by the horizon. Previously to ascending, the padre drew from his breast-pocket a dram-bottle, containing the scanty remains of his morning store of whisky. He prevailed on Edmund to taste a portion of the cordial; and, having refreshed himself, and offered up a prayer for their safety, boldly led the way. Nearly two hours passed, in almost silent toil, ere they gained the summit of the lofty ridge, when their fatigue called for a further supply of animal comfort. Friar John divided his last morsel of bread and drop of whisky with his beloved Edmund; then, creeping to the sheltered side of a jutting crag, the heavens their canopy, the stars their chamber lights, and the green turf their pillow, they soon fell into that profound repose, which happily proved the death of that day's sorrow.

WHY Miss Landon imagined that she was to die early we cannot tell; but her friend, Mr. Blanchard, had long been pledged to write her Memoirs; and before she left England for Africa, the promise was renewed to Mrs. Maclean. This premature anticipation of Memoirs, "epitaphs and tombs," and literary remains, was in all probability made in mere gaiety of heart. It is at least certain that the literary executor was furnished with few materials for the task that unexpectedly and mournfully devolved upon him. But the pledge had been given, and it is here redeemed; probably to no one's satisfaction, and least of all, we should imagine, to that of the author of the Memoir. It is evident that, as regards those events of Miss Landon's life which most require explanation, Mr. Blanchard has written under feelings of delicacy to certain parties, referred to by L. E. L. under the phrases "the vanity of man," and "a vulgar woman's slanderous tongue," which might have rendered total oblivion the wiser course. The public knew comparatively nothing of the obsolete slanders and gossip which, circulated in London or provincial literary coteries, had embittered the life of a favourite; and at all times speedily forgetting everything that does not immediately interest its passions or its pleasures,—even the fate of its most cherished temporary idols,—it was beginning to lose the remembrance of that startling and lamentable event, the shock of which is renewed by the unsatisfactory discussions started afresh in these volumes. They contain no more intelligible explanation of mysterious facts,—nothing indeed whatever, save much ingenious but unsatisfactory reasoning and pleading, intended to place these mysteries in a clear light. They bring forward nothing new upon which the mind may finally rest, acquiescing in the decree of Heaven. The unfortunate lady's more unfortunate husband, is indeed completely exonerated, (nor can any one who takes the trouble to reflect, conceive how the shadow of blame ever rested upon Mr. George Maclean as connected with the death of his wife;) and it is successfully shown that the natural disposition of L. E. L. was cheerful, gay, and enjoying. She was no more the gloomy, evil-foreboding personage which her early poetry indicated, alternating between the agonies of despair and the torpor of despondency, than the actress who, having thrilled an audience with the woes of Juliet, or the tragic ambitions of Lady Macbeth, rubs the rouge from her cheeks, doffs her stage drapery as the curtain falls, and hastens to share with her friend the gay banquet prepared to celebrate her histrionic triumphs.

But the moral of the life of L. E. L. remains of much more value than the mere fact of her death, the causes of which can never now, in all probability, be satisfactorily cleared up; and which, after all that has been said by Mr. Blanchard and others, best admits of the natural and simple explanation of the coroner's jury—a mistaken dose of medicine, of such power and instantaneous effect as prussic acid.—Her marriage, to cool impartial scrutiny, does not appear to have been very happily assorted, nor contracted on the wisest, and certainly not on the highest motives which, at mature age, may be presumed to lead to matrimonial union; though here, we are bound in candour to say, that sympathy ought in justice to go as strongly with the husband as the wife; and there might have been many petty and trivial annoyances surrounding a domestic position, repugnant to her tastes and habits, and irritating to her temper; but nothing whatever to countenance the darkest and the most unlikely hypothesis that has been started to account for her sudden decease. L. E. L. was one of those who had too much to live for to court death. Her worst trials had been surmounted; she occupied, for the first time, a fixed as well as an honourable place in society; she was deeply attached to her brother, and her friends; the world was smiling upon her; and her literary reputation was yearly increasing in extent and solid worth. Whatever the trifles that might have been annoying in her immediate position at Cape Coast, they could not, as her husband with true appreciation has alleged, be deeply felt by a mind like hers. She was no longer a girl. She had not married for love. She had full occupation in her literary engagements, and daily pursued it, certainly not in the languid spirit of a repining and desponding mind. Her period of exile—if her residence in Africa was so regarded by herself—was to be of no long duration: she was full of aspirations for the future; and to every rational mind it must appear that life could not for many years have been so dear, so full of bright promise, to L. E. L. as at the period when she has been presumed, by a few of the hasty-judging, to have voluntarily forsaken it. Believing, then, that her death was either the result of some fatal chance, or of some purely natural cause, we turn at once to her life, in itself an interesting record of the struggles, the dangers, and the enjoyments of genius,—and pregnant with many lessons, especially to the young and gifted of her own sex.

The father of Miss Landon was descended of a respectable family, at one time settled in and holding landed property in Herefordshire. He was the eldest of the eight children of the Rev. John Landon, Rector of Tedstone, of which the advowson was a family property. This living, together with Tedstone-court and estate, was sold in his lifetime, and the family were left with very slender means.

At an early age, the eldest of them, Miss Landon's father, went to sea, and made, among other voyages, one to South Africa. Ultimately, he settled in London, where, by the interest of his second brother, who, through the patronage of the Duke of Portland, had obtained lucrative church preferment, he became an assistant, and afterwards a partner of the house of Adairs, Army Agents. He then married a lady of a Welsh family, of the name of Bishop, and took up his residence in Hans Place, Chelsea, where, in 1802, his eldest child, Letitia Elizabeth, or L. E. L., was born. Nearly the whole life of Miss Landon was spent on the spot where she was born, either under her father's roof, or that of the successive ladies with whom she afterwards boarded in Hans Place. She appears to have had next to no regular school education. A friend taught her to read, and a cousin in the country seems to have completed her education. For a few months in her sixth year she was sent to a boarding-school almost next door to her father's house, into which "the clever little child" was constantly running. Her father having taken a farm on the borders of Herefordshire, confided it to the superintendence of one of his brothers, and thither the whole family removed. The daughter of the farm-manager, the affectionate cousin, for whose kindness she was ever grateful, became Letitia's governess. She could not, however, be taught anything to which her own inclination did not lead; though books were, as in all similar cases, her early and almost sole delight. She could not be taught music, though she felt and understood its very soul. Learning to write a good hand was fairly given up, and she was left to "dab at pothooks" as she pleased. The French language she acquired with a facility which surprised her teachers, and she continued to read whatever fell in her way. Many years afterwards, when on a visit to the accomplished family of her uncle, the Rev. James Landon, at Aberford, in Yorkshire, she playfully wrote to a friend:—

Partly from the severity of the weather, partly because it is their custom, we live very much to ourselves; but the family circle is, in itself, large and cheerful, and I do not know a more agreeable woman than my aunt. One of my cousins sings exquisitely—the younger ones were sadly distressed at my want of accomplishments. When I first arrived, Julia and Isabel began to cross question me—"Can you play?" "No." "Can you sing?" "No." "Can you speak Italian?" "No." "Can you draw?" "No." At last they came down to, "Can you write and read?" Here I was able to answer to their great relief, "Yes, a little." I believe Julia, in the first warmth of cousinly affection, was going to offer to teach me the alphabet. I have had a very pleasant visit, but I am as constant as ever to London. I would not take five thousand a year to settle down in the country: I miss the new books, the new faces, the new subjects of conversation—and I miss very much the old friends I have left behind. . . . I am growing quite rustic—eating my breakfast, (that is really an undertaking,) walking, and learning to work in worsted. In short, acquiring a taste for innocent pleasures. . . . I am refreshing my Tory principles, and beginning to doubt whether republics, equality, and our old favourites, are not very visionary, and somewhat reprehensible.

The fondest attachment subsisted from their earliest childhood between Miss Landon and her only brother. He was soon all that remained to her, a younger sister having died at the age of thirteen. The anecdotes of their childhood, related by Mr. Landon, are such as might, perhaps, be related of thousands, but they take a new character as indications of the future poetess. She appears to have been a quick-tempered, and perhaps irritable, but an affectionate and generous-hearted child. Even at the earliest years, she seems to have sought no sympathy in the trials and sorrows which she kept to herself, to endure in solitude, and to ponder over in her own heart. A letter to Mr. Blanchard from the governess-cousin thus describes the habits and tendencies of the child of genius in her dawning years. At the age of seven or eight—

She would occupy an hour or two of the evening, amusing her father and mother with accounts of the wonderful castles she had built in her imagination; and when, rambling in the garden in fair weather, she had taken with her, as a companion, a long stick, which she called her measuring stick; she was asked, "What that was for?" her answer would be, "Oh, don't speak to me, I have such a delightful thought in my head." And on she would go talking to herself. There was a little world of happiness within her; and even then, the genius afterwards developed was constantly struggling to break forth.

Mr. Blanchard amplifies this description. As may be affirmed of all genius, he says of hers:—

Her genius seems to have sprung up

Just as the grass grows that sows itself.

We have already seen her, in her cousin's description, pushing what she called her "measuring stick" before her, as she took her daily walk in the garden, and deprecating interruption because she had a "beautiful thought" in her head. And this picture may be filled up by the recollections of her brother, who has known her to be pacing up and down the lime-walk for hours in this way—sometimes talking aloud, sometimes repeating verses, oftener in silent thought—the result of all which exercises would be, at night, a long story, or an account of her intended travels, to which he, more especially, had to listen. And listen he did, patiently for some time; but at last, perhaps he got tired, or annoyed at losing his only playfellow in so unaccountable a way; for a bargain was struck between the children, to the effect that on one day he was to listen while she talked, and on the next she was to adopt his amusements. "On her days," runs the reminiscence, "I had to undergo either the account of 'her island,' that is, of what she would do as another Robinson Crusoe, or some fairy tale or verses of her own composition; or perhaps the battle scene from the 'Lady of the Lake,' for the whole of that poem I think she knew by heart." The listener's patience, after a time, appears to have failed again, for a fresh stipulation was made that the something, whatever it might be, which was to fall from the lips of the eloquent young child, was not to be repeated "more than twice or three times at the most."

The date of her earliest literary composition is not known; but she must have been very young. Her father's voyage to South Africa had early excited her imagination; and the effect was increased by a book which he gave her, bearing the fascinating title of Silvester Tramper, a gentleman who was probably the Peter Parley of former days. He dealt in marvels of all sorts: "antres vast and deserts idle." This long continued the pet among what she called her pleasure books, until both Tramper and Crusoe were fairly supplanted by those compositions she afterwards celebrated, as—

Those Old Tales Arabian,
The Old Arabian Nights!

"Many a weary day," says her brother, "those same Nights occasioned me. I had to hear all!" To these succeeded Cooke's Voyages, in the pages of which truth seemed stranger than fiction. In a charming little book, published by Miss Landon, six or seven years since, and much less known, we imagine, than her poetical works or her romances, some of the incidents of her childhood are related; though the shy melancholy heroine of these childish annals is here stated to be as unlike as possible to the genuine L. E. L., whose character in her younger years this heroine is presumed to represent. The heroine of the little book, "Traits and Trials of Early Life," is, as we think, rather formed on the model of some of Charles Lamb's stories of little girls in the charming Tales of Mrs. Lancaster's School. Her biographer says—

It is certain that so far from being a gloomy child, all who knew her, laugh at such a notion. Now and then, as her cousin remembers, a certain violence of temper would get the better of the young student, and on such occasions her unfortunate books were condemned to take up their abode in different directions; but calmly to replace them, at a word, or even a look of admonition, was enough—"her tears flowed abundantly—she would kneel down and beg God to forgive her." Her temper, says this respected relative, was cheerful and kind; "and she lived only with those who loved her for herself, and wished solely for her good."

"I have told the history of my childhood," wrote L. E. L., concluding the little imaginative sketch of which mention has been made; "childhood which images forth our after life. Even such has been mine—it has but repeated what it learnt from the first, sorrow, beauty, love, and death." In contrast with the romance of this picture, and to clear up all mistakes as to the original melancholy of her nature, we must set before the reader a picture painted in far pleasanter colours, not even admitting that the truth is less poetical than the fiction. He who knew her childish feelings and habits so well, sharing her sports and seeing into her very dreams, gives us this assurance that "up to the age of thirteen, when the family quitted Trevor-park, she was a strong healthy child, a joyous and high-spirited romp. Nor," he proceeds, "was this disposition ever wholly lost. When, indeed, thought began to deepen, and the imagination to unfold, it then only changed to the milder and less childish form of playful wit and social cheerfulness." Such were the early days of the happy L. E. L.; and such, we venture to assert, were the feelings with which, when those days were passed, she commenced her career in the world.

From Trevor Park, the residence of Mr. Landon, in Herefordshire, the family returned to London, and settled in Old Brompton, where they chanced to have for a neighbour, Mr. Jerdan, the editor of The Literary Gazette. Miss Landon's literary tastes had grown with her growth, and like all young persons in the same condition, she scribbled on and on incessantly, until the encouraging "not so bad," and the more dangerous "very clever indeed!" inspired the longing desire to appear in print. Mr. Jerdan was consulted; his fiat was favourable, and the destiny of the young aspirant was fixed for life. In allusion to some compliments paid to her by him in The Literary Gazette, in which her early poems first saw the light, she wrote thus to her cousin—and how thrice-happy, how truly amiable L. E. L. was then! One cannot read, even at this distance of time, the lines of the delighted girl without feeling something like the joyous leaps of her own young heart:—

"DEAR COUSIN,—Are you pleased with me! Am I not happy! 'An elegance of mind peculiarly graceful in a female;'—is not this the praise you would have wished me to obtain! Has all your trouble been thrown
It has always been my most earnest wish to

thing that might prove your time had not been altogether lost. To excel is to show my grateful affection to you. The poem is now entirely finished. I hope you will like 'Adelaide.' I wished to portray a gentle soft character, and to paint in her the most delicate love. I fear her dying of it is a little romantic.

And now, dear cousin, I do so long to be with you, if it were only to show you how amiable I intend being. I will not be passionate; and, as to Elizabeth, I will be so good-natured—I will be to her what you have been to me. . . . I never knew how delightful it was to be at home until I was away. It is all very pleasant to go out for a day or two. I do not mean to say I do not like it, but when it comes to be week upon week and month upon month, (for it is now four months since I saw any of you,) I am heartily tired. . . . I hate to be continually obliged to think of what I must say, for fear of offending some one or other—however, I never had the slightest disagreement with one of them. . . . I believe my aunt thinks me not a little rhodomontade, but it is very excusable at present. I am happy for three things; first, I am so enchanted with Mr. Jerdan's note; secondly, so pleased at having left Clifton; and last, though not least, I am so delighted to think it will not be long before I shall see you all again."

This is a genuine and a charming letter, written at the age of eighteen. Miss Landon's later letters to her literary female friends are in a quite different tone, though, everything considered, wonderfully free from the many affectations and insincerities which usually beset female literary correspondence. We have to regret that not one early letter is found of hers to her brother, and scarcely one to any friend to whom she might be supposed, at all seasons, to lay bare her inmost heart, as in the above letter to her cousin.

On Miss Landon's return to London, her Adelaide, referred to above, was published and inscribed to Mrs. Siddons. It is a tale of "Love, War, and Woe," and made little impression.

Those "Poetical Sketches," to which the magic letters L. E. L. were appended, now appeared regularly in Mr. Jerdan's literary journal, until the initials became a popular and a celebrated name. This was from about 1821 to 1824, when Miss Landon occupied, we should imagine, the entire field as an occasional poetess, Mrs. Hemans being still comparatively little known to the public at large.

Again and again does her biographer disclaim for her, individually, the gloomy, desponding character indicated in her early poetry. Her agony and despair were gentler emanations of the School of Byron; her poems hybrids between the brilliant glowing romance of the Wild Irish Girl, and the darkness and mystery of The Child. They were gaudy but really beautiful if flimsy fabrics, woven in fancy's loom, to suit the then prevailing taste of the verse-market. In analyzing her mental condition at this period, Mr. Blanchard reveals the true secret of her early poetry, though popular at the moment, having made so slight and evanescent an impression; charming the tickled ear, but never stirring the depths of the heart, nor awakening any emotion that the appliance of a scented cambric handkerchief might not allay. A better day was before her.

Mr. Blanchard throws away his pains in proving that her early despairing poetry, her sorrows and agonies, her perpetual allusions to baffled hopes, blighted affections, and broken hearts, were only tricks of the artist. It is somewhat at the expense of the sincerity and the overmastering power of her genius, that he establishes her claim to the possession of practical good sense, in saying—

The pen once out of her hand, there was no more sturdy questioner, not to say repudiator, of her own doctrines, than her own practice. The spectres she had conjured up vanished as the wand dropped from her hand. Five minutes after the composition of some poem full of passionate sorrow, or bitter disappointment and reproach, she would be seen again in the very mood out of which she had been carried by the poetic frenzy that had seized her—a state of mind the most frank, affectionate, and enjoying—self-relying, but equally willing to share in the simple amusements that might be presented, or to employ its own resources for the entertainment of others.

In 1824, The Improvisatrice appeared, from the pen of the same mysterious and forlorn L. E. L., whose wounded spirit and beautiful verse had so long arrested the attention of many readers of poetry, and charmed the young and ardent. The harmless, if not high-minded, tricks of "The Great Unknown," and the dark mysteries of The Byron, or The Lara, or The Manfred, were then in full activity, and "the town" in the best disposition possible to be agreeably cheated by its favourites. This conspired with the real beauty, the true fire and passion of the romantic poem, in raising it to the sudden fame which, but for these adventitious and fortunate circumstances, had probably never soared so high. Miss Landon's vocation was now confirmed; for with fame came fortune, which the straitened circumstances of her family made doubly welcome. Shortly after the publication of that, which though far from being her best, was her most popular work, Miss Landon lost her father, to whom she was deeply attached. Of her mother—the widowed mother of an only and gifted daughter, we learn almost nothing in these memoirs, save that, after the death of Mr. Landon, Miss Landon went to live in a boarding-house, with strangers, of excellent character, but still strangers. For this there may have been the most substantial reasons; but it was almost due to her memory to have stated why the youthful and only daughter forsook her widowed mother, why they were parted at a time when nature and affection should have drawn their mutual ties closer than ever. The cause might have been merely pecuniary, and, if so, what so simple and satisfactory as to say, that they could not afford to keep house together. This estrangement in life, if not in affection, was not improbably at the foundation of those slanderous and calumnious reports, which proved the cause of the only real blight that this good and generous, if hasty or ill-advised, creature ever experienced. It seems to have been her misfortune at starting in life, not to have had the courage to be her true and simple self in her social life any more than in her early poetry. False glare and glitter, the desire of effect, might be too much the aim of both. Of all her friends, Miss Jewsbury appears to have best understood the evils and perils of the position which it was in part Miss Landon's choice to assume, when, with "sad and earnest thoughts" of its miseries and dangers, that considerate friend sung—

Thy life is false and feverish,
It is like a masque to thee ;
When the task and glare is over,
And thou grievest,—come to me.

Alas! the object of this address was already stricken,—already grieving,—braving the world's injustice, like her own perverted Walter Maynard, in a somewhat similar position, but with its envenomed arrows secretly rankling in her proud heart. A plain unvarnished tale would better, as we have said, have served the purpose of vindicating Miss Landon, than the delicate periphrasis which her biographer has employed, if it was held necessary to touch at all upon the painful topics he has discussed, and yet not explained. In this, and in all similar cases, we should say, "Name, name." Tell us who are those malignant creatures, that we may trace the origin of their base motives, and, in detecting, despise them. Miss Landon's anonymous calumniators are represented as of three classes: first, persons who were dispraised in the Literary Gazette, or those whose contributions to that journal were imagined to be rejected through her influence with the editor; secondly, those envious persons who never forgive success; and, lastly, the sheer gossips, who thoughtlessly propagated what the others invented. To the attacks or misrepresentations of the malicious, her unguarded or defying conduct laid her but too open; and it must, with the habits of English society, have had an injurious effect on her reputation, that at so early an age as one or two-and-twenty, she chose to assume an independent position,—to become her own mistress,—to withdraw herself from the guardian care of attached relatives,—and, above all, from the protection of a mother's love and a mother's roof. Now, to all this she may have been compelled by circumstances; but of these we never hear. It is too evident that, at the commencement, and for a considerable period, of her brilliant and not always happy career, she yielded too easily to the sin which frequently besets bright and flattered young persons—the vulgar desire of astonishing—of making people stare—of creating a sensation, no matter at what expense to the true dignity and delicate propriety of a high-minded man or woman. She also fell into the lamentable error of which genius is sometimes justly accused—unwise contempt, real or pretended, for the ordinary rules of life. Something of this is indicated by the following apologetic explanation:—

She was always as careless as a child of set forms and rules for conduct. She had no thought, no concern about the interpretation that was likely to be put upon her words, by at least one out of a score of listeners—it was enough for her that she meant no harm, and that the friends she most valued knew this—perhaps she found a wilful and most dangerous pleasure, sometimes, in making the starers stare yet more widely. She defied suspicion. But to induce her to condescend to be on her guard, to put the slightest restraint upon her speech, correspondence, or actions, simply because self-interest demanded it to save her conduct from misrepresentation, was a task which, so far from any one being able to accomplish, few would, without deliberation, venture to attempt; so quick were her feelings, so lofty her woman's pride, and so keen and all-sufficing her consciousness of right.

When ill tongues were busy with her fame, once of her oldest and best friends—Mrs. Thomson, the wife of Dr. Anthony Todd Thomson—considered it a duty to give her some friendly hints of the current scandals, and for the proper regulation of the conduct of a young and unprotected woman, peculiarly exposed to malicious misrepresentation and malevolent attack. In the painful letter which this lady's delicate and friendly interference drew forth from Miss Landon there are no

Idly-feigned poetic pains ;
No fabled tortures quaint and tame.

It contains the genuine expression of a wounded, indignant, bitter, and suffering spirit. In it she says:—

I think of the treatment I have received until my very soul writhes under the powerlessness of its anger. It is only because I am poor, unprotected, and dependent on popularity, that I am a mark for all the gratuitous insolence and malice of idleness and ill-nature. And I cannot but feel deeply that had I been possessed of rank and opulence, either these remarks had never been made, or if they had, how trivial would their consequence have been to me. I must begin with the only subject—the only thing in the world I really feel an interest in—my writings. It is not vanity when I say, their success is their fault. When my "Improvisatrice" came out, nobody discovered what is now alleged against it. I did not take up a review, a magazine, a newspaper, but if it named my book it was to praise 'the delicacy,' 'the grace,' 'the purity of feminine feeling' it displayed. . . . But success is an offence not to be forgiven. To every petty author, whose works have scarce made his name valuable as an autograph, or whose unsold editions load his bookseller's shelves—I am a subject of envy—and what is envy but a name for hatred! . . .

This is greatly overstrained, but it was all felt at the moment by the writer.

As to the report you named, I know not which is greatest—the absurdity or the malice. Circumstances have made me very much indebted to the gentleman [whose name was coupled with hers,] for much of kindness. I have not had a friend in the world but himself to manage anything of business, whether literary or pecuniary. Your own literary pursuits must have taught you how little, in them, a young woman can do without assistance. Place yourself in my situation. Could you have hunted London for a publisher, endured all the alternate hot and cold water thrown on your exertions; bargained for what sum they might be pleased to give; and, after all, canvassed, examined, nay quarrelled over accounts the most intricate in the world? And again, after success had procured money, what was I to do with it? Though ignorant of business, I must know I could not lock it up in a box. Then, for literary assistance, my proof sheets could not go through the press without revision. Who was to undertake this—I can only call it drudgery—but some one to whom my literary exertions could in return be as valuable as theirs to me! But it is not on this ground that I express my surprise at so cruel a calumny, but actually on that of our slight intercourse. He is in the habit of frequently calling on his way into town, and unless it is on a Sunday afternoon, which is almost his only leisure time for looking over letters, manuscripts, &c., five or ten minutes is the usual time of his visit. We visit in such different circles, that if I except the evening he took Agnes and myself to Miss B——'s, I cannot recal our ever meeting in any one of the round of winter parties. The more I think of my past life, and of my future prospects, the more dreary do they seem. I have known little else than privation, disappointment, unkindness, and harassment; from the time I was fifteen, my life has been one continual struggle in some shape or another against absolute poverty, and I must say, not a tithe of my profits have I ever expended on myself. And here I cannot but allude to the remarks on my dress. It is easy for those whose only trouble on that head is change, to find fault with one who never in her life knew what it was to have two new dresses at a time. No one knows but myself what I have had to contend with—but this is what I have no right to trouble you with."

These were her real feelings expressed to a real friend. Her acquaintances knew nothing of them; the world saw no change in her; for in no one respect could she be persuaded to put a curb upon her high spirits, to substitute reflection for impulse, or to set a guard over the free expression of her thoughts and opinions. She could not, however, at this time, surmise the whole baseness of the scandal. The knowledge of it was reserved for after years, when, her life and manners continuing what they had ever been, but the evil report never utterly silenced, it was discovered that a silent disdain of calumny is not always the best wisdom in the slandered; nor a reliance upon time and innocence for justice, the truest delicacy in an adviser. It was L. E. L.'s fate to suffer deeply during many after years of her life, from her own high-minded indifference to false reports, and her resolution to wear no false manner at any time.

This was in the year 1826. In the same year Miss Landon made a visit to her uncle in the north. In her correspondence with Mrs. Thomson, at this time, she expresses herself naturally and frankly, yet not by any means in a style which may lead one to fancy that the trade of literature, when at its best, can be an enviable one for a young woman.

For ten succeeding years she kept writing on and on—poems, romances, and endless contributions to Magazines and Annuals. One of the latter—and it is among the best of the family, Fisher's Drawing-Room Scrap-Book—originated with her, and was, until her departure for Africa, under her sole superintendence. She was also an occasional, and, it appears, a very good-natured, if not a downright flatterer in the columns of the Literary Gazette and Court Journal. She could now, in common phrase, "turn her hand to any job that offered," and derived a considerable income from her facile pen.

Yet L. E. L. did not, therefore, become rich; though much of her literary labour was productive, she never knew how to hoard; and those she loved and respected always shared in her good fortune—it was in her troubles only that she allowed no one, if she could help it, to be a participator. The death of her father had but served to strengthen those maternal claims which (though even here calumny did not spare her) she ever esteemed sacred; nor could she forget that her brother, younger than herself, was equally destitute of parental aid; and, although he had been sent to Oxford by his uncle, there were still wants, which it was one of the delights of her existence to supply, as it is the affectionate pride of his (he wishes this to be said) to remember and acknowledge it.

During all this time, she continued to live with ladies of the name of Lance, and afterwards with their successors, in Hans Place. Her ordinary habits of life and of study are of far more interest than those ill-understood slanders which pursued her to the end. She was about thirty when this sketch is given:—

Nobody who might happen to see her for the first time about this period, enjoying the little quiet dance, (of which she was fond,) or the snug corner of the room where the little lively discussion (which she liked still better) was going on, could possibly have traced in her one feature of the Sentimentalist which popular error reputed her to be. The listener might only hear her running on from subject to subject, and lighting up each with a wit never ill-natured, and often brilliant—scattering quotations as thick as hail—opinions as wild as the winds—defying fair argument to keep pace with her, and fairly talking herself out of breath. He would most probably hear from her lips many a pointed and sparkling aphorism, the wittiest things of the night, let who might be around her—he would be surprised, pleased; but his heroine of song, as painted by anticipation, he would be unable to discover. He would see her looking younger than she really was; and, perhaps, struck by her animated air, her expressive face, and her slight but elegant figure, his impression would at once find utterance in the exclamation which a year or two afterwards escaped from the lips of the Ettrick Shepherd, on being first presented to her whose romantic fancies had often charmed him in the wild mountains—"Hey! but I did na think ye'd been sae bonnie!"—staring at the same time with all a poet's capacity of eye.

Mrs. Hall's recollection of the scene, which took place at her house, is, that he said, taking L. E. L.'s hand, and looking earnestly in her face—"Oh dear! I ha' written and thought many a bitter thing about ye, but I'll do sae na mair; I did na think ye'd been sae bonny."

Either Mrs. Hall's recollection is at fault, or the Shepherd surely accused himself without cause. When did he write or think bitter things of any one?

A female friend has supplied Mr. Blanchard with this picture of the interior of L. E. L.'s study:—

Perhaps, to the L. E. L. of whom so many nonsensical things have been said—as "that she should write with a crystal pen dipped in dew upon silver paper, and use for pounce the dust of a butterfly's wing," a dilettante of literature would assign, for the scene of her authorship, a fairy-like boudoir, with rose-coloured and silver hangings, fitted with all the luxuries of a fastidious taste. How did the reality agree with this fancy sketch! Miss Landon's drawing-room, indeed, was prettily furnished, but it was her invariable habit to write in her bed-room. I see it now, that homely-looking, almost uncomfortable room, fronting the street, and barely furnished—with a simple white bed, at the foot of which was a small, old, oblong-shaped sort of dressing-table, quite covered with a common worn writing-desk heaped with papers, while some strewed the ground, the table being too small for aught besides the desk; a little high-backed cane-chair which gave you any idea rather than that of comfort—a few books scattered about completed the author's paraphernalia.

A lively rambling letter, not overcharged with thought, is next cited, as giving a perfect idea of the style of her conversation. Many clever and smart things, and some things better than clever, do occur in her correspondence, as this:—

The principal event, in my late monotonous existence, has been going to see Apsley House, which is fitted up with even more good taste than splendour. There are many portraits of Napoleon, one by David, the most speaking likeness that ever was seen. Indeed, the whole house is a most interesting chapter in the History of England, and the blinds are the morgue!

The windows had been blocked up at this time to protect them from the attacks of the mob during the agitation of the Reform Bill.

With advancing years, Miss Landon's writings improved in every respect. She has often been praised for the correction of her faults of style, for studying greater concentration, and lopping off her early if not ungraceful redundancies. But her later writings deserve the higher praise of giving striking evidence of deepening thought, of enlarged views of life, and of the awakening or regeneration of the moral feelings.

In 1834, she made a visit to Paris, from whence her letters are of no particular interest. They seem written mainly to show her female friends that she remembered them. The same remark applies to her daily bulletins, of which, it seems, she wrote a great many to different persons, to tell off-hand whatever, particularly in books and periodical works, struck her fancy; though she made no confidences, so far as is seen, to any one, of anything that profoundly affected her heart or her prospects. In 1837, an important crisis in her life arose: she was engaged to be married; but though eleven years had now elapsed, the early scandal was again revived, to blast her dearest hopes.

This fact is stated plainly enough, yet we are left in doubt why such painful consequences should have followed so inadequate a cause, as the revival of a stale and despised slanderous tale. The affair is thus alluded to:—

Into the particular circumstances that led to an inquiry, at this period, and after the lapse of years, relative to the origin and diffusion of the scandal of which she had been the object, it is hardly necessary to enter at any length. Enough if it be here stated, that between herself and a gentleman with whom it had been for some time a pleasure to her to correspond and to converse, a literary intimacy and interchange of intellectual sentiment had ripened (as it was conjectured among their friends) into a closer and tenderer sympathy. Rumour connected their names, as names that were never again to be sundered; and a confirmation of the report that "L. E. L." would soon cease to be the designation of the literary favourite of the public, was anticipated by many. Perhaps it was this rumour of her intended marriage that revived in some quarters the recollection of the old slander, and reanimated prejudice against her. It is, at all events certain, that a resolution was, at this time, formed by two or three of her friends, to force the false speakers to speak out—to trace the report, if possible, to its foul beginning—and compel an acknowledgment of its infamy from those who had idly or maliciously contributed to give circulation to it. The correspondence ended, in the satisfaction of all who were parties to it, (men of opposite tempers and characters,) that the falsehood was as vile as its fabrication was obscure. . . . It was at her own demand that the correspondence was entered upon; although the shock occasioned by the bare thought of being made an object of inquiry consigned her to a bed of sickness.

One might have hoped that this painful matter was now for ever at an end; but it was not. There were persons still doubtful of her conduct, or eager to keep malicious stories in circulation. Something of this kind seems to have been told Miss Landon by her friend and physician—idly as the uninformed must surmise, since no apparent good end could be gained by Dr. Thomson telling his distressed patient what false tales, impossible to be refuted, were propagated concerning her. His communication drew forth the following painful letter to Mrs. Thomson, ten years after the date of that addressed to the same lady, and quoted above:—

Dr. Thomson tells me of your kindly resenting the invidious remarks of which I was made the object.

I will not thank you for what was only justice, but I do thank you for the spirit in which it was done. For such calumnies my own feeling is, the most utter disdain and disgust. My only answer is an appeal to every one who knows anything about me. Pardon me if there appear anything like self-ostentation, when I say I believe there are very few left to themselves, pressed by many difficulties on the one hand, and surrounded by every sort of flattery on the other, that would have acted, as I can fearlessly say I have done. What has my life been? one, quiet, very laborious, and inoffensive. I never have had a friend but what I made for myself, and I am not aware that I ever lost one through anything they ever saw reprehensible in my conduct. Who are my most intimate friends? those who have been such for years, and who have had the most constant opportunities of knowing me. I ask no one to take anything for granted, or only on my own assertion. I have lived all my life since childhood with the same people. The Misses Lance were strict, scrupulous, and particular; moreover, from having kept a school so long, with habits of even minute observation. The affection they feel for me could scarcely be undeserved. I would desire nothing more than to refer to their opinion. Since then I have resided with Mrs. Sheldon, a lady prejudiced against me in the first instance; but what is her feeling now that I have lived with her for two years? That of affection almost as if I were a child of her own. What is also my actual position at this moment? Every day my acquaintance is courted; scarce a post but brings me a letter of admiration and kindness. My very correspondence during the late election* is, perhaps, the most gratifying collection of cordial testimonials of respect to myself that was ever addressed to an individual. That I am the object often of malicious misrepresentation, or rather invention, is true; but it is not the public, it is not the general feeling. I can understand that success must bear the penalty of envy: but it is those who know nothing about me, or my habits, who are bitter against me.

Take the very gentleman who permitted himself to ask a question the other night; what did he know about me? . . . God knows my path has been a very hard one! What constant labour, what unceasing anxiety! yet I never felt dejected till lately. But now I feel every day my mind and my spirits giving way; a deeper shade of despondency gathers upon me. I enter upon my usual employments with such disrelish; I feel so weary—so depressed; half my time so incapable of composition; my imagination is filled with painful and present images.

The result was the breaking off her marriage by her own act, urged by a scrupulous sense of duty and honour. This, the most important and painful act of her life, up to that moment, is thus detailed; though we must confess, that if the whole facts are before us, we cannot view the conduct of the other party to the engagement in the same indulgent light with Mr. Blanchard. The inevitable conclusion is, that the gentleman was not very difficult to persuade; that he had shown no very active or determined opposition to the generous and rash proceeding, which involved consequences so disastrous to the object of his attachment and choice. We are, however, perhaps unqualified to judge, left as we are in the dark as to the immediate and urgent necessity which drew forth this most painful communication to an affianced lover, or if there was anything afloat more than the contemptible stale slander and tattle alluded to in the letter to Mrs. Thomson:—

The severity of the shock she underwent, and the extent of the self-sacrifice she deemed herself called upon by duty to make, may be inferred from the following letter addressed to him, with whom the contemplated union had now, she felt, become impossible. The hand-

* This reference is to the election of her brother, in 1836, to an office which he resigned immediately after her death. It was Sir Robert Peel's observation, on giving his vote, that "he was happy to mark his sense of Miss Landon's character and talents by voting for her brother."

writing gives painful evidence of the agitation of mind and weakness of body amidst which it was composed. Its insertion is permitted here, at the request of her surviving relative, and of the writer to whom she confided the trust of doing justice to her memory. It must be received as the only explanation that can be offered of the feelings by which she was animated, and of the grounds on which she decided.

"I have already written to you two notes which I fear you could scarcely read or understand. I am to-day sitting up for an hour, and though strictly forbidden to write, it will be the least evil. I wish I could send you my inmost soul to read, for I feel at this moment the utter powerlessness of words. I have suffered for the last three days a degree of torture that made Dr. Thomson say, 'you have an idea of what the rack is now.' It was nothing to what I suffered from my own feelings. I look back on my whole life—I can find nothing to justify my being the object of such pain—but this is not what I meant to say. Again I repeat, that I will not allow you to consider yourself bound to me by any possible tie. To any friend to whom you may have stated our engagement, I cannot object to your stating the truth. Do every justice to your own kind and generous conduct. I am placed in a most cruel and difficult position. Give me the satisfaction of, as far as rests with myself, having nothing to reproach myself with. The more I think, the more I feel I ought not—I cannot—allow you—to unite yourself with one accused of—I cannot write it. The mere suspicion is dreadful as death. Were it stated as a fact, that might be disproved; were it a difficulty of any other kind; I might say, look back at every action of my life—ask every friend I have: but what answer can I give, or what security have I against the assertion of a man's vanity, or the slander of a vulgar woman's tongue! I feel that to give up all idea of a near and dear connexion, is as much my duty to myself as to you. Why should you be exposed to the annoyance—the mortification of having the name of the woman you honour with your regard, coupled with insolent insinuation!—you never would bear it.

"I have just received your notes. God bless you—but—

"After Monday I shall, I hope, be visible; at present it is impossible. My complaint is inflammation of the liver, and I am ordered complete repose, as if it were possible! Can you read this! Under any circumstances, the "Most grateful and affectionate of your friends,

The conduct of the gentleman to whom this letter was addressed, was throughout, and in every respect, worthy of the honourable appreciation it obtained, and of her who could thus feel and act towards him.

While forming this resolution upon principle, L. E. L. did not foresee that the impossibility of explaining her conduct to all who might hear of the dissolution of an engagement generally presumed to exist, was likely to expose her to the most mortifying and fatal misconception. The knowledge of the effect could carry with it no possible revelation of the cause. All that could be known beyond the small circle of her confidential friends was, that a correspondence had taken place with a view to the discovery of her traducer, and that it had terminated in the sudden breaking off of a connexion of which the permanence seemed assured, and to which the marriage-seal was about to be affixed. The inference was much too fair for spite and ill-nature to miss.

This occurred in 1837, and, in the previous year, Miss Landon had first met with her future husband, Mr. George Maclean, at the house of a mutual acquaintance. The generosity, the high strain of honour which dictated the breaking off of her first engagement, it is much easier to appreciate than the sudden formation of another connexion, with little to recommend it to her, so far as the world can judge, even when Mr. Blanchard has kindly made the best of it:—

In point of years there was no great disparity between the new acquaintances; and, although in general tastes they were little assimilated, and in manners still less so, as everybody must at once have noticed, there was at least one subject of deep interest to both, one ready topic of delightful conversation—African habits, African horrors, and African wonders—the sea, the coast, the desert, the climate, and the people. Even as a child such themes had attractions for her, and where they were descanted on she was a child still. We can imagine L. E. L. as "seriously inclining" to listen to whatever might be said on such subjects, as the "gentle Lady," afterwards "married to the Moor," might hearken to the travel's history that charmed her, and to tales of antres vast and deserts idle. They met frequently; and as her respect for Mr. Maclean increased with the discovery of the zeal with which he had devoted himself to the interests of the colony he presided over, and the estimation in which he was held by the South African Company, so his admiration of her grew daily under the spell of her artless manners and brilliant conversation. The result was, after an intimacy of no long duration, the offer of his hand—and its acceptance!

Her friends heard with surprise the determination she had come to; indeed her consenting to take such a step seemed inexplicable, when it appeared that Mr. Maclean meditated resuming his official appointment at Cape Coast castle, and that her marriage would be speedily followed by her departure from the shores of England. On what shores to find a home! To the husband such a change must be a magical one. What transition from gloom to gaiety, from cold and darkness to sunshine, could equal the possession of such a companion in the eyes of one accustomed to a total deprivation of the society of European women. But to the wife—what a contrast!

It must here be observed, however, that, at the moment when, after a brief deliberation, L. E. L. accepted the offer of Mr. Maclean's hand, she had no reason to contemplate the surrender of a home in this country as the condition of her becoming a wife. The necessity of a voyage to Cape Coast, and a stay of some continuance, was mentioned no great while subsequent to her engagement to Mr. Maclean, and after much serious discussion it was courageously assented to. . . . The attachment between the affianced parties had one characteristic of true love—its course did not run smooth. Doubts as to the prudence of the marriage, in a worldly, or in a pecuniary point of view, arose among some of Mr. Maclean's friends. His family always expressed the highest possible sense of Miss Landon's worth, and took a just pride in her literary reputation. Respect for her virtues might, and no doubt did, suggest dissuaves; for any alliance, with a conditional residence at Cape Coast, must have been deemed, to the last degree, unpropitious. It is certain that during Mr. Maclean's absence in Scotland, in the summer of 1837, it appeared doubtful whether the marriage would take place, nor did her health promise well, at that season, for her capability to undertake a long voyage, and settle, with the smallest chance of safety, in so horrible a climate.

When these difficulties had been surmounted, fresh obstacles arose, but now on the opposite side. It was confidently affirmed that Mr. Maclean had living a native wife! To his honour be it told, this gentleman had ever treated the calumnious stories which had recently broken off Miss Landon's marriage with utter contempt; and she repaid the generosity by at once accepting his natural and truthful explanation of a connexion much more common in our colonies than praiseworthy. Whatever were the lady's blended motives in forming this union, there is little doubt that genuine love and admiration, with perhaps the seasoning of a young man's pardonable vanity, led the Governor of Cape Coast castle to woo the Child of the Muse; and among the affectionate admirers of L. E. L., his conduct will ever contrast favourably with that of the lover, whoever he may be, who took her at her hasty word, and agreed that their engagement should cease, let the consequences to her happiness and fame be what they might. This strain of generosity could not have been lost on its object; and, besides, whatever might have been objectionable in her intended husband, she was now, in her own opinion, too far committed in the world's eyes to recede with honour.

The rumour of her intended marriage was widely spread. Preparations for it were not only in progress, but were actually far advanced; and, if destined to take place at all, it must take place within a very short time. The matter, notwithstanding, did not long remain with any exciting effect upon her mind. The subject was dismissed as soon as might be from recollection, as one scarcely worthy to be ranked among the many serious considerations which the meditated change so constantly presented.

To all other anxieties and sufferings must be super-added a dread lest the breaking off of this marriage-contract on the eve of its ratification, should have the cruel effect which she had anticipated from a similar event previously—that of appearing, in the false judgment of strangers who could not possibly know the real circumstances of the case, to throw some momentary colour of credit upon the tales of slanderers. This old familiar thought occasioned her far more pain than any fear of consequences likely to ensue from the bygone domestic arrangements of her intended husband.

There is confusion in dates at this time, which suggests unfavourable surmises. The date of the letter to Mrs. Thomson is June, 1837, immediately after which, the reader is led to think that Miss Landon's first engagement was broken off by herself. But her acquaintance with Mr. Maclean commenced in 1836, and we are told that he soon made her an offer of his hand. The courtship must, at all events, have been going on in 1837. While he was in Scotland in the summer of that year, a season of misery to her, it "appeared doubtful whether the marriage would take place," though, when he returned to London in the autumn, "it became apparent that the engagement had not been broken off." How can these dates be reconciled, without the idea being suggested, that Miss Landon had not been quite "off with old love before she was on with the new,"—that "she had two strings to her bow," and a pisaller in the young romantic Governor of Cape Coast. There is certainly confusion of dates, as they appear in the Memoir, but the facts are these, and they require explanation. By the beginning of 1838, "Ethel Churchill" had been published, and was warmly received; and the health of the author was restored, and also her good spirits. Her marriage was now in no distant prospect:—

The coming event, however, joyous as its character should be, cast a gloomy shadow before; for, as often as it was thought of, came the dark outline of the wild and far-off coast to which the summer months must see her voyaging. But at length the time was approaching when it would be necessary for Mr. Maclean to set sail for the scene of his official duties; and, with the arrival of that season, came the marriage-morning—the 7th of June, 1838. The affair, however, was a secret; Mr. Maclean's wishes being strongly expressed for a private wedding. Few, indeed, of the closest friends on either side knew anything of the event, until a fortnight after it had occurred. L. E. L. was married to Mr. Maclean at St. Mary's, Bryanstone-square; the marriage-ceremony being performed by her brother, the Rev. W. H. Landon. The bride was given away by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, whose genius she admired, whose friendly sympathy she had long enjoyed, and whose good opinion she ever highly prized. After a few days spent out of town, the marriage was publicly announced; and Mr. and Mrs. Maclean returned to the house of their hospitable friends, where they remained until it became necessary to repair to Portsmouth.

The vessel was expected to sail by the end of the month, and various arrangements for the happiness of others (ever that on which her own depended) remained to be concluded. Her thoughts were especially directed to provisions necessary to her mother's comfort, and her efforts were not unsuccessfully employed. An engagement with Mr. Colburn for another novel, and contributions to his magazine—that with Mr. Heath, relative to the Female Characters of Scott—and the hope of some success for her tragedy—partially removed her anxiety on the score of those to whom her exertions had hitherto been necessary. Of the "Drawing-room Scrap-book" it was not so easy to retain the editorship; about this she was to the last exceedingly anxious; and this anxiety is referred to here, that the reader may perceive how she had calculated on continuing her literary exertions during the time she should be away, and how she allowed herself no rest while she had a duty to others to discharge. Each of these engagements, in her new position in life, would help her to accomplish one of the first wishes of her heart. "How much shall I write in three years!" was her exclamation to us;—for it should be stated, that her stay in Africa was expressly limited to three years, unless her own choice, at the end of that term, decided otherwise. It must also be observed, that her husband left all her literary arrangements, and the income arising from them, entirely in her own hands. She was unshackled by any stipulation whatever.

This feeling of independence, and the hope founded on it of ensuring independence to another, gave no slight colouring of happiness to her future prospects. There still remained some nervous fears about the climate, (discovered to be, in her case, groundless on her arrival,) but these were checked, as much as possible, by the reflection that she should be free to return in three years. About to part, she felt at peace with all, and enjoyed the confidence that her character would outlive all calumnies. To this must be added, the comfort derived from the reflection, that not one word had been uttered to her prejudice up to this hour that was not distinctly known to her husband. With every calumny, every report, "however cruel and untrue," (to use her own expression,) Mr. Maclean had been made acquainted; there was no concealment of anything on her side; and, on his, just as little concealment of the honourable spirit in which he disregarded scandal.

In the end of June, she sailed for Cape Coast, which she reached in August. Her affectionate brother has given a detail of the most minute particulars of her last days and hours in England. Her last minutes were devoted to writing short farewell notes to her numerous acquaintances and friends. Mr. Landon concludes:—

This was the last I saw of a sister, endeared to me by every tie of grateful affection; of affection never, that I know of, broken for an hour. Many will be ready to give assurance of the private worth, the frank and confiding generosity of her disposition, but to this no one can be a surer witness, or with deeper reason, than myself. In the purposes to which she devoted the fruits of her laborious life, self was ever forgotten, and her industry, I believe, to have been unparalleled. Others are far better able than I am to speak of her as L. E. L., but my anxious testimony to the genuine goodness of her heart will not, I trust, be thought out of place; for, indeed, it springs not from any fond partiality, but is based upon the experience of my life. In childhood, and in after years, in every vicissitude of fortune, both when under severe family trials, she was gaining the rewards of literature, or when amid her success she had to pay the penalties which a woman hazards when she passes beyond the pale of private life, she was still the same—unselfish, high-minded, affectionate.

Her letters to her brother, and to her friend Mrs. Thomson, written during the few weeks of her residence in her African home, breathe content and unaffected cheerfulness, though they are not materially different from those letters to other friends which appeared in the newspapers at the time of her death. The most cheerful and confiding of these letters were written on the day immediately preceding her death—the 13th of October, 1838. For that lamented event, two new hypotheses are here started, the first by Mr. Blanchard, the next by a physician. She had long been troubled with small abscesses continually forming in her ears, and was complaining of this, and of intense face-ache, in some of the last letters she ever wrote. Mr. Blanchard suggests that one of these abscesses may have burst internally, and by causing suffusion on the brain, have occasioned her sudden death; while the medical gentleman hazards the probable conjecture, that to allay the pain of the face-ache, she might have topically applied some of the Prussic acid, which, together with what she had taken to alleviate spasm, may have produced the catastrophe; or that the rubbing might of itself have proved immediately fatal. Her health was in a very precarious state even before she left England, where she had been liable to sudden deadly fainting fits, resembling death; and she must have been further enfeebled by close attention, in watching her husband during his illness. But it is idle to pursue further what must, in all likelihood, for ever remain an impenetrable mystery. The probability, after all, is, that she died from an overdose of a dangerous medicine, either taken inwardly, or applied topically, or both: yet her death may have been caused by other natural causes suggested; or she may have fallen a victim to the impassioned jealousy, and burning, ill-directed revenge of some wronged and discarded rival. Each of these causes is tenable; though there is no shadow of probability for the suspicion of suicide. Miss Landon had sustained, bravely and alone, many worse trials to a woman of keen sensibilities, than those to which she was then exposed, let her petty annoyances, or her husband's indolence or neglect of her be construed in the darkest light possible.

Mr. Blanchard's estimate of her character and disposition, if warm and eulogistic, is no more than the reader, softened by the remembrance of her painful fate, is inclined to sympathize with. His estimate of her genius, and of her successive works, is more discriminating if not more just.

The Memoir concludes with the first volume. The second consists of Literary Remains. These are a Tragedy, entitled Castruccio Castrucani; or, The Triumph of Lucca; which was probably intended for the stage, and which appears to have been submitted to the critical judgment of Sir E. Bulwer. Its chief merit lies in its "love passages," and the charming character of the tender and devoted Claricha, the beloved of Castruccio.

The (Scott) Female Portrait Gallery forms another portion of the Remains, and is partly new, and in part reprinted, from, we believe, the New Monthly Magazine. The sketches are short and slight, but written with a delicate perception of at least the outward bearings of the respective Waverley romances and their heroines. The poems (among Miss Landon's finest) entitled, Subjects for Pictures; the collected mottoes (impressive fragments all of them) to the chapters of Ethel Churchill; and a number of early miscellaneous verses, conclude the volume of Remains. From the remarks on Diana Vernon, and Rebecca the Jewess, we obtain some insight into the secret heart of L. E. L.; such as she was when, taught by adversity and experience, she looked back upon her own life. Of Diana, she says:—

Diana Vernon is a creature formed by no conventional rules; she has been educated by her own heart, amid hardships and difficulties; and if nature has but given her the original good impulse and strength of mind to work it out, hardships and difficulties will only serve to form a character of the loftiest order. . . . Take the life of girls in general; how are they cared for from their youth upwards? The nurse, the school, the home circle environ their early years: they know nothing of real difficulties or of real cares; and there is an old saying, that a woman's education begins after she is married. Truly it does, if education be meant to apply to the actual purposes of life. How different is the lot of a girl, condemned from childhood upwards to struggle in this wide world! Bitter, indeed, is the fruit of the tree of knowledge to her; at the expense of how many kind and beautiful feelings must that knowledge be obtained; how often will the confidence be betrayed, and the affection misplaced; how often will the aching heart turn on itself for comfort, and in vain; how often will the right and the expedient contend together, while the faults of others seem to justify our own, and the low but distinct voice within us be half lost, while listening to the sophistry of temptation justifying itself by example; yet how many highly support the trial, while they have learned of difficulties to use the mental strength which overcomes them, and have been taught, by errors, to rely more decidedly on the instinctive sense of right, which at once shrinks from their admission.

Miss Landon's painful experience of life, must also have dictated the following remarks on the differing characters and lots of women. They are suggested by the character of the placid and fortunate Rowena, and that of the high-souled Jewess, Rebecca.

It is [she says] the Rebeccas, not the Rowenas, who go forth in the solitude of the heart. How often, amid those who seem in our masquerade world to be clothed in smiles, and who hold no discourse save on "familiar matters of the day," should we find one whose sufferings might startle us,

"Could we put aside

The mask and mantle worn by pride?"

How different would the real character be from the assumed; how little do the most intimate know of each other; but the difference which the stranger might discover is nothing to that which we trace in ourselves. . . . To the generous, the affectionate, and the high-minded, these lessons are taught more bitterly than to the calmer, colder, and more selfish temperament. But to those who spring forth into life—love in the heart, and that heart on the lips, bitter is the teaching of experience. How has the eager kindness been repaid by ingratitude: affection has been bestowed and neglected, trust repaid by treachery, and last and worst complained, by whom have we been beloved even as we have loved!"

Such fragments of thought as the above show more of the inward heart of the writer, than many pages of biography, or of what are, by courtesy, termed familiar and confidential letters.

As the best specimen of the new poetry which we can find in the two volumes, we select the subjoined lines, addressed to some true and truly valued maternal friend. They are not imaginative, they are not overstrained, highflown, or romantic; but they breathe the warm and natural sentiments of an affectionate, grateful, and hopeful, though time-taught spirit, and give us everything to hope for the future happiness of the subdued and chastened writer. The world-imposed "task" was happily ended; the "false and feverish" condition of being surmounted, and the prospect of the future rising, if distantly, yet bright and clear, in steadfast if sober hues, when L. E. L. wrote these affectionate verses, on leaving England:—

TO MRS. ———.

My own kind friend, long years may pass
Ere thou and I shall meet,
Long years may pass ere I again
Shall sit beside thy feet.

My favourite place!—I could look up,
And meet in weal or woe
The kindest looks I ever knew—
That I shall ever know.

How many hours have pass'd away
In that accustom'd place,
Thy answer lighting, ere it came,
That kind and thoughtful face!

How many sorrows, many cares,
Have sought thee like a shrine!
Thoughts that have shunn'd all other thoughts,
Were trusted safe to thine.

How patient, and how kind thou wert!
How gentle in thy words!
Never a harsh one came to mar
The spirit's tender chords.

In hours of bitter suffering,
Thy low, sweet voice was near;
And every day it grew more kind,
And every day more dear.

The bitter feelings were assuaged,
The angry were subdued,
Ever thy gentle influence
Call'd back my better mood.

Am I too happy now?—I feel Sometimes as if I were;
The future that before me lies
Has many an unknown care.

I cannot choose but marvel too,
That this new love can be
More powerful within my heart,
Than what I feel for thee.

Didst thou, thyself, once feel such love
So strong within the mind,
That for its sake thou wert content
To leave all else behind?

And yet I do not love thee less—
I even love thee more;
I ask thy blessing, ere I go
Far from my native shore!

How often shall I think of thee,
In many a future scene!
How can affection ever be
To me, what thine has been?

How many words, scarce noticed now,
Will rise upon my heart,
Touch'd with a deeper tenderness,
When we are far apart!

I do not say, forget me not,
For thou wilt not forget;
Nor do I say, regret me not,
I know thou wilt regret.

And bitterly shall I regret
The friend I leave behind,
I shall not find another friend
So careful and so kind.

I met thee when my childish thoughts
Were fresh from childhood's hours,
That pleasant April time of life,
Half fancies and half flowers.

Since then how many a change and shade,
In life's web have been wrought!
Change has in every feeling been,
And change in every thought.

But there has been no change in thee,
Since to thy feet I came,
In joy or sorrow's confidence,
And still thou wert the same.

Farewell, my own beloved friend!
A few years soon pass by;
And the heart makes its own sweet home
Beneath a stranger sky.

A home of old remembrances
Where old affections dwell;
While Hope, that looks to other days,
Soothes even this farewell.

Strong is the omen at my heart,
That we again shall meet;
God bless thee, till I take, once more,
My own place at thy feet!

CORN LAWS.—WORKING OF THE SLIDING SCALE.

BY A CORN MERCHANT.

As long disquisitions are at all times tiresome, and often defeat the object they were intended to promote, I shall endeavour to keep myself within moderate bounds.

In commencing these remarks upon the Corn Laws, I think a few words in explanation of the manner of their working may not be misplaced. The duties are regulated by the aggregate of six weeks' general averages, compiled from the returns of one hundred and fifty towns in England; these returns are made up from the sales of British grain. In London the seller is the person required to give in this return; in all other places it is the duty of the buyer. Each week a fresh average is added to the six, the earliest of which is struck off; by this means, a constant variation in the aggregate is effected. When the wheat aggregate arrives at sixty-six shillings per quarter, the duty, which only receded previously at the rate of one shilling per quarter as the average rose a corresponding sum, for the next two shillings advance, declines two shillings upon each shilling; for the succeeding two shillings, the duty declines three shillings for each shilling; and then four shillings for one the price advances; until it reaches seventy-three shillings per quarter, when the duty becomes one shilling per quarter; which duty does not vary, however high the averages may go.

The object of this law seems to have been to protect the landowners against very low prices, while, by allowing foreign grain to come in, it prevented them obtaining very exorbitant rates: that it has not had this effect, I think, has been proved, and will be disputed by no one. My object in writing this letter, is to exhibit the various means by which the speculator renders these laws subservient to his own ends. Before entering upon my subject, permit me to say a word or two upon an article hitherto unnoticed by writers on the Corn Laws: I refer to oats, upon which the duty only sinks to its minimum point when the aggregate reaches the enormous price of thirty-one shillings per quarter; such has been the effect of this high figure upon the duty, that, until this year, a lower one than four shillings and ninepence per quarter has never been paid, and it has only (I believe) twice reached that sum since the law was brought into operation.

But to return to the manner in which these laws are made void, I shall endeavour to explain the practices which have been resorted to lately, to a greater extent than in former times. In the first place, the averages may be affected by the holder of bonded corn buying or selling English wheat, say of sixty lbs. per bushel made up to sixty-three lbs.; each additional lb. per bushel being worth about one shilling per quarter; he may also obtain a higher price by delivering it at a distance, which, in many instances, costs between three and four shillings per quarter. Sales may also be made at very high rates, the seller agreeing to return a large sum in the shape of allowance or discount. He may also materially alter the averages by buying up all the low-priced and inferior samples without making returns of such purchases, and so keep them out of the market altogether. But these are only some of the minor and more innocent evasions in use. I now come to treat of fictitious, that is, entirely fictitious sales. The following conversation, of which I was an ear-witness, will explain, better than I can, the system of making "Duty Sales." I do not use the exact words, but give the substance.

A, B, C, and D, were all holders of bonded wheat to a large amount. On the market, A came to B and addressed him thus:—

"B, you are a large holder of bonded wheat as well as myself: now, I have six hundred quarters of very fine English wheat, which you must buy of me at seventy-five shillings per quarter."

B replied, "Well, you know, I cannot take the wheat at that money; but, however, I will buy it of you upon this condition,—that if I do not like my bargain, you will take it off my hands again; for I suppose all you want in selling it is to improve the averages."

A.—"Oh, certainly! I will do that; I shall stand between you and harm; but there are C and D, who are also interested: you must make one of them buy the wheat of you, and I can purchase it again from them, and so keep matters all right."

B takes care to enter it in his purchase-book; and among his returns of purchases, he gives in the following:—

"Bought of A six hundred quarters of wheat, at seventy-five shillings per quarter."

This of course tells heavily upon the local average, in which the quantity generally returned varies from one thousand to fifteen hundred quarters, and from the above sale a high average is produced.

B next sells the wheat in question to C, at perhaps an advance of sixpence per quarter, to save appearances: this is also regularly entered through their books. In like manner, D purchases the wheat of C, and he again resells to the original proprietor A, in whose possession it has all along been, no delivery having ever been made of it, except when the parties are very cautious, and then the key of the loft in which it is lying may be hung up in the office of each individual as he buys it; A having access to it at all times, keeping it under his own inspection, and turning or screening it without the slightest reference being made to any one of the others. In this manner a parcel of six hundred quarters of wheat is made to represent sales to the amount of two thousand four hundred quarters, in one, two, three, or four weeks, as the persons acting might deem it advisable; the law being, that if a parcel of British grain is sold fifty times in one day, it must be as often returned. The inspector may go to these merchants and inquire about these transactions: they show him the purchase and sale books; and if he still continues incredulous, so obliging are they, that they will even show him the wheat itself. What can he then do? He cannot with certainty say that it is not a fair sale, however much he may doubt it; he is, therefore, obliged to include it in the calculation of his average. The instance I have above narrated was one in which a great degree of caution, more than is generally thought necessary was used. I knew of more than one individual returning a considerable quantity of grain as bought of another, who not only did not sell it, but knew nothing of the matter until the inspector called upon him to make inquiries about it. To such an extent is fraud carried on in these returns, that during the earlier part of last year, so large a quantity as five hundred and sixty quarters of rye was returned as sold in London at the price of fifty-seven shillings per quarter. Now, every one who is at all acquainted with the subject, knows that scarcely any rye is sold in Mark Lane; and even had any been sold at the time of which I write, the finest would not have realized more than thirty-eight shillings per quarter at the utmost: the very week before this took place, the return from Durham was about eighty quarters at thirty shillings per quarter. During the latter part of August in the present year, when the most strenuous efforts were making for the reduction of the duty on wheat, (in respect to this I speak in round numbers,) twenty thousand quarters were returned in London at eighty shillings per quarter; within less than a month after, the object having been accomplished, the returns had fallen down to four thousand quarters at sixty-four shillings per quarter: which clearly proves that false sales had been given in; as the arrivals had in no degree decreased, and the fall in the markets during that time did not exceed five shillings per quarter, if so much.

Up to this time, I have only spoken of the proceedings of the holders of bonded corn; let us now examine the effects of the law upon the holders of free corn. The speculator in British grain seeing that, from an increase in the price of that description which forms his stock, the duty is likely to recede, goes to a fellow-holder, and sells him a large quantity at a very low price; the other, of course, engaging not to require the fulfilment of the contract. The probable decline in duty has been, however, in the interim, observed by a merchant, who immediately orders a quantity from abroad, that he may reap the benefit of it. On the arrival of the grain, how great must be his disappointment and vexation to find, that by the surreptitious returns of the holders of English grain, the averages have been so much depressed, that with the then present course of things, he sees no possibility of turning his corn to a good account: he, therefore, opposes fraud to fraud, and endeavours to raise the average; but while so engaged, the others get through their stocks at an extraordinary high price, and when the importer does get the duty off, he finds the consumers are all stocked with the article, and he is obliged to part with his on very low terms, to sell it at all. Thus the fair trader is deprived of that gain which should reward his adventure, and the public obliged to pay more than its value to obtain corn. The next and last evasion I have to bring forward is decidedly the most nefarious of the whole. It will be best understood by the relating of the following fact: A few years ago, after a harvest like that of 1839, when the greater part of the wheat in the northern counties was sprouted and unsound, in one of the large towns situated in one of those counties, a house, then doing the most business, held a large quantity of very superior wheat in bond. As the low price of the unsound wheat kept the averages depressed, and so prevented the liberation of foreign corn, it was in great demand, and sold for exceedingly high prices. In the stock granaries in which this wheat was lying, the loft immediately above was not under bond, nor was the one directly beneath: into the higher loft a quantity of this inferior wheat was put, which, at a convenient time, was run down through the floors into the bonded loft, out of which a corresponding quantity of the foreign was let into the loft below. The difference in value between the two sorts might be forty or forty-two shillings per quarter. The Custom-house officers being for the most part ignorant men, seeing the quantity remained, were quite unable to discover the trick that had been performed. This English wheat not being of more than half the value of the foreign, was permitted to ly until the duty declined to a low rate,—thus they reaped the advantage of the scarcity without the risk of decline, when the bonded wheat was thrown upon the market. One instance came to my knowledge where the party removed the bonded wheat without substituting any other for it; which act might never have been found out, as the lofts are not regularly inspected, and he might have paid the low duty when it came; which would have been taken at the Custom-house as if all was right.

From the foregoing, it will not be difficult to deduce, that the Corn Laws, as they are at present constituted, are little else than a premium for dishonesty, and a mischief to that man who is too upright to practise it.

If the landlords must be protected by a duty, let it be done by a moderate fixed one; the expenses of transit and sale forming no slight obstacle to the bringing in of foreign grain at a price ruinous to our growers. In the height of summer, when freights and insurances are at their lowest, the expenses from Hamburg, the nearest port, on wheat, valuing it at sixty shillings per quarter, would be as follows:—Freight, two shillings and sixpence per quarter; insurance, sixpence per quarter; short measure, threepence per quarter; landing, sixpence per quarter; town dues and wharfage, one penny per quarter; commission and del credere, two shillings and fivepence per quarter: in all, six shillings and threepence per quarter. From the more distant ports, those from which we receive the largest supplies, Rostock, Stettin, and Dantzic, the freight is two shillings per quarter more than from Hamburg. A higher insurance, and the Sound Dues, must also be added. The charges from St. Petersburg, Archangel, and Odessa are very considerably higher. These expenses, of themselves, would, in my opinion, afford sufficient protection to the British agriculturist; for it must not be forgotten, that the foregoing calculations are made at the lowest possible rates, at the most favourable season, and that in the charges I have not included anything for loft-rent and turning, which are well known to be very expensive. Of the other kinds of grain I need say little, as on oats, valuing them at twenty-two shillings per quarter, the charges from Königsberg, Kiel, or Rostock, amount, at the lowest computation, to five shillings and fourpence per quarter. The charges on barley, rye, beans, and pease, are proportionally between wheat and oats. I have studiously avoided in this paper saying anything of the benefit the repeal of the Corn Laws would confer upon the country, in the improvement and increase of our manufactures, and the supplying of our population with cheap bread, as these have been dwelt upon by many much abler than myself. All that I have stated I can, from personal knowledge, vouch for; as much has passed under my own immediate direction.

I beg to subscribe myself,

A CORN MERCHANT.

ODE TO LOCH LOMOND.

'Tis morn, and o'er Ben Lomond's brow
 Flings the pale moon her parting glow:
 Resumes the sun his orient dress,
 And bathes the lake in loveliness;
 And gilds the isles that o'er it lie
 Like clouds on an inverted sky:
 In bracing sweep the early breeze
 Comes forth to wake the drowsy trees:
 The fisher hoists his patch of sail,
 And spreads it to the kindly gale;
 While hoarse and rude the wild-fowl screams,
 As if to scare thy deep night dreams!
 Oh! then, blessed Lake, what heart so dull
 As not to feel thee beautiful!

Bright Lake, from yon blue canopy
 The mid-day sun now smiles on thee!
 Full fain his hot red beams to lave
 Deep, deep, beneath thy gelid wave,
 As he, all warm in love's young joy,
 That woos a maiden cold and coy:
 The birds that flit thy margin by Imbue the air with melody:
 The fishes 'neath thy waters play,
 And there hold blythe holiday:
 The rustic's whistling o'er his plough,
 The kine are on the mountain's brow;
 The lambs frisk round the shepherd boy;
 In ripples smooth thou smil'st thy joy,
 And prattling babes thy pebbles cull,—
 Oh! now too thou art beautiful!
 In rich red hues the gorgeous even
 Now steps the deep serene of heaven:
 Wearied of play the little springs
 Now hush in thee their murmurings,
 As romping children, sport-opprest,
 Couch calmly on their mother's breast.

Now youths and maidens pace thy shore,
 And con the heart's loved lesson o'er;
 Or pause to list the strains that float
 Across thee from the distant boat;
 And feel, as breast to breast is beating,
 As cheek with cheek is purely meeting,
 As eye to eye fond tale is telling,
 As soul to soul is softly swelling,—
 Feel that if bliss on earth there be,
 'Tis theirs this holy eve by thee:
 At twilight's hour so calm, so cool,
 O Lake, thou'rt e'en more beautiful!

Now midnight spreads her sable pall,
 A solemn stillness bindeth all:
 No music now the listener hears
 Save the hushed music of the spheres,
 That sail o'er heaven all silently,
 As boats with muffled oars on thee.
 Oh! fair I ween looks forth the moon,
 And shames the broad red flare of noon!
 Sweet vestal maid, to whom 'tis given
 To tend the myriad fires of heaven!
 Blushing in bashful vanity,
 She comes to glass herself in thee:
 And Hesper flameth fiercely bright
 To gem the queenly brow of night.
 The breezes in their cloud-piled halls
 Now sleep—yet sigh at intervals,
 Quicksilvering thy waters pure,
 And raising waves in miniature:
 Now send they them in reverence meet
 To kiss the aged mountain's feet,
 Then cease becalmed—and in the lull
 O Lake thou art most beautiful!

MODERN PROPHETS.

BY CYRUS.

SOME people live to prophesy, others prophesy to live. These two classes include, we opine, no mean fraction of the human family. There is, perhaps, hardly a post-Adamite, gifted with a moderate quantum of the bumps of Hope and Wonder, who has not, at one time or another, hinted or asserted his prescience of forthcoming events. But the classes to which we allude stand out from the mass of mankind, glorying in the possession of a distinctive characteristic, hedged about by peculiar attributes, gifted with an envied exclusiveness of mental perspicacity. This distinction arises in the case of one, from a constitutional necessity to go on prophesying and to prophesy; in that of the other, from a social or positional necessity. You may recognise an individual of the first class by the prepossessing character of his visage,—an eye looking at you and into the future at the same moment,—a glance of apocalyptic import, and an occasional utterance of such phrases as “wait a little,” “something is at hand,” “a hundred years hence,” &c. He has no eye for the present; a hurried glance for the past; but the hieroglyphic future is his daily study, and his mystic ken becomes keener in proportion to the remoteness of its object. Swedenborgians, Irvingites, and more particularly the founders of these sects, are specimens of this class. Those belonging to the second division may or may not have an organic propensity to be perpetually winking, and nodding, and hinting at their intimacy with the phantasmagoria of the world to come. But their badge of distinction is equally open to recognition. They snatch at the prophetic mantle for it is lined with gold. They trade in predictions, and find it profitable to barter kingdoms for an obolus. A large portion of this class are to be found with glossy locks, piercing black eyes, sun-burnt faces, and chattering outlandish gibberish, crowding at nightfall beside their picturesque encampments along many a hedge-row in merry England, chanting, “’Tis merry, ’tis merry, in good greenwood;” or, masticating the well-fed goose, which the proprietor of a neighbouring barn-yard fondly deems, will, at no distant hour, grace with its genial presence his own groaning board. Another tribe of this Tiresian genus, by no means deficient in numbers, are to be found, quill in hand, in a cobwebbed attic, mangling and reconstructing the dynasties and destinies of Europe, alias, elaborating from their toil-wrought brain, the matériel of a leading article. A third are distinguished by the periods at which they manifest the afflatus. In the case of a seat in Parliament being vacated, or of a general election, from village tub or city hustings they pour the Delphic flood over the masses of the uninspired. But we leave it to the philanthropologist to make a scientific delineation, and minute classification of the prominent features in this most interesting department of Natural History. All we shall attempt, is to make, vaguely as well as concisely enough for the general reader, and with sufficient comprehensiveness for the strictest Cuvierian, an illustration of one or two varieties of claimants to the prophetic character.

Profoundly philosophizing on the subject, we have resolved all the varieties under two heads,—Prophets of Sunshine, and Prophets of Gloom, each of which comprises three subdivisions:—the Grand or Homeric, the Pathetic or Ovidian, the Humbug or Quixotic. There are certain epochs in the existence of individuals and nations that bear eminently on the elements of the prophetic character, rousing the most sober and unimaginative spirits into the consciousness of possessing a power of seeing far into futurity,—a faculty which had merely enabled them to anticipate the exigencies of the succeeding day, or the results of an impending lawsuit, till the epoch in question freed from restraint the fount of inspiration, and flung forth the resistless stream of prophecy,—a mighty torrent, sweeping away with resistless force the barriers of rigid calculation. Such an epoch was the Union, when the Seers of the Saxon beheld, rushing down from the wild and barren mountains of the north, a multitudinous horde of gaunt and breechless barbarians, to devour the fruits of southern industry, while those of the Celtic race cried aloud, “Woe, woe to Scotland! the crown hath fallen from her head,—her liberty is extinct,—her altars are desecrated,—the religion of her Covenant-patriots is trampled under foot,—and its ministers compelled to hide in dens and caves of the earth to escape the sword of the persecutor.” Such an epoch was the French revolution, when the stream of prophecy overflowed every street, highway, and hedgerow in Europe; when the confident announcement that peace and justice had descended upon earth; that a few brief years would behold one vast republic, embracing the globe, in which the voice of oppression would be mute, philanthropy regulate every action, and universal love unite the long-estranged members of the human race, into one free and happy brotherhood,—was met by the equally confident assertion that a deluge of evil was about to inundate the world; and that virtue, happiness, religion, the hearth, the altar and the throne, would be swept away by the devouring flood. Such an epoch was Parliamentary Reform, when, to the ear of one, the first clod cast into the grave of Boroughbridge sounded the funeral knell of liberty in Europe; while, to that of another, the same sound was a note of that anthem chanted by angels over the sepulchre of slavery. As the last-mentioned event was the introduction of the latest grand era of prophetic impulse, we shall briefly advert to a few of the leading annunciations that apprized the ignorant and unforeseeing of the occurrences which held “proxima lucis loca,” the portentous births hid in the womb of futurity.

Chapter I.—In which Homeric the First talketh grandly about liberty and steam; and Homeric the Second flatly contradicteth him.

A.D. One thousand eight hundred and thirty-two years, the orator ascended the mount of Proclamation, and thus spoke ore rotundo :—

“A light hath arisen upon the earth—the clouds of superstition have rolled from the sky. Liberty hath planted her standard, and the black banner of despotism is trembling in the hands of its supporters. The time is at hand when mankind, untrammelled in their high mental energies, shall assert in the face of heaven the power and grandeur of human nature, strong in the might of intelligence and freedom. Europe is sensitive in every fibre of her moral frame to the high and glorious impulse. France hath bounded like a young Hercules from the popped couch of slavery. Italy is alive to ancient recollections, and pours contempt on the triple crown. Germany, fired with enthusiasm, and strong in knowledge, waits the signal to unhackle. A spirit is abroad that will, in a few years, convert the sword into a reaping hook, and the fiery glance of national hatred, into the smile of unbounded amity, in every clime peopled by the descendants of Japhet. Then shall the intellect of emancipated and enlightened millions fraternize; and what in the universe of matter can oppose the energies of such accumulated divinity! The pride of Ocean, tamed and humble as the clods of the valley, shall own the omnipotence of steam. Science shall control the aerial currents, and enable the Scottish tourist to bid farewell to the winding Forth,—gaze on the wrecks of almighty Rome,—luxuriate on the wonders of the seven-hilled queen of the east,—sweep tranquil and secure across the raging Bosphorus,—pause amid the ruins of primeval empire,—float above the loftiest peaks of the Himalaya, and return to the blue hills, silver streams, and freshborn bosoms of his native land, within the course of one revolving moon.”

“I beheld,” was the the oraculum of Homeric respondent, “and lo! Britain was clothed with honour and majesty, the undisputed queen of Ocean; the maker and unmaker of continental dynasties; the focus of all the rays of science and erudition; the shrine of truth, virtue, and wisdom; the dispenser of celestial blessings to every region of the earth. But the star of her glory hath set,—the time is at hand when her fleets will be scattered,—her armies vanquished,—her flag insulted,—her name regarded as a byword and a mockery; while, internally a prey to savage anarchy, she will cower in impotent dismay, a wretched and dismembered wreck of what she once was, before the aggression of her puniest foe. Babylon, Carthage, Tadmor, are types of her; and the merchants of future years will ponder as they tread among a few straggling weather-beaten huts, inhabited by the sons of wretchedness; and whisper sadly one to another, "This, this is all that remains of that great city, whose merchants were princes, whose name was venerated wherever a keel could adventure—the acropolis of a nation sacred to Minerva. Let us tread lightly over the grave of that mighty heart now for ever still, and muse on the consequences of that restless spirit of innovation, that prostrated the glorious barriers of ancestral institutions before the raging waves of fierce democracy."

It is not the least remarkable circumstance attending the lofty visions of these gifted seers, that whatever phase the aspect of events presents, is a decided and unimpeachable confirmation of the truth of their prediction. What a melancholy blank in the chronicles of prophecy, is caused by the loss of that sublime oration pronounced by Cheops, when the last stone was placed on his artificial mountain, on the march of architectural intellect, till the valley of ancient Nilus would be too narrow for the splendid trophies of the masonic art!

Who knows not what Cleon, the wealthiest merchant in Thebes, said to a blind minstrel, who sung the exploits of gods and god-begotten heroes before the porch of his stately mansion; "Mæonides, thou art old, but thou shalt survive thy poetry. Come with me and I will employ thee to soothe my children with the charms of thy music, and a reward shall be thine beyond what thou wilt ever obtain by dealing out thy inanities to the gaping Thebans."

Chapter II.—In which Pathetic the First is much affected with the miseries of the poor; and Pathetic the Second has not much to say in favour of modern education.

"I beheld," exclaims the Pathetic from the Pisgah of Prophecy, "the weeping victim of a false and unnatural state of society, struggling from morning to night with barely sufficient time allotted him to eat his scanty meal, exerting to the utmost his overworked and exhausted powers to obtain a miserable pittance; I saw him throw his toil-worn and lacerated limbs on a straw pallet, and pray to God for death to terminate his woes. I beheld over the length and breadth of a nation, that claims to be at the pinnacle of moral enlightenment, a frightful mass of misery,—the million groaning under the pressure of want, to minister to the luxuries of the pampered few,—thousands endowed with fine sensibilities, and capable of high achievements in literature and science, shut out by the fierce necessities of their condition from harbouring an idea not chained down to the wants of the present hour, and unable to snatch the shortest interval to cultivate the nobler powers of their nature. But the glorious future exhibits no feature of this unnatural wretchedness. I behold the broad expanse of this fair world meted out into parallelograms. I see every man sitting under his vine and under his fig-tree, and none to make him afraid. The humblest peasant, the poorest artisan, is in the quiet possession of leisure, food, and the means of domestic culture. The cry of heartbroken distress no longer resounds from the mud-built cabin, but the song of joy bespeaks the happy heart from the rising to the setting sun."

"Alas!" responds a voice from the valley of tribulation, "in the good old times, we believed with trembling. Piety and superstition went hand in hand. We believed in and revered those æri-form and fantastic beings, the fairy and the witch holding a mysterious companionship with the human race; but our faith and reverence was also strong in regard to that awful intelligence, who controlled and directed for his own wise purpose, their dreaded agency. Thrice happy were those days before all these changes were heard of,—when the dead-light, and the wraith, and the wizard, and the warning voice, had their undoubting believers round every fireside of broad Scotland,—when the Beltane fires were kindled with pious enthusiasm, and the influence of the moon on human passions and interests, was acknowledged with religious awe. But now the march of education is accompanied by the march of scepticism. The rocks of atheism stand out in frightful prominence in the onward career of that vessel in which our dearest interests are embarked, and the crash will come when the religion of our forefathers shall be engulfed in the prevailing ocean of infidelity,—the anthem of piety shall no more be heard at morning and evening rising to the throne of God from the humble cottage of the peasant,—and mute shall be the church-going bell on the morning of the hallowed day. The scoffer unabashed, will publish his Gouliah creed even from the shrine of our sanctuaries. The age, too, of chivalry, hath passed away. Instead of the faithful and attached clansman braving weariness, torture, and death, in defence of his gallant chieftain; soon will the levelling spirit of democracy annihilate all distinctions, and the poor infatuated serf will be seen lighting his brand at the ashes of the altar to consume the palace of his feudal lord."

Chapter III.—In which Humbug the First discourses logically of liberty and equality; and Humbug the Second soliloquizes on the Church in danger.

"I lay it down as a fundamental principle in nature," exclaims a philosopher of a certain class to a numerous circle of auditors; but whether the orator is on the hustings, in the taproom, or in the fields by moonlight, we are not permitted to mention, "that all men are born equal and free. Whence, then, inequality, and that state of things that imposes on one class all the miseries, though perhaps not the name of slavery; while on another, it confers a power to control and coerce the actions, nay, even the thoughts of those equally entitled with themselves to the blessings of freedom? Whence? but from tyrannical laws,—unjust institutions,—an unhealthy state of society, fostered and guarded by those who batten on the vitals of our social and domestic happiness. This state of things cannot, must not, endure. Liberty is the life and soul of the present era; and looking into the future, I see no kings to tax,—no oligarchy to oppress,—no masses of bloated wealth walking between us and the sun." by Google

This man raised himself into parliament and office on the shoulders of the people—and ceased to be a prophet. Listen now to the monologue of a reverend father in God, as he painfully raises his gouty supporters upon their soft and silky pedestal, and eyes askance “with lingering looks of love,” his post-prandial modicum of sparkling champagne. “Alas! the time is fast approaching, when these accursed dissenters,—woe to those who repealed the blessed test,—will compel us to live like themselves. They would fain see us, the successors of the holy apostles, compelled to toil for a precarious subsistence, mayhap

The moss our bed, the cave our humble cell,
Our food the fruits, our drink the crystal well.

Our drink the crystal well! faugh! paugh! O that this gouty toe would allow me to convince my diocese, that a country where a bishop is doomed to the drudgery of a curate, is essentially a bishopless country; that a bishopless country is deprived of the blessing of apostolical succession, and is necessarily an irreligious country; and will emphatically—O my toe!—go to the devil. To me it is clear that Great Britain will have no bishops—and if no bishops, no king, no laws, no religion—in thirty years to come.”

A beautiful and convincing illustration of the fact, that however the lines of prophetic light, that brighten the eyeballs of other illuminati, vary as to the objects on the horizon of futurity from which they radiate, the gifted individuals of the latter class receive theirs, variously coloured though they be from the diversified character of the refracting media, from a common centre of procession.

NEW NOVELS.

I. Colin Clink. By Charles Hooton, Esq. 3 vols.

No modern fictionist has set the great English model, FIELDING, so rigidly before him as the able author of “Colin Clink,” and “Bilberry Thurland.” This taste, or choice, and powers of no ordinary kind, at once stamped his works with a character of individuality. Something of the same character was discernible in the fictions of Holcroft, a man who sprung direct from the mother-bosom of England; though, with this exception, Hooton is unique as a disciple of the great master of the purely English fiction. This holds especially of his skilful delineations of the personages of ordinary life, as they may still be found in remote rural localities; in his descriptions of the humours and oddities of what is termed low, as distinguished from purely vicious life. Hooton’s vagrants are tainted with the vices peculiar to their vagabond condition, but they are not encrusted and foul with crime, like the town-bred ruffians of modern novels. The moral incidentally present in all Fielding’s novels, of the Great preying upon the Small, the sharks devouring the little fishes, is more systematically kept in view by Hooton, though in many of the hastily concocted scenes of “Colin Clink,” it is but imperfectly wrought out. Indeed, in the progress of that story, the writer seems to have abandoned his original design, and taken up one which, if likely to be more popular, and more easily managed, carries less weight of metal. In the final acquiescence in society’s injustice, he loses sight of poetic justice.

The story, which appeared in a series of papers in Bentley’s Miscellany, must be too familiar to the reading public to require description. It comprehends a tale of man’s injustice to woman, and of the tyranny of the rich to the poor. There is another story, somewhat extravagant and improbable in the details, of the confinement of a sane man for a long series of years in a private mad-house, by a relative, who wished to keep possession of his property. That such things have been, is beyond all doubt, and they are fit subjects for the novelist. Even when less horrible than the scenes depicted in “Colin Clink,” they must involve mental and bodily agony to the miserable sufferer worse than a thousand murders.

There is great truth even in the most grossly exaggerated scenes and characters introduced; as those of Miss Sowersoft, and the uncouth lover who cast glamour over a too susceptible spinster, impatient to be married, as surely as the spells, of which Bottom was the hero, wrought upon Titania. The scenes at the Tavern Concerts, in which appear the wretched, hectic, hackneyed, “old-before-her-time” actress and singer, possess painful and powerful truth. How many such victims, the miserable ministers to its so-called pleasures, does the Great Babylon, at all times, carry in its fevered and polluted bosom! Is not the image of this poor young girl, as it is here traced, the fitting personification of these hollow pleasures? We might find many more highly-wrought specimens of this fiction, and some of them more pathetic, but none conveying a more useful moral than the following extract. The scene is the “saloon” of a tavern, the avenue to which lies through a dram-shop; and Colin Clink is already more than half in love with the glittering prima donna of that haunted spot:—

As I have not the most distant intention of wearying either the reader or myself with a detailed description of the night’s entertainment, I shall merely observe, that after the curtain drew up, a succession of songs, comic, patriotic, and sentimental, was introduced, and sung by various members of the professional company. Amongst these appeared one, on seeing whom Wintlebury exclaimed to his companion, “That’s my sister!”

Colin looked. A beautiful-complexioned girl was on the stage,—bright-eyed, lively, and attractively attired in the showy costume of a theatrical Neapolitan maid. After a brief prelude on the famous Orchestralophon-agpipe, she sung, apparently not without effort, but with the most bewitching assumption of modesty telling its troubles to the moon, a song, the burden of which ran—

“Encore!—encore!” enthusiastically cried a gentleman, who was sitting a few seats in advance, as he clapped his hands madly together, and tossed his legs at random under the seat before him, “admirable, bi’gar!—me quite consent with dat. Too many is too much!”

“Hangcoor!” repeated a young sailor, considerably more than half-seas over, as he unconsciously recharged his pipe, as though he were ramming down the wadding of a gun, “hangcoor!—Go it agen, Bess, or whatever your name is. Hangcoor!”

This word, under a dozen different pronunciations, ran round the room, while Miss Harriet Wintlebury made a profound curtsy, and proceeded to repeat her song.

As Colin gazed, and gazed again, turned away his eyes, and as instantly fixed them upon the same beautiful object again, his bosom burned, and his cheeks grew flushed; he felt as though in the presence of a being whom he could think scarcely inferior to the angels,—at least, he had never in his life seen woman as she is before. For what were the simple beings, under that name, whom he had met in the out-of-the-way country nook he had so recently left? What was his late mistress, Miss Sowersoft?—what the maids on the farm?—what even Fanny herself?—mere plain, dull, plodding, lifeless creatures of the feminine gender, and nothing more. But this enchantress!—his heart leaped up, and in that one moment he felt more of the deep yearning of love than ever in the course of his whole life he had felt before.

"Let us go nearer," he whispered to his companion; and in the next minute they were forcing their way down one of the passages, between the forms, towards the other end of the room. Before they had succeeded in obtaining a seat on the last form, close under the stage-lamps, Miss Harriet had concluded her melody, and retired amidst considerable applause. Until the period of her reappearance, the time occupied by other performers seemed to Colin endless. Under other circumstances, the novelty and freshness of such an entertainment would have beguiled his attention deeply, and resolved hours into the seeming space of but a few minutes; but now the sense of pleasure derived from this source was rendered dull and pointless by comparison with that far keener delight, that tumultuous throng of hopeful passions, which had so suddenly and strangely taken possession of his bosom. At length she came again,—he started, astonished. Could it be the same? The clear bright complexion (or what had seemed at the further end of the room to be so) now looked opaque and earthy; the white was dead white, and the red was abruptly red as though St. Anthony had been busy with his pencil patching those cheeks with fire; while the substratum of bone and flesh looked worn into a shape of anxious pain, that gave the lie direct and palpable to the colourable pretensions of the surface. And then the handsome bust, which at a distance seemed so beautiful, now appeared a most miserable artistical mockery of nature; and the fixed meaningless gaze,—the mouth formally extended in order to display the teeth,—the dead lack-lustre stare at the remote end of the room, calculated to produce an impression on the more distant portion of the audience,—all combined deeply and strongly to impress the horrible conviction on the mind, that this poor creature, in spite of all assumptions and decorations to the contrary, was a very poor, worn-out, deplorable creature indeed! It forced upon the spectator something like the idea of a death's head endeavouring to be merry,—a skull fitted with glass eyes, and covered with a thin painted mask of parchment, striving to laugh and look happy, in order to be consistent with the laughter and the happiness around it. Add to this the hollow faint voice, (the mere echo of the sound it once had been,) pumped up from lungs that seemed to have lost all power,—to have decayed until scarcely any portion remained,—and we shall feel impressed, as Colin was, with a fearful, almost a terrible, sense of the poor uses to which humanity is sometimes put, and of the deep wretchedness often existing among those whose occupation in life is to look gay, whatever they may feel.

In truth, consumption was feeding on her, seemingly deep and irremediable. Yet she struggled on: what else could she? Still she strove, still fulfilled her occupation every night, still sung, still tried to look merry, although her heart was all out of heart, and her bosom was filled with fear and anxiety from the dread sense of approaching death—too surely at hand—and she unprepared!—perhaps to come to her on that very stage,—perhaps then! And all this to gain a morsel of daily bread!

When one hears of any young creature in danger of such a fate as this, will they not be merciful, and strive to send her, in infinite preference, to the stifling factory, with close labour for sixteen hours a-day.

II. The Trustee. Colburn.

We have here a romance, composed of the ordinary ingredients, mingled with considerable skill and effect. The scene is mainly the town of Hull, though, for that matter, it might just as well have been anywhere else; the time, the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII., and during that of his bigoted daughter, the "bloody Mary." "The Trustee" is a small Sir Giles Overreach,—ambitious, covetous, avaricious, and wholly unprincipled; but a villain of some intellect and tact,—not wholly out of nature,—not motiveless. His human and redeeming point is doting love for an only son. This person contrives, in the troubled times of the tyrant Henry, to get the property of many of his persecuted neighbours into his clutches; and he, of course, cheats and oppresses their widows and orphans. Among others, his kinsman, and the head of his house, Sir Edward Waring, compelled to leave the kingdom to elude the hot pursuit of his enemies, confides to this villainous and traitorous relation the care of his two motherless infant daughters, with jewels and money to a great amount. The young ladies grow up under the care of this false guardian, who plots all manner of villanies against them, which may forward his schemes of avarice and ambition. They are, as is generally now the case when two sisters are introduced, a grave, stately, high-souled Minna, and a gay and frolicsome, kind, light-hearted Brenda. They are, of course, furnished with lovers suited to their respective characters: a young cavalier, a soldier of fortune, who had, in foreign lands, fought his way to fame side by side with their father, being the adorer of the noble Katherine, while Rose is the beloved of her odious guardian's vivacious and amiable son, Charles. The young ladies have, as an attendant, an aged priest, kind, simple-minded, and charitable, though a bigot to his own faith. They, however, much to his grief and horror, adopt the reformed doctrines; and, in the reign of Mary, their religion lays them open to the practices of their guardian, and the machinations of just such a Catholic priest as Protestant romance frequently embodies, and calls a Jesuit. The schemes of the Trustee for the ruin of the orphan ladies, and his other villanies, which are of all kinds, are counteracted by the agency of Scampering Jack, a crack-brained benevolent humourist, a kind of Puck or Robin Good-Fellow, who is found here, there, and in every place where his agency is required, and just at the nick of time; until we have fairly seen the bad punished, the virtuous rewarded, and every one of the personages left happy that deserved happiness. There are here no great or original elements; but the combinations are often good, the characters well-defined and well contrasted; and there is no want of bustle and incident in the progress of the story, while many just and pointed thoughts are scattered throughout its pages.

NEW POEMS.

Hours with the Muses. By John Critchley Prince.

Here we have a volume of fair, smooth verses, which, considering the condition and opportunities of the poet, may be pronounced wonderful! JOHN PRINCE was born the son of a poor reed-maker at Wigan. He was put, while almost a child, to learn his father's trade; and before he was nineteen years of age, he married. He paid the penalty in continued poverty and distress, which must have fallen more heavily upon his wife and children than upon himself, though his personal sufferings are painfully prominent in the sketch of his life, which some friend has prefixed to his poems. In the hope of bettering his condition, he left his family and went to France, where English artisans of his description were said to be in request at the cotton factories. It was a period of depressed trade. He was disappointed of finding employment, and suffered the most severe privations in making his way back to his family, after traversing on foot a good part of France and Germany. When a boy, a copy of Byron's works, which fell into his hands, awoke the love of poesy, and he soon afterwards began to compose "at all times, and in all places." The results are abundant. Some of his poems were written to "lighten his wanderings on the continent, and others, as a relief to poverty and toil, on his own shores." But wherever or howsoever composed, his poems possess very considerable merit, merely as poems, and laying aside altogether the circumstances under which they may have been produced. In the exercise of his poetical talents, Mr. Prince has found much to sweeten a hard but common lot. If the Muse "found him poor at first and kept him so," the measure of the divine gift which he possesses, has brought its own delights and rewards; and in the midst of poverty he can still wisely and piously bless God for "having made him susceptible of feelings so elevating, so humanizing, so divine." This is the true way in which poetry should be considered, and not as something which a poor man may convert into food, fuel, and clothing—an expectation which is the cause of much unpitied disappointment.

The longest poem is entitled THE POET'S SABBATH. It contains some sweet description, and many tender sentiments and just reflections. From a poem, entitled, "Who are the Free? the Great? the Wise? the Blest?" we select one response, which, with much of the contents of the little volume, shows that suffering has not darkened nor yet warped or embittered the author's spirit:—

Who are the Blest!

They who have kept their sympathies awake,
And scattered good for more than custom's sake;
Steadfast and tender in the hour of need,
Gentle in thought—benevolent in deed;
Whose looks have power to make dissension cease—
Whose smiles are pleasant, and whose words are peace;
They who have lived as harmless as the dove,
Teachers of truth and ministers of love:—
Love for all moral power—all mental grace—
Love for the humblest of the human race—
Love for that tranquil joy which virtue brings—
Love for the GIVER of all goodly things;
True followers of that soul-exalting plan,
Which CHRIST laid down to bless and govern man.
They who can calmly linger at the last,
Survey the future and recall the past;
And with that hope which triumphs over pain,
Feel well assured they have not lived in vain,
Then wait in peace their hour of final rest;—
These are the only blest!

We could find many pieces more emphatic than the following pretty lines: but they are recommended by their completeness; and by the thought of the many bright and cheerful moments which must have gladdened the hearth of the writer, though the dismal sketch of his life throws them into the gloomiest shade:—

TO THE CRICKET.

Thou merry minstrel of my cottage hearth,
Again I hear thy shrill and silvery lays;
Where hast thou been these many, many days,
Mysterious thing of music and of mirth?
Thou should'st not leave thy brother Bard so long;
Sadly without thee pass my evening hours.
Hast thou been roaming in the fields and bowers,

To shame the grasshopper's loud summer song?—
When poring o'er some wild romantic book,
In the hush'd reign of thought-awakening night,
I love to have thee near me, winged sprite,
To cheer the silence of my chimney nook;
For I have faith that thy prophetic voice
Foretelleth things which come to make my heart rejoice.

The Poetical Works of Thomas Moore.

Volume VIII. Longman & Co.

This volume contains the Lines to the Angels, and a number of those satirical and humorous poems, which originally appeared "for the occasion" in the Morning Chronicle. Among these, Corn and Cotton comes forth pat to the present moment; as does the Ode to the Goddess Ceres, by Sir Thomas Lethbridge. The preface to this volume refers to Mr. Moore's embarrassments and losses, from his deputy, in an office which he held at Bermuda, proving a defaulter. His ultimate loss appears to have been less than was generally imagined, though still serious to a man in his circumstances. He met and surmounted it in a manly and independent spirit; and we hope that, besides showing him who were his true friends, it convinced him of the impropriety of men of letters holding sinecure offices, or of any official whatever doing business by deputy. We had fancied, somewhat prematurely, it appears, that Mr. Moore had had the good taste to suppress his lines on Mr. Leigh Hunt's honest and much abused book about Lord Byron. We are sorry, chiefly for the sake of his own fame, to find ourselves mistaken. Such a squib may be forgiven at the moment; but republication, after a dozen years have elapsed, is more unpardonable than the original offence.

Did the scenes of riot and low debauchery, which Mr. Moore had just witnessed or heard of at Venice, excite the disgust which dictated the verses said to be written at Chambery, and appearing among the Rhymes on the Road? We hope it was so: that the vices of the lord of mature years, though they passed unnamed, had been viewed with yet deeper abhorrence than those of the dreaming, vagrant boy. We turn with pleasure from these debateable matters to the Ode to Ceres; from which a few stanzas, to refresh the reader's memory, may not be out of place in our pages at this great corn crisis:—

Dear Goddess of Corn, whom the ancients, we know, (‘Mong other odd whims of those comical bodies,)
Adorned with somniferous poppies, to show
Thou wert always a true Country-gentleman's Goddess.

Behold, in his best shooting-jacket, before thee,
An eloquent ‘Squire, who most humbly beseeches,
Great Queen of Mark Lane (if the thing doesn't bore thee),
Thou'lt read o'er the last of his—never—last speeches.

Ah! Ceres, thou know'st not the slander and scorn
Now heaped upon England's ‘Squirearchy, so boasted;
Improving on Hunt,* 'tis no longer the Corn,
'Tis the growers of Corn that are now, alas! roasted.

In speeches, in books, in all shapes they attack us—
Reviewers, economists—fellows, no doubt,
That you, my dear Ceres, and Venus and Bacchus,
And Gods of high fashion know little about.

There's Bentham, whose English is all his own making,—
Who thinks just as little of settling a nation
As he would of smoking his pipe, or of taking (What he, himself, calls) his "post-prandial vibration."[†]

* Hunt's breakfast powder.

† The venerable Jeremy's phrase for his after-dinner wa"

In short, my dear Goddess, Old England's divided Between ultra blockheads and superfine sages ;—
With which of these classes we, landlords, have sided,
Thou'lt find in my speech, if thou'lt read a few pages.
For therein I've proved to my own satisfaction,
And that of all 'Squires I've the honour of meeting,
That 'tis the most senseless and foul-mouthed detraction
To say that poor people are fond of cheap eating.
On the contrary, such the chaste notions* of food,
That dwell in each pale manufacturer's heart,
They would scorn any law, be it ever so good,
'That would make thee, dear Goddess, less dear than thou art !

Long life to the Minister!—no matter who,
Or how dull he may be, if, with dignified spirit, he Keeps the ports shut—and the people's mouths, too—
We shall all have a long run of Freddy's prosperity.
And, as for myself, who, like Hannibal, sworn To hate the whole crew who could take our rents from us ;
Had England but One to stand by thee, Dear Corn,
That last honest Uni-Corn would be Sir Thomas.

Matins and Vespers: with Hymns and occasional Devotional Pieces. By John Bowring. Third Edition.

Last month we had occasion to quote, from the religious poetry of a Catholic,† verses which were calculated to exalt and warm the devotional feelings of all Christians, whatever be their denomination ; and in the present month, a Third and enlarged edition of Dr. Bowring's religious poetry lies on our table, a proof that the laity do not partake in the narrow and sectarian feelings which would exclude all excellence that is not found within the ring-fence of Establishment. Many of these pieces are not less admirable for their poetry, than for their glowing charity and elevating morality. In turning over the collection, the mere embarrassment of riches makes the task of selection difficult. We are, however, guided by what is likely to please the younger portion of our readers.

BAPTISM.

Drop the limpid waters, now,
On the infant's sinless brow ;
Dedicate the unfolding gem
Unto Him, who bless'd the stem.

* A phrase in one of Sir Thomas's last speeches.

† By a mistake, another poem was substituted in the notice of Flowers from the Holy Fathers, in last Number, in place of the one which we intended to cite, in corroboration of what the Roman Catholics profess to consider as the spirit or principle of all true penance. The poem taken is on the text of St. Augustine, "My heart is without rest, O Lord, until it rest in Thee:" that which was meant is on the words of St. Gregory the Great, "In fruit, not in leaves and branches, is penance made known." We shall cite one or two stanzas to show what was aimed at.

With heart and eye prepared to weep,
Sorrow sincere, contrition deep,
Confession serious and complete,—
Such are the wants for penance meet :
But, more than all, a purpose sure,
To sin no more, for love or lure !

Though at Confession's Chair we bow
With tearful eye, and humbled brow,
'Tis mockery and idle pain,
If we rise up to sin again.—
Albeit the bud be red and fair,
A worm is working meanwhile there !

What though we tell with moistened cheek,
With quivering lip, and action meek,
A bead-roll dark of many a sin
'Gainst God and man, without, within,—
Our tears are lost, our penance vain,
If we go home to sin again.

Let our aspirations be Innocent as Infancy ;
Pure the prayers that force their way,
As the child for whom we pray.

In the Christian garden we Plant another Christian tree ;
Be its blossoms, and its fruit,
Worthy of the Christian root.

To that garden now we bring
Waters from the living spring ;
Bless the tree, the waters bless,
Holy One ! with holiness.

When life's harvests all are past,
O ! transplant the tree at last,
To the fields where flower and tree
Blossom through eternity.

PROGRESS OF GOSPEL TRUTH.

Upon the gospel's sacred page
The gathered beams of ages shine ;
And as it hastens, every age
But makes its brightness more divine.
On mightier wing, in loftier flight,
From year to year does knowledge soar ;
And as it soars, the gospel light
Adds to its influence more and more.

Truth, strengthened by the strength of thought,
Pours inexhaustible supplies,
Whence sagest teachers may be taught,
And wisdom's self become more wise.

More glorious still as centuries roll,
New regions blessed, new powers unfurled,
Expanding with the expanding soul,
Its waters shall o'erflow the world.

Flow to restore—but not destroy ;
As when the cloudless lamp of day
Pours out its floods of life and joy,
And sweeps each lingering mist away.

SUNDAY EVENING.—SUMMER.

"Let not your hearts be troubled, but confide
"In me as ye confide in God ; I go
"A mansion for my followers to provide ;
"My Father's heavenly dwelling is supplied
"With many mansions ;—I had told ye so,
"Were there not room ;—I hasten to prepare
"Your seats,—and soon will come again, and say,
"Be welcome :—where your Lord inhabits, there,
"There should his followers be : ye know the way ;
"I am the way, the truth, the life."—'Twas thus
The Saviour spoke—and in that blessed road,
What flow'rets grow, what sunbeams shine on us,
All glowing with the brightness of our God !
Heaven seems to open round, the earth is still,
As if to sanctify us for the skies ;
All tending to the realms where blessing lies,
And joy and gladness, up the eternal hill.
As the heaven-guided prophet, when his eyes
Stretch'd wearied o'er the peaceful promised land,
Even as he stood on Canaan's shores, we stand.

What bigot is prepared to deny to the author of hundreds of such compositions as the above, the name of Christian !

Sketches of Britain. By James Howie, M.D.
Part I.

These are topographical sketches of Scotland, written in a kind of blank verse ; and interspersed with various little tales and episodes. The author does not bind himself down to any locality, but in the strength of his seven-league boots, passes at once from Orkney to Kelsae Bridge, or wherever it pleases him to alight. We cannot say much for the poetry, but the tone of the production is kindly and amiable.

Archib Allan: a Tale in Scottish Verse.

Third edition.

This metrical tale has been highly lauded by some of the Scottish newspapers; and it is pointed out to our notice by one of our most popular living Scottish bards. This ought to be fame enough, in all conscience, for the author of Archib Allan, which has received a heaped measure of praise.

Pride; or, the Heir of Craiven. A Poem. By Henry Cook, Author of "Adrian, the Star of Destiny," &c.

A poem of the school of Byron.

The Thakoorine: A Tale of Mandoos. By Captain James Abbott.

The subject of this poem is a romantic oriental love tradition. The poem is full of sparkling fancy, and not without fire.

Buckingham's America, Historical, Statistical, and Descriptive. 3 volumes octavo; with a Portrait of the Author, a Map of the United States, and numerous Wood Engravings of churches, public buildings, remarkable scenes, &c. &c.

The design of Mr. Buckingham is but half completed in these three bulky tomes, which are confined to his travels in the Atlantic States. A Second Series is contemplated, which will comprehend the remainder of his travels in the Southern and Western States. The second series, from relating to fresher scenes, and to communities less known to travellers, will probably possess even greater interest than the journey through the beaten track; in which Mr. Buckingham has, moreover, overlaid, if he has not often fairly swamped his personal adventures, by heavy loads of topographical description, history and statistics. His previous reputation as a traveller and lecturer, and his long advocacy of the Temperance Cause, prepared the citizens of the United States to receive Mr. Buckingham with kindness and distinction. The combined object of his visit was to deliver his lectures on the East, and to observe and report on the Western Republic with accuracy and impartiality. He accordingly landed at New York towards the end of October 1837, and until his departure from the United States, lost no opportunity of making himself intimately and thoroughly acquainted with whatever can interest an intelligent traveller who means to write a great book, for the instruction of his countrymen at home, about one of the most remarkable countries on the face of the globe.

Mr. Buckingham confirms what every traveller has affirmed of the superior condition of the humbler classes in America, when compared with persons of the same rank in England. "All seem to possess good dwellings, abundant clothing, and an ample supply of food." You see (in the cities) no beggars; and "no drunken men and women, with filthy ragged children." The following is a clear account of the three political parties of America:—

There are here, as there are in England, three political parties—Conservatives, moderate Reformers, and Radicals; and, following after the bad example of the mother country, each party seems determined to see no virtue and no merit in either of the others. The Conservatives are here called Whigs; the moderate Reformers are called Democrats; and the Radicals are called Loco Focos,* a recent name.

The Conservatives are here called Whigs; and they correspond in political character and sentiment with the Whigs of England; being quite as loud in their professions of liberal principles, but quite as unwilling to carry them out into practice. One of their leading organs lately published a very remarkable essay, signed "Sidney," attributed to the pen of a prominent leader of the Whig party, which, besides advocating conservative principles generally, went the length of saying, that "experience had shown that there was as much chance of obtaining a good chief magistrate by hereditary descent as by popular election, and that, consequently, the monarchical principle was as favourable to liberty as the republican." This doctrine was so acceptable to the greater number of the Whigs, that most of their newspapers lauded it; until it was attacked with such ability and force in the democratic prints, that the young men among the Whigs felt it necessary to hold a public meeting to disavow their participation in any such doctrine, and to declare themselves to be uncompromising Republicans.

As far, however, as I was able to discover, by my intercourse with editors and political men of all parties, and by comparison of their journals, I found the American Whigs to be quite as conservative as their namesakes at home. They are nearly all in favour of giving wealth a more open and direct influence than it now possesses, in the suffrage for elections, and would be glad to exclude from the electoral body all who have not some fixed amount of property.

Nearly all the rich capitalists and merchants of New York belong to the Whig party; and the greater number of the New York newspapers are in its interest. We imagine, however, that Mr. Buckingham's observations apply mainly to New York; and that other localities are much more republican. His testimony on the following point is valuable:—

In all the instances that I witnessed of the business of polling—and I visited many of the wards for that purpose—the whole affair was conducted with much more order and decorum than any contested election that I had ever seen in England. There were no party badges, in colours or ribbons, to excite party animosity. There was no drunkenness, riot, or abuse of any kind. Every man came freely to the poll, and went away as freely from it; and though in the greatest number of cases it was well known which way he would vote when he entered, and which way he had voted when he left, none offered him the slightest molestation in word or deed, or even in gesture. In some of the wards, where the emigrants abound, it is said that this order and decorum does not always prevail; but that between Irish excitability and American rum and whisky, there are sometimes torn garments, and hard words exchanged; but even here, violent outrage is seldom committed. It is possible, therefore, that universal suffrage, annual elections, and vote by ballot, may be much less productive of riot, drunkenness, and disorder, than limited suffrage, unfrequent elections, and open voting; for in England, Scotland, and Ireland, where these prevail, the scenes of dissipation and outrage are frequent; and here, where these opposites are practised, they are rare.

Mr. Buckingham gave deep offence to the sensitive white-skins of New York, by permitting persons of a somewhat darker hue to attend his lectures. An anonymous correspondent warned him against the evil consequences to himself of permitting such "amalgamation," which, he was assured, "would never be tolerated by a refined and intelligent community." He retorts happily on the "professedly religious."

I took no public notice whatever of these anonymous communications, though I had occasion to know, verbally, from several quarters, that very many persons had been deterred from attending my lectures here, (and those absentees were mostly persons professedly religious,) because the "coloured people" were thus allowed to sit in the same part of the chapel with the whites. What makes this affected horror of "amalgamation" the more revolting is, that many of the very gentlemen who declare themselves to be so insulted and degraded by being placed ~~so~~ near the "coloured people" as to sit by them, have no scruple whatever to keep coloured women as mistresses, and have large families of children by them. Without this actual amalgamation, indeed, between the white races and the black, there would be none of the mulatto or brown-coloured people in existence. Yet in the northern states of America these "mixed races" are far more numerous than the pure African black; and, therefore, the pretended horror of the slight amalgamation which sitting together in the same chapel involves, while the fruits of a much closer amalgamation meet you at every step, in the highways and byways of the country, is the very acmé of hypocrisy and pharasaical deceit.

* Loco Focos is the name of a sort of Lucifer matches.

A Washington newspaper editor thought Othello a very improper play for representation; the dark Moor wooing the fair Desdemona was "revolting;" and Shakespeare would have deserved to be lynched for having written it, if caught in a Southern State! The play of the Gladiator gave equal offence; and coloured people were not permitted to enter the gallery to witness the representation, lest, we suppose, the animated exhortations of Spartacus to the slaves had put mischief into their woolly heads.

Mr. Buckingham made a point of visiting the Benevolent Institutions of every town to which he went; and he was often invited to assist at those public meetings for useful purposes which are so frequent in America. He has paid much attention to the popular literature, and to the state of the fine arts, which is not high—nor yet promising. Mr. Buckingham throughout inveighs against the most un-English boarding-house system which prevails in all the towns of America; and against the cookery of food, as well as the indecorous haste in which it is universally bolted.

Mr. Webster is considered by many in this country as a very great man, if not the very greatest man in the Union. Of him Mr. Buckingham saw a good deal, both in New York and at Washington; and one is anxious to learn the opinion of a competent judge about the Yankee Daniel. It is this—

Mr. Webster is, and I think justly, considered to be the most powerful orator, the best reasoner, and the most sound-judging of all the senatorial or representative body; yet even he, I think, is greatly over-rated. The doctrine of high duties, tariffs, and protection for domestic manufactures, so long exploded by all the best writers on political economy in Europe, (French, Italian, and German, as well as English,) is dear to Mr. Webster; and he lauds it as the key-stone of the American system. Bank monopolies, and the possession of the immense power over prices and exchanges, which such monopolies give to those who enjoy them, appear to him wholesome and beneficial to trade. He is what in England would be called truly Conservative; and if he were in the English House of Commons, he would act with Mr. Matthias Attwood, Mr. Alderman Thompson, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. Aaron Chapman, and Mr. George Frederick Young, on all questions of protection for shipping and trade. He is, no doubt, a more able man than any of these, and a far better speaker. Indeed, he may be justly called a statesman and an orator, and in both these capacities he seemed to me far superior to Mr. Clay or Mr. Calhoun; the former of whom entertains all Mr. Webster's contracted views about the tariff and bank monopolies; while the latter is the gentleman who declared, "that the slavery of the black was the most perfect guarantee of freedom for the whites;" and who had such just conceptions of this freedom, as to declare, that "if the whites of South Carolina could but catch an abolitionist within their borders, they would hang him up without judge or jury."

Of a speech made by Webster in Congress, in opposition to Calhoun, and which was extravagantly praised in the newspapers of his party, Mr. Buckingham remarks,

Although this great effort of Mr. Webster's would have been thought a good speech in either House of Parliament, or at any public meeting in England, it certainly would not be described in terms of such extreme eulogy as is here bestowed upon it. It was far inferior to speeches delivered in every session in England, by such speakers as Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham in the upper House, and by Sir Robert Peel, Mr. O'Connell, Lord Stanley, and Mr. Sheil in the lower House; and the only way in which I could account for this extravagant praise of it, was to attribute it partly to the bias which partisanship gives to all opinions, and partly to the want of familiarity with higher models of excellence than those by whom they are surrounded.

In personal appearance, Mr. Webster is rather above the middle size, and presents the figure of a powerfully athletic man. His complexion is very dark, as much so as that of the darkest Spaniard, and his full hair is jet black. His countenance is striking; but from his large dark eyes, full overhanging eyebrows, and curl of the lip, the expression is not that of kindness or benevolence.

The traveller considers Mr. John Quincy Adams, the ex-President, as the true great statesman of America. His opportunities and training have been equal to his intellect.

Mr. Adams has been in public life since he was fifteen, being then secretary to his father. He has filled the office of ambassador at several foreign courts of Europe; at home he has been Secretary of State, Senator, President; and he is now a representative, at the age of seventy. He is admitted to be the most learned of all the public men of America; adding, however, to his book-learning, an extensive knowledge of the world, and experience in public affairs; but the noble stand he has always taken against slavery, causes him to be an object of distrust, if not of hatred, to those Members who desire to perpetuate that degrading institution; and therefore he is more frequently annoyed and interrupted in his proceedings than he would be if less firm and less consistent in his course. His habits are peculiar: he has risen every morning of his life, for the last forty years, it is said, at four o'clock in the morning, lighting his own fire in the winter at that hour, and in the summer taking an early daylight walk; and before the hour of the meeting of Congress arrives, which is noon, he has usually performed a good day's work. He has kept a full record, it is asserted, of all the most interesting events of the times, and especially those of which, though relating to public affairs, he may be said to know the secret history and working; and it is added that he has no less than seventy-five folio manuscript volumes of this description, written with his own hand. I had the pleasure of seeing him often, in interchanges of visits during my stay at Washington, and can testify to the great extent of his general information, his humane and liberal principles, his fine clear intellect and vigorous mental power, and his very cheerful and agreeable manners.

Mr. Buckingham does not admire the state of society in Washington.

With more of ostentation, there is less of hospitality and less of elegance than in New York; and a sort of aristocratic air is strangely mingled with manners far from polished or refined. The taste for parties of pleasure is so general, however, that dissipation may be said to be the leading characteristic of Washington society; and one sees this fearfully exhibited in the palaces and languor of the young ladies, who are brought here from their homes to be introduced into fashionable life. These are seen in a state of feebleness and exhaustion, from late hours and continued excitement, long before their forms are fully developed, or their constitutions perfectly formed; and while these ravages are committed on their bodies, their minds are neither cultivated nor strengthened, as the gossip and talk of the morning is usually but a recapitulation of the adventures and occupations of the evening. During all our stay, in all our visits, I do not remember a single instance in which any literary or scientific subject was the topic of conversation; or the merits of any book, or any author, the subject of discussion. There seemed, in short, united in the circles of Washington, all the pretensions of a metropolis, with all the frivolity of a watering-place; and the union was anything but agreeable.

Besides the opportunities we possessed of seeing the largest assemblies at the President's drawing-room and at private parties, we attended a concert given by Madame Caradori Allan, at Carusi's Saloon, where, it was said, all the beauty and fashion of Washington were present; and being advantageously seated, we had the best opportunity of observation. The female beauty was not to be compared, in number or degree, to that which we had seen in similar assemblages at New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; nor was there nearly as much elegance of dress, or gracefulness and propriety of manner. The ladies were noisy and almost vociferous in their conversation, which is contrary to the general habit of American ladies, who are more tranquil and retiring in mixed society than the English; and the men were in general boisterous in their manners, with a greater attempt at playing the dandy or beau, than we had before observed in our journey through the country. The concert-room was very large, and the ladies were intermingled in all parts with the gentlemen; yet the greater number of these last stood up, even during the performance, while the ladies were seated behind and beside them; many kept their hats on, and a great number came with stout walking-sticks; so that when any part of the music was applauded, it was done by the loudest knocking of these sticks against the floor.

Here a good story is told of an English singer, which does much honour to her spirit and sense.

A General, living in the neighbourhood of Philadelphia, who had become suddenly rich, furnished a house in a costly manner, and gave gay parties. He had little else but his wealth, however, to render them attractive; his wife being especially untutored and unpolished, as he had married before he became rich, and both were elevated to their present importance without the requisite personal qualifications to sustain it. To render one of their parties more than usually popular, they invited Mr. and Mrs. Wood among their guests; these at first respectfully declined, on the ground of fatigue; but they were pressed with so much earnestness, that they at length were subdued into consent. When the entertainments of the evening were fairly commenced, and several ladies among the visitors had sung, the hostess invited Mrs. Wood to seat herself at the piano, as the company would be delighted to hear her beautiful voice; but Mrs. Wood begged, with a very serious countenance, to be excused. At first the astonishment created by this refusal was evinced by a dead silence, and a fixed stare; but at length, the disappointed hostess broke forth:—"What! not sing! Mrs. Wood; why, it was for this that I invited you to my party. I should not have thought of asking you but for this; and I told all my guests that you were coming, and that they would hear you sing!" "Oh!" replied Mrs. Wood, with great readiness, "that quite alters the case; I was not at all aware of this, or I should not have refused; but since you have invited me professionally, I shall of course sing immediately!" "That's a good creature," rejoined the hostess, "I thought you could not persist in refusing me." So Mrs. Wood seated herself at the piano, sang delightfully, and, to the entire gratification of hostess and guests, gave, without hesitation, every song she was asked for, and some were encored. On the following day, however, when the host and hostess were counting up the cost of their entertainment, (for, rich as they were, they had not lost their former regard for economy,) to their utter consternation there came in a bill from Mr. Wood of two hundred dollars for Mrs. Wood's "professional services" at the party of the preceding evening, accompanied by a note, couched in terms which made it quite certain that the demand would be legally enforced if attempted to be resisted; and, however much they were mortified by this unexpected demand, they deemed it most prudent to pay it, and hold their tongues.

The hotels of Washington—at which strangers usually reside for a few days before they get into a boarding-house, if they intend a long residence in the city, or where they remain entirely if their visit is a short one—are greatly inferior to those of New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore; and the boarding-houses are still worse. In both, the domestics are all negroes; and in the latter, mostly slaves. They are generally dirty in their persons, slovenly in their apparel, and unskilful and inattentive in their duties. In the boarding-houses, the members of Congress, and other inmates who use them, occupy a separate bedroom, which they use for office, bureau, receiving-room, and all; and on passing by these, when the door is open, one sees a four-post bed without canopy or furniture, the upper extremities of the posts not being even connected by any frame-work; and the bed pushed close up against the wall by the side, to leave the larger space in the rest of the room. A table covered with papers occupies the middle of the apartment, often with a single chair only, and that frequently a broken one; and around on the floor are strewn, in the greatest disorder and confusion, heaps of congressional documents, large logs of firewood piled up in pyramids, the wash-bason and ewer, printed books, and a litter of unfolded and unbrushed clothes.

The drawing-room of the hôtel or boarding-house is used by all equally, and is usually in better condition than the private apartments, though, even in these, the dust of the wood fires, (universal in Washington,) the multiplicity of newspapers and other things scattered about, take away all appearance of cleanliness or elegance. The eating-room is used for breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper; and a long table, spread out the whole length of the room, is kept always laid throughout the entire day and night. The process is this: the table is first laid over night, for breakfast; when this meal is over, however, the table is merely swept, so as to remove the crumbs, and the cloth, not being taken off, even to be shaken or folded up, is suffered to continue on for dinner, the only precaution used, partaking at all of cleanliness, being that of laying the dinner-plates, which are put on the moment breakfast is over, with their faces downward, so that they may not receive the dust.

Dinner is brought on at the appointed hour; but so unacquainted with comfort, or so indifferent to it, are the parties furnishing it, that no warm plates are provided; iron forks alone are used; the earthenware and glass are of the commonest description, and often broken; indeed, articles that would be thrown away as worn out in England, continue to be used here, broken as they are, and no one seems to think of repairing or mending; while the provisions are of the poorest kind, and most wretchedly cooked and prepared. The dishes are all brought to table without covers, and are consequently cold before the parties are seated, and with the exception of now and then, but very rarely, a good fish, (rock fish and perch,) from the river Potomac, we never partook of any good dish of meat, poultry, or vegetables, during all our stay in Washington, though not at all fastidious in our taste, or difficult to please in this respect, preferring always the plain and simple in food, as well as drink. The table-cloth used for breakfast and dinner remains on for tea, which is taken at the same long table, from common earthenware teapots, broken and smoked by long standing before the fire; and after supper the same cloth still remains on for breakfast the next morning, which is laid overnight, as soon as the supper is done.

The same hurry in eating was observable here as in all the other cities we had visited. The boarders are rung out of bed by a large and noisy hand-bell, at half-past seven, and at eight the breakfast is begun. Many persons seemed to us to finish in five minutes, but none exceeded a quarter of an hour; and the instant that any one had done, he rose up, quitted the table, and went into the drawing-room to read the newspapers; so that it sometimes happened, that at a quarter past eight we came down and found everybody gone, leaving us in exclusive possession of the breakfast table. At dinner it was the same; and the whole style and manner of living had a coldness and selfishness about it, which we could not approve.

This extract gives one a tolerable idea of the manner of life in the capital of the United States, which, with the exception of some of the half-barbarous new Western towns, seems to be the most disagreeable place of residence in the Union. The above are merely faults or defects in manners and in trifling modes; but the society of Washington, according to Mr. Buckingham, is corrupt and dissolute in the extreme. For example—

It was matter of notoriety, that a resident of the city, who kept a boarding-house, and who entertained a strong feeling of resentment towards Mr. Wise, one of the members for Virginia, went constantly armed with loaded pistols and a long bowie-knife, watching his opportunity to assassinate him. He had been foiled in the attempt, on two or three occasions, by finding this gentleman armed also, and generally accompanied by friends; but though the magistrates of the city were warned of this intended assassination, they were either afraid to apprehend the individual, or from some other motive, declined or neglected to do so; and he accordingly walked abroad armed as usual.

Mr. Wise himself, as well as many others of the members from the South and West, go habitually armed into the House of Representatives and Senate; concealed pistols and dirks being the usual instruments worn by them beneath their clothes.

This practice of carrying arms on the person is, no doubt, one of the reasons why so many atrocious acts are done under the immediate influence of passion; which, were no arms at hand, would waste itself in words, or blows at the utmost; but now too often results in death. A medical gentleman, resident in the city, told me he was recently called in to see a young girl who had been shot at with a pistol by one of her paramours, the ball grazing her cheek with a deep wound, and disfiguring her for life; and yet nothing whatever was done to the individual, who had only failed by accident in his intention to destroy her life. In this city are many establishments where young girls are collected by procuresses, and one of these was said to be kept by a young man who had persuaded or coerced all his sisters into prostitution, and lived on the wages of their infamy. These houses are frequented in open day; and hackney-coaches may be seen almost constantly before their doors. In fact, the total absence of all restraint upon the actions of men here, either legal or moral, occasions such open and unblushing displays of recklessness and profligacy, as would hardly be credited if mentioned in detail.

There can be no doubt that the existence of slavery in this district has much to do with creating such a state of things as this; and as Washington is one of the great slave marts of the country, where buyers and sellers of their fellow-creatures come to traffic in human flesh; and where men, women, and children are put up to auction, and sold to the highest bidder, like so many head of cattle; this brings together such a collection of speculators, slave-dealers, gamblers, and adventurers, as to taint the whole social atmosphere with their vices.

More anecdotes of this kind are related; and we hear of private assassinations, even worse than the lynchings, which are taken no notice of by any one.

Though this and many other sections of Mr. Buckingham's work, abound in information, just reflection, and entertaining descriptions of social manners and usages, not a little of it may be referred, to what, for want of a better name, we may term the Take-you-by-the-button School; that, in which an author, having once made sure of his reader, insists upon overwhelming him with a flood of irrelevant matter, or with what has but the slightest possible connexion with the subject in hand. It is true the reader sees Historical and Statistical painted upon the warning post of the title-page; yet he is not prepared for the deluge of topographical history which awaits him, and therefore he gets impatient or out of temper, at finding the course of the personal narrative, which is generally amusing and instructive, continually interrupted by dry statistics and long digressions.

Mr. Buckingham visited the Saratoga springs, at which, in the season, the company affords the European stranger a fair representation of all the classes and tribes of the Union; the rich merchants of New Orleans, the wealthy planter from Arkansas, Alabama, and Tennessee, with the more polished and haughty landowner of Georgia and Virginia, the successful speculator in land from Kentucky, Ohio, Missouri, and Michigan; the rich capitalist from Boston and New York, the grave Quaker from Providence and Philadelphia, the official functionary from Washington, and the learned professor from Newhaven, Cambridge, or Hartford, who are found mingled, in strange variety, in Congress Hall. Of this aggregate national assembly, Mr. Buckingham remarks—

There were quite as many elegant men, and a great many more beautiful women than are usually seen among a similar number of persons assembled in any public room at Brighton, Cheltenham, or Bath. Those from the south bore away the palm of superiority in beauty and manners; there being an ease, a grace, and an elegance or polish about the Southern, whether ladies or gentlemen, which those of the North, as far as my observation has yet extended, did not attain. The women are incomparably more beautiful; and we saw here some from Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland, especially from Charleston, Norfolk, and Baltimore, that would grace any court in Europe; while from Philadelphia and New York there were also some lovely countenances, especially among the young.

My opinion indeed was here strongly confirmed, that there is no country in Europe, in which there are so many beautiful faces among the women as in this; the symmetry of their features, the contrast between the marvellous whiteness of their complexion, and their dark eyes and hair, small mouths, and beautifully white and regular teeth, are the chief traits of their beauty. But, on the other hand, they want the full development of figure and bust, as well as the rosy complexion and coral lips, of the healthy English beauty; and are still more deficient in that gaiety and animation, which a brilliant female countenance so often expresses, in the look of intelligence, and glow of feeling and sentiment, which accompany the utterance of a well-educated and well-bred woman at home.

Of the men in the fashionable circles of society here, the difference between the old and the young is very striking. The old men, from the south, and from Carolina and Virginia especially, are what would be called perfect gentlemen of the old school with us,—precise, yet elegant in their dress—courteous and affable in their manners—high-toned in their politics and taste—lax in their morality, while fashion sanctions their conduct—warm in their attachments—fierce in their resentments—and punctilious in all points of honour and etiquette.

The younger men among the fashionables are almost all copyists of the dress, style, and manners of the "young men about town," as they are called in London, and are chiefly remarkable for foppery of dress, and the assumption of beards, moustachios, and other exotic fashions as if they were either foreigners themselves, or had travelled so long on the continent of Europe, as to bear about them the marks of their sojourn at Rome, Naples, and Paris. Their manners, too, like those of our "young men about town," are rather familiar than elegant, and more remarkable for brusquerie and nonchalance, than for courtesy or refinement.

Mr. Buckingham repeats what has so often been remarked of the predominance in society of the young in this young, go-a-head country.

Here at Saratoga, in all the parties we visited, whether balls, concerts, or promenades, the married ladies were seemingly only valued as persons necessary to give countenance to the assembling of the young; while these usurped all authority and influence, and monopolized the exclusive attention of the men.

I cannot but think that the gay season at Saratoga is a very unfavourable preparation for the discharge of those social and domestic duties which all are sooner or later called upon to discharge.

Take the general routine of a day at the Springs, as an example. All rise between 6 and 7 o'clock; and at half-past 7, the drawing-room of each of the larger hotels is filled with from 200 to 300 persons promenading till the folding doors are thrown open for admission to the dining-hall, when this large number seat themselves at breakfast. The meal is generally a substantial one, a variety of dishes being placed on the table; and few persons breakfasting without partaking of some description of animal food: but the rapidity with which it is despatched is its most remarkable feature, the longest time taken by the slowest being never more than 15 minutes, some of the quickest getting through the meal in five minutes, and the average number occupying about 10.

In the busy cities, the reason assigned for this haste is the keen pursuit of business, and the eager desire to get to the counting-house or store; but here, with the entire day before them, and nothing whatever to do, they eat with just the same haste as at other places. The contest for the dishes is a perfect scramble; the noise and clatter of the waiters and their wares is absolutely deafening; no one gets precisely what he wants, though every one is searching after something.

The period between breakfast at 8 o'clock and dinner at 2, is occupied by the more active in excursions to the surrounding points of attraction, on horseback or in carriages: but the greater number remain at home; and the drawing-room is then the general lounge, where groups of the young are formed, who sit for hours engaged in the merest gossip of trifling talk, for it hardly deserves the name of conversation; and neither books, music, nor drawing occupy any portion of the time.

Dressing for dinner fills up a vacant hour; at one, and at half-past one, the drawing-room is again crowded with the promenading parties waiting for the opening of the folding doors to admit them to dinner. The hurry and bustle of the breakfast scene is again repeated, with little of table enjoyment, to reconcile the parties to the heat and noise of the room. The fare is what in England would be called coarse and bad—the dishes few in number, and wretchedly cooked, besides being all lukewarm; and the miserable sprinkling of bad vegetables, being almost as cold as if they had been dressed on the preceding day—no covers for the dishes, or warm plates for the guests—no appointed carvers—an insufficiency of attendants—and altogether an ill-managed and an ill-enjoyed dinner. The escape from this is almost as rapid as from the breakfast, and 15 minutes may be regarded as the average time occupied in it; though a few may sit perhaps from 20 to 25 minutes, but none for half an hour.

The afternoon is literally whiled away between the drawing-room and the sleeping-room; or in the spacious and shady piazzas or verandas, in one of which fronting the garden at the back of the house, the gentlemen retire to smoke their cigars; and in the other, in front of the house, ladies and gentlemen, not otherwise occupied, mingle in the promenade. In all the great houses, everything is sacrificed to appearance. The piazzas are of splendid dimensions, 200 feet by 20, and 50 feet high, supported by lofty pillars, entwined with spiral wreaths of foliage—the dining-halls capable of seating 400 persons—the drawing-rooms, especially that of the United States, of magnificent dimensions, and handsomely furnished: but the bed-rooms are generally exceedingly small, those of Congress Hall especially, scantily provided, and altogether inferior to what the scale and style of the house, in other respects, would warrant the visitor to expect.

The third meal, of tea, is taken at seven o'clock, and is, in short, a supper, as meats of various kinds are placed on the table, which is covered with a table-cloth as at dinner, and at which the 200 or 300 visitors seat themselves in the same way. This is got through with the same rapidity as the two preceding ones; no fatigue during the day, or any other consideration, inducing persons to relax in the least from the hurry with which everything is done in this country.

The evenings are more varied than the day, as there is sometimes a ball, and sometimes a "hop," as it is termed here, the difference being that at the former a full-dress is expected, at the latter the ordinary dinner-dress will suffice; occasionally there is a concert, sometimes a display of ventriloquism, now and then a farce by a company of strolling players, and this again varied by a conjuror with tricks of legerdemain. It is in this vein of the trifling and the ridiculous that the taste is said to run at all times here.

Mr. Buckingham has, in short, as bad an opinion of the moral effects of the annual pilgrimages to the fashionable watering-places, in which the Americans universally indulge, as some of their native writers. He considers them injurious to good manners, to domestic habits, and even to health; and imagines that both the Americans and English might employ their leisure, and spend their money to much more advantage in actual travelling with their children, than in annually congregating at a fashionable rendezvous of vanity, indolence, and dissipation.

One of the most pleasing features in this comprehensive work is a very long list of respectable subscribers, from all parts of the three kingdoms, which shows that Mr. Buckingham's former literary labours have been duly appreciated.

From the concluding part of his narrative, which is to appear in the course of the present year, we anticipate a variety of new information, and remark; and if not of more intrinsic value than the first part, it must, at all events, be more rare and original; because, for ten English travellers who visit New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, not one extends the journey to Cincinnati or St. Louis; to New Orleans, the prairies of the Illinois, and the Lakes; and Mr. Buckingham traversed all these regions, and visited each of their cities and towns.

General Views of the History and Literature of Italy.

By L. Mariotti. 2 vols. Saunders & Otley.

These are the substance of a very comprehensive course of lectures, delivered by Mr. Mariotti in the United States, and of which several have since appeared in English periodical works. They are meant principally to elucidate the history and literature of the author's native country in its existing state; but the history of Italian literature and art belongs to the past. The chapters on recent times and recent authors are therefore comparatively few and brief, commencing with the rise of the musical melo-drama at the close of the sixteenth century, and the serious opera of Metastase

The great names of Italy had been by this date well nigh exhausted.

Goldoni and Alfieri introduce another and a very different set of actors,—Napoleon and his soldiers, and those native writers whose works cherished that spirit of revolution which contains the germ of national cohesion and renovation. Like almost every patriotic Italian, M. Mariotti is the avowed enemy of the Austrian sway, though he thinks with indulgence of the motives which led some of his fellow-countrymen to submission. "Now," he says, "a complete moral revolution must precede any future political movement." The prospect of Italian emancipation is dim and distant. Popular education, which, within certain limits, is permitted or fostered in the native dominions of Austria, is in Italy the object of the blind persecution of the delegated rulers; and the Pope, on the other hand, launches the thunders of the Vatican against the Schoolmaster. This writer enumerates some slight but hopeful symptoms of improvement. Literary men begin to form associations; authors are now secured in their copyrights over all the States; and, what is more remarkable, with the bad example of France—and shall we say of England!—before them, since the year 1814, no immoral book, nor book of immoral tendency, has issued from the press of Italy; one good fruit of the severe censorship, which, however, not only suppresses native literature, but rigidly excludes foreign works. Yet the romances and poetry of England do find a way into "the iron-fenced garden of Europe."

Whether this work be great and perfect, or wanting, in many respects, to the wide subject it embraces, it may be studied with advantage by foreigners, as embodying much that Italians of all ages have thought and spoken of their poets and illustrious men, and of the most momentous epochs of their national history.

Letters from Italy, to a Younger Sister. By Catherine Taylor. Volume II.

The first volume of this work, which was published some months since, was introduced to our readers with the commendation which it well merited. In the concluding volume we accompany the authoress from Rome to Naples; back again to Rome; and from thence to Florence; and by Bologna and Ferrara to Venice; whence she proceeded by the usual route to Milan, and across the Simplon on to Geneva. The work is continued in the spirit in which it was commenced; easy, elegant, and instructive, especially to "younger sisters." The party with whom Miss Taylor travelled, returned to Rome before Holy Week, the sights of which she has picturesquely described.

Fallacies of the Faculty. By Samuel Dickson. Second edition.

This work,—what between professional jealousy and that perception of truth, or spirit of revenge, which leads the non-professional to enjoy a hit at the doctors, and to see the tables turned upon these medical Sir Oracles by one of themselves,—has been fairly abused and praised into fame. Although the author, who is a daring innovator, nay a complete Destructive, may have often mistaken the reverse of wrong for right, he has undoubtedly stimulated clever young men in the profession to investigation; and established the fact enunciated by a brother of the craft, that "British Medical practice deals too much in heroics" and in drugs.

This edition of a clever, stimulating, and suggestive book is considerably enlarged by the accumulation of illustrative facts; and it is in other respects improved. We could wish, however, that Dr. Dickson were a little more indulgent and respectful to his professional brethren, even when he supposes them the most erring and the most conceited in their errors.

What to Observe; or, The Traveller's Remembrancer.
By J. R. Jackson.

This a very thick volume, pointing out to travellers what they ought to observe among the numerous objects which meet their view, or that may be discovered in a new country. Natural and scientific objects are first discussed; then follow the inhabitants of the countries observed, their cities, habitations, modes of life, industry, commerce, government, &c. &c. Each of these great sections is divided into numerous branches. There is, in short, a great quantity of material in the book, not very well digested or arranged; for it is in substance a cyclopædia as well as a traveller's director. There are also useful tables.

Johnson on Life, Health, and Disease.

This is the fifth edition of a popularly conceived Medical Treatise, of which we must, in all probability, have said much good before this, as we certainly, on its first perusal, thought highly of the work. The maxims of Dr. Johnson are temperance and exercise; no coddling and comforting,—and defy the doctor! All this is enforced with just such a touch of sensible swagger and good-humoured bullying, as many people like to be treated and tickled with by their favourite physician; and which some of the most eminent of the medical faculty have, upon calculation, not despised to employ.

An Improved Plan of Cure for Spinal Diseases and Nervous Complaints. By John Hey Robertson, M.D.

A physician, who has in Glasgow frequently and successfully treated spinal disease, here details his practice and its results, illustrating it by numerous cases. His practice is the application of Acupuncture, and also what he calls the Dry Cup.—Affections of the Spine are found in women, in comparison with men, as two to one. They appear from the age of ten to thirty, and mostly in the unmarried, and among the upper classes—or females exempted from labour of any kind. The description of Dr. Robertson's grand remedial process by Dry-cupping is too long for us. The Dry Cups operate by pressure. The Dry Cups are employed in chronic rheumatism, lumbago, strains, &c., besides those spinal cases to which Dr. Robertson's attention has been especially directed. He often follows up the Dry-cupping with a blister on the part cupped; which may have a good deal to say to the cure. The Doctor decidedly denounces steel stays as useless where they are not positively injurious.

A Collection of English Sonnets. By Robert Fletcher Housman, Esq. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

This is an elegant and desirable volume of poetry—comprehending nearly all the best sonnets that have appeared in the language, chronologically arranged. We must except those of Wordsworth, of which, they being all eminently beautiful, and very numerous, only the finest are chosen. Numerous notes, explanatory and critical, accompany the collection, and give it great additional value, from embodying interesting facts, and also the opinions of eminent critics. In short, the book is decidedly of those that one likes to have at all times lying about one, ready to take up as a gentle means of being speedily wafted from this weary, work-a-day world, into the Elysian regions of imagination.

The Laird of Logan; or, Anecdotes and Tales illustrative of the Wit and Humour of Scotland.

We had fancied this collection of good things, a new edition of that amusing miscellany of jokes and anecdotes, "Wit in the West;" but it turns out nearly a new collection. To it is prefixed Biographical Sketches of the editors and contributors to the original "Laird of Logan;" namely, Mr. John Donald Carriek, Mr. Andrew Henderson, and Mr. William Motherwell, "fellows of infinite humour," and now all prematurely slumbering near each other in the Necropolis of Glasgow. A new character is introduced in this extended collection, a flying stationer, or last-speech crier, named, from his vocation, Hawkie, who says, or at least stands sponsor for, many biting and droll sayings. The work, though best adapted to Scotland, and to the western lowland regions of our country, is altogether an amusing melange. Are not, by the way, those humorous stories getting somewhat obsolete that turn merely on dram-drinking and whisky?

Lights, Shadows, and Reflections of Whigs and Tories. By a Country Gentleman.

The author of these Sketches disclaims the idea of entering the lists against Lord Brougham, though his work, which was far advanced before his lordship's appeared, is of the same nature, and the individuals discussed often the same. The Country Gentleman, however, differs in many points from Lord Brougham, and among others in unqualified admiration of the present Whig Ministry. The work may be read with advantage by those who wish to refresh their memories on the political history of the last half century.

The Discovery of America by the Northmen in the Tenth Century. By North Ludlow Beamish.

Some years since, Professor Rafn of Copenhagen published an elaborate work, the fruit of his researches among recovered ancient Icelandic manuscripts, proving, as he and many of his countrymen believe, that the continent of America had been discovered by the Northmen, five hundred years before the reputed discovery of Columbus. The popular parts of the Professor's learned work are selected by a patriotic Irishman, gratified by the share which his countrymen are imagined to have had in the discovery and settlement of some Terra Incognita, which the Northmen then named White Man's Land, or GREAT IRELAND.

Professor Rafn is of opinion that the GREAT IRELAND of the Northmen was the country situated to the south of Chesapeake Bay, including North and South Carolina, Georgia, and East Florida. There is said to be a tradition among the Shawanese Indians, that Florida was once inhabited by white men, who used iron instruments. The investigation is curious; though, in utilitarian language, it is like to prove little or nothing.

Carmichael's Irregular and Defective Greek Verbs.

The subject of the present work is one of great interest to the student of the Greek language. During the last half century it has engaged the attention of the most distinguished scholars, whose labours have detected many errors which passed current in former times. The information thus scattered over numerous critical works has recently been collected with great industry, and presented to the public in a more accessible shape. Among those who have thrown most light on this as well as other departments of Greek Grammar, may be particularly mentioned Thiersch, Matthiæ, Buttmann, and Kühner. The lists of irregular and defective verbs presented by Matthiæ and Buttmann are more especially distinguished for their fulness and accuracy. Mr. Carmichael, availing himself of the labours of these, and of others who have preceded him in the same field of inquiry, has endeavoured to exhibit a more comprehensive view of this class of Greek verbs than has hitherto appeared. In performing this task, he has displayed much industry and sound scholarship, and has apparently left few sources of information unexplored. To the authorities for particular verbal forms, he has contributed largely, and has thus rendered his book a storehouse of facts of the utmost value to the student and critic. The alphabetical order has been very properly adopted, as most convenient for reference; but separate lists are given, in which the verbs are arranged according to certain analogies and principles of formation. These will be found highly useful. It may be proper to mention that, in connexion with each verb, its syntactical usage is stated, whenever it contains any peculiarity or difficulty. A work so extensive, and containing such a multitude of details, as well as critical remarks, cannot be expected to be free from occasional errors; but these are such as may easily be removed in a subsequent edition. In some cases, we are inclined to think that the learned author has rested his conclusions on rather slender data, and that a critical examination of the various readings would have led to a different result. Our limits however, will not allow us to enter into detail. We therefore conclude this brief notice, by cordially recommending the work, as a valuable acquisition to the Greek student, and as containing a greater mass of accurate information on the subject to which it relates, than any other with which we are acquainted.

Black's Guide to the English Lakes.

This is a book in season; comprehending all matters necessary to the guidance of the tourist from whatever direction he may approach the Lake Country; and also a great variety of interesting and pleasant information. The work possesses a peculiar beauty in being interspersed with apt quotations from the Lake poets and other distinguished persons who have resided in those romantic regions. It also contains maps, an itinerary, &c.; is very well arranged in its table of contents; and in external form is neat and convenient.

A New Decimal System of Money, Weights, Measures, and Time, &c. By Decimus Mostan, Esq.

Early in life, this gentleman, when a clerk in a London counting-house, set about simplifying the summation of long columns of figures for his personal convenience, and to expedite business. Since that period, he has been in different parts of the world, where accounts were kept in all kinds of monies; and he has never lost sight of his original idea of the utility of a general or universal system of decimal notation. The evils and inconveniences of the present system are acknowledged; but it will not be so easy a matter to effect the contemplated improvement, or rather thorough reform. The work appears to be the result of great research and pains; and if ever the subject be seriously taken up by Parliament, will probably be considered one of some authority.

Modern Judea compared with Ancient Prophecy.

By the Rev. James Aitken Wylie.

This is a work, or a compilation, which is likely to be popular. It is a careful and elaborate account of the Holy Land, deduced from the narratives of every traveller of any note and authority, from the time of SANDYS and MAUNDRELL, down to Lord Lindsay's visit, and Dr. Bowring's Report on Egypt and Syria. But the present physical aspect of Judea, in relation to Scripture Prophecy, is the main end kept in view; and all books of Travels in the Holy Land contain materials more or less for the elucidation of prophecy. Mr. Wylie uniformly gives references to his authorities in foot notes; and the book is illustrated by a few wood-engravings of remarkable scenes; though not of a kind to make us wish for more of them. The most original chapter is the closing one, upon unfulfilled predictions, and the return of the Jews to Palestine, though it is, from the very nature of the subject, inconclusive.

PERIODICAL AND SERIAL WORKS.

TITLE'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND, Vol. II.—This volume of the history, or at least the two-thirds of it, which contain the "Inquiry into the Ancient State and Manners of Scotland," has ever appeared to us the most curious and comprehensive dissertation extant, connected with our national annals. Of itself it would form a most valuable work. It is divided into sections, treating respectively of the general appearance of the country,—its forests, baronial castles, palaces, cottages, hamlets, monasteries, &c.; its early agriculture; its distinct races; government; state of the early Church; of learning, commerce, and navigation; sports and amusements prior to the accession of the Stuarts; and forms altogether one of the most graphic sketches that has ever been given of ancient Scotland, or indeed of any ancient country.

DICTIONARY OF THE ART OF PRINTING. No. XIV.—This Part concludes Prices, and commences Punctuation, one of the most important sections of the work, both to the profession and the public in general.

FISHER'S HISTORIC ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BIBLE, principally after the Old Masters. Vol. I.—This is an exceedingly beautiful work. The volume contains above thirty well-executed engravings, principally after the masterpieces of Rubens, Rembrandt, Raffaele, Poussin, Guido, Guerchino, West, Copley, and whoever among the most eminent artists have most successfully painted Scripture pieces. The illustrations are given in chronological series, and do in truth "form a commentary on the text of the Holy Scriptures not liable to ambiguity or misrepresentation."

ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF THE HOLY BIBLE, with SCOTT'S COMMENTARY. Division First, containing Five Parts, handsomely printed, with beautiful engravings on steel.

SMITH'S STANDARD LIBRARY OF REPRINTS.—I. "Picciola." From the French of Saintine. II. "Rokeby." By Sir Walter Scott. III. The complete Poetical Works of Edward Young, D.D.

YARBELL'S BRITISH BIRDS. Parts XXII., XXIII., XXIV., XXV.—These Parts contain the Grallatores, an interesting genus, from their haunts as well as their habits. The facts communicated to the author in the course of those labours in which so warm an interest is felt by naturalists and amateur ornithologists, are numerous and curious; and the engravings, which abound, are as truthful and exquisitely finished as ever. Storks, Bitterns, Curlews, the Red and the Green-shank; varieties of the Sandpiper, the Godwit, the Ruff, the Woodcock, the Snipe in its varieties, and the Ibis, enrich these numbers, which conclude the second volume of this elegant work.

GRIFFIN'S SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY. Parts VI. and VII.

STANDARD AMERICAN LITERATURE:—"Life and Times of Cranmer." By the author of "The Life and Times of Luther."

TYAS' SHAKSPEARE. Part XXIV. As You Like It.

HISTORY OF NAPOLEON. Part XXVIII.

M'CULLOCH'S GEOGRAPHICAL AND STATISTICAL DICTIONARY.—Part XI. brings us to Nepaul. The Part comprehends Mexico, Manchester, &c. We have more and more to praise the compendious-fulness—if we may use the phrase—and the accuracy of this most useful work.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE. Part XXXIII. Troilus and Cressida.

GOVERNESSES; or, MODERN EDUCATION. By Madame B. Riefrey. Parts I., II., III., IV., V.—This is a series of essays in French, English, and Italian, of which the Numbers already published are mainly on physical education, and written in part by the husband of the editress, who is a medical man. The work, though assuming a definite character, is somewhat vague and discursive; but it contains many just if occasionally commonplace observations, both on the physical and moral training of children. It may be found useful in education as an exercise in modern languages.

PHILOSOPHIC NUTS. No. VI.

HISTORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN INDIA. By Edward Thornton, Esq. Parts I. and II.

LE KEUX'S MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE. Parts XIV. and XV.

BRANDE'S DICTIONARY OF SCIENCE AND LITERATURE. Part V.

MRS. ELLIS' "FAMILY SCENES; or, HOW TO MAKE HOME HAPPY." Part IV.—This is the commencement of a new tale, which promises to be of a more exciting character than the first story of the series. The moral is still Temperance, but in feelings and passions as well as in the use of wine.

THE POPULAR CYCLOPEDIA OF NATURAL SCIENCE:—Vegetable Physiology.—We do not much heed the blazon—The Society for the Promotion of Popular Instruction—which is affixed to this work, nor any blazon of the sort; but we regard the treatise on its own merits as a clear, comprehensive, and useful one, though it had only been published by "All the booksellers."

PAMPHLETS.

Nine Years' Residence, and a Nine Months' Tour on Foot, in the States of New York and Pennsylvania. For the Use of Labourers, Farmers, and Emigrants. By Thomas Dudgeon.

This little work (cost only a few pence,) written by a practical farmer, contains much that will be found as useful to emigrants, and curious to the general reader, as many works of twenty times the price and pretension. Were it not so accessible from the low price, we should quote liberally from it.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

AFTER a protracted debate, a division took place on the fourth June, on a motion of Sir Robert Peel, of "no confidence" in Ministers, which was carried by a majority of one—312 to 311. This vote rendered either the resignation of Ministers or a dissolution of Parliament inevitable; and the latter step having been resolved on, Lord John Russell announced on the seventh, that the discussion on the Corn Laws was to be postponed till next session—that is, till next Parliament; and the House has been occupied, since that period, in getting through business which could not be delayed. The great body of the Members immediately left London to canvass their constituents, so that barely a quorum of the House was left; and on Mr. Scholefield's important motion on the commercial and popular distress, of which he drew a most appalling picture, the House was counted out during the debate, only twenty-four Members being present. The present Session has terminated, as so many others have done before it, without a single useful measure having been carried. In as far as Scotland is concerned, there might as well be no legislature at all. For several years, not only have all attempts to improve her legislation and institutions been abandoned by Ministers, but a systematic opposition against all who propose any alteration, be it good or bad, has been steadfastly maintained.

CORN LAW MEETINGS have been held in almost every town of the three kingdoms. The general feeling appears to be to accept the proposed Government measure as an instalment, but by no means to give up agitating for total repeal. The Chartists, in some few instances, succeeded in throwing the meetings into confusion, but in general they were defeated. We had some fear that, in Ireland, any proposal to reduce the Corn duties would be unpopular, lest the reduction should have the effect of bringing in foreign corn to compete with Irish in the British markets; but we are glad to find that the proposed measure has been at least as well received in Ireland as in Great Britain. As an instance, we may quote the proceedings of the meeting held at Belfast on the second June. A very large number of wealthy landowners were present, and they all expressed a wish for a change in the present Corn Laws, and most of them were in favour of abolition. The following sentiments of Mr. Sharman Crawford, an extensive landed proprietor, were loudly cheered:—"I cannot but feel that those who wilfully raise the prices of human food are, to a certain extent, guilty, if not of actual murder, at least of being its abettors. I cannot bring myself to support the principle which imposes any duty whatever on corn. I cannot even admit the principle of a fixed duty. While I am ready to go along with Ministers in their present proposition, because I am convinced it would be attended with a certain amount of good, I will never give up my deliberate conviction, that the abolition of all duty on corn should be demanded."

THE PETITIONS on the subject of the Corn Laws, up to the fourth June, were:—for repeal, 2940; signatures, 860,492; against, 1827; signatures, 80,336. For proposed measure, 78; signatures, 33,236; against, 1394; number of signatures not mentioned.

NEW ELECTION.—The whole country is in a stir about the coming election: but although both parties express great confidence of obtaining an accession of strength, no opinion can as yet be formed on the subject. In as far as Scotland is concerned, we do not believe that the relative strength of parties will undergo much change. Many believe that throughout the whole kingdom the declaration regarding the alteration of the Corn Laws will do the Whigs harm, not only in the counties, but in the small towns which are dependent on the neighbouring gentry and farmers. We have great hopes that the gain to the liberal party will be more than equal to the losses. The people are becoming aware how much their own interests are involved in the contest. But it is needless to speculate on such a subject, as a few weeks will show how the fact stands.

PENNY POSTAGE.—It is gratifying to find that this bold and beneficial measure is likely to be attended with complete success. It appears from a paper read by Mr. Rowland Hill to the Statistical Society, that the number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom in the week ending 22d March, 1840, was 3,070,000, and in the corresponding week in 1841, 3,700,000; the increase being 630,000, or 21 per cent. Comparing the numbers with a corresponding week before the reduction of postage, the total increase is 140 per cent. The plan of prepayment has been almost universally adopted: the unpaid forming only 6 per cent. of the number of letters in the General Post Office in November last.

THE PROPOSED CORN DUTIES.—Lord John Russell's announcement, that he proposed to make a great reduction in the duties on grain and sugar, and generally to introduce a more liberal commercial system, has given us much satisfaction. We have always advocated a complete and immediate repeal of the duties on all kinds of food; but as there is no prospect at present of obtaining such a repeal, we hope that all the friends of free trade will agree to take Lord John Russell's reductions as an instalment. One of the great advantages which we anticipate from the reduction (in as far as the corn-duties are concerned—we ought rather to say alteration) is—that it will convince the monopolists in grain at least, that they have not so great an interest as they imagined in maintaining the exclusive system; and that while it is highly injurious to the people, it is of little or no advantage to the landed interest itself, even at present, and would ere long involve it along with the other classes in one common ruin. Agriculture cannot long flourish if trade decay; for where there are few manufactures and little wages, there can be no great consumpt of agricultural produce. The non-agricultural classes of this country now exceed by three to one the agricultural; and it is nothing but fatuity or madness for the landed interest to attempt to ruin not only their best, but their only customers. Our landowners ought to consider that they are placed in a different situation from the landowners of every other country. The latter are not dependent for a market solely on their own consumers, but have always a foreign consumption to a larger or smaller extent to look to. The landed interest are fond of representing that grain can be had on the continent for little or nothing; but they ought to recollect, that before they can export any, they must submit to a reduction of 10s. a quarter below the continental prices; for that is the sum which would be required for freight, insurance, &c. They have therefore a greater interest than any other class, in the prosperity of our manufactures. The merchant, manufacturer, or tradesman, may export his skill and capital, the professional man his knowledge and talents to foreign countries; but what can the landowner do?—what can he export?—not his land, for it is impossible; nor his skill, for he has none, at least none available abroad. He is like the bondsman of the low ages, adscriptus glæba, and must prosper or decay on the soil on which he has been born.

But to return to the proposed duties. Instead of affording less protection, as it is called, than the present sliding scale, we believe they will have precisely the opposite effect. To look merely at the sliding scale is all very well. If prices could be regulated by Act of Parliament, the price of wheat would never have been under 62s. or 63s.; for a duty of £1, 4s. 8d. is imposed, when the average price is 62s., and increases by a shilling as the price falls a shilling. But what has happened in practice? Why, great quantities of foreign wheat have been entered for home consumption at 1s. 6d. a quarter of duty; and the market has often been so p^l—ted by the whole foreign grain in bond being thrown on it at once, as not to recover its elasticity for many months afterwards. We shall take the first instance that occurs to show the agriculturists how the sliding scale has wrought for them. The crop in the year 1830 was a full average, and in the year 1831 nearly an average crop. The average price for wheat for the whole first year was 64s. 3d., for the second 66s. 4d., mean 65s. 3d.; and the duty by the sliding scale ought to have been £1, 1s. 8d., yet it appears from the parliamentary return, No. 46 of 1831, that the quantity of foreign wheat entered for home consumption from 1st January 1830 to 30th June 1831—a year and a half, was no less than 2,576,785 quarters which paid a duty of £732,256, or only 5s. 8d. a quarter, instead of £1, 1s. 8d., as it would have done had the average price of the whole eighteen months been applied, instead of the average of the particular six weeks at which the wheat was taken out of bond. To show further how pernicious to the farmer is the present system, the above return gives the following proof: Above a million of quarters (1,231,595) were entered for home consumption in the single month of September 1830, although the crop was a full average. What a deadening effect such a quantity—being above a month's consumpt—must have had on the markets during the whole winter, need not be pointed out to any one at all acquainted with trade. And what was the duty paid by the million and a quarter of wheat entered in September 1830? Only £213,569 in all, or 3s. 5½d. per quarter! There can be little doubt therefore, that had the proposed duty of 8s. been in force in 1830–1831, the agriculturist would have been more effectually protected than he was by the existing law. Another great evil of the present system, in as far as regards the British farmer, may also be pointed out. It directs speculation almost entirely to foreign grain, for the speculator looks to gain not only from a rise in the price, but to a fall in the duty; whereas in purchasing British grain, he can obtain a profit from the former cause only. Add to this the effect which immense quantities of foreign grain lying in bond, ready to come forth whenever the duty falls, has in depressing the markets, or at least, in preventing them from rising, and no one can fail to see how injurious even to the agriculturalists is the existing law. We say nothing as to the fraudulent manner in which the averages are struck, for that has been long apparent to any one who takes an interest in the subject; and the means by which the fraud is effected, is sufficiently pointed out by a person of practical experience in an article in the present number of this magazine.

The duties proposed by Lord John Russell are as follows:—

Wheat,.....	8s.	per quarter.
Rye, Pease and Beans,....	5s.
Barley,.....	4s. 6d.
Oats,.....	3s. 4d.

Now let us endeavour to estimate what protection these duties will give to the landowner, and what burden it will continue to entail on every other class, the farmer not excepted. The following Table is founded on the estimates of Mr. Chalmers, Mr. Western, Mr. Colquhoun, and Mr. McCulloch, with the necessary alterations for increase of the population and change of their habits; much more wheat being consumed by the lower classes at present than in 1812, when the classification and estimate were first made. We assume the population of Great Britain and Ireland to be at present twenty-seven millions. Seed is not included in the Table.

Species of Grain.	Population.	Rate per Head.	Consumed by Man.	Consumed by Animals, and in Beer, Spirits, and Manufactures.	Total Quarters.	Proposed Duty.	Protection to the Landowner, and Tax on the Public.
		Qr.	Quarters.	Quarters.		s. d.	£
Wheat.....	14,000,000	1	14,000,000	500,000	14,500,000	8 0	5,800,000
Barley.....	3,000,000	1½	3,750,000	8,875,000	12,625,000	4 6	2,840,625
Oats.....	8,500,000	2	17,000,000	13,000,000	30,000,000	3 4	5,000,000
Rye, Beans and Pease.....	1,500,000	1½	1,875,000	2,000,000	3,875,000	5 0	968,750
	27,000,000		36,625,000	24,375,000	61,000,000		14,609,375

So that, with the proposed duties, the landowner would have a PROTECTION to the extent of not less than FOURTEEN MILLIONS, while the other classes would have a BURDEN to bear of the same amount on the single article of grain; while the former still retain the exclusive monopoly of supplying us with animal food, and very efficient restrictions on the import of other food,—such as cheese, butter, &c. We have not taken into account, as we well might have done, the freight, insurance, &c., of the foreign grain, say from 8s. to 12s. a quarter; though this is unquestionably as great a protection to the British landowner, as an additional duty of equal amount. The proposed duties will press heavily on the country, and are a gross injustice; still we think they ought to be accepted. This is the first time since the early days of Pitt, that any minister in this country has even professed a liberal commercial policy. The move is no doubt a small one, but it is in the right direction, and if not cordially received, it will furnish a pretence to future ministers, be they Whig or Tory, to adhere to the exclusive system. It is the first blow at monopoly which has been struck in our time; and it would be infatuation in the friends of free trade not to give every aid in their power to render it effectual.

SCOTLAND.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—The proceedings of the General Assembly this year have astonished every person, except the fanatical supporters of the Non-intrusion party, who are neither remarkable for their numbers nor influence. Among the Scotch nobility they can only count two; of landed proprietors not above half-a-dozen; and the remainder consists of ministers and elders, more remarkable for zeal and a desire to make themselves conspicuous, at any hazard, than for any other qualification. In deposing the ministers of Strathbogie and Mr. Edwards for obeying the law, the Assembly has exhausted its power, (for we presume excommunication, deprived as it is now of all civil effects, will hardly be resorted to,) and it must be sufficiently provoking to the clergy to have it exposed so completely, in the eyes of the people, how small that power is. At the very pronouncing of the sentence of deposition, the minority—almost to a man—declared they would disregard the sentence, and continue in ministerial communion with the deposed ministers; and some of the most influential moderates have been preaching in the pulpits of the deposed ministers, while the services of their church have been going on as usual. It is admitted, on all hands, that, though the General Assembly may depose, they cannot deprive the clergymen of their churches, mansees, or stipends. That can be done only by the civil courts; so that the sentence of deposition, so long threatened, turns out a very innocent matter. In the course of the debate, we do not think that the inherent powers of the Court of Session, as the Supreme Court of the kingdom to control all other judicatories, was sufficiently illustrated. It was assumed, for example, that the Exchequer being a supreme court, could not be controlled by the Court of

Session. By the Treaty of Union, the Court of Exchequer has the exclusive privilege of passing signatures; yet in the case of Dickson in 1815, and Tait in 1827, the Court interdicted the passing of signatures in Exchequer. Although the Exchequer, also, is essentially the Queen's Revenue Court, and the Court of Session has unquestionably no jurisdiction in matters of revenue, the latter Court has repeatedly set aside the sentences of Exchequer Courts, on the ground of irregularity or excess of jurisdiction. To come nearer to the matter in hand. At common law, as well as by the act 43d Geo. III., the superintendence of schools is committed to the clergy, and the sentence of the Presbytery is declared "to be final, without appeal to, or review by, any court, civil or ecclesiastical." Yet, in the cases of Corstorphine in 1812, Kilberry in 1823, and Ross in 1826, the Court reviewed and overturned the decisions of Presbyteries regarding schoolmasters. In the two last cases sentences of deposition had been pronounced, and these were set aside on the ground of irregularity. In the first case, the Lord President expressly asserted the supremacy of the Court of Session over the General Assembly—so that it is no new pretension—remark—"It is saying nothing to argue that the remedy is to apply to the General Assembly. The Court of Session would have the ultimate control, after all, supposing the Assembly to affirm the judgment of the Presbytery. Sir George Mackenzie mentions that the Court have overturned the decisions of the General Assembly, when they usurped powers not belonging to them." What the Assembly will do next, no one is able to conjecture. If the Non-intrusion party act with anything like consistency, they must continue to depose their opponents for obeying the law of the land, till they have stripped the whole moderate party of the character of ministers; for cases must occur every week which will render the clergy amenable either to the censures of the Church courts or to the punishment of the courts of law. The assumption that the Kirk is not only superior to the courts of law, but even to the legislature, (for to such a length do the Non-intrusion party go), is not a little remarkable, when it is considered how often the legislature has altered the religion of the country without once consulting the clergy. In 1560, the Catholic religion was abolished; in 1572, Episcopacy, by archbishops and bishops, was established; in 1592, Presbyterian Church government was organized much in its present state; in 1606, Episcopacy was restored in full vigour; Presbytery was again established in 1638, Episcopacy in 1662, and, finally, Presbyterianism in 1690. What is it, in truth, that gives efficacy to the Confession of Faith itself, except its ratification by Parliament, or, in other words, because it is part of our statute law? There is nothing to prevent the legislature from again changing the established religion to Episcopacy, or even to Popery, except the Treaty of Union; and that treaty has already been violated in so many respects, that a great part of it has been repealed, so that it can hardly be maintained to be any effectual barrier in the way of a change. The supremacy of the Church appears but in an indifferent light when it is considered that she dares not venture to proceed to business without the presence of the Lord High Commissioner, who is sent not to preside, but simply to watch that the proceedings, are not contrary to law. During the last century, the Commissioner thought it incumbent on him to dissolve the Assembly before the proceedings were over, and they prudently submitted to the dissolution. Again, in the years 1746 and 1760, when by accident the King's Commission had not arrived at the time fixed for the meeting of the Assembly, the Assembly met and chose their Moderator, and settled the order of taking up business, but they did not dare actually to proceed to business till the Commissioner arrived. It is plain, then, that the Assemblies of last century at least, did not consider themselves so independent as those of the present affect to be. As matters cannot continue on their present footing, something must be done; and we suggest the following measure:—Repeal the Veto Act by statute, and abolish the General Assembly itself as at present constituted. All great assemblies of clergymen have been found a nuisance, and have been discontinued in every State except Scotland. Since the Council of Trent, no general meeting of the Catholic clergy has been held; and it was long ago found necessary to discontinue holding the Convocation of the Church of England. The constitution of the General Assembly, besides, is not at all fitted for the duties it has to perform. These duties are principally judicial. The Assembly cannot discuss any of the dogmas of religion; it cannot alter one of the doctrines of the Confession of Faith, for these are ratified by Act of Parliament; its whole legislative functions are confined to matters of discipline or forms of process, and extend little, if at all, beyond the powers inherent in every Supreme Court to regulate the manner and form of conducting business before it. An Assembly, consisting of about 400 members, nearly one-half of whom are laymen, without either theological or legal education, is utterly unfit to act as a court of justice, and still less (were it competent) to discuss abstruse points of Theology. We say, therefore, abolish this heterogeneous assemblage, and let four of the most learned of the clergy be appointed as a permanent tribunal, sitting at stated periods, to whom all the appeals and references from the inferior judicatories may be submitted, and decided in the last resort; and we see nothing to prevent the proposed court exercising every other function at present possessed by the General Assembly. Nothing can be more indecorous, nor more hurtful to the interests of Religion, than to see judicial functions of the gravest character exercised as they now are by the General Assembly. Figure the judges in any court cheering and hooting each other, while the moderator has the utmost difficulty in maintaining order,—the same parties at once prosecutors and judges,—false votes continually given,—or at least continually taken down, from the confusion which prevails,—the clerk, to whom, as an impartial person, is intrusted the preparation of the minutes and sentences of the Assembly, getting up in his place at the table and taking an eager part in the debate, and all the other sorts of anomalies for which the General Assembly is so remarkable. Can the sentences of a tribunal whose business is so conducted, command attention or respect?

THE NON-INTRUSION MINISTERS ought to keep in view that if they were to succeed in establishing their system, it cannot possibly remain exactly at the place at which they wish it to stop. If "unacceptable" ministers are not to be intruded on a congregation, it seems a necessary consequence that ministers who, after their appointment, render themselves "unacceptable," must subject themselves to an equivalent ordeal—that of dismissal—at the instance of the male heads of families, when they see reason to change that opinion of the minister, on full experience, which they formed of the presentee, without an adequate trial. To make a minister efficient, this appears to be at least equally essential as the operation of the Veto Act. Now, unless we are greatly misinformed, the majority of the congregations of the leading Non-intrusion ministers are so much disgusted with their proceedings that, if these ministers stood at this moment for their suffrages as presentees, they would assuredly be vetoed by great majorities; and, if this be the fact, is it fair or decent that these clergymen, merely because they have once been installed in office, should, Sunday after Sunday, persist in intruding themselves on a reluctant congregation? If these ministers have any principle, they ought, before proceeding farther in their insane career, to give their parishioners the opportunity of now expressing whether they are "acceptable" or not, their parishioners not having hitherto had that opportunity; for those to whom we allude have been ordained before the Veto Act came into operation.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

It appears from the Parliamentary returns that, notwithstanding the constant complaints of stagnation of trade, the business of the country is rapidly increasing. If, for example, we refer to the amount of customs collected at our principal ports, during the three years 1837, 1838, and 1839, we shall be convinced of this fact. Thus, Leith shows an increase of nearly £50,000, £525,403, £511,970, £573,686. Glasgow, £394,152, £403,905, £468,975. Greenock, however, shows a considerable falling off, no doubt from the circumstance that many ships which formerly delivered their cargoes at Greenock, are now enabled, owing to the deepening of the Clyde, to carry them to Glasgow. The custom duties collected at Greenock in the three years above-mentioned, respectively, were £380,704, £417,673, £315,084. There is, probably owing to a similar reason, a decrease at Port-Glasgow, £94,161, £102,830, £68,046. Aberdeen, £65,330, £66,252, £71,832. Dundee, £67,429, £66,135, £66,376. The increase at Perth has been remarkable, £8,760, £11,893, £25,767. The net revenue of Scotland, exclusive of the revenues of Crown lands, increased from £4,672,134 in 1837, to £4,952,460 in 1839. The manufacture of paper has increased in a greater ratio in Scotland than any other manufacture. In 1835, 10,672,596 lbs. of paper of the first and second class paid the duties of excise; in 1838, 16,105,666 lbs. The duty paid on paper in 1838, was £97,893; in 1839, £119,442.

Whatever may be the cause—whether it be the Corn Laws, the state of the currency, or the oppressiveness of taxation, the fact is undoubted, and is admitted by men of all shades of political opinion, that the distress among the manufacturing classes is at this moment, and has been for upwards of a year past, excessive, and if equalled, has hardly or ever been exceeded in the history of the country. In all the manufacturing towns, hundreds of houses are unoccupied, and thousands of operatives unemployed. The distress has even reached branches of trade which could hardly have been expected to be affected. For example—notwithstanding the great demand for iron, occasioned by the numerous railways in progress, no fewer than thirty-five furnaces have been blown out in Staffordshire, and fifteen in Shropshire. The numerous operatives employed at them have of course been reduced to great distress, though an attempt has been made to find work for them at the furnaces still in blast. Commerce is equally distressed with manufactures. The exportation of goods has fallen off in an unprecedented degree; and although the first and best half of the year has now passed, there are few merchants or manufacturers indeed who can say they have done more than paid their current expenses, while the great majority have been carrying on a losing trade in the expectation of better times, of which not even the dawn has made its appearance. The necessity of a more liberal commercial policy has forced itself upon the attention of all parties; for by no other means than by a property and income tax, or by laying duties on the import of foreign products, now practically excluded from our markets, is the great and increasing deficiency of the revenue to be supplied. Next to the repeal of the Corn Laws, a reduction of the duties on sugar would be of the greatest consequence. Sugar is now one of the necessities of life. The present Gazette price of West India sugar, without duty, is 40s. a cwt., while Manilla sugar of good quality, may be purchased in bond in London for 20s. a cwt. The quantity consumed being about four millions of cwts. annually, four millions is the tax which we pay yearly on the single article of sugar, to keep up the West India monopoly. Lord John Russell proposes to retain the present duty on British colonial sugar, but to reduce the duty on foreign sugar, from its present prohibitory rate of 63s. to 36s., so that the West Indians will still have a protection of 12s. a cwt., equivalent to a tax of above two millions on the public. Surely this should satisfy them.

AGRICULTURE.

Up to the first week of June the grain crops of all kinds had a most healthy and luxuriant appearance, and there was every prospect of an abundant crop. But since that period, the long-continued drought, accompanied, occasionally, with cold east winds, greatly changed the appearance of the country; and although the yield may still be abundant, the bulk must be greatly under an average. In East-Lothian there has not been so dry a year since 1826, and the county has, in many places, already assumed the parched aspect it bore in that year. The hay crop may be considered a complete failure; for, in addition to the loss arising from the shortness and scantiness of the rye grass, clover is almost everywhere wanting. Indeed it seems to be useless to persevere any longer in sowing red clover, for on all soils on which it has been cultivated for a length of time it is almost in vain to expect even a fair crop. Surely among the many hundred species of clovers and congenerous plants, some one might be found better adapted for long cultivated soils than the red clover. As wheat began to show the ear about the 15th June in this neighbourhood, it is to be feared that the crop will turn out deficient, unless we have, within a few days, showers accompanied with warmth. This is the most critical season for that crop, and its quality as well as quantity depend chiefly on the weather between the middle of June and the middle of July. In many districts, owing to the dryness of the soil, turnips have not braided, but they are still early enough. Where the seed has grown, the braird is equal and promising. We have heard no complaint of the fly as yet. Potatoes have, in some parts of Fife and elsewhere failed and have been replanted: but the failure is by no means general. Notwithstanding the impending reduction on the import duties on corn, (for a reduction is now inevitable, come who may into office,) rents are increasing, and markets have not declined. On the contrary, since the end of May prices have been slowly but steadily rising. On the 16th June the best wheat in the Edinburgh market, weighing 66 lbs. a bushel, brought 73s., and the average price was 66s. 5d.; barley, weighing 58½, brought 37s., the average being 34s. 6d.; oats, weighing 46 lbs., brought 30s., the average 26s. 2d. The truth of the matter is, that the agriculturists, notwithstanding the vigorous efforts made to cajole them, are fast getting over the bugbear of the repeal of the Corn Laws. They are now beginning to see that it is entirely a landlord's question, and that the repeal would do good and not harm to the farmers as a body, even if grain fell as much in price as has been anticipated by parties on both sides of the question. For our own part, for reasons we have formerly given at length, we do not expect any great inundation of cheap corn. Over the whole continent, not only population to consume grain, but manufactures which will enable that population to consume, not only a larger quantity but a better quality of grain—for example, wheat instead of rye—is rapidly increasing; and we see no reason for thinking that, in future years, the exportable product will increase to any great extent, though more soil be brought under the plough, and a more efficient system of agriculture be adopted.

THINGS AT THE WORST.

THERE is an old snatch of the "wisdom of our ancestors" which says, "when things are at the worst they mend." In the new House of Commons things must be at extremity; and Lord John Russell perfectly satisfied that the object which he had so much at heart in framing the Reform Bill,—the increase, namely, of the landed influence in the House of Commons,—is sufficiently provided for. If there were any doubts on the subject remaining on his mind, the results of the election will surely have removed them. Or if he is not convinced, let him advise with Lord Howick, Lord Morpeth, Mr. Edward John Stanley, and Daniel O'Connell.—But the time is past for upbraiding and recrimination; and, once for all, it is enough, that of the many concurrent causes, whether real or ingeniously devised to account for and break the downfall of the Whigs, no one has been half so instrumental as their own timid, trimming, or disingenuous policy, and the secret disinclination of some of them to forward the cause of which they pretended to be the champions. Some of them must bitterly regret the fair occasions they have let slip, for their own sakes, if not for that of the commonwealth; and resolve, that if ever they again have power, they will take warning by the story of the Persian husband, and kill the cat the first night. If the Whigs had done that justice to the people, which was for years in their power, they would not have been left in their present plight by those they have kept unable to aid them, however willing they may be.

After the unexpectedly narrow majority which they obtained on the accession of the young Queen, when many accidental circumstances combined to recover for them the popularity they had justly forfeited, the present defeat need have taken no one by surprise; and yet so prone are mankind to hope, it has done so. To certain defeat the Liberal party must have looked forward, but not for reverses so decided and galling. When every allowance is made, it is with the bitterest mortification that Reformers must look to London, Westminster, Leeds, Hull, and Dublin. For the counties lost there is some colour of reason, in the ignorance and selfishness of the landed interest, and of those depending on it; the same causes extend to a few smaller

English towns, overborne by the counties, and engrossing, in relation to their population, far too large a share of the representation. But how shall we, even when largely allowing for venal freemen, and Tory gold, overlook such blighting facts as the loss of Grote, seemingly without a regret, or an attempt to keep him, the rejection of Hume, without whose presence we cannot imagine a Parliament complete—and O'Connell, baffled in the capital of the country for which he has done so much? To account for this amount of discomfiture is more easy than to pardon some of the causes to which it is owing. The Liberal party was not prepared for reverses so signal; nor were the Tories for that decided victory which has come to them enhanced by the charm of unexpectedness. They counted upon an ovation and they have obtained a triumph. Will it be imagined so complete as at once to raise Sir Robert Peel, from "a practical statesman," a dexterous trimmer between nearly balanced parties, into an avowed Tory? Instant symptoms of the new conversion of Sir Robert, if it shall come at all, are to be wished for. They would save a world of time, which may be spent in suspense or wordy warfare, and leave the ground clear for the immediate trial of the strength of parties.

In defiance of many discouraging appearances, even in those localities where better things might have been hoped for, we will never believe in a national re-action which tends to Toryism; though the falling away of the people from Whiggism is an obvious fact that we have been holding out in warning to the Whigs for the last five years.—The spread of Chartism is surely no proof of Tory reaction; but neither is that sickly apathy, commencing in disgust and terminating in indifference, which has for several years pervaded a large and valuable, because the most intelligent, portion of the constituency. But if alienated from the Whigs, and incapable of being roused by their tardy professions of better things, and if culpably careless how matters went between the rival factions, this class of electors are most decidedly hostile to Toryism. Where parties were so nearly balanced, as the returns of the greater part of both the town and county elections show them to have been, ever this small section, generally independent voters, but careless of late about registering, and indifferent about voting even when qualified, may have caused the scale to turn the wrong way; but this is no permanent gain to Toryism. From a much larger class of every constituency—those who urgently required protection in giving a conscientious vote, and who have seen no disposition in the Whigs to give them the security of the Ballot—farther sacrifices were not to be expected. The very men who required those voters repeatedly to sacrifice their interests, and to entail suffering or ruin upon their families, would not wave their own merely speculative or fanciful objection to secret voting, because it was un-English! Had this party any right to expect that for a fifth and sixth time these electors were to suffer in supporting them? Had these electors not a right to demand—"Before I give you another vote that is detrimental to my interests, give me at least a pledge that you will endeavour to render my future votes harmless to my family." This large class of voters had previously done too much, and suffered too much, to be all at once moved by those Free-Trade professions, which might be sincere, but which were put forth too tardily to ensure any immediate practical result. All this, besides an unusual amount of intimidation, bribery, cajolery, and the employment of every sinister influence, must have told in the late election; but this no more shows reaction to Tory principles, than does the backward ripple on the surface of the stream, raised by the passing breeze, prove that the under-current is setting towards the fountain-head, instead of obeying the great law of gravitation, and flowing, however sluggishly, yet ever onward. There is, however, one species of reaction evident, though it is not of a very dangerous kind. It is most conspicuous in persons of placid tempers and reflecting minds, whose prepossessions are not towards Toryism, but towards something which, for want of a better phrase, we may term Peelism. They had gradually lost confidence in the Whigs; they have seen their downfall without any emotion; they looked for it, and were fortified against it by indifference. But they are alarmed at the evident financial difficulties of the country, and at the increase of the nondescript parties known under the general name of Chartists; and they have, and not without reason, a belief in the intelligence of Sir Robert Peel, and in his knowledge of the wants and temper of the people; nay, in his patriotism, if left to himself. They have, in short, right or wrong, faith in the intellect of the man; they consider him a statesman, and have some hope from his common sense and "practicability;" and, in as far as they are Reformers, more hope from those external impulses which must urge onward him or any Minister who shall for any length of time administer the affairs of this country. Such persons, and they are a growing, though never likely to be a large body, are disposed to take very quietly, the Whigs knocking out their brains upon the wall of their own raising, "and to give Peel a fair trial." Is the Minister of the Tories, the Minister on the sufferance of these moderate Reformers, equal to the part expected from him? Sir Robert Peel, like other men, has his destiny in a great measure in his own hands. Has he the firmness, presuming that he wants not inclination, to act upon the promptings of his own cool head; to be really the dignified minister of the country, not the instrument of the Tories? Has he the courage, in the strength of wisdom and right, to set himself above those who hold themselves his masters and patrons—him their necessary, but half-distrusted, and half-despised tool? It is much to be doubted that Sir Robert Peel is equal to the accomplishment of even those meditated good purposes which many moderate Reformers give him credit for entertaining. He is surrounded with difficulties; but his greatest weakness lies within. No successor of Pitt, Canning, Castlereagh, or Grey, will ever again alumber on a bed of roses; though, thanks to a philosophic temperament, the recumbency of Lord Melbourne has been nearly one Long night of revelry and ease.

But former Tory Ministers, besides living in easier times, enjoyed, if not the confidence of the people, yet the enthusiastic support of their own powerful party, and the favour of the Court. Peel enjoys none of these advantages. He is the Tory Premier because the Tories cannot do better. They have no other choice. If he remain long in place—and we do not pretend to calculate the duration of life in the young Parliament—it must be as the Minister of the Middle Classes; of that respectable and wealthy party, which, if some of them have been from habit or accident rather Whiggish in their personal predilections, are moderately Conservative in their general politics; disliking and dreading anything like organic change; seeking no improvement save perhaps in the fiscal system, if it shall be demonstrated that the present system is thoroughly worn-out; not averse to some improvement in the administration of justice; and, if Dissenters, desirous of the abolition or mitigation of church-rates. It is likely that such fair-and-softly Whigs, having long given their confidence to Lord John Russell, because he was not a dangerous Reformer, but stood upon Finality, will not long, any more than the moderate Tories, withhold their trust from Sir Robert Peel. This respectable and wealthy Middle Class party; the ordinary influences of every existing government; the Church, to the extent of supporting the Minister, however the man may be distrusted; and the more enlightened portion of the aristocracy, may make the future Premier formidable to his opponents for a greater length of time than we care to think of. It were, indeed, if put according to Cocker, a very simple question.—If Lord Melbourne's government hobbled on for four years with a bare majority of twenty, how long will Sir Robert Peel's work with one of eighty, and the Peers to boot? The answer might be, until the newly elected Parliament shall die a natural death. But no such duration is probable; though Sir Robert Peel, who is mainly indebted to Whig backwardness for office, should be farther indebted to them for continuance in it—no such duration is possible, if they are now ready to join the Radical Members in driving the wedge which must uproot him.

Much will depend upon the character and temper evinced by the new Opposition in its very first demonstrations. There may be no want of a hostile, nay of a factious spirit, of clever Parliamentary tactics, and small manœuvres dexterously executed. But this will go but a short length with the people, who must have something more substantial to excite them, and enlist their feelings, hopes, and efforts on the side of the Opposition, than Whig party triumph or Tory party defeat. Frightening the new government with Ireland, worrying them on their foreign policy, and on minor affairs, will not do, without coming at once manfully forward in the united strength of Opposition with those great measures of improvement in the electoral system, for want of which they have themselves fallen. And until that system is purified, every Administration must fall the instant it puts forth anything which, like the lost Budget, may savour of liberality, or ventures to touch the most minute ramification of the consolidated system of abuse.

The first skirmishing affairs in Parliament may be matter of curiosity and amusement; but until the temper of the Opposition be plainly shown—and that must take some time—and until Peel's vague professions have been put to the test of repeated votes, the amount of popular opposition which the Tory Government will have to encounter, cannot be known. Specious generalities and vague professions may serve for a time; but it is no more given to Sir Robert Peel than to any greater man to serve two masters. He must speedily take his stand either with the country, or against it; with the Monopolists or the Antimonopolists; with the Orange faction or with the People of Ireland; with those who would carry out the principle of the Reform Bill, the imperfections of which have just been so clearly demonstrated,—or with those who consider that failure a final measure. But the unfortunate Sir Robert has not two, but three masters to serve: he has the High Tories—whom their assumed victory will render wilder than ever—alternately to soothe and curb; he has the moderate Middle-Class Conservatives—Whig and Tory—to satisfy in their reasonable demands, if he would retain their confidence, which is his strongest bulwark; and, he has the country—the People—to gain, without whose favour, as the Whigs have experienced, no Administration can long stand. The hampered position of Sir Robert renders it next to impossible that he should even try to gain the favour of the people. He has not the power to offer the Reformers anything really worth their acceptance, however well-disposed he might be. Untaxed food?—he may see the measure to be as necessary to the prosperity of every great interest in the country as it is just in principle: but he is the Premier of the land-owners and monopolists, and dare at best attempt only some peddling compromise, which will please no party, and serve no good end. At the same moment that the inefficiency of the Reform Bill has been glaringly demonstrated, he takes his stand, saying, "There shall be no farther improvement. This is your own chosen instrument, but it is found suitable to our purposes. It shall not be changed." And it is certainly with a better grace that Sir Robert Peel may declare for finality than those in whose lips that doctrine has been found. The denial of what is so urgently required, is, however, in effect the same whencesoever it comes; and unless it can be shown that the majority of the people really want to have their food heavily taxed, their industry impeded, their trade ruined, and their capital wasted, no one will have the hardihood to assert that they are anything like fairly represented in the Parliament just chosen. If any man doubted whether a wider electoral basis, and an improved system of voting,—whether, in brief, extended suffrage and the ballot were required to give the people any chance of being fairly represented, he must have been converted by the scenes we have just witnessed, and their disheartening results.

But a new Tory reign was an ordeal which Whig supineness made it inevitable that the country should pass through; and if necessary, then the sooner the better. There are, it would appear, a few individuals of the Whig party, who, like drowning men catching at straws, hope that all is not lost,—that Peel is not yet in office,—that the effect of another election may be tried. No sane person can wish for any such wild experiment, the consequences of which at this juncture would be a yet larger Tory majority, more decided symptoms of the alleged reaction. The forlorn-hope of desperate small placemen, lying through disgraceful expedients, intrigues, and Court favour, is not worth attention. The liberal party had the ordeal to pass; and again we say—the sooner the better. If true to themselves, they have really little to fear from Tory domination. A young Ministry, composed of very discordant elements, cannot be all at once dangerous. It must feel its way. The Whigs were for their first two Sessions really active reformers. They did a very great deal—ten times more than has ever been done since; so much, indeed, that some of them thought nothing more remained to be done. The Tories may also come out with their good measures, or their placebo; and what we most fear from them is those half measures, whether of tariff or of law reform, which may serve as stop-gaps, preventing for years the carrying of good whole measures. No other kind of reform, and no entire, far-reaching reform principle, of any kind, can be looked for during the dynasty of Tory-ridden Sir Robert Peel. But as it has become a necessary infliction, it should, like all other evils, be made the best of, viewed on the brightest side. At once it gives us a powerful, and, we would fain hope, a united Opposition; united not alone on the principle to which the Whigs more immediately owe their downfall, but on those other great and fundamental measures without which no Liberal Ministry can stand,—or, in other words, without which the interests of the People can never be adequately represented in Parliament. Lord Morpeth may believe that his seat is lost by reaction; Lord Howick that he has failed from the unhandsome conduct of his opponents.

Mr. Hume that he has lost Leeds from bribery and the want of the Ballot : there may be an infinity of opinions, many of them just, as to the cause of the failure ; but there can be but one as to the true remedy. Are the Whigs, as a body, becoming converts to the necessity of an extended suffrage, of ballot, and of sweeping away those numerous clogs and impediments, some of which were advisedly placed as a counteracting force upon the free operation of the Reform Bill ? If so, there is much to console the country for their loss of office, and for the temporary Tory ascendancy ; which promises some sport in the first place, and by and by another and a triumphant struggle ; a new Reform Bill crisis, conducted with equal energy, and with better understanding of what is required.

SHINE AND SHADE.

LEAVE the cell, and come away !
Sport alone should rule to-day.
Moping uses, follies tearful
Time like this should turn to cheerful.
All is light :—in dewy beads
Glitter forest leaves and meads :
All is music :—merles and thrushes
Warble in the waving bushes :
All is fragrance :—clouds of bloom
Garden, grove, and bower perfume :
All is love !—the ring-doves cooing,
Whisper, “ ’tis the time for wooing ! ”
Come and share it while you may,
Leave the cell, and come away !

Should the heedless guest that views a prison,
Vex the bound with tidings of the free !
Spring may cheer the blest, while, newly-risen,
Hope outshines her sun : but saddens me !
Well I know the beauties thou portrayest :
Be their brightness to bright spirits shown !
But the smile of joy, when joy is gayest,
Seems to mock the sorrowful and lone.

Leave your toil, and come away !
Care will blind you, if you stay
Brooding o'er the dingy column
Of some pedant dry and solemn,
While you miss in Nature's looks
Better lore than hides in books :
Sit with shrivelled ancients fasting,
While life's banquet-oil is wasting,
And the sly pursuer, Time,
Laughs to see you spend your prime
'Midst the bones that he has stricken !
With a palsied nought can quicken.
These may wait a darker day—
Leave your toil, and come away !

Aye ! a stranger, 'midst a crowd that shun me,
Wherefore, like a risen ghost, appear !

Where are they whose eyes look brighter on me !
Where is one to whom my voice is dear !
I have worshipped love, and love hath wounded ;
Sought for fellowship, but friends can fail !
Nature gladdens eyes, by these surrounded,
Robbed of these her warmest hues grow pale.

Clear your brow, and come away !
Turn not thus your heart to clay,
With laments for love discarded—
Friendship lost or ill rewarded ;
Cause were here to sit and moan,
If the world were desert grown !
There are lips can better reason,
Eyes that teach a sweeter lesson,
Would you look abroad, and find
Faithful men and maidens kind.
But to life, and bliss, and beauty,
If you count this treason duty,
'Twill be darker than you say,—
Clear your brow, and come away !

No ! 'tis ended ; yet, afraid to waken
Fruitless yearning, wishes life denies,
Think me not, though lone, of all forsaken,—
In the past my path and treasure lies !
There in silence gentle voices hail me ;
Shades of fondest hours my love restore ;
Friends are here, who soothe and will not fail me,—
Dreams that busy, but torment no more !

Like the wounded hart, he wanders fated,
Whom mischance or sorrow once hath made
Stranger to his kind : disowned, unmated,
Strays the cold recluse—a living shade !
Bid him, not, against the doom rebelling,
Cheerful men with stony eyes to scare ;
But retired, with thought and silence dwelling,
Seek their kinder home, the world of air !

THE POET'S SPRING-TIDE.

I HEARD thee ask—What accident or mood
Controls the hour when wayward poets sing !
Yet hast thou seen a lark, whose humble wing
So lately brushed the lea, with life renewed
In music, rapid as a mountain spring,
Outsoar the golden clouds ; at once pursued
By sweetest ecstasies that pant and thrill
In his full breast, and all the welkin fill !
Sprung from the grassy headland, tell me why
He wavered near, and oft delayed, before
Quivering, he rose to Heaven, rejoiced to soar,—
As if allured to earth, and urged on high
By the same passion !—still he flutters o'er

The chosen spot, with rising melody :
And is there nothing, save the flowers below,
That sways him thus : sweet querist ! is it so !

Nay ! and the spell those nodding blooms conceal,
That woos the bird to linger and aspire,
So rules the poet ; silent, till the fire
Of love-lit eyes his melting lips unseal :—
Then will he sing—and men, perchance, admire
The strain he only asked one heart to feel !
Know, but for love that chorister would be Still mute :—and I, dear lady ! but for thee !

MORE MEDITATIONS IN THE WEN.— COVENT GARDEN, AND THE HUSTINGS.

BY A TEMPLAR.

COVENT GARDEN is one of my favourite haunts. Its history is an epitome of the constitutional history of England, worth a dozen of Lord John Russell's, though like him it springs from the house of Bedford. A few words will suffice to convince even sceptics of the truth of this assertion.

Covent Garden, which still bears in its name a record of its former connexion with the Church—"the mark of the Beast," as Sir Andrew Agnew might say—came into the possession of the founder of the Russell family on the dissolution of the monasteries. The family mansion stood for a long time on its southern verge towards the Strand. That taste for building which it cost our monarchs so many vain edicts to check, or more properly, a desire to invest capital profitably, led the noble proprietors to build on this demesne, which was most favourably situated between the court and city: hence the piazza and the church in the square, both the works of Inigo Jones. The square was meant, as is clear from its architectural adornments, to become the abode of the fashionable world; but it was destined to another fate. The market, which originally occupied what is now the upper end of Southampton Street, was, by the progress of building, pressed backward into the square; and being tolerated for some time, acquired a prescriptive right to remain there. Its original inhabitants gave way before the influx of costermongers. To them succeeded, in the days of Pepys, court surgeons, and painters, and fashionable mercers. Then came the theatres, and with them a train attendant of actors, lodging-house keepers, taverns, bagnios, and hôtels. The square was abandoned to the parish church, houses of public accommodation, and the denizens of the fruit and vegetable market.

[Now, is not this the constitutional history of England at large? First the king plunders the church, and is obliged to allow his courtiers to go snacking with him; next the nobles engendered in the dead body of the church, like maggots in the carcase of some nobler animal, seeing the profits made by industrious and enterprising merchants and tradesmen, become speculators; then the middle-class comes to tread so close upon the heels of the nobility, that the latter, in a vain attempt to preserve their seclusion from the vulgar, extricate themselves from the crowd; then shoals of those who live from hand to mouth,—wits, actors, adventurers, and, in short, the mob, genteel and vulgar, break in and level all distinctions. Covent Garden in its present state is an epitome of Great Britain, as its history is of the kingdom's history. There is the market in the centre as representative of our commerce; there is Bow Street as representative of our laws; and there is the church as representative of our religion. There are pickpockets and policemen, barrow-women and clergymen, ladies of easy and of uneasy virtue, country lawyers and traders, gaping visitors of London from curiosity, actors and stray people of fashion,—grotesque absurdities, inexhaustible by a Hogarth or a Cruikshanks.

It is evident from all this that Covent Garden must of necessity be the most appropriate place in all Westminster for holding Parliamentary elections. Our motley aspirants to senatorial honours, all of them find there something congenial: our Sinclairs and Agnews have at least the church walls to back them; our Duncombe, the only genuine representative in our days, of the gay, devil-may-care Liberal of the Fox and Sheridan school, is quite at home in the neighbourhood of the theatres, whose champion he has been; our Burdetts and Leaders find or found that portion of the mobility which loves in its heart a well-dressed or titled assessor of democracy. The modern Whigs, as usual, are worst off here. These political bats, alternately attaching themselves to the aristocratic or democratic cause, as their prototype called itself beast or bird according as the battle went for the former or the latter—these white-livered precisians,

Content to deal in decencies forever, find little that harmonizes with their emasculated propriety in the genial but boisterous roar of the Garden. But they generally contrive to bring a train of kindred bodies (we had almost written spirits) to keep them in countenance: so even they are not left in that uttermost loneliness—the sense of being alone in a crowd.

Whether some mystical intuitive consciousness of this fitness of things, or merely the open space and its central situation, has caused Covent Garden market to become the place of election for Westminster, is of little consequence. The fact is so. It is as nice a place for an election row as heart could desire. The hustings erected in front of the church have the east end of the market buildings, forming three sides of a square, before them, with a not very broad street intervening. The vacant space is large enough to contain a numerous crowd; when closely packed, the thick-wedged array is impenetrable to the police; and, supported on three sides by buildings, and in front by the hustings, it cannot be taken in flank;—then the refuse of the market furnishes a copious supply of missiles. The crowd consists, of course, principally of that class which is without the pale of the franchise, and has no means of expressing its political sentiments, except by hooting, hurraing, and cracking jokes. The rare intervals at which an opportunity is afforded it of doing even so much, makes it gulp each occasion with a ravenous appetite. Every cheer and counter-cheer raises the spirits of those engaged in the sport, till the "growing enthusiasm" can find no vent but in practical jokes, to which the propinquity of the vegetable refuse affords an irresistible temptation.

It is rarely that we see ill-nature or ferocity in a genuine English election mob. Their wildest freaks are the mere outbreaks of rude overflowing animal happiness. The occasional outrages of sullen ferocity are always the work of the hired bludgeon-men and bullies of the ring, with whom Whig and Tory candidates have been in the habit of surrounding themselves, as a body-guard "against the mob," which they fear because they do not know it. It is but rarely that either party, except in cases of glaring apostasy, have been roughly handled, where they have not drawn the punishment upon them by their own excess of precaution.

It has been thought anomalous, that the Whigs have more frequently incurred the indignation of "the mob" than the Tories. Nothing can be more natural. The Tory and the mob are political antipodes: they rarely come in contact. When the Tory is driven to face "the mob," (nota bene, "the mob," properly speaking, is to be found only in towns,—it is a free body,—the rural serfs are not sufficiently high-spirited and intelligent to constitute a mob,) it is as a forlorn hope. There is no disguise: his obnoxious political principles are avowed; and to allow of this being done with the least possible amount of danger, some frank, jolly, good-humoured person is selected, who can keep his temper, and make the rabble like him though they detest his politics. The Whigs, on the other hand, court the alliance of "the mob," without knowing its character well enough to know how to deal with it. A Whig is necessarily a pedant: he sees the people, and everything natural, reflected in the softening mirror of books. He has never mingled with the crowd. When a child, he was mamma's well-behaved darling, who never played with naughty boys, or dirtied his clothes: when he was at school and college he was a pattern of industrious study—and, if he did not carry off the lowest premiums and honours, at least ranked next to those who did: and in after-life he remains the same incurable, neat, decorous prig. With him "the child is father of the man" indeed. He wishes to square his own conduct, and to see others square theirs, to the precepts he has imbibed from his godmothers and god-fathers. He is shocked at the levity and reckless overbearing conduct of the Tories. He is shocked at the coarseness and waywardness of "the mob." He would clip and smooth all mankind into a likeness of his own prim self, as old-fashioned gardeners clipped forest trees into peacocks, Adams and Eves. He has no sympathies with the habits and thoughts of others: he has no conception how other men can differ from him. With parson Adams, he would read his sermon to the squire's drunken led-captains and toad-eaters: but he lacks the robustious bon homie of the parson,—he abhors filthy tobacco and ale, and is as incarnate a vinaiquette as ever an old maid of them all. He first excites derision by his ignorance of men, and then anger by his pragmatic censoriousness. There is a natural antipathy between such a one and "the mob:" it is impossible they can come in contact without quarrelling.

"The mob," which, as hinted above, is only to be found in an English city, is the express image of the natural man, not as Rousseau has painted, but as his Creator and the accidents of life have made him. We call ourselves a civilized nation, and certainly there is a civilized class among us; but it is a mistake to suppose that all are civilized. The gypsies are uncivilized—the wild Welsh, Irish, and Highlanders are uncivilized—the chaw-bacons are uncivilized,—and the cities too have their hordes to whom the genial influence of civilisation has not yet extended. They swarm in our courts and blind alleys. They live within sight of schools and churches, and good men's feasts; but participate in the advantages of none of them. Rob Roy truly and pathetically appeals to the untaught condition of his clan maddened by persecution. The same may be said to this day of the Catherans of Saffron Hill and Field-Lane, Wapping, and the Mint. No man has taught them anything. The law, which is fabled to be the protector of all citizens, at best leaves them unharmed. If ignorance and the stings of appetite prompt them to violate its precepts, its myrmidons pounce upon them at once. They know the law often as an enemy—never as a friend. They hang on the skirts of civilisation, alternately its drudges and victims. In the genial climate of London—for wealth and sea-coal fires lend us a more than Italian climate—these savages, like the Lazzaroni of Naples, plump out into finer specimens of their class than the mountain starvelings of the North and far West. If their close pressure upon civilized society has taught them some of its vices, for these the savage always picks up first,—their residence in a land of plenty has given them high spirits and good nature. These constitute the substratum and body of "the mob." Its animating and guiding spirits are those who form an intermediate layer between it and the educated steadily industrious classes—the men originally belonging to the mob who have fought their way within the pale of civilisation, or those of the "better classes," whose vices or weaknesses have degraded them from their caste. "The mob" has physical strength and strong passion: it is right English in the main; but the scoundrelism of every clime and tribe floats weltering in its tide. It is less hunted than in days of old by Draconic laws, but it is kept out of the pale of society by our exclusive political system; and so long as it is thus kept apart, it will remain the uncouth thing it is.

The saturnalia of a nomination is the signal for all these Parias to swarm out from their dens, and make holiday. They mingle with those who really take part and interest in the election, and outnumber them. They have human feelings and human apprehension, however rude, half-developed, or perverted. They may not understand aright all that the speakers say, but they have a twilight conception of their meaning; and passionate appeals, couched in figures, may come home to them, and raise their excitable passions. A good-humoured bluff Tory has some chance with them. They are too ignorant to know what his party have done, or what its principles are: they are caught by his portly person, and his ready laugh at his own wit. The out-and-out radical is sure of their favour. If, of their own class, they feel their self-importance flattered by his taking rank among the gentlemen: if well-dressed and educated, they feel still more consequential from his sympathy. But of the Whig they can make nothing. They are at first shy of his advances, as fearing him; and when they detect his effeminacy, they despise him. In their good humour, they play with him, as the monkey of Brobdingnag did with Gulliver; and when the human ocean is stirred up with wrath, the poor Whig, thrown into the middle of it, is like one of Smollett's beaux wriggling amid the waves of Martin's Deluge.

To the ladies and gentlemen of the Tory side, "the mob" is an object of half-timorous curiosity. They like to steal a peep at it; palpitating like young women while they gaze at the lions and monkeys of a menagerie. They regard with wonder and admiration any of their friends who has the courage to venture into the crowd, when he comes off unscathed. It was thus that coroneted carriages crowded to allow their fair inmates a peep of Captain Rous on the day of his return for Westminster. The command of a ship of war is a good school for learning how to deal with the mob, and for inspiring a man with confidence in it. The gallant captain rode about in the throng of it the whole time of the election; and the old women of the Carlton Club, and the young women of Almaack's, when they saw him come off scathless, looked upon him with scarcely less veneration than the multitudes on the plain of Dara did upon Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, when they emerged unsinged from the fiery furnace. Occasional adventures of this kind have convinced the Tories that the mob is not exactly the terrible monster their fancies pictured it; still they retain their misgivings—keep it at arm's length, and would prefer looking at it through a grating.

As for the intercourse between the Whigs and the mob, every page of the annals of Westminster is full of anecdotes illustrating its nature. The Whigs will be pawing the mob; incapable of learning their ignorance of the way to please it, and their want of power to control it. Even broken heads fail to teach them self-knowledge. The adventures of the first election we turn up will serve to establish our position. Fancy Burdett and Hobhouse or some other radical champions, at the one end of the hustings; Murray Maxwell, it may be, at the other; and George Lamb, for want of a better, as the representative of the Whigs, occupying the centre. The Whig journals have, for some weeks previous, been claiming for their leaders the character of the popular party. But these popular gentlemen, having their misgivings, have hired all the heroes of the Fives' Court, to keep the front of the hustings for them. The poorer class of electors, and the genuine thoughtless mob, begin to grumble at this preparation for overawing them. After some deliberation, a select band of the more athletic seek, like a wedge, to cut their way through the centre of the bullies of the ring to the hustings, while the united mass pushes it forward from behind. Much elbowing and jostling ensues—the boxers begin to lose temper, but are for a time kept quiet by their consciousness of the overwhelming numbers arrayed against them. At last, feeling themselves elbowed out of their places, they grow savage, and show fight. They are borne down by the mass, driven back to Southampton Street, thrashed, forced to abscond, and disappear for the day. The Whigs look round in vain for their body-guard, but it is too late to recede. The Radical orators are received with uproarious applause: a faint accompaniment of hisses is heard for a short time, but is speedily drowned. The Tory orators are received with unmingled groans and hootings from the street, while distant cheers are borne to them from the windows, where gentle and fair hands are waving hat and handkerchief, to encourage them to go through the dread ordeal. At last comes the turn of the Whigs. They begin blandly, are baaed and hooted, lose their temper, become waspish and impertinent. A deputation rushes into the Radical Committee Room. "— is insulting us." The chairman has despatched his assistants in all directions, is giving charges to a dozen messengers, and receiving reports from a dozen districts, at the same moment. He has no time to attend to the trifling interruption, and, thinking to turn it off with a joke, says, "Oh, pelt him then!" Jokes are sometimes as dangerous as King Henry's wish to be delivered from Thomas à Becket; and in the present instance, the deputation, being men of literal understandings, proceed to business, and in a few moments the orator resembles the mud-wall of a Carse-of-Gowrie cottage, in the act of drying. Well, the show of hands is taken at last; the returning officer has made his declaration; a poll has been demanded; and the crowd is about to disperse in perfect good-humour. At this moment, a long array of horsemen, with badges of buff and blue ribbon at their breasts, push officiously through the crowd towards the hustings, overturning one man, trampling on another's toes. Jostling and bitter words, signs of rising anger, are interchanged. One of the cavaliers lifts his riding switch, and accidentally or intentionally, it falls upon a woman. The blood of every man in the thronged assemblage is up. The horsemen are obliged to give way. Along Henrietta Street, down Bedford Street, along Chandos Street, down St. Martin's Lane, round Charing Cross, and through Cockspur Street, to their place of rendezvous in Pall-Mall, they hold their headlong way. In vain they seek to escape the missiles that whirr and whistle after them. The wrath of Marquis Court and Maiden Lane, of Petty France, Palmer's village, and all the purlieus of St. Giles, follows, dark and rapid as a thunder cloud, in their rear. Mud, brick-bats, withered turnips and rotten cabbages, clash and rattle on them with the pitiless pelting of a hail-shower. And, worst of all, those among them who have seats in St. Stephens, must prepare to hear their adventure recapitulated to them by George Canning in the evening.

The moral of this long story is,—the mob is ignorant and capricious, and will be so, as long as by being excluded from the pale of the constitution, it is made to feel itself a degraded caste, and as long as larger grants are made by Parliament for the erection of stables and dog-kennels at Windsor than for the education of the people. The Tories may be treated civilly by the mob, but they never can persuade it to adopt their politics. The Whigs, if they will have its love and confidence, must learn to be more cordial, more frank, and less narrow-minded: they must, in short, learn to treat men like fellow-creatures. If they would release the mob from the influence of demagogues, they must become Radicals themselves, instead of trying to catch and tame a stray Radical, and enlist him in their ranks. A Whig, though a feeble and pragmatical creature, may be benevolent and sincere; a whiggified Radical is a jobber. The mob despises the former but hates the latter.

CHAPTERS ON ENGLISH POETRY.

SCOTT, BYRON, AND THEIR IMITATORS.

CHAPTER II.

OUR poetry, then, during the whole interval from SPENSER to COWPER, had, both in its machinery and tendency, been artificial. From thence, it has been undergoing transformations according to the character and power of each of its professors. A complete change has come over it. It is now again influential in the government of society, and holds a retired and awful cognizance in religion. In the hands of one, it is a wildering excitation; and in those of another, a pastoral allurements to the good and the simple. By all, its power has been again acknowledged. Poets have been called dreamers; but they are the only searchers for the real. They have been called, by a mistake, dealers in fiction; but they alone, with a pure heart, follow truth: and, in the want of a more perfect intimacy than it has been the lot of mortals, in all past ages, to attain, they have been contented with truth of description; for nearly all past poetry is descriptive, whether of active or passive nature, emotion, or object.

"Men talk of poetry as of a matter of amusement and idle pleasure; who will converse with us as gravely about a taste for poetry, as they express it, as if it were a thing as indifferent as a taste for rope-dancing, or Frontinac, or Sherry. Aristotle, I have been told, hath said, that poetry is the most philosophic* of all writing; it is so: its object is truth, not individual and local, but general and operative: not standing upon external testimony, but carried alive into the heart by passion: truth, which is its own testimony, which gives strength and divinity to the tribunal to which it appeals, and receives them from the same tribunal."

It is necessary that we prepare ourselves for the study of poetry, as we prepare ourselves for the investigation of all truths. Shall we allow years of preparation for sciences which are merely the dogmatism of matter of fact, and deny it to the professors of that art whose object is the innermost soul of man, and its intercommuning with the whole external world, as they are mutually existent? or must the language of this be so plain, that they who run may read, that any one may understand the outgoings and incomings of thought in the works (poetic) of the greatest of men? If poetry, indeed, be a convention, then all who have once passed the threshold, and been initiated in its cabala, should be able to understand it. But it is opposed to all convention: the most primary desires of our nature impelling us to advancement in all good, to admiration of all beauty, are the materials of all poetry; and we seek after a possession of them, and find it as we may. If poetry be properly an amusement or a relaxation from what are called graver matters, then have people a right to expect it to lie on the surface, easily picked up in the intervals of leisure, and dressed out in variety, like Jacob's coat, to please the eye, and prevent all dubiety. But it is the mistake of a false refinement, the fallacy of modern logic, that would consider it so. It is not so: it is not satisfied with appearances; on the contrary, it is sick of pageantry and everlastingly going inward to the heart, and the idea, of which life is a manifestation, and offering its gleanings to be judged by them.

. . . . There is one mode of representation which is equally convincing to all of us, which results, like Dame Quickly's soliloquizing about Sir John's promise of marriage, from accuracy of knowledge and singleness of intention on the part of the speaker: there is another, which persuades us by reasoning. There is one kind of art which is honest, and, confessedly a means only, values itself no further; and there is another which, by refining and rhetorizing, assumes to itself the false importance of an end. The first of those modes of expression—the first of those kinds of art—we have seen used and practised by the early masters in English poetry, and at its highest perfection in Shakspeare, just at the time it was about to wane. The second of these modes of expression and kinds of art followed Shakspeare and the era of the Reformation: it was not the natural growth of the country, but the result of foreign models having been used. The finest phase of this second condition of poetry is the scholastic, and may be said to have attained its greatest excellence in Milton.

We say the finest phase, because it is not refer-

* "Poetry is the true philosophy." Professor Wilson has said good things on this text. Both Wordsworth and Wilson refer to poetry as the exposition of the springs of passion and action; it is also the truest philosophy, in its capacity of giving us the result of all speculation; it makes us feel what is true, and to reflect on passion.

able to a standard like the other, but is mobile, and changes with the social-artificial state of those who practise it. From Milton it degenerated to Pope, and from Pope to the beginning of the present century it degenerated still. From the beginning of the present century, when poets began to estimate aright the high calling of their name, and became aware, in one shape or other, of those rights and duties which we have just been claiming for them, until the present day, it has played such fantastic tricks before high heaven, as have made the simple-minded and the philosophic alike turn from it, muttering to themselves the words of the Trojan, as he tears the letter,

Words, words, mere words, 'tis nothing from the heart :
Go, wind to wind, there turn and change together.

Others of our poets endeavoured to explain and avoid this. They tried to engage, by representing the affections in their simplest beauty, believing that they were "when unadorned adorned the most," or by involving the grand interests of the race, and making it a vehicle for the annunciation of doctrine speculative or moral, to be prophets and teachers. To see how these intentions were worked out, we must inquire how each pursued them ; we must consider the men as well as their works ; we must draw an abstract of each, and, having done so, compare them and their results in connexion with the age ; and first of—

SCOTT AND HIS IMITATORS.

The writers who have been most popular among us of late, have been Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott. Sir Walter's initiation into letters was not quite like that of Shakspeare, but it was as far from being scholastic, perhaps much farther : it was without method, and interrupted by ill health, and, as is generally the case with a son following the same tract of life which his father has travelled before him, had no precise term. He exchanged the school for the office, without almost knowing the difference : the desultory mode in which the studies of the former had been pursued, was succeeded by as desultory a pursuance of those of the latter. The dominion of the middle classes was not, fifty or sixty years ago, so fully established as it now is : he was on an isthmus between the great and the mean ; and it depended on himself, by attaching his interests to those above him, to become associated with them, as it would have been easy (had his tendencies been base) for him to have experienced a descent to the Avernus beneath. He was ambitious, and strong in mind as in body, and fully attained his elevation. This happy medium gave him some initiation into both extremes ; and the time he passed in the country, while a child, brought him acquainted with much that belonged to the soil, much of the native and heartfelt both in the prejudice and good sense which Scottish country life eminently affords. His place of birth and residence, from infancy upwards, like the circumstances already mentioned, had likewise the advantages and disadvantages of being equally removed from the busy turmoil and constant impulsion of the seat and centre of politics and commerce, and from the dead condition of village life. Edinburgh is a city which combines, in a narrowed degree, all the varieties of London society, and, ever dwelling on its ancient or professional character, has rejected the liberalizing spirit of a commercial city. In aspect, it is itself a romance, presenting hills surrounding a rugged eminence, crusted over with huge buildings, and terminating in towers. Every lane, every house, has its history, and, until late years, (during which short time, indeed, the devil of improvement has been hard at work,) it appeared the very old age of nobility. How many cavalcades have defiled down that hill, now, in truth, "wearing motley," and resonant with ungente sounds ; how many picturesque processions, which found choice dames and stalwart men, without going beyond the limits of a Scottish court, have wound between these rows of airy buildings : how many blades have been drawn—how much honourable blood has been shed in these lanes—in the days of "sturt and strife," when the Black Douglas and the Hamilton expended their blows in private feuds, instead of leaguings the followers of the bloody heart, and the retainers of its rival house, in "keeping the borders redd." The everyday life of Edinburgh, too, during the youth of Scott, had much peculiar to itself, and well qualified to inspire those safe opinions, and stimulate to those paths of ambition which Sir Walter chose. It was thoroughly a burghers' town, with rights and privileges descending from father to son ; and every man knowing his neighbour. Many were the merry meetings and carousings, on stated nights, to which they went with as much seriousness as if it were a matter of business. Scotch law considers a man's going to kirk and market, after making his will, as establishing its validity and his sanity ; the Edinburghers might have made it market, kirk, and tavern, and the last had been the surest of the three.

There was another division of the inhabitants ; the aristocracy, who valued, and justly, the dignity of family name and connexion, and valued it the more, inasmuch as it was only of local influence. These were at once the bane and support of the respectability of the town ; and it is not difficult to see in what degree one born as Sir Walter was, and reared in the inveterate notions incidental to the place, was doomed to certain opinions—certain politics, religion, &c. ; even as he was created and endowed with the large limbs of a strong Scotsman—his high cheek-bones, and penthouse brows.

Sir Walter Scott began his career by a study of the border tales ; his first work being the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border." He had, indeed, already published some translations from the German—Leonora, &c., and Goetz von Berlichingen, and other pieces ; but the Border Minstrelsy was his first important publication. This was followed by his edited edition of "Sir Tristrem, a metrical romance of the thirteenth century, by Thomas of Ercildoun ;" a title, on the correctness of which the annotator to Warton's History of English Poetry casts many doubts. Then followed "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," which was rapidly succeeded, from time to time, by his other romances in verse, until "The Lord of the Isles," in 1814—the same year in which Waverley appeared, and drew the eyes of the world, and concentrated his powers on the production of that stupendous series of novels, which has established him as one of the greatest men of the nineteenth century.

And what is the nature of those poems whose popularity rose to so great a height as if by glamour, and which are now, in the process of a few years, comparatively so little known? They were altogether a mistake—the quickly begotten fabrications of antiquarianism, to suit a public hungering and thirsting after novelty. Their success, as well as their subsequent neglect, have proved them so to be. Sir Walter saw the stirring up of men's minds, and the gulf which the public excitement and revolutionary innovations had cloven between them and the poetry of the past age; he saw how unfit it was to supply the highly fermented state of the public mind which had ensued, with anything like pleasure; and he fell on the method most consonant to his habits to supply its place. Sir Walter Scott had a conviction of the greatness of the poetic character; he acknowledged to himself how unavailing and inanimate it had been under the Pope school of writers. But instead of remedying it, as a genius of another mould would have done, by attempting to adapt the art of the poet to the advanced intellectual condition of the age, he did not see nor believe it to be advanced, and endeavoured to establish it as of old! If he is right, then almost everybody else is wrong;—because everybody else has, directly or indirectly, tacitly or intentionally, by inference or analogy, acknowledged a widened sphere of knowledge, and a better understood system in all things, to have been introduced since the time to which metrical romance belongs.

But this great writer, born an antiquary, and growing up "learned in all the learning of the Egyptians," seems never to have wasted a thought on matters abroad—to have been scarcely aware that there was such a thing as experimental science pursued in this country, or such a phrase as political economy. He took upon himself, as if he were at a fancy ball, the character of a wandering minstrel, and, with his harp slung over his russet garb, he fancies himself recounting, with pride, the deeds of the family who entertains him; for which beggarly predicament he consoles himself by claiming kindred with the family himself. He loved the minstrel character, he respected it; but he loved more, and respected infinitely more, the barons and ladies (however rare a spirit the one might have had, and however brutal that of the other) to whom they played. He looked more to the outward means and appliances of men than to their inner fabric: those who were powerful over the body were always more important to him than those whose wand ruled the spirit; and, besides, in viewing any past time, he had the faculty of placing himself among the actors, and entering into their respective feelings toward each other. For instance, Shakespeare and Lord Burleigh would be in his mind—owing to the realism by which he was ruled, and to the vast projectile power he had in placing himself in any given time and scene—no other than an insignificant player, cunning it might be with a grace, but still insignificant, and the powerful and important lord as one in high office. The weight of Shakspeare's genius and fame, which so fill the imagination of other men, had no reverence from him; nor was this in him an equivocal, as in Moore's verses, when he bitterly contemns Rousseau and Madame de Warzen, and says of them, that by the neighbours

If known at all, they were but known,
As strange low people, low and bad—
Madame herself to footmen prone,
And her young pauper all but mad.

Sir Walter loved the poetic character for the lustre it shed on those it celebrated; and the reputation that appertained to it was rather reflected from them, than proceeding from the bard's own genius. The duchess says of the Last Minstrel, at the end of the third canto,

In sooth, 'tis strange, this old man's verse
Can call them from their marble hearse.

And—

The harper smiled well pleased; for ne'er
Was flattery lost on poet's ear.

Then he begins the next canto—

Call it not vain—they do not err
Who say that, when the poet dies,
Mute nature mourns her worshipper,
And celebrates his obsequies.

It may be said, that all that follows this is very well in the mouth of an old minstrel, but that the author had little to do with it. The life of our great novelist, however, proved that he did think, and feel, as well as write, in that fashion. He was ever working for social elevation, ever turning his powers and projects towards making himself one of the landed and privileged; never like Milton, "with God's help, winning an immortality of fame," travelling far to show respect to genius, and asserting and endeavouring, with his pen and voice, the correction and purification of the laws; or, like Shakespeare, retiring from all observation, an obscure individual again, after having written Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, and the Mid-Summer Night's Dream.

My lyre—it is an idle toy,
That borrows accents not its own;
Like warbler of Columbian sky,
That sings but in a mimic tone.
Ne'er did it sound o'er sainted well,
Nor boasts it aught of Border spell;
Its strings no feudal slogan pour,
Its heroes draw no broad claymore;
No shouting clans applauses raise,
Because it sung their father's praise;
On Scottish moor, or English down,
It ne'er was graced with fair renown;
Nor won—best meed to minstrel true—
One favouring smile from fair Buccleuch:
By one poor streamlet sounds its tone,
And heard by one dear maid alone.

But if thou bidst, these tones shall tell
Of errant knight and damosel.

He seems, in the opening of the Bridal of Triermain—certainly no compliment to Lucy the "one dear maid"—to prefer a smile from the dowager, although a duchess, to one from her, calling it the "best need to minstrel true." And when he throws off this minstrel masquerade—or rather when he appears like other people, as we ought scarcely to call that garb in which he most generally appears a masquerade, however strange it may be—he sinks at once into the feeling that he is acting a mummer, and doing something unworthy. He is willing to concede his book and labour to be fully well used, if it be not thrown aside.

CONCLUSION.

And now, Ennni, what ails thee, weary maid?
And why these listless looks of yawning sorrow?
No need to turn the page as if 'twere lead,
Or fling aside the volume till to-morrow.
Be cheered—'tis ended; and I will not borrow
To try thy patience more, one anecdote
From Bartholine, or Perinskield, or Snorro.
Then, pardon thou thy minstrel, who hath wrote
A tale six cantos long, yet scorned to add a note.

This is humble enough in all reason, but it is the humility of a proud man. It is not that he despises poetry, but that he knows its tricks, and can be only amused by it. This is beautifully illustrated by what he says of himself in one of his letters. Acknowledging the popularity of his poetry, and taking some merit for knowing when to cease writing, he compares himself to Lord Byron, who rose into fame at that time; and adds, that, even if he had had the power, he would not have entered the arena as a gladiator, after the manner in which Byron did. It would be the same with all other intellectual pursuits: he would treat them all as beneath the staid land-holding individual; as secondary to the desire of aggrandizing his family and occupying an important relation to the soil, and the natives that till it. His mind was too squared and compacted to be wholly moved by any artificial pursuit; but it was subjected by birth and education to infinite prejudices. His was a gigantic soul almost entirely without music.

Sir Walter Scott was everlastingly returning to a country life, and looking back upon the former condition of the land and its tenants,—but it was in admiration of the subjugated contentment of the lower orders, and the arrogant will of the baron. Cobbett, too, was constantly casting his eyes on the same old English time and rural scenery, but with a benevolent longing to find again the efficient pleasures of roast-beef and plumb-pudding. Wordsworth, more than either, has become bound, "with ties as strong as flesh and blood," to mountain and moor, and their inhabitants; but the bonds of his love are the high and holy sympathies of our common nature.

Sir Walter Scott was, as Mr. Carlyle has remarked,* in an eminent degree, a healthy man. His opinions were never shaken by speculation; he had no figments of the brain, nor visions of more perfect things than the comparative preference of such as he had seen—a carved cabinet and a plain cupboard, for instance. A friend once called upon the author, on returning from a visit to Sir Walter. He was an enthusiast, and entertained those lofty ideas of Poetry which a man, prone to metaphysics, is inclined to hold: it is either everything or nothing with him. He threw himself down in a chair, and exclaimed, with much chagrin, that "his notions of genius had sustained a shock which would not be easily overcome."

He had been introduced to the novelist at his own earnest desire, that he might receive some advice, and hear his opinions, on what he was at that time greatly interested in—religious poetry. They spoke of blank verse. Sir Walter recommended the verse of Thomson's Seasons; and asked if his visitor had read Thomson. The latter was a little surprised at such a question; but ventured to say, that he had studied all the celebrated writers of blank verse, and thought Milton's wonderfully greater than any other. Sir Walter replied, that he liked Thomson's descriptions very much; and, being a Scotchman, he had come much in his way. This was also a surprise to his auditor, who could not have dreamed of a mind like that of Sir Walter taking into account such an irrelevant triviality as geographical position in considering an author. Our friend, however, added, that there were some others of less note in blank verse who had a fine understanding of its powers, and mentioned Blair; to which remark Sir Walter assented; and said he had known Blair's family, and that he was related to Dr. Blair, who was one of the ministers of the High Church of Edinburgh, and Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University.

But to return to his poetry. It was an attempt to revive the metrical romance of chivalry, to ingraft the refinements of modern poetry on the matter and manner of that forgotten order of compositions. It was altogether a mistake. Such a union is productive only of false notions. It is throwing a false veil of beauty over a naked and coarse fabric. It is making us liable, by prejudicing the mind, to misunderstand history, and to regret an age which ought to be dismissed from the memory with pleasure. It was cutting out the martlets and griffins sanguine, and placing them in Cuvier's "Regne Animal." But it delighted the public by novelty. Imitators sprang up,—Paterson, Hogg, Allan Cunningham; and, above all things, it tended to increase that mania for landscape, which has, for the last twenty years, overrun every corner of the country, and filled exhibitions and print-shops with scenery and landscape annuals, until these names have become nauseous. Turner, the "Professor of Perspective," produced from year to year his choice specimens of true Cockayne with astonishing professional ability, and give delight by additional novelty. This mania has not yet gone, and perhaps it may now be considered the most prominent result of the revival and modernization of metrical romances by Sir Walter Scott.

Harp of the north, farewell! the hills grow dark,
On purple peaks a deeper shade descending;
In twilight copse the glow-worm lights her spark,
The deer, half seen, are to the covert wending.
Resume thy wizard elm! the fountains lending,
And the wild breeze, thy wilder minstrelsy;
Thy numbers sweet, with Nature's vespers blending
With distant echo from the fold and lea,
And herdboys' evening pipe and hum of hiving be

His prose works are a different matter. He was there a greater than Prospero. He has established the novel in the future literature of England and of Europe as the successor of the epic and the narrative muses.

BYRON AND HIS IMITATORS.

Few more fortunate men have ever lived and figured on the stage of the great world than Lord Byron. So completely has his art succeeded, that many good people even yet, with a folio before them of portraits of the women he loved or the women he fancied, interspersed with views of his baronial home, his residences abroad, and the places he visited in his travels—even yet, with all this before them, people will say, and especially those ladies who adore the cavalier character, and affect to pity it, “How unhappy he was!” He came to a peerage without being born to one; he had his destiny in his own hand, and every step he took in life, was taken by his own free choice.

Lord of himself, that heritage of woe!

Let those who think that Byron would have been happy as a domestic man, as a member of the Upper House, and a voter on party questions; or, in short, those who can point out any course of life in which Byron's nature would have enjoyed more than in that of reckless and ever-changing excitement, assent to such exordiums as the following:—“It was reserved for the present age to produce one distinguished example of the muse having descended upon a bard of a wounded spirit, and lent her lyre to tell afflictions of no ordinary description—afflictions originating, probably, in that singular combination of feeling with imagination which has been called the poetic temperament, and which has so often saddened the days of those on whom it has been conferred.” What follows, by way of clincher to this, is an impertinent fallacy, which has been current for Byron's especial use for some time past; and it is very likely, if one was to bring the evidence of poetical biography from Chaucer downwards to contradict the fact, it would continue to be repeated the same as ever, and in the same ludicrously unhesitating manner:—“Nor does it require much time, or a deep acquaintance with human nature, to discover why these extraordinary powers should, in so many cases, have contributed more to the wretchedness than to the happiness of their possessor.”

The first years of Byron's boyhood were passed in wandering about the hills in the north of Scotland. His father, whose character was every way questionable, it appears, wooed the mother of our poet for her fortune, had deserted her when it was spent; and she, not having much cause to regret him, called her child after her own name, and returned to her native place, that she might be her own mistress with the moiety that remained. Dark enough, certainly, were the prospects of young Gordon at this period: his father banished, disclaimed by all, and his mother nearly so,—a passionate woman who used to fight with him, and say in her rage, “You little dog, you are a Byron all over,—you are as bad as your father!” to which he adds, in his own relation of the circumstance, “I gave her cause enough.” A miserable picture, indeed, as far as want of judgment, and want of sensibility on all sides can create misery.

At an early age, however, by an unexpected chance, he became the heir to his granduncle, Lord Byron, a person who had been long shunned by every one even more than his father, for having been guilty of the heaviest crime on the civil code; and, after a few tears of boyish conceit on being called Dominus at school, he entered on his honours, and almost verified his mother's assertion, by commencing a course of extravagance, and establishing his will, his caprice, paramount over the happiness or the judgment of the best with whom he came in contact, and over whom he could rule.

The history of Byron's first publication is well-known. He had distinguished himself by excesses at college; and when he left it, he thought he might as well distinguish himself in a new manner. From his earliest years, his grand ambition was to occupy attention,—to assert his own greatness, and claim it, as if his nobility were a thing apart from himself,—he had once been without nobility. Even at a later period of his life, when some military authority showed him the honours usual to his rank, he was so flattered as to make a preconcerted speech in return, instead of gracefully receiving them as his due. Without any worthy pride or self-esteem, he printed his schoolboy pieces, as if anything in the shape of a book were all that he cared to produce. His satire, which followed it in publication, is a proof of that want of rectitude of feeling which compels a man to say what he thinks. All are alike to him: like the Irishman in the fair, he cares not if it be his father's head he feels through the tent-canvas,—he strikes it to keep his sapling in practice, although not with the same good humour. Next followed “Childe Harold,” and Byron was at once elevated to the pinnacle of popularity.

No similar instance of success has ever occurred in the history of letters. The “Childe Harold” was carrying Scott's plan a little further. He simply resuscitated an old fabric: Byron endeavoured to put new life in it. Choosing a ballad name, and an antique verse, he spun out something between a tale and the diary of a sentimental tourist. Casting his own notion and the fashionable one together,—for Wertherism had not yet subsided—he described the countries through which he had been travelling, and gave an interest to the descriptions, and a connexion to the whole, by throwing over it a thoughtful reflective shadow of misanthropy. This he called “A Romaunt.” From that period to this, the name of Byron has been coupled with many sorts of false sentiment and “force of style.”

The influence of this affection on the public mind, coupled with Byron's real power, has been prodigious. “The poet,” as Chateaubriand remarks, “seeing what part the public made him perform, began to curse the world, which had only been the subject of his reveries!” Poem after poem followed; and he continued, as this writer phrases it, to curse the world; and people more and more admired him. Pirates as bright with fine affecttions, as their sword belts were brown with dried blood, and pirate's wives, who would have died at the sight of a dead mouse, followed one another, intermingled with newspaper gossip, licked up with wonderful avidity, relating to his profligacy at Venice; or stories more publicly told of Guiccioli, she being a personage who did more honour to her cavalier. He became a European figurant. The French wondered at him, and published forged manuscripts in his name; they also advertised a book by Sir Thomas More, meaning Moore! The Germans also wondered; and even Goethe assisted in circulating an absurd story to account for the supposed desperation of his character, that he had murdered a friend, and his conscience was lashing him about the world! This is called European fame, which only gives us another argument to prove the impossibility of judging of poetry or a poet apart from the circumstances, social and national, amid which he lived, and in accommodation to which he wrote.

"The young have taken certain magic words in earnest; the women have felt disposed to allow themselves to be seduced with dread by this monster, to comfort this unhappy Satan. Who knows?—he had perhaps not found the woman whom he sought,—a woman beautiful enough, a heart vast as his own. Byron, according to the phantasmagoric opinion, is the old Serpent, that seducer and corrupter, because he perceived the incurable corruption of the human race; he is a fatal and suffering genius, placed between the mysteries of matter and intelligence, who sees not a word in the enigma of the universe, who considers life as a horrible irony without cause, as a perverse smile of the evil one; he is the eldest son of despair, who despairs and denies; who, having within him an incurable sore, revenges himself by leading all that approach him to misery through pleasure; a man who has not passed through the age of innocence, who never had the advantage of being rejected and cursed of God; a man who, having sprung a reprobate from the bosom of nature, is the damned of nothingness. Such is the Byron of heated imaginations!"

Amusing as this criticism by the Count de Chateaubriand is, it is no less correct. Byron, he considers, borrowed the tone of his characters from him; and Beranger, with "The Biographie Universelle," (Suppl.) think the same. "René" preceded "Childe Harold," "Lara," &c.; and perhaps if the genealogy of the character were worth investigating, it might be found to possess a filial resemblance; so that Harold is only the grandchild to Werther, the family honours becoming more decorated at each remove. Byron found an agitated public delighted with Scott's metrical romances; and as popularity was all his aim, he outstripped his northern rival by producing more exciting food for the many-headed monster. It is said that the domesticated animals alone are accustomed to that respectable evil—yawning. The tabby on the footstool by the fire shows its ennui by the hour; the wild cat among the heath in the West Highlands has something more serious to do,—it is all day hunting the field-mice and the birds, and has to defend itself from the inclemency of all weathers. So may it have been with Byron. He was like the great man who, being worhipped by all except one man, made himself unhappy by having too little cause for unhappiness. Perhaps if Byron could not get people to take notice of him otherwise, he would have driven so close upon them that his carriage-wheels had cast the mud over their clothes. Nay, this was many times exemplified: for instance, in visiting the Lakes, when he wrote an ironical letter to Hogg. He had only the public voice as the standard of his admiration: the writers of the Lakes, therefore, were nobody to him. In all speculative matters, he was equally infirm. At the age of thirty-two, we find him saying, "Somebody has sent me a little book about Christianity that has made me very uncomfortable: the reasoning seems to me very strong, the proofs are very staggering. I don't think you can answer it, Shelley; at least I am sure I can't, and what is more, I don't wish it." And yet under the unavoidable influence of an acquaintance with that marvellous thinker, he had been writing dramas on biblical subjects, involving opinions where himself had none. All that he knew, and almost all that he cared to know, was

That it was all a mystery; here we are

And there we go; but where! Five drops of lead,
Or three, or two, or one, send very far.

And is this blood, then, formed but to be shed?

Can every element our elements mar?

And air, earth, water, fire, live and we dead!

We whose minds comprehend all things! No more;

But let us to the story as before.

It is more with the effect of Byron's genius and character on our literature that we have to do, than with his poetry itself. It may be safely said he has made the strongest impression of any writer we have had, not only in this age but in any other. And he did so by pure excitement. He descended on the troubled waters of the times; not as a good angel to calm them, but to increase the storm—to add the sound of his trumpet to the din of the strife—to add the heat of his great and burning genius to the fever of the public mind. His mind was like that of the public, every way undecided. The difference between the real and the merely apparent, the permanently good and the immediately pleasurable, was confounded in his theory of life. He had little idea of the tendency of anything, and no philosophy.

The passion for scenery had been mainly introduced by Sir Walter Scott,—it was carried to an incredible pitch by the writings of Byron. Travelling became the only employment a person of any sensibility could indulge in; and instead of its being an exhilaration, people persisted in speaking of it as a species of banishment. This passion became connected with another, which was sentimental gallantry. Moore had an equal share in spreading this taste. Faces in all styles of languishment have been ever since poured out, as if every print-shop was a harem, and the artists Georgian merchants. The part of the eunuch, according to this cast, falls to the publisher; and as he has been chiefly instrumental in keeping the rage alive, he is worthy of it. We have had books too, of the Beauties of the Court of Charles II., the series of whose pictures Madame de Staël very properly reprobates at Hampton Court, while the most philanthropic turn away in disgust from any palliation of those humbler wretches who are the grubs of the same species as those butterflies. And though there have been, and are, many continuators and improvers on Mrs. Wolstoncroft's "Code of Rights," such a sentiment as that expressed in the following verses (which the writer has several times repeated,) from a Lord Byron, have been able to turn the heads of the female multitude as effectually as ever:—

"Eliza, what fools are the Mussulman sect,
Who to women deny the soul's future existence!
Could they see thee, Eliza, they'd own their defect,
And this doctrine would meet with a general resistance.
"Had their prophet possessed half an atom of sense,
He ne'er would have women from his paradise driven;
Instead of his hours—a flimsy pretence—
With women alone he had peopled his heaven.

"Yet, still to increase your calamities more,
Not content with depriving your bodies of spirit,
He allots one poor husband to share amongst four!
With souls you'd dispense, but with this who could bear it!

"His religion to please neither party is made;
On husbands 'tis hard, to the wives most uncivil;
Still I can't contradict what so oft has been said,
'Though women are angels, yet wedlock's the devil!'"

Music, too, was brought into service; and every young lady in the kingdom, for some years, with all the ability of her throat and hands, implored the Maid of Athens to give Lord Byron back his heart; or ascended tenderly through the whole gamut those sufficiently nonchalant lines,—

"Fare thee well, and if for ever,
Then for ever fare thee well!"

Hobhouse and others, gentlemen of critical power as well as men of business, wrote large books of commentary; but Byron, disposing of what was already his, hastened to new fields. "Manfred," "Cain," "The Deformed Transformed," &c., although exceedingly brilliant, were neither original in their nature, nor did they produce much effect; for both which reasons it is not necessary to say much about them. "Don Juan" is his finest work: it is the natural man; it is full of discursive wit, it has prodigious agility of style, and lightly drawn pictures of the passions and affections, which are eminently beautiful. It is an artificial imitation of the variety of nature; a heterogeneous mixture of all contrarious ingredients.

The school which Byron founded is the Intense School. He begins "Lara" with these lines:—

"The serfs are glad through Lara's wide domain, And slavery half forgets her feudal chain;"
as if it were necessary, or even possible, that slavery should be always thinking of her chain; nay, as if, in the "feudal" servitude, they ever knew they were in chains at all. He thus describes that hero:—

"Not unrejoiced to see him once again,
Warm was his welcome to the haunts of men;

Born of high lineage, link'd in high command,
He mingled with the magnates of the land;
Joined the carousals of the great and gay,
And saw them smile or sigh their hours away:
But still he only saw, and did not share,
The common pleasure or the general care;
He did not follow what they all pursued,
With hope still baffled still to be renewed;
Nor shadowy honour, nor substantial gain,
Nor beauty's preference, and the rival's pain:
Around him some mysterious circle thrown,
Repell'd approach and show'd him still alone."

The interest of "Lara," like that of his other pieces, is concentrated in one character, and he makes that character an impersonation of one passion. He had outgrown this himself when he wrote "Don Juan;" but the public have scarcely done so yet. Rhetoric was Byron's faculty; his power was the power of words. This is comparatively a narrow field: in it there is nothing to glean after a hand like his has reaped. Byron's poetry circumscribed this species: it says, thus far can words be held for things,—thus far can they move the feelings, or personate beauty and sublimity without being animated by the soul of those superior existences,—thus far can the sensuous in poetry be carried. The styles of former scholastic writers, the Courtly, the rationally Correct, the Lackadaisical, have had a termination put to their variety by the Rhetorical. And Byron himself has virtually terminated the Rhetorical by the preference he has given to simple narration and mixed diction in "Don Juan;" especially as we see him versifying an actual account of a shipwreck, as he has done in that poem, and thus producing one of his finest passages.

Another feature in the works of this noble poet is, that his writings present that transition in the history of every man, and which is at present pending over public opinion, from a reliance on precedent to self-reliance. His morality was little more than that of immediate enjoyment; and he expressed it so freely, that we cannot mistake. It is always a vast benefit to have a sincere speaker:—the continuance of a great deal of the evil common to society results mainly from a secreting of its commission. Byron in this sense was a benefactor and a reformer. In religion, too, he has been one of the most decided writers the world has ever had. He professed nothing; treated whatever was ridiculous with undisguised contempt; and spoke out more freely than any (as if it were a matter of no one's interest) about those topics which every one avoids. The drama of "Cain" is a work which would require a more lengthened consideration, if we did not intend to review in detail the "Prometheus Unbound" of Shelley, which contains a more perfect scheme of the same philosophy united to higher art. "Cain," and "Heaven and Earth," are productions which, coming after his other works, startle us into great admiration of his multifarious powers; and perhaps do nothing more.

SKETCHES IN ERRIS AND TYRAWLY.*

BY THE AUTHOR OF A TOUR IN CONNAUGHT.

THIS is a continuation, we are glad to say not a conclusion, of a lively and delightful book which we had lately the pleasure of introducing to our readers. Conclusion it need not be; for give the author as a field in which to expatiate, a single barony, nay a parish, or a farm, with a mountain, a bit of bog, and a bit of sea-coast, a hamlet, a chapel, and a ruined tower, an ass and an old woman, a priest and a gossoon, and he will not lack for raw material out of which to construct an exceedingly entertaining and truly Irish book.

His discoveries are still in Connaught, and in its most purely original districts, Tyrawly and Erris. He starts at once from Ballina, and plunges into the heart of the great bog of Tyrawly, surrounded by its grand amphitheatre of Slieves and Moams, without having even had his breakfast. This, we can tell the reader, is no jesting matter. There is no choice of viands on the banks of the Owenmore, and the tourist soon repented the squeamishness he had shown at the dirty hostelry of Crosmollina. Perhaps there is no worse place for breakfast, or any meal whatever, in any part of her Majesty's dominions, than that same bog on which he found himself: always excepting a similar wild moorish track lying across the misty Island of Lewis; where, by virtue of the useful Hebridean faculty of second-sight, an old Highland woman prepared a bicker of porridge for the solace of the Ettrick Shepherd, foreseeing, by his own account, that a gifted Sassenach was to pass her lone hut, sorely in want of refreshment. Our tourist was not so fortunate. The Irish have never possessed the useful power of seeing far before them. The traveller beguiled hunger and the way by listening to the tales and traditions of the driver of his jaunting-car; and probably drew also upon the stores of his memory. Nor are his legends ever allowed to halt for lack of a little invention and embellishment to help them off. This is quite as it should be; and in the genuine flavour of the sod, these tales equal any humorous diablerie we have ever had from the same copious source.

The "good people" expelled, by many causes, from other places, seem to crowd to Erris, where they are named "the gentry," and are spoken of with the utmost respect, and where they still do a great deal of mirthful mischief. On the wild shores of this district, "the gentry," before the time of the Coast-guard, took the smugglers under their special protection; and then everybody smuggled a little; priest, squireen, and parson. But ghosts, giants, dwarfs, and enchanted men, are also plentiful. The Mullet of Erris, a peninsula of some extent on that coast, afforded a field to our tourist's antiquarian and traditionary researches; and furnished him with specimens of manners not to be found anywhere else; the natives being, in many respects, the same they were a thousand years ago. His principal guide through the Mullet was a Squireen, or duine uahasal, named Michael Anthony O'Donnell, a person of high family, counting sixteen descents in these parts, since his ancestors had left the North to settle in the Mullet. But here is the man and his surroundings. Original enough they are; considering that they must actually be included in some parliamentary district or another, to which her Majesty's writ is just issued:—

Approaching the western coast [of the Mullet,] our way lay through one of the largest villages; like all the rest, it was an irregular congeries of huts, but they, standing as they did high and dry, did not exhibit so much damp discomfort as the bog cabins. One or two dwellings were of a better sort, and one was shown as the habitation of the Queen of Erris; or, in other words, a Miss M'Donnell, who, having some education, some property, and much good sense, has been dubbed by Priest Lyons (as a Hildebrand crowned an emperor,) her Majesty of the Mullet. I certainly had a desire to enter into the presence of this western Victoria—but the honour was denied me, inasmuch as she was making a royal progress amongst her lieges in the mountains. I, as a sort of set off against this disappointment, was brought into the house of an Erris squireen—one who once was a considerable landholder, but, from profuse hospitality and other causes, is now reduced nearly to the level of a common peasant, and who lived principally on the goodwill of his neighbours. Mr. Michael Anthony O'Donnell (which fine double Christian name is abbreviated into Mister Mickletony,) was not in the house, but he was not far off, and would be sent for. His house, or rather cabin, though not larger than the others around, was clean and water-tight—the floor was swept—there was an air of tidiness and decency around. I observed a book or two on a shelf, and one appeared to be a New Testament. As this man was decidedly a character, and had much to tell of old lore and legend, a message was left for him, requesting he would follow us, and we proceeded to the glebe house. And such a position for a glebe house, within three hundred yards of the Atlantic Ocean—nothing between the sea cliffs and the rear of the house but a dreary down, on which a blade of grass dare not start up lest it should be cut off by the driving blast fraught with salt spray, and where only the sea pink and the bent had the means and power dwarfishly to vegetate! What a wide difference between this Erris glebe, and one of the sheltered, garden environed, placid, picturesque glebes in wealthy England, the very emblem of old long established comfort, and this horrid house, with its interior walls all green with the mildew of indomitable damp—its windows shattered with the last winter's blast, and for panes of glass, boards, canvass, and all manner of ugly make-shifts substituted! I wonder how an Oxford or Cambridge Fellow would like to be sent here, as the settled retreat of his latter days. Why, the very sight of it would give him a quartan ague. But not so our Irish parson. The worthy divine was out amongst his workmen, trying to make a little hay, not while the sun shone—for the orb was not visible—but while the wind blew, without carrying wet on its wings. I have seldom seen a healthier looking young man.

I confess that when the parson wished me good morning, and his place was supplied by Mr. Mickletony O'Donnell, I was not sorry for the exchange; for, without desiring to disparage his reverence, either as a clergyman or a gentleman, I must say that I, for "the nonce," preferred the garrulous and credulous Milesian to the matter-of-fact minister. What a perverted taste!

* 1 vol. cloth. Dublin: Curry & Co.

Now, I was prepared by the young friends who accompanied me from Belmullet, for what I was to expect in Mr. Mickletony, and he did not do discredit to his character. The man is tall, thin, and rather narrow shouldered. He stoops a little, I should suppose from frequent bendings of his body as he enters the cabin doors of his many friends; he has a little shuffle in his gait, arising, I should suspect, from the over use of whisky—the commencement of what may end in delirium tremens. He has a round face, a keen black eye, and, if all be true that is said of his drinking propensities and practices, he shows a constitution that has hitherto well withstood the poison of a continual stimulus. Mr. O'Donnell's accost has the ease and confidence of one who felt he was of the better sort, and he entered at once into free and familiar conversation. Where we stood there lay before us the great ocean, which was heaving under a wind that was sending from the south-west heavy clouds that portended a speedy fall of rain, and along the wild cliff-embattled coast, the waves were boiling and surging and sending up their spray on high, with moanings amongst the caverns, that foretold the coming storm. To the north was Eagle island, lofty and abrupt, with two picturesque lighthouses, which were just being erected. Southwards Innisgloria, and farther down towards Achill, Inniskea. I desired to gather what I could from Mickletony about Innisgloria, and accordingly asked was he ever there?

"Yes, to be sure I was. Do you think I would not often be where all the people of any gentility do be buried?"

A great deal is made out of Mister Mickletony, who had had, in his time, several personal encounters with "the gentry," and particularly when returning home late, after drinking a great many tumblers of punch. We take, in preference to his fairy adventures, one of his traditional tales:—

"I'll tell you what I heard my father say, that in the time o' Cromwell there was a troop commanded by one Coote came into this quarter, and they racked, ruined, and cut down all the poor Catholic people. My ancestor was at that time rich and prosperous, and he knew that if he staid he would find no mercy. So he gathered all his money, put it in a crock, and in the presence of a foster-sister, who was his maid, he buried it under his kitchen hearth, and then he departed into Donegal, leaving the girl in care of his home; and by-and-by the troopers came, and they having got the hard word that the man was rich and that he couldn't have carried all away with him, commanded the woman to tell where the money was. Of course she denied all knowledge, and then they had her lashed with their bridles, and yet she wouldn't tell; and then they half hanged her, and cutting her down pressed her to disclose, and still she said nothing; and then they spread out the coals of fire on the very hearth under which was the gold, and placed her sitting on the burning embers; and what did she do then—why in the middle of her great pain she bit off her tongue and spit it in their faces; and then they set fire to the house, and left the poor colleen to wander tongueless about the world: and so it was until the curse of Cromwell was removed and better times came on, and Catholics could live at home, and my ancestor returned to find his gold safe and his poor fosterer a dumb wanderer, going from house to house.

A very ugly story is told by Mickletony, and confirmed by our author, of the insolence of Protestant prejudice and ignorance; and he has no inclination for such exposure, though the proper feelings of a gentleman forbid concealment of such brutal and offensive acts.

ERRIS is comparatively still an unknown region, shut in by bog and mountain, and long by want of roads. In the "ould ancient times," it was the country of the O'Flahertys, from whom it passed to the Burkes and Barretts. After the Cromwel-lian confiscations, Erris was granted to an Irish placeman, Sir James Shaen, and the wide district was divided between the co-heiresses of his son. One of the young ladies married a gentleman of Kildare, named Carter; the other a Bingham of Mayo. The Carter half of the extensive property remains entire—a rather wonderful fact; and Major Bingham, a celebrated improver, more noted for his spirit than prosperity, still holds a large share of the original possessions of his family. The Shaens introduced a Protestant colony for the improvement of their property, and located the new comers in the Mullet. But here Mr. Otway, the author of the tour, states a most discouraging fact:—

The men who had the courage to undertake this settlement, had also the moral energy to persevere; therefore, while this generation lasted, improvements went on, a better breed of cattle and superior tillage were introduced; and though they were annoyed and robbed by the old natives, still the colony prospered as well as circumstances would admit. But here, as indeed elsewhere all over Ireland, and at all times of its history, the generation that succeeded the first settlers was of a very deteriorated character. I believe no race of men was ever known to have changed character so rapidly as the Cromwellian settlers; the descendants of the stiff, stern, often fanatical, sometimes pious Puritans, Baptists, and Presbyterians, became the most profligate and careless of mankind. It has been always the character of the English settlers in Ireland to become "ipsis Hibernis Hiberniores"; but I believe no race so rapidly adopted the wild extravagant character of the Irish as the Cromwellian. Before half a century had elapsed, properties that had been divided amongst soldiers, officers, and adventurers, were lavished and spent as easily as they had been acquired; and instances are on record of estates, now worth thousands per annum, being exchanged for a horse, a setting dog, or some even more vicious accommodation; and as in all times and places where there are spendthrifts, there will be accumulators, in a comparatively short time a vast quantity of the small Cromwellian allotments was absorbed and merged into the possession of watchful and clever appropriators, and still the evil remained as from the beginning, and still continues, of the country being partitioned amongst a comparatively small proprietary, who had neither the means, the knowledge, nor desire to improve their huge possessions. This evil has been universal all over the island—it has always prevailed in Connaught; it has been excessive the more we approach the west, and in Connemara, Joyce's Country, Achill, and Erris, it has hitherto been the great bar to improvement; and it is to be found that in many cases, though, of course, not in all, the lords of these wide wastes, jealous of their ownerships, have preferred to be like Selkirk, the monarchs of all they survey, even suppose it were profitless bog and mountain, rather than part upon a long lease with what might call for capital in its improvement, or give remuneration to those who would expend time, industry, and knowledge, in making it productive. In Erris, the original lessees of Sir Arthur Shaen, instead of devoting themselves to husbandry, to enclosing, tilling, and manuring their allotments, and acting the part of industrious yeomen, became merely stock owners, running their cattle over tracts that remained in their hands as unimproved as ever. I don't believe stockmen ever have, or ever will improve any country. They have, in a great measure, kept Connaught unimproved, and a large portion of South America; in the same way will they keep back Australia. The life of a stockman must for a great part of the year be inactive: therefore amongst uneducated men, sporting and carousing will naturally ensue; hence expenditure greater than income, embarrassment, a diminished stock, property parted with, and eventual ruin.

There is here matter over which economists may ponder. Mr. Otway advances excellent reasons to show the utility of clergymen in such districts as this, being agriculturists and improvers, however improper in ordinary circumstances it may be for them to allow secular affairs to intermeddle with their sacred functions. Dean Lyons, a well-known Catholic clergyman, in the district, has been an active improver, and has set a good example, which his neighbours and his flock are not, we are sorry to find, in haste to follow. For this he has been frowned upon by his superior, Archbishop M'Hale.

The Roman Catholic faith finds no favour in the eyes of our tourist. He sportively imagines that many of the obstinate old Mullet farmers doggedly persisting in following the agricultural wisdom of their ancestors, may have said to their improving priest—

“Your reverence, that wants us to stick to the old way in religion, why urge us to give up the old way of managing our land.” I have heard that some one recommended to this new-light pastor, that it might be well if, when imposing a penance, instead of sending a sinner to ATONE for his misdeeds to the reek of Croagh Patrick, or the holy well of Bala, he should send them to dig drains and execute other useful laborious works at his farm of Shanaghy.

Yet good crops of barley, raised for distillation, are seen in the Mullet, and on the coast, forced by sea-weed manure. The farms here are still held under something similar to the old Scottish tenure of run-rig, than which the ingenuity of man could not devise a worse. The implements of husbandry are somewhat like those one reads of in Martin's Account of the Hebrides; and indeed the customs and manners of the district are as primitive as those described in that curious book. For example, in some places the practice still remains, of horses drawing both the plough and harrows, (where there are such implements,) from the tail! This, the people contend, is neither cruel nor injurious to the animals; and, at all events, it saves the expense of harness. Our tourist thus describes these primitive people:—

In the mountain district outside the Mullet and away from the sea shore, the people living in villages through the glens, content with as much potatoes as their families want, and some corn to be used in illicit distillation, give their attention principally to the rearing and sale of cattle; there are none more astute in driving a bargain; and they are great hoarders of money. Like all people over the surface of the earth, badly governed, and subject to the exacting will of their superiors, they exhibit outwardly a poverty which is far from real. Interested and prejudiced persons may assert that all this arises from recent oppression, and arising out of English rule and Protestant penal laws; but the evil is older and much more deeply seated. The cosherings and the bonnaughts, the coyne and livery of their ancient Milesian lords, the inroads and the feuds of rival septs, gave rise to this general mistrust, and to this fear of appearing wealthy, long before England afforded its protection to, or, as some say, inflicted its injury on, the Irish community. Neither does the present distrust arise solely from fear of the landlords knowing how wealthy they are; I am sure, also, that the appearance of poverty is simulated to blink the priest.

The natives of Erris are not at all cleanly in their persons or houses: in many of their houses, as I have been given to understand, they have but one vessel that will hold water, and that is the metal potato pot; and therefore personal ablution is confined to the face and neck.

A person remarking on this disagreeable subject, observed that he could see plainly the line of demarcation between the washed and unwashed parts; which line put him in mind, so defined was it, of the tide-water mark on the sea shore.

Mr. Knight, a gentleman intimately acquainted with the district, in his topographical work, describes the people as—

Generally speaking, far from being poor, with often greater marks than others of outside poverty,—an active, hardy, intelligent race of men, hospitable to an extreme, as far as they have means; but, satisfied with little themselves, they seek not what others would call comforts, but which, to them, from habit, would be superfluous luxuries; hence, in their houses, there is little of cleanliness, or apparent comfort in furniture, bedding, or the usual accompaniment of a certain sum of riches. The whole thought seems to be the rearing and tending of cattle, going to fairs, and selling or exchanging. In 1813, I slept at a man's house who had one hundred head of black cattle and two hundred sheep, and there was not a single chair or stool in his house but one three-legged one,—no bed but rushes,—no vessel for boiling their meals but one, nor any for drinking milk out of but one, (the Madder), which was handed round indiscriminately to all who sat round the potato-basket (myself among the rest) placed upon the pot for a table; yet this man was said to be very rich besides the stock named above.

One might fancy one was reading of the poor people of Orkney some generations back; or of the victims of rapacious Turkish local governors. There is some doubt about the amount of the population of Erris. Our traveller insinuates—nay, he plainly says, for he is not addicted to insinuation—that the Catholic clergy often exaggerate the fractional parts of the “seven millions.” He supposes the real number of the people of Erris may be 16,563—a considerable reduction from the number assumed by Dean Lyons. The Poor Law Commissioners made it less by 4000. The people are naturally milder, and of more amiable character, than the pugnacious peasantry of Munster. Education is retrograding among them, and superstitious and absurd customs have been stationary for many centuries. We select one example:—

Like all ignorant and at the same time imaginative people, the natives of Erris have very carnal views on what is usually considered the invisible world. Take for instance the following:—When the cholera prevailed eight years ago, the conception amongst the Errisians was that of an old witch who went along with a terrible countenance, horrid hair, and breathing out a dense fume, dropping pestilence wherever she went; that in her vocations as she moved along from Sligo and passed the Moy at Ballina, where she made thousands blue and stiff with her death-dealing breath, she strode westwards through Tyrawly and came to the river Owenmore, and was in the act of wading that stream, when a pious man, who had been on his knees just going through a decade of prayers with his beads, and, rising therefrom, saw her in the middle of the stream; and moved to it, no doubt by his guardian angel, he up with a stone and flung it at her with all his force, and that with the best effect; for he broke her thigh; and with that she turned about, and why shouldn't she, and never made her appearance in Erris.

The Highlanders had, and have, similar ideas. The small-pox, in particular, they embodied under the figure of a stately woman, whose displeasure they tried to appease. The people of Erris keep all the cuttings of their hair stuffed into crevices of the walls of their hovels, under the idea that the dead at the resurrection must produce all the hair they ever had. The following instance is given of their simplicity, by a coast-guard officer, and of the good sense of an archbishop not famed for that quality:—

When Archbishop M'Hale made his first visit to Erris, an old man, named G——n, a neighbour of a neighbour of mine, went with many hundreds to be confirmed at Inver. The prelate, surprised no doubt to see so old a man come before him, asked him how many Gods there were. "Three," bluntly replied the old catechumen. "Three!" exclaimed the bishop in horror at such a heresy; "why, you ignorant old man, there is but one." "There may be only one now, times are changing so," sturdily replied old G——n; "but when I was a boy there certainly were three—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." The archbishop said no more to G——n, but, turning to one of the priests, said in a half whisper—"I hope that poor old man is happy in his belief." This story I had from a priest that was present.

But they don't want shrewdness. Many of our readers must, if only through Carleton's Tales, know of those periodical banquets, ordered in reality by the priests, though at the expense of their richer parishioners, and shared by them as often as they hold "a station." These substantial repasts form part of the priests' perquisites; and this brings us to our tale.

On a certain day somewhat later than a century ago, Huey Gallagher, the priest's clerk of the chapel of C——, gave out after mass to the congregation, that he had somewhat of consequence to acquaint them with—to which they would do well to take heed. This solemn preliminary of course caught attention, and some great announcement was expected—nothing short of the pope's death, or the arrival in those quarters of Father Mathew. When with loud voice Huey sung out, "Good people all, I warn ye not to kill any geese during the stations to be held during the following week, for all the geese are dying at Ballina of the cholera morbus!!! This ruse was too transparent, and the consequence was, that all the people burst out into a roar of laughter at Huey's bulletin, in which the priest very good humouredly joined. Was it not the case that his reverence was tired of geese, with which he was crammed ever since Michaelmas, (so that, satiated with such fowl feeding, he in sad wit asserted that he expected pen-feathers would shortly start from his skin,) and that mutton just now was in prime order! At all events the proclamation of the priest's double had not the designed effect; for Mrs. Monaghan having the following Saturday the honour of giving a station dinner, had two geese killed for the occasion.

Mr. Otway does not go the length of recommending that the Catholic clergy should be paid by the government; but he shows what might be the benefit to the people, were these reverend fathers not so directly dependent upon their flocks for their support; and of what advantage to the independence and usefulness of the Catholic clergy themselves might be, as Barney Brannigan says,

The good friendly sup of the true Regum Domum, enjoyed by their Presbyterian brethren of Ulster.

As specimens of the work in different styles, we shall now select a few passages, recommended by their brevity, and their humour or pathos:—

AN IRISH FAIR—Scene, Killala.

I love to look on at a fair, it delights my heart to witness the cordial meetings and greetings of the kind-hearted people, to see the hearty kiss given, to hear the noisy laugh passed round. I wish I had the art of fixing on canvass this or that most picturesque group, when I could portray not only the round and jocund faces—blessings on them—of my countrywomen, but also the rich contrasts of colour in the costumes, which I wish they would not change—the scarlet mantle, the madder red petticoat with its many plaits, the brown boddico, the yellow kerchief, the sky blue stockings. Talk not to me of Swiss or German costumes: rather give me a Connaught lass attired as I have just said, with her fair skin, her ruddy cheek, her mirthful black eye, and her white teeth almost sparkling from her half opened, good natured, and large mouth. She is no beauty to be sure—her head and form are Celtic, and not Grecian; but there she stands before a tent, a kind laughter-loving amiable crathur. I see her there coquetting most intensely, with Pat on one side, and he's a clean, comely, broad shouldered, light limbed, springy fellow; he could run to Sligo and never draw breath; he could hurl or fight till the cows came home. On the other side of her is a sailor in his many buttoned and well-fitting blue jacket; he wears a white dimity waistcoat and a red bandanna tied carefully careless about his neck: he is a specimen of manly vigour, a little weather beaten to be sure. Sally, the deceiver, is dividing her smiles and pleasantries between her two admirers; an old wrinkled body (Sally's aunt no doubt) is standing behind—she is watching the lively colleen; she would rather that Sally was not so particular with Jack tar; Paddy with his bit of ground and his decent cabin would do better for her. Such groups you may jot down in your sketch book at a fair in Killala.

SEA-PIECE AT DOWNPATRICK HEAD.

We now ascended the hill a little higher, and came to a chasm that yawned unexpectedly at our feet. It was about fifty yards long and about ten wide, and down about eighty feet below, you saw the sea as green and clear as an emerald, rising and heaving softly and harmoniously, and disclosing many fathoms deep all the magnificent and beautifully tinted vegetations that adorn the caverns of the ocean. Sunk in the middle of the fair plain, you cannot at first imagine how came the sea here, but, by-and-by you see that it is open at both ends, that, in fact, the roof of a great sea cave, that has penetrated through this promontory, has fallen in, and you learn that you can enter at the north-east of the promontory, and, passing along in a boat for nearly half a mile, can come out at its south-western side, and that this is a great skylight by which the sun and air are admitted into the recesses and sinuous labyrinths of this great excavation. It is called Poolnaashanthana; there are many of the kind on this coast, and I had already observed a fine one in the Mullet of Erris, but this one at Downpatrick is far and away the deepest, the largest, the grandest I have seen, and is certainly a great natural curiosity.

On a soft sunny day, when all above and below is still, it is pleasant to wear away the lazy hour in looking down from above, and ponder on the beautiful contrasts of light and shade that this cavern presents, to see the riven rock, painted by nature's own hand with ochres, red, brown, and yellow; lichens, scarlet, white, orange,—crystallisations of lime, iron, or silice, sparkling where a sunbeam brightened them. Down below, the starfish and medusa floating in purple beauty, and spreading out their efflorescent rays,—while every now and then the quiet modulations of the incoming tide, as they sigh below, are broken in upon by the cooing of the sea pigeon in its safe fastness, or the hoarse shriek of the caillif cormorant as it reposes after the success of its fishing in the calm deep. I would like to spend some of the few idle days my lot allows me in this busy world, hanging over this Poolnaashanthana, and in quiet loneliness admiring how beautiful, and grand, and good, God is in his multitudinous creations.

After telling a sad story of a poor fellow who, one stormy day, lost his life by falling into this chasm with his horse, which he was leading home with a burden of sea-weed, Mr. Otway proceeds to relate, with great feeling, one of the most tragic tales that has ever been made known of the mournful period in Irish annals to which it refers.

The French, by landing at Killala, had induced the population of Mayo to rise in rebellion, and, after early success, and subsequent defeat, the hopes of the insurgents were altogether extinguished by the defeat and surrender of the French at Ballinamuck,—and, after the surrender of Killala to the king's forces, the hour of retribution came down on the poor misguided people, and the curse of martial law, domiciliary visits and free quarters, wasted all around. There is a village in the Laggan not far from Downpatrick, and the young and able of that community had, in the general rising, gone out,—and why should not they, when told by their betters, in whom they entirely trusted, that their country and their religion called them to the field; they had been at the taking of Killala and Ballina, and were active—as all Roman Catholic Mayo was—in defeating General Lake at Castlebar; and now they had come home to reap their corn, and their wives and families had given God thanks that, with but one or two exceptions, all had returned safe, and the wise and prudent had asked what good had been gained by all this ruction, and the answer still was, “It's well it's no worse;” when the hard word came one day, as the whole village population was busy stooking the oats, that the army from Killala was coming, that the terrible Fraser fencibles were at hand,—hard, stern, plundering men who gave no quarter. Of course, the men's consciences told them that as insurgents they were amenable to the law, and their fears urged their flight—but where! The red coats were too near to give them time to flee to the mountains, and so they made to the cliffs.

Here, often these young and active men were accustomed to go a fowling, and along the great precipice of Downpatrick, pluck the young sea bird from the ledges of the rock, rob the sea pigeon's nest, or surprise the young seal in the recesses of Poolnashanthana. In pursuit of these wild sports, their practice was, to let themselves down by ropes, and, trusting to the steadiness and vigour of their companion above, to hang along the face of the cliff or descend to holes and caves otherwise inaccessible. On this occasion, they recollected the Poolnashanthana, and aware that the tide was out, considered that they might safely resort to the ledge of rock that remained for some hours uncovered below, and there stay concealed until the soldiers had scoured their village and retired, under the conviction that their victims had escaped. Accordingly, they, to the number of twenty-five, took an active and able-bodied woman with them; and, by means of her holding a rope from above, all successively descended the chasm, and seated themselves on the rock, while the woman went back to the village, having received strong injunctions to return and draw them up again when the army had gone away, or at any rate, before the tide should rise and cover their resting place.

It may be imagined the suspense of these poor men: they were near enough to hear in the still autumn day, the musket shots; they thought of their houses fired, their corn in flames, their cattle driven off, and, what was worse than all, their defenceless women abused. The day wore away, and the westerling sun sent its slanting beams more and more faintly down the chasm: the tide was coming in fast, the ripple became a wave as it boomed in, and rose gradually so as to touch and cover their feet. But why go on! The woman went, but returned not; frightened out of her wits by the fury and licence of the soldiery, she forgot her trust, and fled away towards the inland hills; the army had retired, night came on, and the tide rose to its accustomed limits, and it covered higher than any human head that populous rock; and when another sun arose, and the women and greybeards of the doomed village came to Poolnashanthana, they could see some corpses lying dry and bloated here and there in the caves and chasms; others had floated out to sea. The sun has seldom shone on a more melancholy sight! But it avails not to continue the subject,—a generation of the males of that poor hamlet was swept away, and at this day not an old man is to be found there.

Some merry jokes and stories of the Troubles follow this tragic tale. We, however, prefer the genuinely Irish legend of the—

TRANSMIGRATION OF DARBY O'DOWD.

On a calm fine evening, two young fellows had urged their currachs into one of the caves between Downpatrick and Kilcummin, where the seals were known to breed, and they had brought, besides poles to knock down the creatures, plenty of dry bog fir to keep up a blaze, and having got far in, the place was alive with seals, and the poor things were toddling about amongst the round stones at the end, and the boys were busy enough striking them on the head, and all they could reach were finished off and ready to be brought out, when in the farthest end of the cavern, and sitting up on its bent tail in a corner, just as you may suppose a tailor would sit on his board, there sat a fellow, his head as round as a man's, and it looked white, shining, and bare, with a flat nose and two grey eyes just like an old fellow who was laid up past his labour in the chimney corner. Some of the boys was just making up to him to strike him down with his pole, when the seal cried out in a squeaking, snivelling, supplicating voice, “Och, boys! och, ma bouchals! spare your old grandfather Darby O'Dowd.” You may suppose that the boys were not a little astonished and frightened when they heard a seal speak; but one of them plucking up courage, accosted the creature and said, “Now, that is all a joke, you're no grandfather of ours, for Darby O'Dowd is long ago, long ago in his grave, and, God be merciful to him! he lies in Dunfeeny churchyard.” “You may say that, and thrue it is for you, grandson Tim. It's thrue I was dead and dacently buried, but here I am for my sins, turned into a sale, as other sinners are and will be. See what comes of selling mangy sheep for sound bastes, and swearing away before a coort a neighbour's good name; and Heaven is just, and here I am making my purgatory as a sale, and if you put an end to me and skin me, as I see you are for, maybe it's worse I'll be, and go into a shark or a porpoise, or some fish that will never have the honour or glory of sitting as I do now on firm land. Mind my bidding then, boys avick; lave your ould forefather where he is, to live out his time as a sale. Maybe for your own sakes, for they say every dog has his day, you will ever hereafter leave off following and persecuting and murdering sales, who may be nearer to yourselves nor you think.” It may be supposed that the young seal hunters gave up their occupation and left their grandfather alone; at all events, let there be what foundation for the story there may, it is universally believed, and on the strength of it the people have given up seal hunting.

Mr. Otway obtained a great deal of information from an intelligent officer of the Coast-guard, who had been for some time stationed in Erris, and who was well acquainted with the customs and notions of the natives, as well as with the pranks of “the gentry.” Either in Jamieson's Dictionary, the Statistical Account, or some such learned work, we have read of Scottish herds, not very long since, on Beltane i. e. May-day, the great festival of the Sun-god, making sacrifices, and pouring out libations, to the eagle, the fox, the hooded crow, and other animals of prey, for the protection of their flocks during the ensuing year—repeating, “This to thee, O fox! Spare my lambs,” &c. &c. The herds of Erris, if less poetical in their observances, address themselves more sensibly to the animals they wish to propitiate. For the fox they make *mitten*s, or we should say socks, to keep his feet warm in winter, which they leave near his hole. But they do more :—

They make the foxes sponsors for their children, supposing that under the close and long established relationship of gossiped, they will be induced on all these occasions to befriend them instead of doing them harm. In corroboration of these facts, I give the following extract from my friend's diary :

"Oct. 15th, 1840.—On visiting Portnacloy this day, I happened to mention in the watchhouse that I had heard that the foxes occasionally received presents of mittens, and were nominated as sponsors to their children, in order that they might be coaxed to let their lambs alone. P. D.—, a Roman Catholic, immediately assented that these statements were correct, and related the following instance: 'On the coast-guards' first coming into the country, old Dogherty the herd, who then lived at Portnacloy, was some time after appointed as Mr. Bourne's herd; his flock sustained great loss through the voracity of the foxes, and one year, having lost nearly twenty lambs, he went to the fox's den, with about a pound of good wool, which he threw in, and thus addressed him in Irish:—'Fox agra, let's be good friends, and do, avick, let my lambs alone. Here's some wool to make mittens for your young ones, and I will be their gossip, and will ever and always be a good neighbour to you.' The fox, it would appear, accepted Tom's offering of friendship and fosterhood; for by his account to his friend, the coast-guard-man, from that day forth, he never lost a lamb."

When the foxes will not come into terms of truce and friendship by fair means, they are otherwise managed, as thus :—

Foxes are generally reputed great and ingenious rogues; but I believe to Erris is confined the conviction that the foxes themselves are aware of their bad character, and that they not only deserve, but are liable to be hanged for their larcenies and burglaries. It is on this admission of the foxes that the people act when they tie a small hempen string round the necks of their lambs, and Reynard never touches any so provided, his presentiment of his probable and deserved fate rendering him very cautious how he has anything to do with a hempen cord."

Cats are, in Erris, as important to the community as foxes. They hold parliaments, exactly like those of St. Stephen's, during the night, and for the same supposed purpose of raising the wind.

We are afraid that, where a humorous moral is not brought out, some grave Sassenach readers may consider these superstitious customs as too puerile for repetition. Not so the many excellent suggestions for the improvement of those wild regions. Great sums have already been thrown away, both by the government and individuals, in abortive schemes of improvement, adopted without due consideration of local circumstances, or of natural obstacles, or rather impossibilities. It is principally as a work of entertainment that we have considered these sketches. That it lays claim to a higher character has been manifest in our extracts, but is more obvious from those sections to which we cannot refer. One brief hint we do take, as it is equally applicable to many places in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland.

I have long considered, that on account of the lamentable want of capital that exists in the country, the landlords should become, as it were, partners in the husbandry of the estates on the metairie system that prevails so much in France and Italy, and that they should supply the seed, implements, and stock, while the tenant supplies the labour, and that a definitive portion of the produce (not money) should come to the landlord's share; or, if the supply of all but labour on the part of the landlord could not, from his want of capital, be allowed, that at any rate he should receive off the respective farms not a money, but a produce rent; as, for instance, such a proportion of the corn and cattle: so much oats, so much barley, so much butter, wool, pigs; in a word, a share of whatever the land is best capable of producing. In this way I understand Lord George Hill in an extensive property he has purchased, and now gives up his fine mind to manage, in the county of Donegal, provides seed corn, supplies a stock of pigs, cows, or sheep, of breeds best adapted to the country or climate. He has erected large storehouses, where he receives the grain of his tenantry, either in certain proportions or at a fixed price; and becoming the merchant as well as the landlord of his estate, he either exports or holds over for the supply of the vicinity at a future day, just as much as he deems expedient. Of course, in doing all this, he must exercise considerable inspective vigilance on the part of himself or his bailiffs and agents; but he is doing incalculable good: he has already won great confidence in his disinterestedness and integrity, and the experiment, as far as it has gone, has been most satisfactory. Now I conceive, that if the Erris landowners would even go so far as to take produce in payment, and not money, the distressing events I have heard of would not occur: of the tenantry, in many instances, being obliged to mortgage their corn, and butter, and pigs, before they are ready for market, in order to meet the money rent they owe to the landlord; and the consequence is, that the dealers in the little export town are thriving rapidly, and making in a sudden manner thousands of pounds, while the poor growers are not bettering, but every year getting worse; and at the same time the landlord is not satisfied, but still complains of his tenant's want of punctuality.

We need not recommend this work; it recommends itself to all classes of readers; but we may say, that the "ascendancy" prejudices of the clever and lively writer are not so frequently displayed as in some of his former books.

SONNET,

INSCRIBED TO JOHN MILTON.

An organ pealing forth an anthem grand,
Whose tone can ravish at the simplest motion
Of its high master: or measureless ocean
Whose surges lave the shore of farthest land:
An old magician, at whose mystic wand
Upriseth visions from the fathomless caves
Of dim cloud-land: or a High Priest who paves
The way to heaven with a dear father's hand:—

Such was thy song, great Milton!—Yet soft as lute
Wind-waft at midnight o'er Venetian seas:
Sweet as the choir that hymneth in the breeze,
At whose blest harmony the soul is mute:—
But for fit simile might mankind pine—
Save princely Raphael, he who drew with pen like thine!

E. J. II.

THE GREEN GAUNTLET; OR, THE TRAITOR'S SON.

(Concluded from our July No.)

CHAPTER V.

—“’Tis morn; and o’er his alter’d features play
The beams, but not the hopes, of yesterday.”

EDMUND started from his verdant bed, where he had found that sweet repose to which the downy couch and gilded canopy in vain invite the sons of luxury, and hailed the rising sun as he offered up a fervent prayer for his unhappy country. His faithful companion in toil, in danger, and in treason, still lay wrapt in pleasing slumbers, to judge by the play of his intelligent features, and the half-smile which extended his lips, as they seemed to move in earnest conversation. Edmund gazed upon his mysterious guide with mixed feelings of good and evil; but his generous nature buried the recollections of the latter in the more pleasing contemplation of his better qualities.

The friar’s attachment to himself, his daring courage, and his manly, and devoted perseverance in the cause of the country dear to his heart, reconciled him to the darker features of his character. Our hero sat down beside the dreaming man, to indulge in the painful retrospect of his past life; in which he could not fix upon a single day which had proved to him one of unalloyed happiness, from the first dawning of reason to his now mature manhood! It was a sad and melancholy thought! How long these reveries would have remained unbroken is doubtful, (for the friar still lay entranced in sleep,) had they not been suddenly dissipated, by the alarm of heavy and hurried footsteps on the crown of the cliff beneath which they had found their humble shelter. Edmund was instantly on foot with a pistol in each hand; but fearing to draw the attention of the supposed intruder by awakening the friar, he crept gently and stealthily round the base of the cliff to reconnoitre, when, to his infinite relief, he beheld no more formidable trespasser on their retreat than one of the dwarfish cows of this mountainous district; which, probably persecuted by the gad-fly of the early morn, had ran at the top of her speed to escape her tormentor; but the animal was now quietly nipping the short and stunted grass which grew around the spot. The priest meanwhile awoke, and missing Edmund from his side, started at once upon his feet, and into the full possession of all his faculties. Silence reigned around; he could hear the powerful throbbings of his own anxious heart; he caught at his pistols—they were safe, and loaded. Bending his eyes on the dewy turf, he followed Edmund’s track, and soon discovered him gazing from behind a small rock on the cow, in the natural expectation of the appearance of its owner or the herd’s-boy. Friar John, rejoiced to see his dear Edmund safe, did not for a time cast his eyes around; but on catching a glimpse of the cow he gave a violent start—his frame shook with agitation! Edmund became alarmed, and his alarm was increased when he saw the priest, with eyes firmly bent on the animal, fall down on his knees, and draw forth his crucifix, which, as he whispered a prayer, he pressed with fervent devotion to his lips! Edmund stood in mute astonishment at his companion’s extraordinary emotions. After a minute’s silence, the friar hastily turned to Edmund, and with unusual seriousness of voice and manner, cried out—“O! my Edmund, there’s surely truth in dreams and visions! That cow—that poor animal which now stares upon us with affright, unused to the sight of strangers,—was sent by Heaven for our salvation from approaching danger.”

Edmund, who considered the vigorous-minded priest to be superior to the ordinary superstitions of the country, knew not what conclusion to draw from this strange exclamation. He held his peace. Meantime the friar cast a keen and searching glance on every side, then, again addressing his friend, said, “We must away from hence at once, there’s danger in each moment’s delay!” “Whither shall we fly to in the full glare of day? or where find a more secure retreat than this?” inquired Edmund. The friar mysteriously replied—“Wherever that cow shall lead us.” Edmund for the moment entertained doubts of his friend’s sanity; but the priest seemed firm and perfectly collected. “Follow me,” said he, “and tread heavily, so as to imprint the marks of our footsteps on the yielding soil, which you perceive terminates on the border of the bog below.” Edmund silently obeyed instructions. When arrived at the verge of the bog, where a narrow causeway of stones, rudely and irregularly placed, forms a foot-path across the wide expanse, but passable only in summer, the priest quickly divested himself of his boots and stockings—directing Edmund to follow his example: this task performed, Friar John pointed out the route for his astonished, but still silent, companion; directing him to keep in view the cliff as their point of reunion. “It may be rough walking for you Edmund, but the foot-prints of the barefooted mountaineer will never excite attention—in that lies our safety.” Shaping his course by the friar’s well-watched movements, Edmund proceeded, boots in hand, after a somewhat wide detour, to the place of rendezvous. “Now we have baulked them,” said the priest exultingly, “and perhaps gained a day’s march on the enemy; for be assured, my son, we are pursued.” On ascending the spot where the little cow was now contentedly grazing, the friar approached the animal, and with a few words, or rather sounds, of that description and that peculiar chirp used by their daily keepers, he soon put the animal in motion, carefully watching her first movement, and which was directly for the valley on the south side of the mountain ridge: the priest threw up his eyes in silent prayer, and beckoned to Edmund to follow his steps. The cow proceeded in gentle pace, while the companions in misery and in danger, pursued the track of their unconscious leader in silence. Their course lay down the sloping and tangled side of that vast mountain ridge; affording no other view than a dark extensive range of new cut bog, fringed in some spots with scanty strips of oats or potatoes; the only marks of cultivation in this wide and desolate scene. The cow loitered from time to time, when tempted by a tuft of fresh grass, sprouting from the roots of the brakes of furze, which clothed the mountain side—a luxury which the priest (now more than a mile from the point of apprehended danger) was not inclined to deny the poor animal. During one of those brief halts, Friar John again exclaimed, “Well, Edmund, there is truth in dreams and visions.” His listening friend waited for explanation. “I dreamt, this blessed morning, that my mother’s spirit* appeared to me, in that self-same nook where we last night found our shelter. I thought she gazed on me with tearful eyes and anxious features as she bent over me. I prayed her to speak and bless me, but she was silent and sorrowful. I struggled to seize her hand, but she withdrew it, and solemnly pointed towards the south. I bowed obedience. At that moment rays of glory seemed to gather round her head, and her now placid features were illumined by a smile of comfort. I gazed on her with rapture and devotion, and falling on my knees, bent my head to the earth in humble reverence and prayer; but on again raising my eyes towards the place whereon she stood, she was lost to my view: but in that place stood a cow! Yes, Edmund; and may I never serve the table of my Redeemer, or ever again break the Bread of Life and Salvation, but a cow in every respect identical, in form, size, and colour, with that unconscious animal whose footsteps are, under Heaven, our guide from danger. You may smile, Edmund, but Providence shows its goodness by various ways: let us accept the omen, and be thankful. They had now travelled more than a mile and a half of the slanting mountain side, without meeting any of the scattered inhabitants, when the loud and sudden bellow of their vaccine guide announced her approach towards home, or the contiguity of her owner or herdsman. The ever-cautious priest gave the signal for their crouching beneath a brake of furze to await the event, when they shortly beheld an aged, but active, woman approach, and quite unattended; the appearance of two forlorn strangers in that desolate spot, told at once their tale of sorrow. The sight of the surprised priest removed all fears and apprehensions. The priest briefly told the story of the late battle in affecting terms; the poor woman weeping over the bloody details. She then led the way to her lonely habitation,—a miserable mud-built cabin which sheltered herself, and an aged, blind, and bed-ridden husband. The parties almost touched the hovel before they perceived it, being surrounded by huge clumps of turf which were reared in all directions. They entered, and saw with pleasure a pot of potatoes hanging over the fire for the morning meal of the little family, which, beside the aged couple, had the addition of a simple boy, then absent in search of the cow. The frugal meal of potatoes was much relished by the hungry fugitives, to whose portion a small quantity of butter was added: this humble repast was washed down with a draught of the simple element, to which the drainings of the priest’s bottle only afforded the tantalizing idea of departed spirit. Just then they were suddenly startled by the noise of hasty footsteps, accompanied by a sobbing sound. The woman held up her finger for silence, and after listening attentively for a moment, nodded her head with confidence, which seemed to imply, that the footsteps were known to her. She hurried out of the low door-way, and intercepted the gossoon, who was blubbering as he ran towards the dwelling. Having made him sit down to compose himself, lest the sudden sight of strangers might increase his terror, she kindly inquired the cause of his alarm; the boy stated that he had followed the tracks of the cow far to the nor’rard—where she turned off to the east—that he pursued her in that direction, and found that the beast had been grazing, some short time before, on the head of the cliff: while seeking about that quarter for the cow, he saw a party of yeomen below the cliff beating through the furze with their naked swords, and searching every corner of that spot. Here the priest, who, with Edmund, was an attentive listener to the boy’s story, cast a solemn look on his companion, and raised his hands to heaven in silent devotion. The boy continued—“Well, they caught me peeping over the cliff at them, and soon hauled me down amongst them,—the gentleman” (that is, as the boy meant, the officer) held his sword to my throat, and swore he’d cut off my head if I didn’t show him which way the croppies† went. I told him that I was looking for my cow since day-light, and had not seen a soul that morning. I cried and roared ready to break my heart, and at last they let me go. They all then went down towards the bog to the nor’rard, looking all the time on the ground at the marks of the croppies’ feet,”—and “whereabout do you think they are now child?” asked the woman. “Oh, the Lord knows that,” replied the boy, “as soon as I saw them go down towards the bog I ran off with myself.” The half-witted boy’s story ended, neither the padre nor his friend felt much at their ease: the former, however, referring to his morning vision, asked Edmund, “if that was not a BLESSED DREAM?”—the latter, in silent thanksgiving for their escape, forbore to enter into any discussion with the priest. After due preparation, the boy was introduced into the cabin, where a few words of kindness from Friar John fully restored him to the possession of that small share of intellect which nature had bestowed on him. After despatching his breakfast, the boy once more told his story, but still more circumstantially. In the description given by the boy of the leader of the party, the priest fancied he recognised one whom he well knew would not trouble any court-martial for an authority to execute him, the instant he laid hands on him. This worthy was a magistrate of Wexford, who, without property, respectability of character, or family, had found means to recommend himself to the favour of government by the boast of the many scores of peasants he had slaughtered with his "own good gun." It was the daily practice of this wretched (and we will hope infatuated) tool of a bloody system, to go out at day-break, attended by three or four of his, permanently-paid, corps of yeomanry, "Croppy shooting"—that is, killing every poor houseless wretch they met in the fields or highways, who, after the burning of his hovel by the loyal military, prowled about in starvation and misery, with his ragged frieze coat tied about him, the last article left to him either for decency or comfort. Can we wonder if blood begat blood, and cruelty on the one side engendered cruelty on the other? The heart sickens with indignation and disgust at such a state of things. To return to our tale: It did not require much deliberation to determine the friends on a removal from their present precarious place of refuge; meantime a hat became necessary for Edmund to exchange for his military one, and this the woman undertook to procure for him from a neighbour, whose cabin was two miles distant, and on the other side of the ridge of mountain. Thither the poor woman set off, after preparing the pot of potatoes which was to form their dinner meal.

The anxious pair counted the moments of her absence. Her intelligence, when she returned, decided them on instantaneous flight: she had reached her neighbour's cottage without seeing any one whatever, and found no difficulty in procuring from him his Sunday hat, which, on her story, he would willingly have given, even without the guinea-note of which she was the bearer, to reward him for the sacrifice. He stated to her, that scarcely one hour had passed since his cabin had been entered by the "Bloody G—w—n" and a party of his yeomen, who ransacked every corner of the lowly habitation, stabbing with their swords and bayonets every part of the thatch, and also his turf-rick, and little stack of oats which stood beside his dwelling: after a keen search all about his place, they departed in fresh pursuit, vowing vengeance against all who should be found to have given a moment's shelter to the rebels of whom they were in chase. Every preparation was made for an immediate move: the epaulettes and lace were ripped off from Edmund's frock, and, with his hat and the priest's robe, buried under a heap of turf, as a future prize. Their only safe route was across the bog, but it required a guide to lead the way: the kind old woman offered her services at the first dawning of the next morning, as that hour had arrived, when she was in the daily habit of ministering to the necessities of her helpless old man, whose existence depended on her care. Such an appeal was unanswerable; and they were about to depart unattended, when the woman assured the friar that, if not frightened or spoken to with unkindness, the *innocent boy would guide them as safely as she herself to the foot of the opposite range of mountains to the south; and to which, added she, no yeomanry from this part could reach, without taking a course of ten miles to the east, or twice that distance westward,—"So, HEAVENS be your guide! go, in God's name, at once." Thus encouraged, the friar and Edmund loaded their pockets with potatoes—the only eatable that offered: having dined on the same fare, with the additional zest of a draught of new milk from their guardian cow, they took their departure, having handsomely rewarded the benevolent woman. The boy, duly instructed, cheerfully led the way; all his alarms were calmed by the priest's kind and conciliatory words. Their track proved to be such a maze of intricacy, that the travellers, each moment, found the value of their innocent guide, without whose aid, it now became evident to both, they could not have proceeded half a mile through the dark labyrinth. The boy steadily led them on, seldom stopping, but when he did, he was left to his own musings, uninterrupted by either. After a short exercise of memory, he would resume his way smilingly, as if he himself had been led on in the path of safety, by some unseen power.

The sun was declining as they traversed the last heavy mile of this dreary bog; and a wall of mountain appeared before them, as if to bar their further progress. They anxiously watched the boy's countenance, but it betrayed no signs of fear or of disappointment; and to the priest's inquiries as to where they were to ascend the mountain, the boy pointed to a dark ravine, less than quarter of a mile distant, which, he said, afforded a track, in summer, to the top of the mountain. This he expressed in his own way, cheered by the priest's encouraging expressions. When they arrived within a hundred yards of that dark and gloomy spot, the poor child's colour changed to deadly paleness; he made a full stop, and declined all nearer approach to that frightful cleft. Finding the poor creature's terrors increase; considering, also, the desolate and intricate path the boy had to retrace to gain his home, the priest forbore to press him; and after bestowing what was to him a large present, and their kindest thanks, they watched his departure with anxious eyes.

They approached the immense chasm with doubting hearts as to its being a practicable passage; but, on closer view, were agreeably surprised at its presenting a regular series of shelving steps, with occasional flats of some extent, and by no means of difficult ascent. At that season of the year, the height of summer, it was perfectly dry, with the exception of a small trickling stream, scarcely perceptible, which stole down the centre of these gigantic stairs, but as clear as crystal. As the anxious fugitives cast their eyes around them, the scene was well calculated to inspire that awe they mutually felt. The huge mountain, rent by some awful convulsion of nature, towered on each side to the height of several hundred feet in overhanging masses, causing involuntary dread in the mind of the adventurous pair. They refreshed themselves with a draught of the icy-cold stream, then girded themselves up for the ascent. It was a toilsome task, but at each hundred yards gained, their way became less difficult, their view less dreary; the awful walls of black and adamantine rock less lofty and frowning. After a struggli-march of nearly two hours, almost constantly climbing during that time, and fearful to look back on the precipices they had scaled, the priest was the first to reach the highest ascent, which afforded him a wide, but imperfect, twilight view of the whole southern coast and the distant main. Not a hovel, however lowly, appeared in sight, where they might hope to find a shelter for the night; the dews already fell damp and piercing, while a cold wind swept along the desolate range of the mountains of Iverk, on the highest of which they now found a safe retreat from present danger. Beside the last crag they had climbed, they perceived a natural cave, which would at least afford shelter from the cold blasts of the night. Thither they resolved to repair; and after collecting a few handfuls of the scanty crop of mountain heather, they laid them down in sadness.

At the first dawn of day they arose from their cold and flinty bed, and gazed on each other in ghastly paleness. With no other sustenance than the potatoes saved from their yesterday's store, they ate, and gave thanks. They boldly pushed forward into the county of Waterford, which they had now entered. The day, as it advanced, proved very unfavourable to their progress; storms of thunder and lightning, followed by heavy rains, drove them from the mountain to the valley to seek a shelter even at the risk of their personal safety. After several hours' toilsome travel, the priest's watchful eye caught a glimpse of a few scattered clay-built cabins, apparently about three miles distant, towards which, between hope and doubt, they bent their painful course. On nearer approach, the undaunted friar, who never shrunk from danger, insisted on going alone, to ascertain whether the inhabitants of this sequestered hamlet would receive them in kindness; entreating his beloved Edmund to await the result, and, if he did not return, to provide for his own safety by flight. The half hour of his absence was one of the most unhappy of our hero's existence; his anxiety for the adventurous friar conjured up every conceivable mischief as likely to occur to that daring man. At length, to his joy, if joy could be felt under such circumstances as theirs, he beheld the friar approaching towards him, accompanied by a decently attired man, whose demeanour showed him to be friendly. This person kindly and respectfully offered him the shelter of his humble roof; and, in a quarter of an hour, the almost broken-hearted Edmund found himself comfortably housed in one of those petty publican's residences called sheebens. Into this humble hôtel the wearied pair were received with a kind welcome. The padre had told his tale: he was a priest, and a rebel,—claims sufficiently strong to call forth all the sympathy and hospitality of the landlord of this lowly sheeben. The comforts of a good bed, for there was but one for both, and a few excellent meals of plain, but wholesome food, soon restored the priest and his pupil to their wonted vigour.

Edmund took advantage of this temporary calm to sound the priest as to his present hopes and future views; not disguising his own despair of a successful issue to the contest, after the treachery which destroyed the last chance of their party on the 5th. "My beloved friend," said the ever-sanguine friar, "think not that one defeat will be sufficient to crush the spirit of a whole nation determined to burst its bonds of slavery and oppression; the headstrong folly of those leaders who so madly rushed into the field before our plans were ripe, are alone to blame. The untimely death of our great leader, Lord Edward,* and the judicial murder of those unfortunate brothers,† to whom so much was confided, threw the direction of our affairs into less talented hands; they have by this time, no doubt, drank of the bitter cup of error;—but we have others in reserve. Our plans are laid; we have an executive directory ready to assume the functions of government the moment we possess ourselves of the castle of Dublin; our civil and military boards are already organized; our mock parliament must give way to a national assembly, to which peers as well as commoners will be eligible as members by election, but without the odious distinction of an upper and a lower chamber; none of the public establishments will be destroyed, but a universal reformation of old abuses shall sweep away the dross, and leave only the pure and valuable behind, on which we may rebuild our ancient institutions; the honours of the law, the army, the navy, and the senate shall be open to all, without the heart-burning distinctions of creed, of past politics, or property; even our great enemy the state-church, shall be allowed to stand undisturbed, and free to all who profess its tenets; but 'PROTESTANT ASCENDANCY,' which for centuries has embroiled our unhappy country, must perish, and for ever! Our religion will assert its own rights, strengthened by the voice of millions! Each church must stand or fall by its intrinsic merits, and each derive its support from its own professors. But, it is painfully evident, my son, that foreign aid will be necessary to ensure our success: that too (blessed be Heaven!) we have in prospect, and only awaiting a favourable moment to fly to our shores. Although the unfortunate precipitancy of the hot-headed H——y, by yielding to the wild cry for battle in the field, has given an awful shock to our cause, we are still neither crushed nor conquered, but yet strong enough to rear our heads in triumph over the ruins of a despotic government." The friar's wretched sophistry did not satisfy the mind of Edmund, or remove his doubts: the detestable betrayal of the leaders of the rebel army on the 5th, sunk deep into his heart. To the question—What was to be done for present safety? the friar proposed to try his fortunes at Waterford, for the chance of a coaster bound to Wales or Bristol, in which they might withdraw from the country, during the first heat of the pursuit. The hazard of such a step did not appear to daunt the friar, whose extraordinary escapes hitherto, impressed him with a belief, that he was an object of the peculiar care of a protecting Providence, and above the common chances of evil. Vain enthusiast! Did he never reflect, that Providence, for its own inscrutable purposes, oftentimes affords a long career of impunity to crime, only to render the retributive stroke of justice the more awful! But the friar seemed to be impelled by some over-ruling destiny to rush blindly on in his work of bloodshed and rebellion,

Leading the guilty—guilt's worst instrument.

His determination once taken, he made arrangements for his journey with unsinking spirits; self-confidence supported him through every danger; and he prepared to take leave of Edmund with as much unconcern, as if a price had not been set on his head, and the description of his person, probably, posted at every corner of the city into which he was daringly about to venture. Mounted on the horse of the landlord, and clad in his host's Sunday suit, all appearance of the sacerdotal character was at once sunk; and, bestowing a blessing on Edmund, he departed without a trace of sorrow, care, or anxiety on his sunburnt countenance.

Four hours were passed in solitary travel, until his descent into the plains brought our friar at last into contact with a party of mounted cattle-jobbers, on their road to Waterford market, with whom he kept company until they arrived at the suburbs of the city, where the greater number put up their horses, proceeding towards the market on foot, each to his separate affairs. The priest's horse, after a mountain journey of six hours, required rest and care, more particularly, as the same ground was to be again travelled over before the next morning's sun: he accordingly gave the necessary orders, and directing some refreshment to be prepared for himself, proceeded to carry his intentions into operation at once.

The contagion of disaffection to the government had extended itself amongst all classes. Even the shoeless, ragged beggar, in his road-side shed, whose utter debasement left him nothing to hope for, still offered up his prayers for the success of the rebellion, which could not, even by the success he besought for it, improve his lowly condition. In one of this class, secured by his very wretchedness from suspicion, the friar found a ready messenger to convey a despatch to a reverend friend in the city, which was safely delivered within half an hour, and promptly answered in person by an humbler brother of the church—a young priest about thirty—who approached his superior with due caution, but with every mark of veneration and respect. Brief and interesting were the communications which passed between the parties. The padre heard with sorrow that the executioner had been busy during the last three days. The commander-in-chief of the rebels, with many other leaders of note, (including two baronets,) had expiated their treason on the common gallows, with no other form of trial than the identification of their persons. "Our brethren," added the young priest, "are rigidly watched; even the sanctuary of the altar does not afford us protection from insult. Fly, my friend! my once kind patron and protector, if life be still worth possessing, for here you are surrounded by peril, perhaps at this moment we may be objects of hostile observation; an escape from this port, however perfect your disguise, would, under the ferment of the moment, be impossible. Fly! while you are yet safe!" A few words from the friar sufficed to explain his immediate wants, and his junior departed, funded with ample means to procure what was required. Undismayed by all that he had heard, the friar partook of that afternoon's meal, and enjoyed his subsequent glass, with all the composure of the most uninterested of the group he had thrown himself among; devouring, with all the appetite of apparent ignorance, the various versions of the battle of the 5th. He must have been somewhat edified to hear of the exploit of the "Bloody Friar Roche," in firing back, from the mouth of his cannon, the heads of the slain and captured royalists, when his ball ammunition became low. The credulous narrator swore to the fact; the friar of course appeared convinced. Evening brought to his hands the parcel from his reverend friend, consisting of a small valise, containing a suit of black clothes, purchased, at the hazard of a fit, for Edmund, a few shirts and stockings, and a stout frieze top-coat for himself. Thus furnished, he prepared to take his departure, previously to which he fortified himself for the journey with another hasty meal, and no stinted portion of the punch-jug, which passed merrily round; zested by some loyal toasts which his reverence gulp'd (with a mental reservation however.) At nearly sun-set the friar's horse was brought forth, infinitely improved in strength and appearance from his bountiful treatment that day. The valise being strapped on—the padre, ensconced in his new frieze coat, mounted, and set off, with a portion of his morning fellow-travellers, on his return to the mountain shebeen. Friar John's hilarity kept them all on the laugh, and when the time arrived for his turning off the road for the mountain, they separated with expressions of mutual regret, and the hope of meeting again. The party, when left to themselves, unanimously agreed that he was one of the finest, heartiest fellows they had ever met, for a Connaught man, (as they knew by his Irish)—a name odious to the southerners of Ireland; and this was the FRIAR! steeped in blood and treason!

The padre, wisely trusting more to the instinctive sagacity of his horse than to any knowledge he could pretend to have of a road he had never travelled before that morning, left the animal to choose the best path, and pursue his own steady pace. Night gradually fell—the stars were dimmed by soft and misty clouds—all around became darkness and solitude; not a sound broke on the friar's ear, but the dull monotonous tramp of the old horse as he plodded on his silent way. Here was an hour for reflection! But did he reflect on his criminal and dangerous course? No! but whistled and cheered on his lazy horse and occasionally whiled away the heavy midnight hour with a stave, not out of the Litany, but some old Irish ditty, all redolent of the turmoil of plunder and of battle! Possibly that "pliability of man's spirit, that can surrender itself to illusions which cheat expectation and sorrow of their weary moments," carried him back to days of innocence; when, sitting under some sunshaded hedge, he revelled over the wild romances of his country, imbibing, even in his infant days, that warlike spirit which clung to him through after life. That was the place, and that was the hour, if ere "descending spirit could converse with man."

have received his mother's warning blessing ; but 'tis not improbable, but in that solitary hour fresh schemes of vengeance filled his guilty mind.

At length the clouds of night gave way to misty morn. Ruddy streaks broke along the grey horizon, when the friar's unwearied eye beheld the sun's first beams reflected on the glassy bosom of the distant boundless ocean. The prayers and praises, which lay buried in his heart during the awful hours of darkness, now burst forth with all their gathered force in warm devotion ; and he eagerly pressed forward his horse, anxious, once more, to embrace his beloved Edmund. Incomprehensible man ! Home, even though a temporary one, is ever welcome to the way-worn traveller. Sixty-four Irish miles, (more than eighty English,) within the day and night, was no small trial of the friar's stamina ; yet, after four or five hours' sleep, he arose as fresh and full of hope as ever.

The landlord, who was now in their perfect confidence, crushed all their expectations of escaping by the coast, by announcing the result of his inquiries amongst the fishermen. From the Wicklow Head to Cape Clear, every portion of the coast was watched by a chain of cruisers, through whose vigilance, not even the smallest fishing-smack could pass unsearched. The priest now saw that a temporary separation became necessary for their mutual safety. Edmund, it was arranged, should remain in secret ; while the friar, whose intention it was to make his way to Dublin, could arrange for the reception of his friend. Once in a large and populous city, they might bury themselves from public observation, until some favourable opportunity for escape presented itself. Here we leave him, while we follow the movements of the adventurous friar. The danger and difficulties he had to encounter in his attempt to reach the metropolis, were such as would have appalled any other man : his very first risk was an awful trial of his powers of self-possession. His landlord, whose wardrobe furnished his outer man, accompanied him to within a couple of miles of the first garrison town on his route, where they parted. The landlord having, with his clothes, transferred his name and documents to the priest, the latter boldly rode into the small town, and at once to the guard-house, to undergo the customary examination of his person, his business, and destination ; but even for this frightful ordeal he had, as far as possible, provided, depending on his own fortitude to carry him through : he had been furnished, by his landlord, with a letter addressed to him by the agent of the estate, in answer to some application relative to his little farm, only a few days before received ; he also possessed the friar with the brewer's last receipt, and also the guager's permit for the last cask of whisky delivered at the shebeen. With these documents he had no diffidence in presenting himself as the friendly landlord,—and to whom he made a very liberal compensation for all favours, including the old horse. The sergeant of the guard conducted the friar to the quarters of the commanding officer, a major of Scotch fencibles : had he been brought before an Irish magistrate, his danger would, indeed, have been imminent. The officer, on a careful view of all the papers submitted by the friar, directed a pass to be filled up for his signature, authorizing "Lanty Laughlin, publican, of the barony of Upperthird, county of Waterford, to proceed unmolested to Dublin, on his lawful affairs." In this pass, his person, which certainly he had altered as much as possible, was described : he gave his age at forty-five. While this, to him, most important document was in hand, he beheld a proclamation for the apprehension of himself and fifteen others,—leaders in the rebel ranks,—with a large reward for each. His heart felt like a lump of ice within his bosom, as he read this paper ; and, although his person (as it was when he appeared before the Privy Council in Dublin the year before) was tolerably accurately described, he most fortunately, on this occasion, escaped recognition ; but his fortitude almost sunk as he turned round to meet the Commander's searching eye, when, handing him his passport and giving his final orders, he was directed not to depart for one minute in the course of his journey from the high road ; and also, that in entering every town, or village, he should immediately repair to the guard-house, and present his pass.

Arrived in the city of Dublin, he made an immediate arrangement for Edmund's reception in a safe retreat ; and in the course of a few days wrote to him to that effect. The mail-coaches in those days were, as a matter of precaution, escorted from stage to stage by detachments of cavalry of the line. On reaching the village of Naas, (shortly after daylight, on the second day's journey,) Edmund, to his great alarm, discovered, in the detachment which escorted the mail-coach in which he travelled, a portion of the identical regiment of dragoon guards, whose charge on his brigade at the battle of New Ross, caused such slaughter on both sides. The bare possibility of his recognition by any individual of the party did not tend to render the last two hours of his journey pleasant. Remote as such a chance appeared, Edmund could not wholly divest his mind of the fear of such an unlucky event. He had fought hand to hand and face to face with many of the corps on that bloody day ; but his anxiety on that score was relieved on the arrival of the mail-coach at the entrance of the city of Dublin, where the detachment, whose escort beyond that point was no longer necessary, halted and dismounted. Edmund's small portion of baggage unloaded, he proceeded to a chamber at the mail hôtel, to enjoy a few hours' sleep, and did not appear until evening, when, entering a hackney coach, he proceeded to the quarters prepared for him by his friend. The retreat which he had provided for Edmund was in the house of an aged widow lady in the northern extremity of Dublin.

Edmund saw, with deep mortification, (and shame at the cause,) the hopeless state of the insurrectionary force into which he had flung himself with all the ardour of his generous nature, in the pure spirit of patriotism, and was still ready to perform his part, could any general and well-organized plan be presented to him ; but he would not descend to become the leader of a predatory band, actuated solely by the blind, uncalculating spirit of revenge, much less by the hopes of plunder.

His still faithful and devoted companion and leader was his daily attendant,—endeavouring from day to day to revive those hopes which, in his own heart, were each day becoming more faint. Edmund's wasting health too, alarmed him: a deep and settled melancholy had taken entire possession of his mind, and his late manly frame was fast sinking under the effects of anxiety, want of rest, and healthful exercise; for he had rigidly confined himself to the house since his arrival in the metropolis.

A flight to Wales was determined on, and a day saw them safely landed in Holyhead: proceeding to a secluded village in Caernarvonshire, they took up, for the present, their peaceful abode. The pretence of flying from the scene of the Rebellion was quite sufficient to procure them sympathy and attention from the unsuspecting, uninquiring villagers. Having seen Edmund settled in this calm retreat, the friar took his departure for London to renew, through certain secret channels, his correspondence with his friends near the French Government.

The invasion of England was then one of the favourite chimeras of revolutionized France; nothing else was talked of on each side the Channel; and it became the policy of the crafty English ministry to keep up the alarm in the breast of every Englishman who had ought to lose. One half the male population of the country were dressed in the garb of soldiers—nine-tenths of whom would, in all probability, have resigned the honour of the warlike field, had such an event as actual invasion taken place; however, as these heroes were never tempted by the enemy, their boast of what they would have done in deeds of arms may be allowed to pass current. But Mr. Pitt well knew that, although his boasted legions of volunteers would melt and dissolve, like snow before the sunbeam, on the first landing of the foe, they would, under the then state of England, prove (like the Irish yeomanry) formidable enough to their friends and countrymen. The minister had thus his pet force in reserve, ready to let loose upon the starving manufacturer, or insurgent agriculturist, in the event of the slightest movement in the cause of public liberty.

The friar having received the information he so anxiously waited for, flew at once to his friend Edmund, big with his important news. He found him in renewed health, and vigour of mind, prepared to undertake an active part in an approaching event, which was at that moment in a forward state of preparation,—another expedition for the invasion of Ireland.

The first division of the expedition, consisting of a frigate, a corvette, and about a dozen transports, having failed to reach Bantry, or Galway Bay, found a safe anchorage in the small bay of Killala, on the coast of Mayo; and Ireland was thrown into a fresh ferment by the announcement of the landing of General Humbert's expedition, and his taking possession of the town of Killala, and its neighbouring positions. The force thus thrown so unexpectedly into the country was, as may be imagined, greatly exaggerated as to numbers, equipment, and resources. When this intelligence reached Wales, the priest and Edmund lost not a day in hurrying towards Dublin, to enter which, no passport was required. Various regiments of English militia, who, in the course of the summer, had volunteered the extension of their services to Ireland, were then on their hurried march; some for Liverpool, and others to Holyhead. Such an extensive embarkation of troops, and attended by such clouds of followers, facilitated the exit of our adventurers from England, and their landing in Dublin.

One day only passed ere they were on their road to Connaught, towards which province troops were on the march from all quarters of the island. The whole country was thrown into such a state of discreditable confusion and alarm, that this very circumstance accelerated their progress to the scene of action.

The estimate made of Humbert's force at Castlebar was five thousand, while the rebels calculated to have joined his standard were counted at twice that number; and the hearts of the friar and his friend beat high at this intelligence, so false! so deceptive! In the course of the night they took their departure for Ballina; but avoiding the high road to escape the patrols of cavalry, struck up the mountains to the southward of the great Lough Con, and arrived by daylight at the General's head-quarters. The friar presented his secret credentials from the French Minister at War to the Chief of the Staff, who in less than five minutes returned to hurry him into the chamber of the General-in-chief, who had not yet risen. Humbert appeared highly gratified at the arrival of a person through whom he could communicate with the various chiefs of insurgents, who had announced their readiness to join their forces with his; and mentioned that one chief, with whom he had had an interview the previous night, tendered his service, with a body of nearly two thousand men already armed. With this party, the friar was directed to arrange without delay: his delight may be conceived, when he discovered in this powerful ally no less beloved and respected a friend than Walter Roche, whose nephew soon joined to share in the happiness of the meeting.

A considerable force of insurgents was by that time collected in the neighbourhood of Killala, to which place the friar was ordered, with his two friends, immediately to repair, and assist in the distribution of arms and clothing; ten thousand stand of the former, and an equal number of suits of the latter, had accompanied the expedition, and were then in a course of delivery.

With a daring confidence, which showed his expectation of far greater assistance from the rebel force than he was destined to realize, General Humbert advanced to the attack of Castlebar, and, viewing the disproportion of his troops in number and quality to those he attacked, his own astonishment must have been great when he succeeded in taking that large and populous county town, after a feeble resistance, from a large corps of the army, which he literally drove before him with a mere handful of troops. This action is stigmatized to this day by the name of the Races of Castlebar.

The panic caused by this first success of the invaders spread like lightning through the country, which it required all the coolness and caution of the veteran Cornwallis to check or control.

Report had magnified the temporary advantage gained over the king's troops at Castlebar. Having reached the rebels of the north, in the absence of their destined commanders, with the usual impatience of vain and self-sufficient leaders, two bodies marched forth, each of which were cut off in detail, or dispersed, ere they could reach the point where their services might have proved valuable. Indeed it occurred most happily for the royal cause, that the petty jealousies and constant squabbles for precedence amongst these provincial leaders paralyzed all their attempts at combination or concert; that disposition to thwart, depreciate, and counteract each other, which is the great blot on the national character, served more to assist their enemies and injure their own cause than all the chances of war. The northern force never joined! although Humbert had reckoned on an addition of twenty thousand to his ranks; and it will be seen by the map, that he had the boldness to go half-way to meet them!

Marquis Cornwallis, having been joined by several English regiments, at last put General Lake and the army in motion. Humbert, deceived and disappointed of the promised support, waited the attack of the royal troops without a hope of success. He could not reckon altogether on more than four or five thousand allies, and some portion of whom were at too great a distance from his flanks, and in a country intersected by lakes and bogs, to render their services available when the hour for action arrived. Roche's rebel division was posted on the right of the invading force, and was so suddenly attacked in flank by a battalion of light infantry, supported by another of Highland fencibles, followed by a squadron of cavalry, that they were forced to give way, under frightful havoc. That on the left, lost its commander and several of its officers, and was compelled to fly in disorder,—when the whole of the centre of the royal army poured its force upon the gallant Humbert. It was by no means to the discredit of that brave officer that he capitulated to a force nearly ten times his numbers. The Roches' brigade had lost more than half the numbers with which they entered the field; the remainder endeavoured to save themselves by flight, as they best could; a few faithful followers of the family stuck by Walter, who had been wounded in one of his legs, supporting him in his hurried escape to the mountains, and for whose greater comfort his supporters had constructed a litter, formed of their pikes tied together, and cushioned by their coats, on which the poor fellows were anxious to bear him, ere night fell, to some place of safety, no thoughts of their own security interfering with their humane purpose. Before he was lifted into this rude carriage, the friar approached the side of his old friend, and, with an emotion which he never before betrayed, clasped him to his breast, and with an air of peculiar solemnity, pointing to the heavens, whispered, "THERE we next meet!" he hurried away, as if fearing to trust himself with another look at that benevolent countenance, which, at that moment, seemed to beam with feelings of peace and forgiveness to all mankind! Edmund assisted his uncle on the bier and saw him depart, with the lingering hope of meeting him on the morrow, under less perils than the present hour; but, alas! that morrow never arrived.

As it will not break the thread of this painful narrative, it may be as well to state here the wretched fate of poor Walter Roche. His devoted people bore him away to a place of retreat that night, when he insisted on their providing for their own safety, leaving him to whatever fate providence destined him. He changed his appearance by putting on the clothes of the poorest and most wretchedly clad of the party; and thus disguised, begging by the road side, lame and in rags, a small party of soldiers, belonging to the Provost Marshal's guard, looking for straggling rebels, passed him, but from his wretched appearance he excited no attention: twice they looked back on him, and passed on; but one, more doubtful than the rest of his abject poverty, returned to rifle his pocket, when the discovery of a concealed watch betrayed him. Walter's hour had arrived! he was dragged away, and soon as the car which followed the party came up, he was tied on it, and hurried to head-quarters. His person was soon identified as General Roche; and he was ordered for instant execution! the shafts of a provision wagon presenting a ready gallows.

To return to the friar and our hero: During the first hours of the evening they pursued a guarded course, carefully avoiding all prominent spots on which the pursuing parties might discern them; but as darkness fell, they were obliged to trust to chance, not knowing the moment they should fall into the hands of the enemy, or into some other danger. They travelled for some hours in a devious, uncertain path, for the greater portion of the time gradually ascending, until their further progress was arrested by a barrier of craggy rocks, in rude fantastic piles, amongst the clefts of which they tried to snatch a brief repose, to await the daylight; Doyle, who was their sole and last attendant, acting as sentinel. They awoke at the first dawn, when a scene presented itself, which was calculated to inspire horror. On one side stood an insurmountable granite barrier, scarped by the hand of nature, so as not to afford a resting-place even for a bird, to the height of upwards of one hundred feet; and on the other, not more than ten yards distant, a yawning gulph, whose rugged sides were jagged into a succession of narrow shelving ledges, which hardly afforded a footing to any living thing, and of unseen depth. Directly in their front, crag mounted on crag, until the shapeless mass was terminated by a huge flat slap, half projecting over a dark and dismal lake, full fifty yards beneath this beetling precipice. An instant remove from this frightful spot, into which the darkness of the preceding night had betrayed, became an object of the first necessity, by continuing to the westward after descending their present position. They were preparing for their descent, when the priest's keen eye perceived a cloud of moving objects on the distant plain, which induced them to conceal themselves again within the entrenchment of the rocky crags; when again the priest cautiously looked forth, he plainly saw a party of cavalry, and a large body of infantry moving in the plains below, evidently taking the course of their intended route. The priest and his partner in danger kept close within the recesses of their hiding-place, while Doyle took post on the opposite side. On the margin of the gulph, behind a cleft rock which afforded him a view of the narrow, slippery approach to this dismal place of retreat, he laid his bulky body down at full length. Behind this natural and massive screen, in one of the smaller clefts of which he introduced the muzzle of his long duck gun, and along the barrel of which his watchful eye ranged, not a being could approach the spot unseen by him, an advantage which his chief, on the other side, did not possess. By and by, the awful stillness of the place was broken by the hum of many voices, and the tramp of cavalry, but still at such a distance below as to afford no grounds for immediate apprehension. At length a solitary straggler—a mounted officer—bent his course upwards to reconnoitre, in all probability, this rugged spot, when his progress was stopped about thirty yards below the hiding-place, where all vegetation ceased, and the abrupt and slippery face of the rock prevented his further advance on horseback. Having gazed upon this wild scene of desolation with astonishment, he appeared in the act of returning to the troops below, when Doyle, who had him covered to a hair's-breadth, could not resist his blood-thirsty desire to despatch him; to the horror of Edmund and the priest, the clicking sound of the cocking of his gun struck on their ear, instantly followed by the loud discharge of his formidable weapon, which reverberated around the craggy spot. The unfortunate officer met his death on the instant; his affrighted horse dragging the bleeding body, the foot entangled in the stirrup, to the foot of the ascent. This error of the rash and sanguinary ruffian, Doyle, was irretrievable; all that now remained to the doomed fugitives was to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

Doyle reloaded, and fired again and again on the advance of the soldiers, which, from the nature of the ascent, could only be effected by single files, distributing death at every discharge of his murderous weapon; but the soldiers continued to push on, scrambling upwards until twenty, or more, had gained the summit of the polished rock: still their foe was invisible. Doyle's ammunition had been reduced to one charge, of powder only; with this last resource he once more loaded, cramming down his long barrel all the buttons of his dress; then starting like some hideous monster from behind the rock, he gave the soldiers, for the first time, a sight of their gigantic enemy. Although startled at first, twenty muskets were, in an instant, levelled at him, but too late to check his slaughtering fire, which poured amongst them with destructive effect; after which, unhurt in person, he sprang towards the dark ravine, down the scraggy sides of which he slid and scrambled, reckless of life, amidst a shower of bullets. How he escaped death, even for a moment, must have appeared to himself, as it did to his assailants, miraculous. Swinging sometimes at full arms' length from ledge to ledge, he had nearly gained a safe cover from the fire, (whatever was to be his after fate,) but, in the wild scorn of danger, which only a desperate maniac could have exhibited, he stood for a moment on a projecting ledge which barely afforded him a moment's footing, then pulling off his hat, he sent up a howl of loud defiance, and a curse on his assailants: unhappy wretch! in another moment a brace of bullets shattered his skull, and his huge carcass, tumbling from rock to rock, soon found its last resting-place in the black and pitchy stream which struggled o'er the rugged bottom of that frightful abyss!

During this awful contest the priest and Edmund remained in perfect silence; at length they were compelled to break from their covert by the appearance of two of the soldiers, who, by mere chance, discovered their hiding-place. Both the priest and Edmund discharged their pistols with effect, before the unfortunate soldiers could raise a musket; after which they ascended a higher crag, though exposed to the fire of those beneath. Hotly pursued from crag to crag, they still maintained their advantage over their pursuers, whose arms and accoutrements proved great impediments to their climbing. At each favourable opportunity of firing with effect, the devoted pair did not spare their enemy. The moment that one, more active or adventurous than the others, had gained the summit of a crag, he was met by a shot which hurled him, reeling downwards, a corpse, or severely wounded. But numbers must ever in the end prevail, where all retreat was cut off; and as fast as one soldier fell, others clamored up the rocks in quick succession. This desperate and awful struggle seemed drawing fast to its fatal close: Edmund, with the aid of the friar, had succeeded in gaining the last spot from which the battle could be prolonged; then, taking off his coat, and flinging the skirts to the friar, he, by those means, enabled him also to ascend. They were now on the immense slab which overhung the gloomy lake: on this they took their final stand. By crouching down on the rock they could screen themselves from the fire of their besiegers, but they became necessarily exposed whenever they arose to repel the few who attempted to scale the difficult ascent. Every man, for the first quarter of an hour, who succeeded in gaining his momentary footing by the aid of those beneath, was met by the united fire of their desperate foe. A short cessation of the firing caused Edmund to advance a pace or two, in order to ascertain whether any new point of attack was occupied, when he was struck by a musket ball on the left breast, which threw him into the arms of the watchful priest, instantly extended to receive him. The shock was severe, but momentary; the bullet, however well directed, fell harmless, having struck the Green Gauntlet, which our hero always wore next his heart. The padre triumphantly drew it forth, and shook out the flattened ball on the weather-polished surface of the rock, and was about to replace it in Edmund's bosom, when, at that moment, two shots were fired from a quarter from which no previous attack had been made, one of which, but too faithful to its murderous errand, carried death to the heart of the unfortunate Edmund. The priest, still untouched, supported on his knee his dying friend, whose warm life-blood poured over the breast of his affectionate supporter. Snatching the Green Gauntlet from the hand of the priest, the expiring Edmund pressed it to his lips, then sunk lifeless on the shoulder of the devoted padre.

A reinforcement had apparently arrived to the exhausted detachments below, and the voice of one in authority was heard ordering the fire to cease; next moment a white handkerchief waved on the top of a halbert, as a flag of truce, and the Commander's voice was heard to cry "Surrender, and mercy!" "Death! honourable death!" shouted the friar, in reply "but no surrender!" rising at the same time, in full view, holding the bleeding body of his beloved Edmund to his breast. The heads of many soldiers were now seen, assisted from below, attempting to gain the last ascent. One had succeeded in obtaining a footing, and, although with no other arms than his bayonet, thought to make an easy capture of the last remaining foe, and was in the act of rushing on the friar, when the latter, with his left hand, sent the contents of his last loaded pistol into the soldier's body, then indignantly flung the weapon amongst the other assailants below. Others of the soldiers were now in the act of ascending; the officer himself had nearly gained a secure footing, when the desperate priest, seeing any longer resistance useless, madly rushed to the sloping edge of the dreadful precipice: the horror-struck officer once more cried out, "Surrender, and mercy!" "NEVER!" answered the priest; then, uttering a wild, unearthly shriek of defiance, plunged headlong down the awful gulph, with the senseless body of Edmund clutched in his death-like embrace.

A rudely formed wooden cross, supported by a pile of stones, now overhangs that fearful precipice, to mark this scene of horror,—long known as the Friar's leap. In a fissure of that stupendous cliff which overshadows that still and gloomy lake, the seed of some creeping plant, blown thither by the wind, or deposited by some vagrant bird, has taken root, and spread itself into a shape, on which superstition has bestowed the name of the GREEN GAUNTLET.

Upon the borders of that secluded lake, the eve of the festival of St. John is annually celebrated by prayer, by penances, and by midnight vigils. Friar John is still not considered dead, but translated; and his reappearance on earth confidently looked for, by the wild and superstitious peasantry of that remote and quiet spot. But upwards of forty years have passed and gone, since that extraordinary man, after tempting death in every form of danger on earth, sought a voluntary grave in the depths of that unfathomed lake.

CHORLEY'S MUSIC AND MANNERS IN FRANCE AND GERMANY.*

THIS work is the result of one of the most common of accidents. The author, whose business is "pen-work," and who in music almost boasts of being a fanatic, during a half-dozen years made as many trips to the Continent, principally to attend Musical Meetings, and to judge and report on the state of Music, as the Art exists in its most celebrated resorts. To see all manner of sights, and to judge of men and manners, if not so much a direct object, was an inevitable consequence; and thence again, in the circumstances, what so natural as a book? And an exceedingly pleasant and companionable book Mr. Chorley's will prove to all the lovers of "light reading." Not one of them can be morose. To musical, and in one sense, to literary people, it will be somewhat more. Each journey occupies a separate section of the work. The first was made to Paris exactly as Mademoiselle Bertin's opera of Emeralda was produced and failed; confirming (apparently) Mr. Chorley in the current, ungallant opinion, that in music, women are good for little—save to sing or play the music which nobler man alone is able to compose. The Grand Opera in Paris, and its history; descriptions of the other musical institutions of that capital, with the fate of operas, much sound criticism, and many anecdotes of musicians, we pass by; though Mr. Chorley, it should be noticed, comes to the final conclusion, that the music of Meyerbeer is as typical of what is called "Young France," as the romances and tales of Victor Hugo and George Sand, or as the eloquent ravings and mysticism of De Lamennais. This work adds several melancholy new instances to the catalogue of the perils and misery to which the most brilliant professional singers are liable from loss of voice, or as frequently from the caprice of the fickle public. Turning from these tragical and really touching reminiscences, we meet with a passage which embodies Parisian manners as well as music, and which contrasts sparklingly with the pictures of the dingy dens in which Beethoven, and others of the greatest German masters, received their guests or rehearsed their works:—

I am recalled to one of the most agreeable mornings of my first visit to Paris—a breakfast given, that M. Niedermayer, then about to produce his "Stradella," might afford some idea of his new work to half a dozen of its protectors. London has nothing so pretty as the scene of this meeting: a suite of bachelor apartments in—no matter what quartier. Where we furnish, the French decorate; and the host, like Pope's Timon, "having a taste," the two little rooms themselves contained matter for a chapter, if the minute and graphic writer of "The Old Curiosity Shop" chose to describe them. Luxurious chairs, choice pendules, magnificent old china, flowers, the artificial texture of which alone was betrayed by their blooming serenely in corners darker than real camellia or hollyhock would abide; morsels of ruby glass, and Middle-Age Jewellery, each with its history, strangely intermixed with insignia of manly occupations—all, if not exquisitely neat, arranged in a graceful disorder;—the eye could not wander among these without, by contrast, calling up some of the smoky, dingy dens, in which the youth of London is contented to dwell; as if manliness lay in discomfort, and good sense and good taste could not be one. It was a skillful touch in Bulwer to make his man of the world, in "Ernest Maltravers," when wishing to be spoken of as a steady and rising person, choose a gloomy house with dusty carpets, dingy curtains, a dim dinner-table, and a cook who lavished flour in the oyster sauce! No such artist purveyed for —'s establishment. After the exquisite breakfast, the scene became yet more unlike an English morning conversation-piece. The Maestro, or Kapellmeister, (for Niedermayer is German in name as well as in the expression of good-humoured and domestic simplicity,) having been placed at the piccolo, he was helped to render the score in dust by the best musician of the party. I may name M. le Prince de la Moskowa, because among his manifold achievements—which one day thrust him into the breach at Constantine, and on another carry him to the top of the most inaccessible mountain of the Pyrenees—he has, in some degree, forfeited the privilege of privacy, by giving an Operetta, "Le Cent Suisse," to the Opera Comique. So, too, when I say that the graceful romance, "Venise est encore au bal," was sung by the best tenor voice in Europe, I may, without indiscretion, name M. le Prince Belgiojoso, since his beautiful published Italian melodies have made him also known to the public. The rest of the little party sang, some of them very well at sight,—all with an almost artistic interest in their occupation; and as the morning went merrily over, I could not but reflect how long and how closely May Fair might be rummaged, without its offering a gathering in any degree analogous.

This extract we consider characteristic of the style of the work, as well as of manners in Paris. It is vexatious to find that an Opera, so agreeably heralded, was not successful. Mr. Chorley considers the Huguenots of Meyerbeer the masterpiece of the modern French Opera. Nor is he alone in this judgment. It is also that of the hybrid growth named George Sand, who has addressed many high-flown, if irrelevant compliments, in the guise of criticism, to the composer. This monstrous growth, by the way, seems of more interest to English readers in his or her personalities than in her or his works. Any English literary gentleman that should leave Paris without knowing, or at least having seen Madame Dudevant, (the de seems now dropped by the Baroness,) must be deemed doubly unlucky. We suspect that this necessity has sometimes made the "Appearance" be seen whether in Paris, wandering in Switzerland, or climbing the Alps, where it could only be viewed by the mind's eye; though Mr. Chorley has certainly been so fortunate as to see it. This was at the Opera, when from the strange fascinations of "an ugly, middle-aged, crack-voiced" brilliant, impudent, and thoroughly French actress, he was drawn off by more powerful spells.

A comedy was going on in both of the stage-boxes, distracting the attention. The Parisians could hardly keep their eyes on the stage, so much attracted were they by the imposing airs and graces of Mrs. —, pranked out in "that Mussul-womanish mystery"—a huge scarlet turban,—her cheeks yet redder and rounder. Of more sober colour than Mrs. — was my group in the opposite box; and yet I would hardly have exchanged its central figure for a revival of Madame Recamier herself after a dip in Modes's caldron, or a glimpse at any other of the perfect beauties whom the world has ever seen, beginning with Helen of Troy herself.

The figure was a man's in its habiliments, at least in the frock-coat, loose and faced with velvet, which covered its bust. In place of cravat, however, there was a dubious-looking shawl or silk handkerchief; and the throat and chin which rose therefrom had never been visited by razor. In short, either M. Calamatta's striking half-length portrait is a lie, or there sat George Sand. There was the rich black hair, parted on the forehead just as M. Calamatta drew it; and there were the Sybilline forehead, and the eyes, melancholy in their sweetness, and sublime in their depth, and the gross Satyr-like lips and heavy jaw—the latter a little grosser and heavier than the artist has shown them. Either, then, the author of "Mauprat" has a double, or the original was before me; and I was free to enjoy one of those opportunities for unobtrusive but close observation which, in some cases, is almost more desirable than personal intercourse. He must be very sure of his own talents and position who can approach a Byron, a Scott, or a De Stael, for the first time, without such a sense of inequality as throws restraint over powers of observation as well as over powers of pleasing.

I noticed neither the air nor the features of any of the gentlemen by whom the Eidolon was accompanied. It (for what other gender shall one dare affix!) was talking at its ease: in a low voice, tuned to that feminine pitch which separated it from the other male voices of the box. By hard listening, there are few instruments in an orchestra—few tones in a crowd—which cannot thus be followed by an acute and practised organ. Feminine, too, was the motion of the mouth and lips—or I have watched, with a view of distinguishing the accents of the sexes, for some twenty years in vain. Feminine, too, the occupation; for I became presently aware that, whatever the tongue might be about, the eyes and the hands were carrying on a telegraphic communication with the person who occupied the stalle immediately before mine. A glance—and I had also recognised him. I had owed, indeed, too much of my past evening's pleasure to his grace and gentlemanly bearing, as the hero of the love-story of "Le Domino Noir," to have forgotten the features of M. Coudere. The Appearance was talking to him, I have said, as busily as eyes and hands could talk; and, whether by way of encouragement, defiance, or mere sport, the end was, that from a packet of bon-bons, worn in its pocket, it twisted up half a dozen in the corner of its "Vert-vert," or some other such waste leaf of paper, and launched them at that particularly meritorious singer and clever actor. It was a woman's arm that threw them. It was a woman that I saw, ten minutes afterwards, glide past me in the narrow and stifling lobby, with a hat pushed over her eyes, with the slim waist, and the loose pantaloons—and the whole costume, in short, which has so scandalised many an English traveller; and is described with such a déagé ease (a man never talks about what he wears) in one of the strange but eloquent "Lettres d'un Voyageur."

When Mr. Chorley afterwards mentioned what he had seen in society, the fact was indignantly denied by the representatives of "Young France."

I could not have seen her! She never wore men's clothes. It was an absurd English calumny. Two years later I could have quoted the testimony of a friend of my own, who had stood beside her when, in a like attire, she watched the preparation of the convicts for the galleys in the court-yard of a French prison. I could have told how one of the most distinguished of her countrymen had described to me, with all his usual grace as a raconteur, a visit she had paid him—hat on head, coat on body, boots on feet, and staff in hand—on her route to take fraternal counsel with M. l'Abbé Lamennais. But, unfortified then, save by her own confessions, and the floating tales wandering about the world, and eager to escape from a flood of eloquence as rapid but not so amusing as Dejazet's, I could but bow to the better knowledge of my instructors; having not the slightest inclination to do battle in behalf of what they chose so vociferously to declare was a dream.

"We formed," says the writer, describing the arrival of the travelling party at Chamouny, "a group inextricably embarrassed; and not the less so, because the servant girl, amazed to see a figure so covered with mud, whom till that moment she had taken for a groom, embracing so fair a lady as Arabella, dropped her candle, and ran about the house with the news that 'Number Thirteen' had been taken possession of by a troop of mysterious, indescribable people, with hair like savages; where there was no making out which were men & which were women—masters or servants."

Yet were the fact of George Sand appearing in this costume very notorious, there would be no disputing it; and certainly no disgrace imagined in it by "Young France." In travelling, such costume was at one time quite usual in France, adopted for convenience. Even now, in Mrs. Ellis's account of her residence, last year, in the Pyrenees, we hear of the ladies riding in wide trousers, strapped below their boot-sole, which their manly manner of bestriding their beast makes only a proper and convenient dress. Though Madame Dudevant may, nay must, have donned doublet and hose once and again, when it so pleased her, there is little doubt that she has been imagined, or as likely personated twenty times. What temptation to an impudent French actress, on her travels, for example, there must be in being mistaken for a George Sand! Truly, unless Madame Dudevant be ubiquitous, as well as masculine in her tastes and attire, it is impossible that she could be so often met in different places by different persons.* But enough of the types of "Young France."

In 1839, Mr. Chorley went to Leipsic, to be present at the celebrated subscription concerts of the town, which take place during the Fair, and at other stated periods. After praising Herr David as the prince of orchestra-leaders, he comes to a higher musical celebrity, Dr. Mendelssohn, for whom his reverence is so great, that he is almost afraid to pay him compliments. A lucky man seems Dr. Mendelssohn in all his belongings and surroundings; and so happily, and well, and usefully placed, that one must fear, if he should yield to the tempta-

* Many persons have set down the figure which Dr. William Cumming and Mr. Espinasse of Edinburgh met in a steamer on the Lake of Geneva, as the true George Sand, though the Doctor does not say so in the agreeable book ("Notes of a Wanderer in search of Health") in which he relates the incident. There were many passengers on board; but the group which attracted all eyes consisted of a celebrated German musician, of eccentric appearance, his long fair hair hanging about his shoulders—a French Countess, who had left her husband and four children to share the fortunes of this Orpheus—and the Figure; a woman who, in that year (1834) appeared about twenty-two, with sallow complexion, and long black hair hanging in the style of that of the musician, which, after all, is a very natural manner for hair to hang, and drest in all respects like a man, "viz." in the Doctor's words, "a Swiss blouse, a double-breasted waistcoat, trousers, and straps under her boots, a black silk stock, a straw hat, and though last, not least in wonder, a cigar in her mouth! I shall never forget my feelings of surprise and amazement when she first emerged from the cabin, and made the tour of the deck. Every eye was fastened upon her. At first, I could not believe her to be a woman; but after hearing her voice, there was no longer room for doubt." The Appearance read, apart, to her two companions; and the spectators were afterwards surprised to find that it was the Bible she had been reading. The Doctor continues—"To do her justice, she had not the slightest air of coquetry: on the contrary, her expression was of a demure and pensive cast." He was sailing from Lausanne for Geneva; and when he landed, saw no more of the Appearance, whom every reader of the Doctor's book sets down for the true George Sand, though it might as likely be the Wandering Jew.

tions of those who would make their own of him, he may go farther and fare worse. But this is a Scotch enigma which time must solve. There is nothing connected with the Leipsic concerts (which Mr. Chorley admires as inimitable) more admirable than the hearty style of the suppers by which they are followed. They remind us of the now, alas! traditional oyster-suppers of Edinburgh, in those good old times when learned Professors and their womenkind, the literary and the fashionable, mingled promiscuously in the genuine if somewhat homely and boisterous enjoyment, at which their polished successors would turn up their noses. Indeed we fear that our rambler among the German musicians might himself have been overwhelmed or disgusted had he encountered the social parties and practices in London, or even in Manchester or Liverpool, of which he is kindly indulgent, if not enamoured, at Leipsic. Bating the music which, at Scottish reunions, would have been solely vocal, and always national, or at such merry parties mere Crambambuli; and that instead of champagne there would have been claret, the following is exactly an Edinburgh tavern supper, almost up to the French Revolution:—

Very pleasant were those concerts, and very pleasant—though anything but English—the suppers which sometimes succeeded them,—when parties of nine or a dozen ladies and gentlemen would repair to one of the hôtels, to do justice to the good things of its specie-karte; and the animated scene of the dinner was more gaily repeated, from the ladies being in evening dress. To be sure, I could not help lamenting over the fresh and pretty toilettes that must have gone home, in some cases, saturated with tobacco-smoke; and it was sometimes difficult to hear a word that passed in the midst of the noise of the service of the table—the explosion of champagne corks—and the diapason of a violent and busy band of music, playing Strauss and Bellini and Auber with an untiring industry hard to sympathize with when the ears are full with Beethoven and Mozart. Such a Babel of mirth and good-fellowship, such a mingling of many odours, I never encountered elsewhere. I cannot wish that such a Leipsic fashion should be brought home to us, with the Leipsic style and conception of what orchestral music means. But there it was natural, and hearty, and pleasant. Jean Paul speaks of "a crumpled soul:" a better scene for the straightening of the same could not be devised than those merry and obstreperous finales, especially if the favour of the misanthropist is to be propitiated by a dish of larks. Those delicate birds are nowhere to be found in such perfection as upon a Leipsic supper-table: and Music, as all the world knows, is a most potent sharpener of the appetite!

Is not, by the way, vocalists devouring larks a species of cannibalism? No lark was ever killed to be eaten in the land of Burns! But the Germans have "a crop for all corners." Irish and Scotch people believe that the John Bulls are never comfortable, for many hours on end, without a taste and a sip of "summat" edible and potable; but, according to Mr. Chorley, their German kindred surpasses them in this symptom of advancing if not of the highest civilisation. Your savage, your "stoic of the woods," will go as long without food as Dugald Dalgetty, the Duke of Wellington, or any other late-dining duke: and thus the extremes of society meet; the comfortable burgher, and well-to-do yeoman, German or English, forming the central point:—

During the four hours which are to be expended in exchanging the town of Sebastian Bach for the Florence of Germany, you will assuredly see, gentle observer, a national propensity in its ripest development;—I mean the disposition of the best-hearted hosts and soundest instrumentalists of Europe to stop on every possible occasion—"etwas zu essen." I cannot describe how whimsically this wonderful appetite struck me on my constant journeys to and fro in Dresden. The train I chiefly used starts from Leipsic an hour after the early dinner; when the copious repast might surely, one would have thought, have sufficed for a part, at least, of the afternoon. No such thing. At every one of the six or eight stations between the two towns—fruit, cakes, cups of broth, glasses of brandy, squares of sodden pastry with plums imbedded therein, biscuits, sandwiches, plums, pears, and other garden docters, are proffered to the caravan, from baskets of hawkers and in the station-houses. Nor are they proffered in vain:—old and young, women and men,—already provided, in nine cases out of ten, with a travelling provision against famine,—partake of them with a zeal and an intrepidity which, every time I witnessed it, recalled to me Petruccio's disdainful exclamation—and which take such various forms, that, within the compass of those four hours, a Cruikshank could easily find matter for a series of "Administrations of food."

Nothing but sit and sit, and eat and eat!

The music and musicians of every town he visited claimed the special attention of Mr. Chorley; and if often disappointed, he is also frequently delighted. The performance of Beethoven's music at Leipsic gave him new ideas of him whom he names the Shakespeare of the Art. His enchantment seems to have reached the height on witnessing at Dresden the performance of the Opera of Euryanthe. Indeed he appears to have been under a spell during his residence in that beautiful place; and though far enough from being a man of the Movement, a spirit of "Young England,"—if in England there be any youthhood left,—his spleen was stirred by recollection of the condescensions of German royalty to Genius. After noticing some of the slights and indignities offered to musicians by princes and courtiers, yea, even to Carl Maria Von Weber! he breaks forth:—

I confess, whenever I reflect upon such an appropriation of the services of Genius as this,—when I think of the "Concert-Stück" destroyed by the stirring of a salad, or the exquisite Sonata in A flat, Op. 39, being lost in the midst of the discussion of those mighty puddings in which a German cook excels,—the corruption of Radicalism rises strong within me. I verily believe, had I known the nature of the duty which the position of Weber at Dresden demanded from him, while I was in the full glow of enthusiasm consequent on the enjoyment of "Euryanthe," I must have shaken the dust of Pilsnitz from my feet, with something of a bitter and disdainful feeling, instead of turning round and admiring the fine but heavy composition (to use the painter's jargon) it made between two magnificently embrowned chestnut trees, ere a sudden bend in the road to Löhmen hid it from my sight.

But Mr. Chorley has feeling for more than for what profane scoffers, who care little for tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, and nothing whatever for their mighty differences, term "fiddler's music;" and the following passage, and several others in the same genial strain occurring in different places of the work, where he speaks of national music,—of true, that is of natural music,—the expression of human feelings and passions, the audible longings and aspirations of the mind after the unknown and the infinite, will be read with pleasure by many to whom criticism on fashionable Operas would prove wholly barren. A passage which we admire will illustrate our meaning. At Nuremberg Mr. Chorley went to St. Sebalds to witness the celebration of the anniversary of the Reformation:—

For this I could have imagined a more befitting locale than was made up by the presence of all those saints and angels and Coronations of the Virgin, and those candles and crucifixes, and that ever-burning Tucher light, and those escutcheoned monuments. The psalms for the day were advertised at the church doors, where also a kind of voluntary contribution was going on, every one quietly putting in his poor's penny as he passed the corner where stood the dried-up holy-water vase. The building was filling rapidly with a congregation thoroughly piebald in its appearance. Old women were there in stiff buckram bonnets, which might pass for the head-gear of the Sisters of Charity; burghers in every pattern of mütze and upper-benjamin; with abundance of peasant men and women, the latter putting all modern fashionists to shame by the grace of their traditional head-dress—a composition of black ribbon, with pendant loops behind, a caul of silver fligree, and sometimes a forehead-band of gay red or blue. There was as much walking about among the men as can be seen in any Catholic church—I cannot add, as much of that abstracted and silent devotion among the women, which is so remarkable and worthy an object of imitation in the behaviour of those attending what some have been pleased to call "the idolatrous sacrifice of the Mass."

Short time I had to look round me and note as little as this; for, while I was considering the remarkable mixture of creeds past and present which the scene presented, the organ burst out, and with it one thousand voices, into a grand Lutheran Corale which I had in vain sought for in Herr Schneider's choir-book. It will be best known to my reader as the tune tortured to stage uses by Meyerbeer in "Les Huguenots."

But what were all Meyerbeer's effects, produced by "rhyming and twirling" that noble old psalm, compared with the grandeur of this! I have never been more strongly moved by music. As verse after verse of the grand tune rolled through the dim vaults of the church with a mighty triumph, it appeared to my fancy as if the effigies and pictures on the walls began to shake and tremble and fade,—the Saints to droop their heads dejectedly,—and the votive light, from which, somehow or other, I never strayed far when in the church of St. Sebald, to flicker as if it were about to expire.

From Nuremberg the traveller went immediately to Paris, and the spell, mingled of music, poetry, and antiquity, was at once broken. One anecdote may serve as a key to his change of dream. The locale is Notre Dame de Lorette:—

"As to Notre Dame," continued —, with that inimitable nonchalance which no Englishman can ever acquire, "after all, it is well enough for what it is!" and out came a tale of "sellers of doves and money-changers," to speak metaphorically, who carry on during the hours of worship a recognised traffic which it is needless to particularize. The poor Lady of Loretto! she has fallen into irreverent hands. A whimsical anecdote is told of the series of sacred pictures which adorn the clerestory wall, with the crude blue and scarlet and orange of the modern French school. Their artist began his labours under the reign of a past dynasty of fashions, when no lady could be dressed—and, of course, no St. Barbara or Bridget—without a balloon on each shoulder as large as her bust. While the work was in progress, the compass veered to the opposite extreme; and the painter, not to be behind his time, reconsidered his costume, and absolutely changed all the draperies of his figures—the giqot sleeves of the holy women, that is, into the true scanty cut à l'Amadis!

I hope these are only two good stories. The latter, at all events, is not a type of the spirit and taste now prevailing over the beautification of the sacred edifices of Paris.

To me, even before the architect and the glass-painter and the carver had taken them in hand, the churches in the French metropolis had always had a particular charm. The guide-books make little account of them; but, like the fitting figures of the Sisters of Charity, whom the heart loves to follow in the streets, they offer precisely that repose so eminently needed amid all the life and passion of Paris. The sight of a grim and overhanging porch, with its time-melted sculptures, and a dwarfish old woman or two crouched on its steps to carry on some small traffic beneath its shelter, is a temptation I can never resist. While prying about within their precincts, I have hardly ever failed to encounter some figure upon which the imagination could fasten. One day it has been a grisette, tripping down the stream of sunshine shed along the dusty pavement from the high windows, carton in hand, and pausing before the chapel of her favourite saint to take out her week's allowance of little sins in a short prayer or two. One day it has been the meagre mournful old man or woman who watches the triangular frame of tin, with its rapidly-wasting votive candles: another, the identical Maturin or Lucas of Molière's comedies and Jannott's sketches, with his coarse plentiful hair and his pot au feu complexion, his sabots clattering as he comes, but taught by some remnant of traditional reverence, especially if he be of Breton stock, to clatter—as old Mr. Wesley's children were taught to cry—quietly. I have witnessed in one or other of them almost all the ceremonies marking the progress of life which are so interesting in a strange land. The first time I entered the triple porch of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, recently repaired, and its choir-windows renewed with stained glass, as richly violet as if they were set up to promise a second advent of Napoleon, I came in for a wedding. The bride, it is true, was an ugly woman, with projecting teeth, and not very young; but she was tricked out with orange flowers and a blonde veil as tastefully as though she had been a Duchess; and she tried her best to elongate her mouth to that meek simper which the beauty-painters in France render so well. The bridegroom I but remember for the tenderness of his side-glances, which, considering their object, were, as I once heard a tourist remark of the ruined castles of the Rhinegau, “amazingly well got up.” The two were standing ceremoniously under a scarf of white damask, held by a couple of youths, who jested behind their backs while the service proceeded, till the officiating priest approached the bridegroom with the pouch,—whether for the quête (collection) for the poor, or for his own fees, I know not. This the youth deposited betwixt his finger and thumb; but the old white-haired man, whose lynx eyes followed the operation, perceived some informality, and began to protest against it. “It was enough,” the bridegroom declared; “he would give no more.” “It was not,” replied the priest, emptying the contents of the little bag into his wrinkled palm; and, from contesting the amount under their breath, the two were beginning to gesticulate, and to scold audibly, when the bride, with a magnanimity worthy of imitation, dived into her jaunty reticule, and, drawing out a coin, with a contemptuous shrug of disdain, put an end to the dispute. I strolled away, amused rather than gratified. Another chapel showed me a prettier group. This was gathered on the occasion of a baptism, or what our prayer-book calls “the churching of women.” In the centre was the tiny pink-faced marmotte, warmly swathed, and daintily balanced in the arms of a middle-aged woman, with good neighbour in every line of her honest face, and a tear in her eye. Close to her was the meek mother on her knees, and a couple of huge whiskered soldiers kneeling behind her, and bowing their faces over their cocked hats. The little party was flanked on the one side by a country lad with earrings, and on the other by a young artist, bound for the Louvre, with his portfolio under his arm. In spite of his magnificent pelisse, and his wide-brimmed hat, he was as hermaphrodite in the aspect of his long black curls, and his scrupulously smooth throat, as if he had taken the fashion of his toilette from the authoress of “Mauprat” and “Les Maîtres Mosaïstes.”

From Madame Dudevant, namely. The above passage is in the best style of the author and of the book; which contains many passages of equal merit, and of the same sound character. We ought to have mentioned, in explanation, that Louis Philippe has, for some time back, applied himself as munificently to beautify the churches of Paris as to raise fortresses in it. This beautifying of old sanctuaries is, in fact, but another species of the wily Citizen King's fortifications.

Among the remarkable contrasts which the Paris of the present hour affords to that of Napoleon, of “The Empire,” there are none more pregnant with lessons than this:—

Another and most signal example of the contrasts to be encountered in Paris presented itself in the fourth change of scene, which served for close to a pleasant but rather hurrying day. This I found in the two small and humbly furnished rooms where Madame la Duchesse d'Abrantes received her weekly guests. Who could enter them and not think of the brilliant salons of Paris, at which, as Junot's wife, she had queneed it in her time! Herself, too!—when I saw her, every trace of youth and elegance was gone. Her figure was clumsy, her eye heavy, her voice hoarse, and her spirits feverish; heavy eye and hoarse voice and feverish spirits referable to the same habit of indulgence in opiates. It was a complete metamorphosis. One could not, in her case, speak of difference between the present and the past,—between the literary drudge, compelled, out of an exhausted store, to coin volume after volume for a satiated public, and the intimate companion of Napoleon! The noisy repartee and anecdote which filled her small rooms, and in which she bore a most incessant part, could not deafen me to the recollections that would arise as I watched her cajoling one or two of those confident black-bearded haunTERS of every salon, in every line of whose countenances there is “journalist” as clearly written as if the printer's devil had stamped it there. This was only a few months before the contrasts of Madame d'Abrantes' lot were brought to a climax by her death in a hospital! When she was lying there—once the inmate of palaces—in almost her last hours, the nurse in attendance pointed her out to a party of visitors who were making the tour of the wards:—“What!” exclaimed the expiring woman “is it me you would make a show of?”

So far as regards music, or indeed anything else, the most important result of Mr. Chorley's rambles is the report he has brought home in confirmation of what may be considered the germ of another great “French” revolution, spreading from France over Europe. As there is, we are persuaded, a strong feeling in this country to promote such a revolution, we shall cite his testimony in support of its practicability. Of its utility, there is hardly any longer a question. There can be no argument against the labouring classes being taught music that will not equally hold against their being taught to read or write. No argument will hold, until it is proved that the different orders of society have a different physical organization, different mental faculties and degrees of natural intelligence. We wish that what is so really valuable had been told in more simple and direct terms; but plainness and severity are not Mr. Chorley's taste in anything. He may also probably over-rate the value of Wilhelm's method, but this is a secondary consideration:—

A new musical power has been created in France, in the working of which lies more, far more, chance of its becoming a country really devoted to the Arts, than in the royal patronage of such a king as Louis Quatorze, whose munificence implies vassalage for the people! There is to me a particular charm in the agency by which this power was introduced into the government schools of education in France. The agent was the song-writer, whose sarcastic and pathetic appeals to the street-echoes of Paris were little less formidable to the constituted authorities than the "Ca ira" of the Republicans to the last generation of Bourbons who had sat on the throne;—whose few stanzas—

On parlait de sa gloire
Sur la chaux bien long-temps—

are a burial-strain sinking far deeper into French hearts than all the more pompous laudations of Napoleon, of which more pompous bards have been delivered. I love to think that the same Beranger whose sweetest and deepest songs were those vented under the rigours of imprisonment, and who gave to the old tunes of the boulevard and the guinguette words little less dangerous in their pathos than the witticisms of Figaro had been in their Shylock-like intensity,—could also do his part to promote national settlement and national enjoyment hand-in-hand—could build up as well as pull down! I love to think that every childish chord from the dog-kennels* at Versailles says as much for the progress of true liberty and religion in France as the most bitter rhyme ever launched against kings and priests in the days when France would no more away with their oppressive formalities.

It was Beranger, then, who, in 1819, introduced to M. Degerando, the head of the "Société pour l'Instruction élémentaire," M. Wilhem—then a comparatively young and unknown musician—whose admirable method has at once taken root and spread wide over all the kingdom of France, and, happily for us, been recently introduced into our own country with fair auspices of permanence.

So far and so widely has its fame spread, even here, in a short period, that to detail its leading features and plans, is needless; suffice it to say, that in France its success has been tested in schools of all kinds and of "all orders." I have heard charity children, at a tender age, singing difficult musical compositions at sight, with a certainty and clearness beyond the reach of the generality of the English profession, and totally at variance with the slightest idea of empiricism. I have seen, also, the pale, greasy, grimy operatives of Paris, when their day's work was over, thronging together eagerly, in bodies of one or two hundred, not only to receive instruction in an art which was to amuse them as innocently, at least, as the Sunday dance, on the strength of which France so long set itself forth as an Arcadia of gaiety—but also to lay up self-respect by having their capacities for learning elicited, and that in a manner which brought them on a neutral ground with those clothed with purple and fine linen. It is surely no light service done to humanity, when the great classes of society, without displacement, are taught that they have not only senses, but spirits, in common.

I can conceive no spectacle of a more healthy interest than one of the evening meetings at the Halle aux Draps, a large building not far from the Palais Royal—open for one or other course of gratuitous instruction every evening in the week. The class I heard take its lesson there, under the tuition of an indefatigable and excellent professor—M. Hubert, who has acted as M. Wilhem's viceroy in diffusing this method through the different public institutions of Paris, amounted to two hundred men, or thereabouts. Some of them were as old as sixty, and may have heard The Marseillaise sung, and seen The Carmagnole danced round the guillotine; some of them of that mischievous age which is more mischievous, as M. Fréger and other statisticians will assure us, among the urchins of Paris than the growing boys of any other town.

* These dog-kennels are now occupied by the Normal School.—E. T. M.

We exhort our readers to study the entire passage, and to profit by it. Wilhem's method has been introduced into this country by Mr. Hullah, as was noticed in a former number of this Magazine; but with the best apparent inclination, neither this nor any other system, has yet made much national progress, if even a fair commencement. Yet there is promise. The Temperance Societies have been and will be promotive of a taste for music. They will not allow the toppers to have all the good tunes.

We are tempted by Mr. Chorley's adventures in an excursion to the Brocken, and by a band of runagate students from Göttingen that he encountered there, "fine, lawless, unkempt fellows,—more dirty, more good-natured, and more jovial than anything of the same order to be found," even, we presume, near Trinity College, Dublin. But we shall pass this jovial band to get at our own beloved young countrymen, who seem to make a point of writing themselves down fool and ass, if not worse, in every "Stranger's Book" that is kept in Europe, and who, of course, will not be misunderstood on the Brocken:—

It was vexatious to find Englishmen of title and family announcing their presence in one of Nature's high places, by dull and trivial jokes, which showed how little admiration they could have brought thither. Captain This chronicled the day when he "jumped Jim Crow on the Brocken." Sir That, in tracing his route, wrote himself down "as having come from nowhere, and going to Hell." The whole truth should not be spoken at all times, and in all places, says Lord Chesterfield.

In their night on the BROCKEN, the Burschen were probably predetermined to be very joyous, and what is the same thing, very riotous and uproarious; and they completely succeeded. Amidst their overbrimming glee they sung or roared favourite part-songs, which leads Mr. Chorley into another piece of pleasant musical disquisition on the social music of Germany, of the kind that will be popularly relished. He remarks:—

These part-songs are too little known in England, as one of the most national and not least engaging features in modern German music. We have rested upon our glees with a complacency so exclusive as to make us overlook what our neighbours were about. I question whether these German efforts were known to a dozen professors in England before the arrival of the brothers Herrmann. The latter even were by many, who should have known better, strangely confounded with the Tyrolean minstrels; though their classical quartett playing (the best rehearsed and understood I have heard on this side the water) must have puzzled those fancying that the wild national air and the well-constructed composition were "all one concern."

It is forty years since Zelter (best known in England as Goethe's correspondent) and his friend Fleming founded at Berlin a congregation of staid elderly men, who met once a month to sit down to a good supper, and to diversify the pleasures of the table by singing four-part songs, principally composed by themselves. Their number was forty; and far the larger part of it composed of amateurs or men in office. It was an original statute that no one was eligible as a member who was not a composer, a poet, or a singer. During his lifetime Zelter was their president and principal composer; and in no branch of art, perhaps, did his peculiar talent evidence itself so brightly as in these convivial effusions, where humour, raciness, a masterly employment of the limited materials at his disposal, and a fine sense of the poetry he took in hand, distinguish him among his contemporaries. Goethe used to give his songs to be composed by Zelter; and many of them were sung at the Berlin "Liedertafel" before they were printed or known elsewhere. Fleming also contributed some fair musical compositions—that to Horace's ode, "Integer vitæ," amongst others.

It was in the year 1815, or thereabouts, that Berger, Klein, and a younger generation of musicians founded a young "Liedertafel" society, on the same principle, and for the same number of members. Friedrich Forster wrote some very pretty songs for it. Hoffmann, the novel writer and kapellmeister, made it one scene of his strange and extravagant existence; and left behind him there an immortal comic song—"Turkische Musik," the words by Friedrich Forster. In general, a gayer and more spirited tone pervaded this younger society than belonged to their classical seniors. It was the practice of both bodies to invite guests on holiday occasions; and by the younger part-singers ladies were admitted twice a-year. Nothing could be sprightlier or pleasanter—a little extra noise allowed for—than these latter meetings.

It would seem as if the old German love of corporate processions—the old affection for guilds and burgherships—found an expression in the societies to which this couple of institutions gave rise. They were not long in spreading far and wide. The good suppers became of less integral consequence; original compositions were not always attainable; but in every town it was natural to collect the younger men of all classes, for the purpose of singing together. A regular system of organization, of division and subdivision, has arranged itself. The town societies in combination form provincial assemblies, where many hundreds come together. In the north of Germany the large class of young men who are either schoolmasters or organists in the towns and villages, or are educated as such at the normal schools, have societies of their own, and periodical celebrations.

The provincial festivals of these societies are held in the good time of the year, so that open air performances are practicable. A fine site, too, is a thing always chosen. Not very long before my Harz ramble, the Liedertafeln societies of that district had been holding a congress at Blankenburg. The natural man of the German, indeed, which seems to require a pipe every hour, and a refec-tion at every milestone, seems never, by the indulgence of his appetites, to be coarsened out of his love of Nature. He loves a fine view to smoke over;—will make a riot in the years of his cub-hood in such a sanctuary as the top of the Brocken over night, and still earnestly enjoy the panorama and the mountain walk in the morning. One might have thought that the beer-cellar and "the bosky bourne" must appeal to a totally different class of pilgrims; but it does not seem so. There is a picturesque spirit in all German public festivities, to which we never approach nearer than by rifling conservatories of their flowers, to die in the stifling and oleaginous atmosphere of a ball-room. These Liedertafeln societies take part in other celebrations not their own. When Schiller's statue was inaugurated in Stuttgart, the singing bodies of all the towns in the districts round about poured in through the gates of the town, one after the other, each with its banners and its music, till the separate chords, to speak fancifully, united in a grand chorus in the market-place. And while there exists a well-trained army of volunteer choristers ready to be called into action on all occasions—it need not be pointed out how different it is in quality to the body of sub-ordinates at once semi-professional and untaught, at whose mercy lies so much of the best music ever to be heard in England—I should say, did lie; for part-singing is now flourishing with us like the bean-tree in the Faëry Tale.

It is needless, again, to remark how the works which make a whole great people vocal,—“a whole country” (to quote a forcible expression of the accomplished musical friend to whom I am here indebted for my facts) “absolutely heave with harmony,”—must have a value and an interest in more aspects than one. If we lay aside the sober and serious compositions of the elderly gentlemen, and, on the other, the familiar “Crambambuli,” and other such ditties of the büschchen, (musical weeds worth nobody's owning,) there is on every hand, and in every guild, much to interest. To offer an instance or two likely to be familiar to the English—Music has nothing nobler in her stores than the battle songs in which the harmonies of Weber and the burning words of Körner are united. We sit by our firesides, it is true, and know not the sound of an enemy's cavalry in our streets, nor the booming of an enemy's cannon without our gates; and hence are touched only faintly by the spell of the soul within them; but it is impossible coldly to listen to the masculine chords and bold modulations of "Lut-zow's Wild Chase," and the "Sword Song," and the "Husarendlied." Again, we have taken home to our-selves and half nationalised "Am Rhein," among our "Black-eyed Susans" and "Rule Britannias," because of its spirit and beauty;—though we cannot feel, save dramatically and by going out of ourselves as well as from home, the joviality and mirth of those who dwell in a wine-land, or the kindling of such a spirit as moved the army of Liberators on their return from victory, when within sight of Ehrenbreitstein, to burst out with one consent into that noble melody which was heard with little ceasing for two days and nights while the band was passing over the river!

Honour, then, to the part-songs of Germany, and better acquaintance with them! is not the worst toast one could propose at a glee club.

There are things in the book much finer and prettier, and more critical, but nothing better and heartier than the above extract, and others of exactly the same spirit. Nor is our author alone among his countrymen in receiving such sound and healthful impressions from the natural and homely manners of Germany, though the evidences to their power over English minds generally remain locked up in a manuscript journal; rarely getting even the small length of a printed book. German customs are admired where they are, like wild-flowers, found indigenous; but no one dreams of attempting to acclimatise them. According to Mr. Chorley, our stiff manners, expensive habits, and ostentatious tastes, not only mar our social pleasures, but retard the progress of music amongst us. A late American writer hailed the discovery of India-rubber clogs for the ladies of New York and Boston as the era of a happy change in social manners, as his poor country women needed no longer be winter-bound; frozen up for eight months of the twelve, to doze by their stupefying stoves. The citizenesses of America were only mud-im-peded: the ladies of France and England, if "of condition," are the thralls of customs more chilling than a walk through snow-broth. What accounts for the thriving condition of music in Germany, shows by a reflex light the dead-weights, the benumbing influences which retard its advancement among our-selves:—

The health and prosperity, indeed, of the best music of Germany—that of combination—is largely owing to the friendly unsuspiciousness which manifests itself in a freedom and ease of intercourse between the sexes, bearing upon Art with direct and important influences. Mrs. Grundy is rarely heard of among the young ladies and young gentlemen of the country, however pertinaciously they choose to sing choruses together or practise the harmony-music of instruments. As a friend of mine remarked, when adverting to the hindrance which manners, as well as artificial refinements, present to a full and hearty combination of the amateurs of England or France, "the obstacle, in both countries, is the difficulty your ladies find in moving alone, without servants, gentlemen, and other accompaniments obligato. Yet this is almost indispensable to such an undertaking, unless it be confined entirely to the inferior classes. Now our damsels, even at night, if there are three or four of them, and an old spinster in the rear, will roam about and fear nothing; or the singing gentlemen will accompany them home; at the bare idea of which every Frenchman's morals would go into fits." There is something in this worthy of honest attention. We cannot, perhaps, return on our track so as to assume a more primitive form of manners; and no audacity is so unbridled, no affectation so pernicious, as the courage and the artlessness of an acted simplicity. The uneasy shame of the first adult English waltzers was a more dangerous profligacy than the unconscious effrontery of many a professional dansuse, who has been trained to her exhibitions from her cradle. While exciting our energies for the diffusion of Music, as a desirable and attainable household guest, we shall labour in vain till something is done towards rendering it independent of all cumber, and formality, and expense; to make it a thing of daily love and custom, and not of show. We have better voices than the Germans, and a fair musical organization; but the scientific training of patient study is not less wanting among us, than the social support of a system of manners which shall give room to the art to move easily; and by detaching it from an exclusive association with paid and public exhibitions, deliver it from the undistinguishing ban under which Intellect and Morality have so unfairly placed it.

The solidity of female musical accomplishment in Germany is one of the surest evidences of the deep root which the art maintains in the land. For, be it remembered, this knowledge is found in a society where the housewifery, ridiculously banished from our female education, is practised sedulously and with a cheerful self-complacency; where every room bears tokens of the tapestry-working diligence of its female inmates,—and where in every circle the Englishman runs a good chance of being relieved from his uncouth struggles at German phraseology by being addressed clearly and elegantly in his own language.

This, again, is worthy of profound study. We admit its truth, but entertain no hope of improvement.

Mr. Chorley's high-wrought expectations were sadly disappointed at Berlin; and he retorts, almost bitterly, upon Herr Von Raumer for his condemnation of London music, and of all music save that of the functionary's favoured Prussian capital.

Mr. Chorley received his first unfavourable impressions from the performance of Der Freischütz; and, in Berlin, if anything was likely to please him, this should have been the very piece. It was stark naught; and as to the most celebrated singers, those whose fame had been trumpeted before him throughout Germany!—But the musical world of London has had, and will have, an opportunity of judging for themselves of the persons criticised.

The people of Berlin have faults, moral as well as musical. They are prone to detraction; they have bad tongues. The following picture might, however, apply to other towns:—

So kindly do the inhabitants welcome strangers—so delightful (in spite of its touch of precision) is the tone of their society—intellectual without ostentation—that I cannot but wish they were kinder to each other. To pay a round of visits in Berlin is like dancing the egg-dance, where at every step you are in danger of breaking a shell, and leaving a stain. If I asked, with a natural interest, about Madame Von Arnim, whose published correspondence with Goethe gives her a claim to be numbered among the distinguished women of her country, a dozen voices made haste to assure me that her letters were no "Letters of a Child," and attacked her reputation with that weapon most odious to women—a calendar of dates! Who ever thanked the Quarterly reviewer for disinterring the Lynn register that destroyed our belief in the early authorship of the delightful "Evelina?" If I praised the hospitable attentions of —, I was chilled by a direct "You go there! It is a hollow house." If I inquired in one quarter for Mendelssohn's music, a dry "Yes, he had talent as a boy," discouraged a second question. If I desired to know, in a second, which of Marschner's works were most in favour: "They perform none here," was the certain answer, and as certain a prelude to some story of cabal and quarrel, which it fatigued the heart to hear.

It was the same of every one and everything; "a pulling down," as our author happily says, "of a shower-bath charged with bitter waters, and drawing down a discharge of those idle tales of which every great musician has in turn been made the hero." In short, the Berlin of this work is a most unsatisfactory place, in which nothing pleasant is found by the author or reader, save "an hour" spent with Goethe's romantic correspondent, the eccentric writer of the "Letters of a Child," and another hour with a mechanist. Allowing a little for the grateful enthusiasm of the writer, there is still much to attract in his account of the highly-gifted woman, whose effusions—if we, unlike the Berlin gossips, cast out of view the parish register—are among the most remarkable that ever the teens gave to the world. Who can ever forget her pictures of Beethoven, of Madame de Stäel, of old Madame Goethe, of everybody, but especially of herself? Our own Lady Mary Wortley was a very precocious as well as a splendid creature; but Goethe's correspondent,—if, again, we neither question of her extreme youth, or of the authenticity of her famous epistles,—surpasses Lady Mary as much in talent as in that bloom of the feelings which give to early girlhood half its charm and loveliness. But here is the Child transformed into the elderly woman:—

That friend of so many artists, and whose journals and letters to Goethe have presented the world with the most poetical picture it has yet received of the master-genius of German music,—the rapt and rugged Beethoven. Even were I willing to publish what passed in the confidence of private intercourse, to record that interview in detail would be impossible. Such a rapid and vivacious and ever-changing flow of eloquence I never encountered, even in a woman,—never such a fund of racy language and quaint illustration, or such a child-like and artless nationality. It was like reading a suppressed page of her strange and poetical "Letters of a Child;"—few celebrated persons being so identical on paper and in personal intercourse as the reporter of Beethoven's raptus for Goethe's benefit, and the Lady of Berlin. Never, too, did I look upon a more expressive and striking countenance than Madame Von Arnim's. There is a touch in it of Mignon and Fenella; a certain gipsy animation and brilliancy beyond the power of Time to destroy. The hazel eyes are still as deep, tender, and searching as when they reminded good Frau Von Goethe of the tones of the violoncello. The small and symmetrical figure is as nimble, and the gestures are as impulsive, as in the days when their owner jumped into the Maine, near Aschaffenburg, on the overturn of her brother-in-law's carriage, to rescue the purse of violets Goethe had thrown to her at a party at Wieland's, among the other treasures of the floating band-boxes. The enthusiasm is still untired which stirred the maiden to take an active interest in the fate of the poor Tyrolean, and enabled the mature woman to master the modeller's difficult and delicate art, for the purpose of designing a monument to the memory of her beloved friend—as the striking design at the head of the English version of the “Letters of a Child” testifies. A like ardour of perseverance helped Madame Von Arnim through the study of a strange language, for the purpose of effecting her unique translation [into English] of her own letters.

An encomium on these singular and really beautiful letters follows this passage, in which those best acquainted with them will be the most ready to join. What might have been Mr. Chorley's final impression, had he enjoyed another and another, and many hours of Madame Von Arnim's brilliant conversation, we do not pretend to guess: he left her in rapture, and retains his first impressions.

He made another interesting visit in Berlin. It was to the inventor of the secret process, or machine, or whatever it may be, by which fac-similes of ancient (and of course of modern) paintings may be produced “so exact as to have made many cavillers in the first instance insist that the impressions were copies wrought by the hand.” In 1839, copies of a small head by Rembrandt, done by this secret process, might be seen in every drawing-room in Berlin, and appeared quite as wonderful as the then novel Daguerrotype. Mr. Chorley felt a natural desire to visit the ingenious inventor, whose name is Leipmann, and whose works are now known far and wide:—

His lodging (for one does not speak of a house in Germany) was up a gloomy and desolate court, approached, of course, by a common stair, which was broken and dirty. The two little rooms appeared yet more squalid than the reality to an English eye, from the uncarpeted floors, and the close, loaded atmosphere attendant upon stove-warmth. A few chairs, and a few copies of the Rembrandt head, formed the principal furniture.

We were ushered into this comfortable place by a pretty fair-haired girl—such an one as Sohn or Bendemann might take as a model for one of their female figures.

This was an orphan whom the artist had adopted—his sole confidante—his sole assistant. She watched every question we put with a jealous alacrity, as if (woman-like) she feared that her master's simplicity might allow him to utter the secret her wit knew how to conceal. . . .

Herr Liepmann has the softest German voice that ever spoke to me. A thin and flaxen moustache upon his upper lip added to his appearance of bad health. This, he said, was largely owing to the hard labour which he had undergone to keep life and soul together, while he was making his experiments. Originally a not very successful painter, he had been for years haunted by a notion of his invention; and, in spite of the laughter and want of sympathy of all to whom he had spoken of it, he had gone on studying the picture in the Museum selected as his first experiment till he had brought it away, to quote his own words, “hair by hair;” and arranging his process—working half the night the while as a manufacturer of sealing-wax, to gain time and groessen to bring his plans to maturity. I have never seen any one freer from the conceit and self-assertion so often evident in inventors. He listened to every objection as to permanence, universal practicability, &c. &c., as meekly as if he had never thought of such things before. . . . To close the visit, we had the King's letter brought out, which had bestowed upon the inventor an honorarium, amounting to some £20 of English money, with many flattering expressions of admiration and protection.

Since then the art has made great progress: the successful reproduction of a second subject, after a cabinet picture by Mieris, has assured the discoverer that his invention is not limited, as many declared it must be, to freely-touched subjects on a large scale. Notice and honours have flowed in upon him; but I am mistaken if he be not too good a German to have become other than the same simple, unprofessing, uncourtier-like man as I saw in the Alexander-strasse.

We have gone perhaps too far with our agreeable travelling companion; yet so delightful are the ziz-zag rambles, that we do our readers kindness in advising them to follow at greater length the self-same course.

MEMOIR OF DR. JAMIESON.

AUTHOR OF THE SCOTTISH DICTIONARY.

It has been suggested that some account, however slight and imperfect, of an author who has added so important a contribution to Scottish national literature as the DICTIONARY of the Language, and who long occupied a prominent and honourable station in the literary society of Scotland, may not only be welcome to the public at large, but peculiarly acceptable to those who possess his great work. In furtherance of such a design, Dr. Jamieson has fortunately left valuable materials, of which, by the kindness of the survivors of his family, we have been allowed the use.

Towards the close of his long, and perpetually active course, the Doctor so far yielded to the entreaties of his friends as to throw together rather copious memoranda of the principal occurrences of his public and literary history. These, which fill upwards of two hundred closely-written folio pages, he has entitled “Recollections of my Past Life.” They are written with perfect simplicity, in a reflective spirit, and often with considerable graphic force. The memoranda are, however, thrown together without much regard to arrangement, or, save at the outset, to the order of time; but they are pregnant with matter. “They are meant,” to use the Doctor's own language, “after I am called from this transitory scene, to gratify surviving friends who may wish satisfaction on facts and dates, which could not otherwise be obtained;” and he affectingly adds,—“This now appears the more necessary, for preventing mistakes at least; as it has pleased the Supreme and All-wise Disposer of my lot lately to remove all those of my family who might have had it in their power, or been most qualified to communicate such information after my decease.”

These Reminiscences were written shortly after their venerable author had lost the last of four out of the five sons whom he had seen long established, with credit and honour, in their respective professions; and when he was himself in his seventy-sixth year: yet they bear no mark of decaying powers: not even in the handwriting, which is remarkably clear and distinct. For at least sixty of those years, Dr. Jamieson had been an intelligent observer of what was going on around him; and, for upwards of fifty of them, he had mingled more constantly and largely in the different grades of Scottish society than any other individual of his age whom we can name. His range was from the humble manse of the Seceder pastor, or the yet more humble fire-side of the cottar, to the drawing-rooms of nobility; and through all the intermediate links of the literary, the religious, and the professional circles of Scotland. His acquaintance among those aristocratic Scottish families who have been distinguished by their regard for the national literature, and for the encouragement of men of letters, was, from an early period of his life, extensive; and in his frequent residences in London, he appears to have seen more or less of almost every eminent individual of the age. His reminiscences thus afford a rich fund of anecdote, and many characteristic traits of remarkable individuals, which, we trust, will not be wholly lost to the world; though we regret that our limited space allows us to make but scanty use even of what is required to elucidate our immediate subject,—the author of “The Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language.”

JOHN JAMIESON was born in the city of Glasgow on the 3d March, 1759. His father, Mr. John Jameson, was the pastor of one of the two Seceder congregations which were then established in that town. His mother's name was Cleland. She was the daughter of Mr. Cleland of Edinburgh, a man who seems to have enjoyed the friendship of the more distinguished of the clergymen of the city, and who had married Rachel, the daughter of the Rev. Robert Bruce of Garlet, son of the second brother of Bruce of Kennet. This reverend person, the great-grandfather of Dr. Jamieson, suffered persecution as a Presbyterian minister during the troubles of Scotland. Dr. Jamieson's paternal grandfather, William Jameson, was the farmer of Hill House, near Linlithgow, in West Lothian. His eldest uncle was a writer in Linlithgow; and his father, from his profession, must have received a university education; but all the family of Hill House seem to have had a tincture of letters; and in a copy of Virgil, of date 1688, which the Doctor retained as a kind of heir-loom, the names of each of the sons were entered, followed by a Latin inscription. He imagines that the Jamesons from whom he was descended, may have come originally from Caithness, an hypothesis borne out by Sir Robert Gordon's History of the Family of Sutherland; and Mr. Jameson, a writer in Alloa, informed him that some centuries ago, three brothers of the name had come from the north; of whom one settled on the north side, and two on the south side of the Forth. However this may be, his more immediate ancestor, his grandfather, was a respectable farmer, and related to some of the smaller lairds of the county, and to the wealthy merchants of the then flourishing commercial town of Borrowstounness. The Doctor, who was tenacious of blood-relationship to the extremity of the old Scottish kindly feeling for reckoning kindred, thus counted cousins, through both father and mother, with a far-spread and highly respectable connexion. In early life, for some reason which he merely describes as puerile, instead of following the orthography of his ancestors, and of his own father, he adopted the different spelling of Jamieson, which it was judged best that he should retain, as he had in this manner subscribed his marriage-contract and other documents; but he made his family adopt the original name of Jameson.

One of the most remarkable facts connected with the family is, that the father and grandfather of two Seceder ministers had been a strict Scottish Episcopalian. This fact Dr. Jamieson learned, when advanced in life, from his friend, Sir Alexander Seton, when the baronet was eighty years of age. When a boy, Sir Robert remembered William Jameson of Hill House as the only churchwarden of his uncle, then vicar of Riccarton, and as being peculiarly zealous to maintain the sanctity of the purlieus of the chapel. Dr. Jamieson believes, that in the common detestation of prelacy which prevailed in Scotland, his father was actually ashamed to confess this family degradation: for he never could learn from him of what religion his grandfather had been.

The subject of this notice, to use his own words, which we wish we could adopt throughout, “never enjoyed the benefit of regular instruction in the English language. “My good father,” he says, “had the common prejudice of our nation against what was then called ‘knappin’ English.’” He accordingly placed the future lexicographer with a poor, useless creature named Macnoir, who on Sundays officiated as his own precentor; and principally, it would seem, for the kind purpose of encouraging other parents to send their children to the same school. Whatever Macnoir's musical talents may have been, he was no English scholar; and his most celebrated pupil remarks—“This, some good-humoured friend may be apt to say, was a pretty early initiation into that partiality for the Scottish language which the writer has eventually displayed.”

After this imperfect course of elementary instruction, he was, according to a practice not yet wholly exploded in Scotland, where the English language is often left to shift for itself, sent, in his seventh year, to the first class of the grammar-school of Glasgow, then taught by Mr. William Bald, a teacher quite of those times; a man of great humour, and a boon companion, but suspected, on good grounds, of partiality towards the sons of men of rank, or of those wealthy citizens who occasionally gave him a good dinner, and made liberal Candlemas Offerings. These Annual Benevolences long remained a degradation to the Scottish schoolmaster, and a detriment to the scholars. Young Jamieson's master received the customary donation on Candlemas Day, ex cathedra. “On the receipt of the donation of each scholar,” his pupil relates, that “he proclaimed to the aggregate classes, in language perfectly intelligible to every one who heard it, the relative value of each gift. He who was of an inferior rank, or whose parents, perhaps, put a higher value on money than others did, on presenting half-a-crown,—which I believe was the minimum—was congratulated, often in a low tone, with the wish expressed by the Latin term Vivat. If the sum amounted to a crown, he received, in return, the more honourable salutation, Floreat,—as being one who deserved to rise or prosper in the world. But if the colour of gold gladdened the eye of the teacher, he exclaimed, with greater spirit than in any of the former instances, Vivat Floreatque!—as intimating that the liberal donor merited not only to live but to flourish." By this teacher, the son of the not rich Seceder minister was treated so "unjustly," that his father took him away at the end of the first year. Mr. Bald afterwards attempted to apologize for his glaring injustice to the boy, by owning that he had a claim to the highest place and the first prize, but that as there was a high bet depending on the head of his rival in the class, he so manœuvred that the prize should be carried off by the dunce! Young Jamieson's father does not appear to have been influenced by paternal weakness or vanity on this occasion. Other parents had shared his feelings; and the class which, in the first year, contained above seventy, in the second fell off to twenty-four. The boy was then placed under a private teacher named Selkirk, who is described as a worthy man, and with whom, in two years, and by the unremitting care of his father at home, he made such progress, that he was deemed fit to enter the first "Humanity," or Latin class, in the University of Glasgow. He gently blames his "ever-venerated parent" for improperly hurrying on his education; justly remarking, that he "did not sufficiently reflect on the almost invariable character of a youthful mind not altogether obtuse; that though impressions seem to be vividly received, they are frequently superficial, and give place to others that succeed them, which although apparently received with equal readiness, often exclude those that have preceded them." He continues, "I blush when I recollect that I was only nine years of age when I entered the Humanity class." The professor was the Rev. George Muirhead, of whom his pupil entertained the most affectionate recollection, and an "indelible veneration." The Doctor's reminiscences contain a rich mine of anecdote and of characteristic traits of the professors, and of the clergy of Glasgow and its neighbourhood, in those primitive days; and also of the "old-world" gossip of his Alma Mater. Muirhead was himself a character; and though something of a pedant, an enthusiastic scholar. He entered with his whole soul into the business of his class. Classical reading, but above all, Virgil, was his passion. While a country minister, he had, it was said, purchased a piece of ground to improve in the way prescribed by the "Georgics," which system of husbandry produced the most natural consequences. Once that young Jamieson wished to borrow an amusing, though still a Latin book, from the library belonging to the class, Muirhead addressed him with considerable sternness—

"John! why would you waste your time on books of that kind?"

"What would you have me to read?" inquired John, with all humility.

When the Professor replied, with great fervour, and to the utter astonishment of the boy—"Read Virgil, sir; read him night and day—read him eternally!"

His own copy of Virgil was as black and well-thumbed as the breviary of any Irish priest. The other professors were glad when the Session closed, that they might either be off in every direction whither inclination led, or left at leisure for any favourite study or pursuit; but "good old George never left the college, and seemed to have no enjoyment save in stalking like a ghost through the courts and piazzas, solitarily occupying the scenes in which all his earthly delight was concentrated." This original boarded with the celebrated brothers Foulis, who, as Printers to the University, were allowed a house within its precincts. It is a curious fact, mentioned by Dr. Jamieson, that the types, by which they produced such beautiful specimens of typography, were cast by Dr. Wilson, then the Professor of Astronomy in the college.

During his second year at the Latin class, young Jamieson also attended the first Greek class, which was then taught by Dr. James Moor, the well-known author of the Greek Grammar which bears his name. Though a man of talents, he was a very inferior teacher to Muirhead. His habits were irregular and dissipated; and he lost all authority in his class, which was often a scene of the wildest disorder, and the Professor a laughing-stock to the children; for if of Jamieson's age, they can be called nothing else. To Jamieson the course was, he says, "almost entirely lost," and he also contracted idle and trifling habits. Though his teacher's words eloquently told him of the beauty and elegance of the Greek language, the teacher's example rendered a boy of eleven, fond of play, indifferent to regular application or study. If Dr. Moor himself forgot what lessons he had given out, it was not to be supposed that his juvenile students would rigidly remember them.

So early in life as this period, the future antiquary was beginning to discover a taste for old coins, and other curious objects, on which he expended his pocket-money, and also a vein for poetry. Both predilections were congenial to those of the dissipated Professor, with whom Jamieson became so far a favourite, that he kindly explained the coins the boy brought to him, and would show him his own valuable collection, acquired while Moor had travelled with the unfortunate Earl of Kilmarnock. In short, under Moor, his pupil seems to have made progress in everything save his proper business, the Greek language, which he regretted during the whole of his life. His boyish negligence was partly to be ascribed to the ill-health of his father, who had been struck with palsy, and who subsequently sustained no fewer than eighteen shocks. Deeply and repeatedly does the Doctor, in his recollections, regret his idleness—precious time trifled away that could never be recalled. This regret is, however, oftenest to be found in the mouths of those who, like him, have been the most diligent and unremitting in study and in business, and who best know the value of time.

So early as the time of his attendance on the prelections of Professor Muirhead, his mind received that bias which influenced the literary pursuits of his after life. "The Professor," he says, "not satisfied with an explanation of the words of any classical passage, was most anxious to call the attention of his pupils to the peculiar force of the terms that occurred in it; particularly pointing out the shades of signification, by which those terms, viewed as synonymous, differed from each other. This mode of illustration, which, at that time, I suspect, was by no means common, had a powerful influence in attracting my attention to the classical books, and even to the formation of language in general, and to it I most probably may ascribe that partiality for philological and etymological research in which I have ever since had so much pleasure. I have yet in my possession some of the notes which I took down either during the class hours or afterwards, from my first attendance on the Humanity Class."

The precarious state of his father's health made the studies of an only surviving son, already destined to the ministry, be pushed forward with anxious rapidity. The friendly Professor Muirhead disapproved and remonstrated; but there was too good reason for the precipitance. His father (as the Doctor mentions) long afterwards informed him, that he was much afraid that, having been long a prisoner from complicated disease, he would be early taken away; and, as he had nothing to leave his son, he was most desirous to forward his classical and professional education. He was accordingly next season sent to the Logic Class, though, as he remarks, "a boy of eleven years of age was quite unfit for studying the abstractions of logic and metaphysics." This year, also, he considers "entirely lost," and that "it might be blotted out of the calendar of his life." A second year spent in philosophical studies was employed to little more purpose; and though he now studied under the eminent philosopher, Dr. Reid, he had become, during his father's continued illness, too much, he says, his own master to make any great progress "either in the Intellectual or Moral powers." He took some pleasure in the study of Mathematics; but over Algebra, on which he consumed the midnight oil, the boy, very naturally, often fell asleep. His classical and philosophical studies were certainly begun in very good time; but it is yet more surprising to find the Associate Presbytery of Glasgow admitting him as a student of theology at the age of fourteen! The Professor of Theology among the Seceders at that period was the Rev. William Moncrieff of Alloa, the son of one of the four ministers who had originally Seceded from the Church of Scotland, from their hostility to Patronage, and who, consequently, organized the Secession Church. Though not, according to his distinguished pupil, a man of extensive erudition, or of great depth of understanding, Moncrieff was possessed of qualities even more essential to the fulfilment of his important office of training young men in those days to the Secession ministry; and from the suavity of his disposition, and the kindness of his manners, he was very popular among his students. After attending Professor Moncrieff for one season at Alloa, young Jamieson attended Professor Anderson in Glasgow, (afterwards the founder of the Andersonian Institution,) for Natural Philosophy; for which science he does not seem to have had much taste. While at the Glasgow University, he was a member of the different Literary Societies formed by the students for mutual improvement. These were then the Eclectic, the Dialectic, and the Academic; and he was successively a member of each of them. Their meetings were held in the college class-rooms, and were well attended by students and visitors. Sometimes the professors graced the ingenuous youths with their presence, as an encouragement to diligence.

The Doctor relates many beautiful instances of the mutual respect and cordial regard which then subsisted among the different denominations of the clergy of Glasgow, and which was peculiarly manifested towards his father during his severe and protracted illness. Comparing modern times with those better days, he says:—

"If matters go on, as they have done, in our highly favoured country for some time past, there is reason to fear that as little genuine love will be found as there was among the Pharisees, who, from sheer influence of party, in a certain sense, still 'loved one another,' while they looked on all who differed from them in no other light than they did on Sadducees. May the God of all Grace give a merciful check to this spirit, which is not from Him!"

Dr. Jamieson was himself, throughout the whole course of his life, distinguished by a liberal and truly Catholic spirit. His friends and intimate associates were found among Christians of all denominations, though he conscientiously held by his own opinions. If he ever lacked charity, it appears to have been towards the Unitarians, a fact perhaps to be accounted for by his early controversy with Macgill and Dr. Priestley. Episcopalians and Roman Catholics were among his friends, even when his position as the young minister of a small, obscure, and not over-enlightened congregation of Seceders, in a country town, made the association dangerous to himself with his jealous flock.

From his earliest years, Dr. Jamieson seems to have had the happy art of making friends of the wise and the worthy, and especially of persons distinguished for natural powers of mind, or for great literary attainments. He had the no less enviable power of retaining the regard he had attracted, and of disposing every one with whom he came into contact to forward his views, whether these were for personal or public objects. A really remarkable degree of interest seems to have been taken in his prosperity, and in that of his large family, at every period of life. From boyhood he had been cordially received into what may assuredly be called the best society at that period known in Scotland,—namely, that of eminent friendly professors, clergymen distinguished by talents and piety, and religious families among the ancient gentry. While comparatively a boy, attending the class of the Rev. William Moncrieff, at Alloa, he frequently visited that remarkable relic of the olden time, the celebrated Mrs. Bruce of Clackmannan, or "The Lady of Clackmannan," as she was more usu-termed; in whose house his grandmother, Rachael Bruce, had been a frequent guest two generations before. Indeed, the excellent Doctor appears to have been, from boyhood to old age, a kind of pet with ladies of rank and talent, who were among his most zealous friends, anxious in forwarding all his projects. The earliest, if not the noblest, of this number was the venerable Lady Clackmannan, the widow of the representative of the royal lineage of Bruce. Dr. Jamieson's reminiscences of this gentlewoman and her "troops of friends," after the lapse of sixty years, are replete with touching interest. Clackmannan House was then the rendezvous of all who boasted of any drop of the blood of the Bruce, or who were Jacobites: and here, consequently, the youthful student of theology must have met with much delightful society. The good old lady's means were by this time much circumscribed, as the territorial property of the family had been greatly impaired; yet she kept a house as open as her heart, and the cruise and the barrel failed not. Here Jamieson first heard, with distant awe, of the Abyssinian traveller Bruce, who was of the same stock; and whom he vindicates, by substantial facts, from the charges once brought against him by thoughtlessness and malignity; though time has since established his veracity beyond a doubt. Old Lady Clackmannan is perhaps best known to the world at large from the Memoirs of Burns, who, as enthusiastic a Jacobite as herself, was, it may be remembered, sportively dubbed knight by her, with the sword of her great ancestor, Robert the Bruce. According to Dr. Jamieson's recollection of this interesting old lady, "she did not appear gifted with much intellect, but she made up for the want of this by the warmth of her affections." She spoke the broad Scotch of her age, and her conversation possessed considerable humour and naïveté. She was herself a Bruce, of the family of Newton; and had married Henry, the last representative of the ancient House of Clackmannan. Her brother, then Dr. Bruce of Cowden or Crowden, a sweet retirement on the banks of the Devon, was grandfather to the present Countess of Airley. The whole family were keen Jacobites, though the Bruces had also in Dr. Jamieson's ancestor, a Whig or Presbyterian branch. Her immediate predecessor, the widow of Sir David Bruce of Clackmannan, and the daughter of Mackenzie of Tarbet, in the insurrection of 1715 raised a troop of horse for the service of King James, and rode to Perth at their head, with holster pistols before her. For her zeal against the Presbyterians and Hanoverians, this lady was nicknamed, by the Whiggish parish minister, "The de'il o' the garrison." The Doctor's ancient friend was, if as determined, more womanly in her expressions of hostility. One day when she was gratifying young Jamieson's passion for old coins and medals by exhibiting her own collection, she showed him, among others, a medal of Clementina, the daughter of Sobieski, and the consort of the first Pretender. While doing this she gave him a familiar jog on the arm, as was her frequent practice with favourites, saying, "Mind, my man, this is no Pug!"—in allusion to the nez retroussé of Queen Charlotte, a fruitful royal vine whom the Ja-cobites especially disliked. Dr. Jamieson's Whiggish grandmother, Rachael, when a young woman, had been almost as zealous for her peculiar opinions as Mause Headrigg. When she and the rest of her family chanced to dine at Clackmannan House, she alone testified, by keeping her seat while grace was said, abhorrence of the prelatist superstition under which her worthy father had been persecuted. The health of "The King" was then generally given, without the addition of the proper name; to spare the delicate consciences of Whigs and Jacobites, and to keep the latter out of the clutches of the law. Lady Clackmannan usually gave the toast in this ambiguous form, but this zealous young lady always added aloud, "King George." Yet, these differences in politics and religious faith provoked no resentment, produced no alienation of affection.

In recollection of his grandmother's zeal, Dr. Jamieson tells a good anecdote of a small Highland laird, on the banks of Loch Lomond, Grahame of Blairvokie, who, though he had been out in the '45, ventured, after a time, to reappear; and once, rather rashly, risked joining a drinking party of military officers in Glasgow. When the toast came to him he gave the usual double entendre, "The King," on which a petulant young officer demanded, "Which king do you mean, Sir?" "If there be twa," replied Blairvokie drily, "ye may take your choice o' them." At a much later period of life Dr. Jamieson met at Tynningham, the seat of the Earl of Haddington, (with whom, during the life of the Countess, he was a frequent guest,) Mr. Livingston, an accomplished gentleman, a well-known Jacobite, and the supposed representative of an attained family. Mr. Livingston had been employed by George the III. in the delicate office of breaking off the marriage contracted between the Duke of Sussex and Lady Augusta Murray, a daughter of the family of Dunmore: a marriage, by the way, which Dr. Jamieson considers solemnly contracted and "unquestionably lawful and obligatory in the sight of God." When Mr. Livingston was presented to their Majesties before setting out on his expedition, the Queen, "who was not thought to possess a great degree of tact or delicacy," abruptly said, "Livingston, were not you out in the last rebellion?" He replied, with perfect self-possession, "No, Madam; and may it please your Majesty, the only reason of this was, that I was then too young." The anecdote may not be new, but the Doctor heard it from the lips of the actor, whom he greatly admired, and who told him other facts, particularly of the depravity of German Professors, which we should consider not a little questionable.

Difference of political and religious opinion had, in the days of the old Lady of Clackmannan, no power to sow distrust or beget even the suspicion of treachery among friends and clannish cousins. Her husband, the last lineal descendant of his family, was long compelled to skulk, after the fatal events of 1746, and was known to many of the visitors, to be concealed in one of the vaults of Clackmannan Tower. He died in 1772. His widow lived after his decease for twenty years, and died at the age of 91, leaving the Earl of Elgin and Bruce of Kennet to contend for the honour of the chieftainship. Lady Clackmannan bequeathed the family-tree, which hung in her dining saloon, and the two-handed sword said to have been wielded by King Robert Bruce at Bannockburn, to the Earl of Elgin. When Dr. Jamieson was on a visit to the Earl, at Broomhall, a great many years afterwards, these precious relics, which he so much longed to behold again, were with difficulty discovered after a search of three days among the other lumber of a garret! The Doctor had a personal interest in this search, independently of his antiquarian tastes; for he wished to see what was said of his great-grandfather, Bruce of Garlet, the father of the spirited Rachael. A fine trait is related of the heir of that property, the brother of this young lady. On the death of their father, he made it entirely over to her; saying, "it was little enough for Rachael," and, like a noble and adventurous young Scot, sought his fortunes abroad. He settled in Barbadoes, where he made a fortune, and established a flourishing family; with whose descendants Dr. Jamieson in after years affectionately counted cousinship. The small attention shown by the Earl of Elgin to family relics, so precious as the sword of the Bruce, led the candid Doctor to infer that the stories propagated against his lordship, in relation to the manuscripts of Mr. Tweddell, must have been calumnies; and that the papers were much more likely to have been lost or mislaid by the Ambassador, through carelessness, than purloined. It is proper to say, that probable as this inference was, it was not the fact; for the earl long afterwards obtained, and showed Dr. Jamieson proofs that the manuscripts, failing other means, had been sent from Pera to the British Consul at Smyrna, to be thence forwarded to England, long after Lord Elgin had left Constantinople. So much for rash and severe judgments in matters of this sort.

But Dr. Jamieson is still but a lad attending the Theological Lectures of Mr. Moncrieff at Alloa, and enjoying an occasional holiday at Clackmannan House, where his grandmother had gone of yore; or visiting the Rev. Mr. Randall of Stirling, the father of his friend, Dr. Randall Davidson, afterwards of Muirhouse. The worthy minister of Stirling, who was of a much more generous and cordial nature than his better-known son, would fain, as a friend, have advised the young and active-minded student to leave the Secession and direct his views to the Established Church, which held out a more inviting prospect to a youth of talents; for such Jamieson, even then, must have appeared to strangers. But the strong desire of his father, his immediate connexions in the Secession Church, and every kindly influence that had hung around his youth, bound him to the Secession; though the name of Seceder was still a reproach, provocative of that "dread laugh" which a youth bears with difficulty. The first Methodists in the darker parts of England were not treated with more ignominy and scorn, and actual persecution, than the poor Seceders at that period. But the young student did not flinch from his standard; nor did he ever repent the sacrifice; though he seems to have felt, and at times almost bitterly, the peculiar evils which annoy, and harass too many dependent dissenting ministers. He at one time conceived a boyish fancy for studying medicine, but gave it up in deference to the wishes of his father, who was bent upon seeing him enter upon the sacred office to which he had early been destined.

After he had attained the dignity of a student in Theology, instead of condescending to resume the red gown of the Glasgow student, he repaired to Edinburgh to prosecute his studies, and lived, while there, in the house of his maternal grandfather, Mr. Cleland. He here attended the prelections of the eminent Dugald Stewart, then but a young man himself. He also studied the Hebrew language in a private class; and was admitted a member of a Society of Theological Students, who met once a-week in the class-room of the Hebrew Professor in the University. "A man of great learning and piety, adorned by singular modesty," was this Professor, who bore the honorary descriptive title—or nick-name—of the Rabbi Robertson. If ever Dr. Jamieson's reminiscences are given to the world, his sketches of the most celebrated of the Professors and Ministers of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and of the eminent Clergy of the neighbourhood of the latter city, of whom some were great originals, will be perused with interest. In these "Recollections," will be found the origin of many families, that have since risen to fortune and station, both in England and Scotland. To us it appears that a history of those virtuous and prosperous families, which have in Scotland sprung from

Beneath the altar's sacred shade,
would prove much more interesting, and far more valuable, than any Peerage or Baronetage; displaying, as it must, in every page, the importance of education, and of those habits of frugality, perseverance, and self-reliance, which has raised so many of the descendants of the Scottish clergy, Established and Dissenting, to eminence and fortune in the highest walks of professional and commercial life.

Though so much genuine love and charity were displayed in the intercourse of the clergy of Glasgow with their sick brother of the Secession, there was, as has been noticed, much contumely to be endured by his son, and that of a kind peculiarly galling to a young mind. He says, that from his very entrance into the University, he had to struggle with the petty persecution of his fellow-students, whose malignity was the result of their ignorance. He was invariably distinguished by a party nick-name, often accompanied by abusive epithets. The most virulent in this petty warfare were the Irish students, who then came over to the Scottish Universities in great numbers, and who could not suffer this new kind of Swaddler to escape their impertinence. "The worst" of his juvenile persecutors, he says, "were rude and irreligious young Irishmen, whose relations were able to provide for them in the Established Church of our sister island. None of them knew what the term Seceder meant, though many a curse they conjoined with it. They only knew that it was some scheme of religion different from that which had the protection of the law in this country, as well as from that in Ireland, on whi-alone they could depend for 'a morsel of bread.' Is it surprising that with such Successors to the Apostles, the Roman Catholic religion has spread in Ireland within the last fifty years, and that Protestantism has decayed?

During the young student's residence in Edinburgh, he made many valuable and desirable acquaintances, and acquired some useful friends. Of this number was the venerable Dr. John Erskine, who continued the friend of Jamieson for the remainder of his honoured life. Of this excellent person, and of the more remarkable of the metropolitan clergy and the leading characters that then figured in the religious world, Dr. Jamieson retained a vivid recollection; and he has graphically described many of them in his Reminiscences. Dr. Erskine commanded his veneration and love, but he also felt great respect for the Evangelical Doctor's Moderate colleague, the celebrated Principal Robertson, the historian. Robertson was long the leader of the Moderate party in the Kirk Courts; and though a conscientious Seceder, and one in a manner dedicated from his birth to the service of the Secession Church, young Jamieson, on witnessing the masterly manner in which Robertson conducted business in the Church Courts, felt, in his own words, "That if he were to acknowledge any ecclesiastical leader, or call any man a master in divine matters, he would prefer the Principal in this character to any man he had ever seen; for he conducted business with so much dignity and suavity of manner, that those who followed seemed to be led by a silken cord. He might cajole, but he never coddled his troops." Of the once popular and celebrated sermons of Dr. Blair, then in their first vogue, a minister of the Established Church, an intimate friend of young Jamieson's, whom he describes as a man of distinguished abilities, said to him, "There are many heresies of omission in these discourses."

These "Recollections" contain some very remarkable instances of the arrogance, senseless pride, vain-glory, and assumption of clergymen, and particularly of those who have risen from the lower ranks of society. Dr. Jamieson rightly thought, that, although of all professions the clerical should be most exempt from vanity, arrogance, and spiritual pride, yet it seemed the most readily of any to expose the aspirant to the power of those odious feelings.

Dr. Jamieson introduces this subject in referring to a plan formed by the Earl of Elgin to support the poor of the parish of Dunfermline by a legal assessment, but which was opposed by the senior minister, who would no more, says the Doctor, deign to associate in any scheme of benevolence with "unhallowed Seceders, Episcopalian, Independents, or Baptists, than if, instead of a Presbyterian minister, he had been the mitred Abbot of Dunfermline." Following out this subject, Dr. Jamieson remarks, "Can that observation be well-founded which I have heard a thousand times, that of all men, those of an ecclesiastical character are most eager for the possession of power. I cannot reasonably be supposed to be prejudiced against what would be called my own cloth;

but the experience of all ages, and of all religious professions, seems to give its sanction to the remark, however invidious it may appear at first sight; and to represent it as an incontrovertible fact, that the love of power in men invested with a sacred character, has, however variously modified or disguised, been the origin of by far the greatest part of the contentions and calamities which have desolated civil society. It would give me great pleasure could I, on just grounds, deny the truth of this assertion; but I must conscientiously acknowledge, that were I to do so, I must act against my own conviction." The Doctor, who had seen a great deal of the clerical character in all its phases, proceeds to illustrate this opinion by specific instances; remarking, "The greater part of ecclesiastics having sprung from the lower ranks, have not enjoyed the advantage of such domestic education as could tend to enlarge or liberalize their minds, and, perhaps, from the devotement made of them, by parents, to a superior station in society, have been, from their childhood, inflated with the idea of their personal superiority to the other members of the family, who are left to drudge on in the same lowly sphere as their fathers. I have known one, the son of a common ploughman, who when yet a mere boy, after he had been, for a few months, attending philosophical prelections at a kind of academy, as preparatory to theological studies, instead of eating at the same coarse board at which his parents and other relations were wont to partake their humble fare, had a small stool—for there was no other alternative—placed for himself in a corner of the inner apartment, and covered with a linen cloth, at which he sat in solitary dignity. Had he possessed any proper feeling, he would have spurned such a distinction; but it ministered to his nascent pride, and had, I have no doubt, great influence in forming his future character of lordly assumption."

In this case, as in most others,

The boy was father to the man;

but the particular symptoms are of little comparative consequence. This clergyman, however, affected to condemn all pretensions to good birth or gentle breeding until he married a woman of family. From that day, his invariable toast, after dinner, was in honour of the family with which he had obtained an alliance; while the paternal house which had sacrificed to his pride, and made him a scholar and a great man, was, of course, sunk into total oblivion. The case is by no means rare, but it is edifying. Dr. Jamieson endeavours to trace some other causes of this common failing of ecclesiastics, and of all persons possessed of spiritual superiority, concluding thus:—"Many a lady abbess has been in effect as absolute in her convent as Catherine the Empress of Russia on her throne." No temptation or ambition is so strong as that of enthraling or subjugating Mind. All other kinds of tyranny and power are poor and vulgar in the comparison. Dr. Jamieson continues,—"Tomen bearing a spiritual character, the temptation has been strong; because as religion respects an unknown state, a greater opportunity has been afforded them of working upon the fears of the bulk of mankind, than that arising from the influence of fear in regard to objects within the grasp of their senses; and nothing that is merely temporal can have the same influence in subjugating the mind, as a firm belief, that the individual who lays claim to this power holds in his hands the keys of the eternal world."

After attending the Theological class for six sessions, the candidate for the ministry was, at the age of twenty, appointed by the Synod to be taken on trials for license; and in July 1779, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Glasgow. In the Secession Church, the moment that a young man obtains license, he is kept on hard duty, receiving regular appointments to preach within the bounds of the presbytery for every Sunday in the year. This would seem a most important part of the training for the regular ministry; though, by it, much time may not be allowed for the preparation of sermons, between the period when the licentiates close their public theological studies, and commence their itinerancy. In the district in which Jamieson's duties lay, there were at the time many vacancies, and also the germs of new congregations; and the scenes of his labours on successive Sabbaths lay often far apart. His first appearance as a preacher was at Clonmell in Carrick in Ayrshire, then a very dreary and poor place. From the first he seems to have been popular, and this small isolated congregation wished to obtain the young preacher as their pastor; but to this he gave no encouragement, deeming it his duty to leave such matters to the regular authorities, applied to through the forms usual upon such occasions. His next appointment was to the Isle of Bute and Cowal, in Argyleshire. The picture which he gives of characters and of manners, now more than sixty years past, and their contrast with present times, is not a little striking. The venerable Doctor, in old age, relates, "I found my situation on this beautiful island very comfortable. The place of preaching was in Rothesay. I lodged at a farm-house in the parish of Kingarth; and I never met with more kindness from any man than from ———, the minister of the parish." This was not at all in accordance with the Doctor's subsequent experiences of the Established ministers in other parishes, and particularly when he came to be settled in Forfar. A nephew of the minister of Kingarth had written from Glasgow, apprising him of the young Seceder preacher's invasion of his parish, and recommending the encroacher to his kindness. The Doctor continues, "I had no sooner taken up my residence than he came to call for me, and urged me in the most strenuous manner to come to his manse. When I expressed my sense of his great kindness, declining to receive the benefit of it, as delicately as I could, he told me that if I persisted in my refusal, he would attribute it solely to bigotry; as he supposed, I could have no other reason for preferring the accommodation of a cottage to that of his house, save my unwillingness to reside under the roof of a kirk minister." To convince him of the reverse, the young Seceder finally agreed to spend one night at the manse; a proceeding probably somewhat hazardous, from the jealousy of such intercourse sometimes felt by the dissenting flocks. This clergyman belonged to a class of Moderates which has for ever passed away. He went out daily with his dog and gun, and often stepping into the cottage, surprised the Seceder preacher poring over his next Sabbath day's discourse. The Doctor narrates: "He often found me writing, and when I told him I was studying a sermon or a lecture, he laughed at my diligence; asking me if I had no old discourses; and assuring me that they would do perfectly well in Bute. 'I have been so many years in this parish, (I forget how many he specified,) and I never had more than four sermons. I go through them every month. All that I do is to change the texts; and I do not believe that any of my hearers, except blind David, observes that they are still the same.' One day he said to me, 'If you were settled you would visit your congregation, I suppose.' 'I would certainly reckon it my duty,' I replied. 'Well,' he rejoined, 'I visit all my parish every year; but not just in the way you would take. You'll be for giving them a long exhortation and a prayer; that's no' my way. I divide my whole parish into three districts, and visit them on three different days. I intimate from the pulpit, that on such a day I expect such a quarter to attend at a certain hour at the public-house of the clachan; and I give them a gude pot-full of kail, and a reaming bowl of punch, and send them a' hame very happy. I'll be bound for't, if ye would take my way, your folks would like it far better than your dry kind of visits.'

"I found it impossible," the Doctor proceeds, "to reason with this man; for although he never lost his temper at anything I said, it made no impression on him, for he tried to turn it all into a joke. Being a good deal shocked at his undisguised denial of some fundamental articles of the Christian faith, I took the liberty to ask him, 'If you hold such sentiments, how could you, as an honest man, subscribe the 'Confession of Faith?' 'I never did,' said he to this. I replied, 'I always understood that no man could receive ordination in the Church of Scotland without subscribing this.' 'That is the usual way,' he said; 'but as I had a dissenting congregation in the north of England before receiving the presentation to this parish, I was ordained by the Class or Presbytery of that district, who did not require this formality.' . . . I had a deep feeling for this man; for his natural dispositions were singularly amiable. He told me without the slightest portion of ill humour, that almost all his congregation had left him, and walked, some of them, six miles to hear me preach." The Doctor relates some beautiful instances of this gentleman's pure and hidden benevolence and kindness of heart, and concludes, "I never can recall the memory of this benevolent man without very deep regret; because, notwithstanding his amiable qualities, he left on the hearts of those who were the most attached to him, the painful apprehension that 'one thing was lacking, and this the one thing supereminently needful.'" which light was received, and in which he had to eat, sleep, and study. These were not the palmy days of the Secession Church, whose followers have now reared comfortable, and often handsome edifices for worship in every district of Scotland, and provided liberally for the subsistence of their ministers. The young preacher was submitting most christianly or philosophically to dire necessity, when he received a kind invitation from an ancient lady to take up his abode in the mansion of Achavauillin, then, with the estate, belonging to a family of the name of Campbell, though it has long since changed its fine Celtic appellation with its proprietor, and become the modern Castle Towart of Mr. Kirkman Finlay. There the stranger was treated with the hospitality which characterized the country and the period. The master of the house was then in America with his regiment; for the war still raged: but his mother did the honours of his house; and some of the younger inmates even accompanied the preacher to his romantic place of worship. It might have been that of the Druids, once so well known in the same locality. "It was," says the Doctor, "in the open air, on the side of a rivulet, the congregation being assembled on a slight acclivity, at the bottom of which it ran. I stood in the hollow, having a large moor-stone for my pedestal, the ground being covered with a pretty deep layer of snow, which had fallen in the night. For my canopy I had a pair of blankets stretched on two poles. The situation was sufficiently romantic; for, besides the circumstances already mentioned, the sea flowed behind, and the mountains of Argyleshire terminated the prospect before. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, I never addressed a more sedate auditory, nor one apparently more devout."

He passed over to Cowal in the depth of a severe winter, and was received in a wretched smoky hovel, without even glass to the aperture thr

In the beginning of 1780, Mr. Jamieson was appointed by the Associate Synod (the Supreme Court of the Secession) to itinerate in Perthshire and that district. After preaching for several Sabbaths in Dundee, in which there was then a vacancy, he made so favourable an impression that the congregation agreed (but not unanimously) to give him a call to be their pastor. But Forfar, his next preaching-station, was to be his resting-place for many years, an ungenial and dreary sojourn. To Forfar he was then, of course, a total stranger; and in old age he touchingly relates:—"Though I were to live much longer than I have done since that time, I shall never forget the feeling I had in crossing the rising-ground, where I first had a view of this place. I had never seen any part of the country before. The day was cold, the aspect of the country dreary and bleak, and it was partly covered with snow. It seemed to abound with mosses, which gave a desolate appearance to the whole valley under my eye. I paused for a moment, and a pang struck through my heart, while the mortifying query occurred—'What if this gloomy place should be the bounds of my habitation?' And it was the will of the Almighty that it should be so."

The congregation of Forfar was at that time but newly formed, and had never yet had any regular minister, being, by orders of the Presbytery, supplied, as it is termed, from Sabbath to Sabbath with young probationers and others.

Three calls were at the same time subscribed for the popular young preacher: from Forfar, Dundee, and Perth, where he was wanted as a second or collegiate minister. The congregation of Dundee was large and comparatively wealthy, but the call was not unanimous;—some of the elder members fancying the "fair-haired lad in the white jockey coat" too "modish" for a dour Seceder minister. He states himself, "I have lived to see two distinct eras in our section of the Church. When I was licensed, it was objected, even by some ministers, that I had too much of the English accent; and that, unless I changed my mode of speaking, I would never get a church in the Secession. In a little more than half a century I found that, with the young generation, I was not fashionable enough."

However the ecclesiastical courts of the Secession Church may manage such matters now, there seems to have been a good deal of intrigue and jesuitry employed in those days in the settlement of their younger clergy. In affecting to consult the popular voice, and the advantage of the respective congregations, they in fact managed to please themselves, and to keep back a popular rival. Either Dundee, or the second charge in Perth, would have been a much more agreeable and advantageous appointment for Mr. Jamieson: but the Synod allotted him to the small, poor, and ill-organized congregation of Forfar, which, with difficulty, managed to give him an uncertain stipend of fifty pounds a-year. The prospect was not dazzling. Having lived in towns, and among the better classes, he had some idea of what fifty pounds was; and he saw that he had here no rational prospect of being able to maintain a family: he had also seen the difficulties of his father's family, with nearly double this amount of stipend. A man of less energy, though with equal abilities, must have succumbed,—would, indeed, have been entirely lost in such a locality and position. He naturally felt hurt at the conduct of the Synod, though that venerable body might, after all, on public grounds, be justified in preferring the good of their Church to the worldly advantage of an individual. In appointing a young, popular, active, and able man to a new locality, and a congregation still in a great measure to be formed, they certainly acted with true policy, as spiritual rulers, in leaving Perth and Dundee, which were safe, to take their chance with inferior candidates. The event justified their reasoning, whatever of individual hardship it might have inflicted on their young brother.

For many years Mr. Jamieson maintained a hard but manful struggle in Forfar, which place he seems never to have liked. In the meanwhile, though chagrined by the conduct, and above all by the fineness, of his spiritual superiors, he piously resigned "his lot into the hands of the All-Wise Disposer of events;" in the assurance which followed him through his long life, "that his gracious Master would provide for his wants in the way that was best." The matter had too its bright side. He was affectionately, nay anxiously wished for by the whole of this poor congregation : and his father, though naturally disappointed that his son had been sent to what seemed the worst of the three places that had given him a Call, consoled himself by reflecting, that though only two persons had dissented from his own appointment to Glasgow, they, as long as they lived, had been thorns in his side.

The abstract principle of Voluntaryism is perfect ; but in this imperfect state of being there certainly may arise many impediments to its happy operation in ordinary practice.

Nothing could seem more ungenial, not to say more uncomfortable and gloomy, than the condition, on his first coming to Forfar, of the young minister, accustomed to urbane society. His congregation consisted of wholly uneducated people, with whom he could maintain little social intercourse. The "respectable" part of the town's-people, as, by courtesy, the upper-classes are exclusively called in such small places, "seemed," he says, "to avoid me as if I had been a wild beast;" and the Established minister presented a complete contrast to the kind-hearted, though heterodox buck-parson of the Isle of Bute. He hated all dissent and Dissenters, but particularly those who had so insolently come into Forfar, and set up a meeting-house under his own nose. His usual name for the Seceder minister was "that fellow;" and the Episcopalian clergyman of the place was not treated with greater ceremony. He, however, affected to regard them both as his parishioners—two of those under his pastoral care! Seceders in Forfar were then, as a body, as well as individually, treated with contumely and abuse; represented as hypocrites and Pharisees, who, for a pretence, made long prayers, and were actually stoned in the streets. "I have often," says the Doctor, thought then of the language of the Apostle Paul,—“I have fought with wild beasts at Ephesus.”

Though he was still happy in the society found at intervals in the distant respectable families which he visited—in Perth and the neighbourhood, or in the hospitable manse of Longforan, in the Carse of Gowrie, then a residence combining every charm, the first gleam of social happiness which he enjoyed in his own town, arose from making the acquaintance of his excellent and highly valued friend, Mr. Dempster of Dunnichen. The Doctor has but an imperfect recollection of how they first met; but he believes that he waited on Dempster to ask for some franks; and Mr. Dempster's kindness was the first earnest of good fortune to a deserving and able man sadly misplaced. "Of this amiable man," he says, "I may justly say, that, all circumstances considered, I was more indebted than to any other whom I have been acquainted with during the whole course of my life. I was always a welcome guest at his table, whatever was the rank of his visitors. He gave no preference to those who might have been disposed to consider themselves as exclusively entitled to the title of clergymen. Others indeed said that he showed an evident partiality to me. He went formally to introduce me to his most honourable guests, from whom, if residents in the country, I generally received an invitation to visit them. Thus, from his influence, I, who came to the country as a stranger—who had not a single relation in it, and who was treated as an alien in the place of my residence, and looked on as a thing unknown in society; who was viewed by the bulk of those around me as a blind bigot or ignorant enthusiast—gradually came to be considered as one not altogether unfit for friendly intercourse. I must have been blind indeed, had I not seen the beneficent operation of Providence in opening up my way to external respectability."

Energy and talents were not wanting to improve this opening. A further strong stimulus to exertion was soon supplied, and perseverance and industry brought, in due time, their own rich reward.—But first, one more anecdote of the admirable Dempster. He was generally considered of the Whig party, as all Members of Parliament then were, who usually voted with Charles Fox and against Mr. Pitt. The first time that Dr. Jamieson was in London, which was eight years after he had been settled at Forfar, he chanced to dine with a Whig M.P., and the conversation turned on Dempster, who, Dr. Jamieson said, was a peculiar favourite with his countrymen on account of his patriotic spirit. The Doctor relates, "To my astonishment," he replied, with much frigidity of manner, "We do not like him much here." "May I ask," subjoined I, "for what reason?" "Why," said he, "because we are never sure what side he is to vote on."

The ill-placed Seceder minister about this time, with a fresh stimulus to exertion, received a new and great accession of happiness. In about a year after coming to Forfar he married. It might seem utter madness for a clergyman of any denomination with a stipend of fifty pounds a-year to think of marriage, but the most prudent considerations cannot always prevent a young man from falling in love. The young lady who was the object of Mr. Jamieson's attachment, and who proved his faithful and beloved partner for more than half a century, was Miss Charlotte Watson, the youngest daughter of Robert Watson, Esq. of Shielhill, in Angus-shire, but then residing at Easter Rhynd, in Perthshire. Her mother, the daughter of the Rev Mr. Gray, parish minister of Brechin, was dead before this time. When a stripling, young Jamieson had often heard a friend speak with affectionate admiration of the family of Shielhill; of their respectability, hospitality, and regard for religion: a quality then almost unknown among the landed gentry. He was thus predisposed to esteem and like the whole family; and before coming to Forfar-shire he had seen two elder sisters of the young lady in his father's house at Glasgow, when they were on an excursion to the West.

The apparently imprudent love-match of a very young pair, proved a most auspicious union, whatever might be the difficulties with which Mr. and Mrs. Jamieson had long to struggle, from a limited income and a very numerous family.

Matters now seemed to brighten in the f manse. Home had new and great attractions, and the society of the place and of the country began to look with more cordiality or complaisance upon the husband of Miss Watson, the daughter of one of themselves, a lady of an old and respectable family of their own county, than they might ever have felt for the poor Seceder minister, whatever were his claims and merits. Soon after this period Mr. Jamieson began to write for the press, and he continued for forty years a constant and even a voluminous writer on many diversified subjects. His first productions were controversial, and connected with his sect. He had indeed written verses for Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine when a mere stripling; and he was no contemptible versifier.

From boyhood he had been fond of antiquities; and the neighbourhood of Forfar afforded considerable scope to a local antiquary. He communicated the fruits of his early researches, in different papers, to the Literary and Antiquarian Society of Perth, of which he was a member. Mr. Dempster advised him to write a history of the county; and this gave impulse and direction to his researches, though the design was never completed. He now began to wage war with Macgill of Ayr, whose peculiar heresy had been lately broached, and with other alleged Socinians. He thus enjoyed some degree of literary reputation, together with the character of a sound and evangelical minister.

Before he made his first visit to London, which was in 1788-9, SOCINIANISM UNMASKED—the title of his examination of Macgill's work—had paved the way for his favourable reception. He also carried with him a collection of sermons, which were afterwards published under the title of "Sermons on the Heart," and which were warmly received, though his works of this sort do not, in general, appear to have yielded much profit to the author.

The introductions of Dr. Erskine and others procured for him an extensive acquaintance, particularly in the religious circles, and among the evangelical ministers about the metropolis. Theocentric Ryland, the Baptist minister, John Newton, Venn, and Cecil, and many other eminent ministers, were among his new friends; and he found, besides, antiquarian and literary associates; while Mr. Dempster was ever his fast friend. To add to his dignity in these town circles, he had just received from the College of New Jersey, in the United States, the honour of the degree of Doctor of Divinity, the first honour of the sort that had ever been conferred on a Seceder.

Among other introductions, Dr. Erskine gave him a letter to the pious and benevolent John Thornton, whose daughter, the Countess of Leven, he had already visited at her own house in Fifeshire.

The abolition of the Slave Trade was at this time an absorbing question; and, to aid the good cause, the Doctor had, with some care, written a poem, entitled "The Sorrows of Slavery;" the publication of which lets out some of the sacred mysteries of the Press. A friend in Scotland thought that the experience and influence of a literary man in London would be of use to the poem or its author; and it was accordingly sent to Dr. William Thomson, who had been a parish minister in Perthshire, but who was now a reviewer in London. To the person who recommended Dr. Jamieson's poem to his good offices, Thomson had been under great obligations; and whatever were his other faults, he was grateful and friendly; yet the Doctor had afterwards reason to wish his poem in other hands. Dr. Thomson was a man of ability and learning, but a regular hacknied London man of letters. He was the author of "Mammoth," "The Man in the Moon," "Newton's Travels," &c. &c., and he conducted the English Review, then published by John Murray the First, in Fleet Street. Thomson, though a man of great powers of mind, united rough manners with much warmth of heart. The Doctor relates—"He took his laugh at my expense indeed, but with perfect good humour, particularly ridiculing the fuss I made about the Slave Trade." "Why," said he, "you whine about your African slaves: I am more toiled than any slave in the West Indies, in order to make a decent living to myself." One evening, on our way home from dining with Mr. Dempster at Knightsbridge, he stopped short at an advertising office, saying he had a little business to do here. How much was I confounded when I heard him dictate for the press a pompous notice of my arrival, literary plans, &c. &c. When we left the house, I, in pretty strong terms, expressed my dissatisfaction at the manner in which he had used me. All the apology he made was to say—"Allow me to tell you, Sir, that you are quite ignorant of the world: a man can never be known in London without puffing. To my certain knowledge, Hastings, during the trial, paid for no fewer than ninety-four puffs."

Through this person's recommendation and influence, Murray agreed to publish the poem. They sometimes dined with that Bibliopole, and a circle of the literary men of the period, and among others the elder D'Israeli.

Shortly after Dr. Jamieson had returned to Scotland, he was shocked to find that his Memoirs had been published in the European Magazine, evidently with the design to call attention to him as a great literary character. In this memoir, his paternal descent was traced to Jamieson, the eminent Scottish painter; and with greater truth, in the maternal line, to the still higher lineage of Bruce. Dr. Jamieson was, as he states, "much galled" by a production which he fancied was calculated to draw ridicule upon him; but remonstrance with Thomson, whom he strongly suspected as the author, would only have made matters worse. He after this made repeated visits to the metropolis, where he usually officiated for his friend, Dr. Terment, while that gentleman visited his relations in Scotland. On these occasions he extended the circle of his acquaintances; and in London, or the neighbourhood, he discovered many of his distant relations now moving in respectable, or in high life; and all of them, but especially the ladies, exceedingly friendly, and desirous to forward his views. Among the individuals to whom he was introduced were

Granville Sharpe, Mr. Wilberforce, and John Howard. His Sermon on the Heart became popular, and their fame enlarged the number of the author's friendships in the religious circles of the metropolis. Among the kindest of his female cousins was Lady Strange, the widow of the celebrated engraver, a very lively and clever woman, retaining even in advanced life all the warmth of early national feeling. When the Doctor, a stranger, made his formal and distant obeisances to this vivacious lady, he relates—"The good old lady ran up to me with the vivacity of fifteen, and took me in her arms, giving me a most affectionate embrace." Her friendship for him and his family continued undiminished to the close of her life. She was one of those good women whose heads and hearts are continually occupied with plans for serving their friends, and promoting their permanent interests; and she had considerable influence. She suggested that the Doctor should leave the Secession Church, and look for promotion in the Church of England; but this idea he rejected, as he had previously done that of entering the Established Church of Scotland, where the interest of his friends might have been of service to him. Yet no one surely had ever greater temptation. He had now been for more than a dozen years vegetating in Forfar on the same annual pittance originally allowed to him. Here still his greatest solace beyond his own house was the society and steady friendship of Mr. Dempster, who was ever his best and kindest friend. "Many a happy day," he writes, "have I spent under the roof of this benevolent man. We walked together; we rode together; we fished together; we took an occasional excursion to examine the remains of antiquity in the adjacent district. If the weather was bad, we found intellectual employment in the library, often in tracing the origin of our vernacular words in the continental languages."

The Doctor had not yet projected his great work, the Dictionary; the first idea of which arose accidentally from the conversation of one of the many distinguished persons whom he met at Mr. Dempster's residence; Dunnichen being long the frequent rendezvous of not merely the most eminent men of Scotland, but of those learned foreigners who from time to time visited the country. This was the learned Grim Thorkelin, Professor of Antiquities in Copenhagen. Up to this period, Dr. Jamieson had held the common opinion, that the Scotch is no language, but merely a corrupt dialect of the English, or at least of the Anglo-Saxon. The learned Danish Professor first undeceived him, though full conviction came tardily; and proved to his satisfaction that there are many words in our national tongue which had never passed through the channel of the Anglo-Saxon, or been spoken in England. Before leaving Dunnichen, Thorkelin requested the Doctor to note down for him all the singular words used in that part of the country, no matter how vulgar he might himself consider them; and to give the received meaning of each. Jamieson laughed at the request, saying, "What would you do, Sir, with our vulgar words; they are merely corruptions of English?" Thorkelin, who spoke English fluently, replied with considerable warmth, "If that fantast, Johnson, had said so, I would have forgiven him, because of his ignorance or prejudice; but I cannot make the same excuse for you, when you speak in this contemptuous manner of the language of your country, which is, in fact, more ancient than the English. I have now spent four months in Angus and Sutherland, and I have met with between three and four hundred words purely Gothic, that were never used in Anglo-Saxon. You will admit that I am pretty well acquainted with Gothic. I am a Goth; a native of Iceland, the inhabitants of which are an unmixed race, who speak the same language which their ancestors brought from Norway a thousand years ago. All or most of these words which I have noted down, are familiar to me in my native island. If you do not find out the sense of some of the terms which strike you as singular, send them to me; and I am pretty certain I shall be able to explain them to you." Jamieson, to oblige the learned stranger, forthwith purchased a two-penny paper book, and began to write down all the remarkable or uncouth words of the district. From such small beginnings, made more than twenty years before any part of the work was published, arose his four large quarto volumes, and that revolution in opinion as to the origin of the Scottish language, and theory of its origin, which he has maintained in the learned Dissertations which accompany the Dictionary. It would not now be easy, we apprehend, to explain the difficulties, discouragements, and privations under which that great undertaking was prosecuted for a long series of years. The author had now a large family to maintain and to educate; and he was even embarrassed with debts inevitably incurred; while the prospect of remuneration for his labours was distant and uncertain. How he and Mrs. Jamieson struggled through their accumulating difficulties, might probably have puzzled themselves on looking back to explain; but he was strong in faith, and also active in endeavour.

On the death of Mr. Adam Gib, Dr. Jamieson had received a Call from the Seceder congregation of Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, to be their minister. But the Synod again opposed both the wishes of the congregation, and Dr. Jamieson's interests and obvious advantage, and that, too, at a period when his removal to the capital would have been of the greatest use to his literary projects, and to the professional education of his elder sons. He very naturally looks back, with some degree of bitterness, upon this second frustration of his reasonable hopes by the same body; but, as before, he quietly submitted. A few more years elapsed, and the person (a Mr. Banks) who had been ordained to Mr. Gib's church, went to America; when the Doctor was once more unanimously called; and the Synod could no longer, in common decency, oppose his translation. The change from Forfar to Edinburgh was, in every view, a happy and fortunate event. His stipend, which in Forfar had been £50 per annum, was probably at once quadrupled: he was among friends, and in literary society, and had every advantage for prosecuting his philological and etymological researches. Shortly after this learnt that the Rev. Mr. Boucher, vicar of Epsom, was engaged in a work of somewhat similar character, and mutual friends advised that the one should buy the other off, and obtain his accumulated materials, for the use of his own work. Jamieson liked neither the idea of compromise nor of co-operation; and a debt of national gratitude is owing to him, for having resisted overtures which would have degraded the language of Scotland to the level of the barbarous provincial dialects of England: for in this light Mr. Boucher considered the Scottish language, and would have so treated it in his projected Glossary. Yet any reward for his labours, however inadequate, must, at that period, have been an important consideration with the Doctor; and he, at one time, had offered to give up his treasures for £250. The friend of the vicar of Epsom, the late Bishop Gleig of Stirling, had, however, too much knowledge of the value of Jamieson's labours, and too much conscience to permit this sacrifice to be made: so the negotiation was ultimately and fortunately broken off; and the death of Mr. Boucher, before the publication of his work, put an end to the affair, and left the field open to our National Lexicographer. It is not as merely patriotic natives of Scotland that we regard this as a fortunate circumstance, but as the friends of sound literature; and as prizing yet more highly than the learning displayed, that fund of innocent and delightful entertainment and instruction, spread before us in the pages of the Scottish Dictionary,—those imperishable records of our history, our literature, and our usages, which may enable all future generations of our countrymen and their off-sets in every distant land, to think and feel as ancient Scots; and which will keep open for them the treasures of their fathers—the pages of their Burns and Scott; and of those other works which, but for this master-key, would soon become sealed books.

The people of Scotland certainly never took so great an interest in any work that had appeared in their country as in the Dictionary. It was every one's concern: and after the first two volumes had appeared, and set so many thousand minds at work, to add to, or endeavour to render more perfect, this national monument, the learned author, from the palace and the castle to the cottage, found devoted, and often able auxiliaries, in completing his great design. Among the Scottish nobility who assisted him we find Henry duke of Buccleuch, who made his factors in the south collect words; Alexander duke of Gordon; the Earl and Countess of Minto; the Earl and Countess of Haddington; Sir Robert Liston, who, when he was a youth, holding the plough, had acquired a thorough acquaintance with his mother tongue; and a long list of the gentry of the country. But this is neither so remarkable nor so interesting as another description of his auxiliaries. He mentions a common soldier in a Scottish militia regiment, then stationed in Ireland, who sent him a list of words, in a letter displaying great talent. While at Minto House, in Teviotdale, and other places in the south, at which he frequently visited, the shepherds of the district were wont to wait upon him with words. The Ettrick

Shepherd is one of his ordinary authorities in his explanations. He had been intimate with Sir Walter Scott, from about the time that the latter was called to the bar; and Scott took the deepest interest in his work, and by his contributions and advice, repaid the useful service which Jamieson had rendered him while compiling the Border Minstrelsy. To that work, besides criticism and antiquarian lore, Jamieson contributed the eldritch ballad of the Water Kelpie, written in a pure old dialect. Those who could not assist him with words, yet circulated his prospectuses, and procured subscribers to the work. Through the interest and exertions of Lord Glenbervie, the duty on the paper for printing the Dictionary was remitted, in virtue of a provision, entitling the publishers of works on Northern Literature to a drawback on the paper used. Among his friends of a later period, none were more zealous than the late Duchess of Sutherland, through whose interest or recommendation he was afterwards chosen one of the ten Associates of the Royal Literary Society, instituted by George the IV. Each Associate was entitled to a pension of one hundred guineas. The Society, who numbered among its members, Coleridge and D'Israeli, fell with George IV., which occasioned no little disappointment and hardship to some of the Associates. The fact is unimportant to Jamieson, save as it brings to light a circumstance rare and highly honourable to all the parties concerned. Dr. Jamieson had, by this time, from advancing age and indifferent health, resigned his charge of the Nicolson Street congregation; and his retiring allowance was only £150. The recent death of two of his sons in India had dried up another plentiful and grateful source of income, and under the peculiar circumstances, he felt the sudden withdrawal of the royal bounty, which had been imagined by all the Associates, from the terms of the grant, to be given for life. In these circumstances he entered into a correspondence with the late Earl Spencer, who, unable to effect any change in the councils of King William regarding the pensions, generously and delicately offered to continue the Doctor's allowance out of his own pocket, and at once sent an order on the house of Sir William Forbes for the first half-year's payment. This munificence in a stranger to one having no claim upon him, save as a man of letters imagined to be placed in difficulties in his old age by a caprice or an accident, made a deep impression on the Doctor's mind; though the offered bounty was declined, but with the warmest expressions of gratitude. In his letter to Earl Spencer, he says, "It was certainly more gratifying to my feelings to receive a token of royal munificence than it would have been to become a debtor to the same extent even to my own relations; yet I am bound to mention, that I have two sons, one an advocate at the Scottish Bar, in high practice, the other a banker in Havre, who are both able, and willing, to help me." And the munificence of the earl was respectfully declined. The correspondence about this affair must have left warm feelings of mutual respect and satisfaction in the minds of both these excellent men; indeed, so much was this the case, that Earl Spencer left him, by will, a legacy of £100 per annum, as a mark of his esteem and respect. In 1833 this pension was in Dr. Jamieson's case restored through some secret court influence; Earl Grey, then Premier, himself announcing that he had been placed on his Majesty's Civil List for a pension to the amount of that which he had lost by the dissolution of the Literary Society of George the IV.

The remainder of his useful and laborious life was spent in ease and tranquillity; and indeed though a large sharer in the common calamities which visit humanity, his share of the blessings and enjoyments of life was also great. He had, however, the affliction of seeing the greater part of his numerous family descend to the grave before him; some in infancy and childhood, but others in the prime of life and usefulness. Of five sons that reached manhood, only one survived him. Three of his sons died in India; two were distinguished in the medical profession. A third was in the military service. His second son, Mr. Robert Jameson an eminent member of the Scottish bar, long in lucrative practice, and entitled to look forward to the very highest honours of his profession, died some years before his venerable parent. His surviving family consists of Mr. Farquhar Jameson, now a banker in Paris; Mrs. Mackenzie, the wife of Captain Mackenzie of the 21st regiment, and several grandchildren.

In the latter years of his life, Dr. Jameson had been liable to bilious attacks, for which he was recommended to try the waters of different noted Spas in Scotland. From such stations as Pitcaithley, the Moffat Wells, or Inverleithen, he was in the habit of making rounds of visits to those families of the neighbouring nobility and gentry who had been among his earlier friends. The banks of the Tweed between Peebles and Berwick had ever been to him a more favourite and familiar haunt than even the banks of his native Clyde; and many of the happiest days of his latter summers were spent amidst the lovely scenes of "Tweedside," and among the friends and relatives which he possessed in that classic district. He had always been fond of fishing as an amusement; and in the Tweed, and its tributary stream, he socially pursued the "gentle craft," almost to the close of life. Of the houses which he had long been in the habit of visiting on Tweedside, none seems to have left a more indelible impression on his memory than Ashestiel, the happy intermediate residence of Sir Walter Scott, whom Dr. Jamieson had first visited in his little cottage at Lasswade, and,—the last of many times, in the lordly halls of Abbotsford, only a very short while before Scott went abroad, never again to return—himself. Dr. Jamieson and his family were living, in the summer of 1830, at a cottage which they had taken as a summer residence in the vicinity of Melrose. They had declined Sir Walter's repeated invitations, justly indignant at those inconsiderate or impudent strangers from all quarters who daily made inroads on his quiet and leisure, and resolved that they should not add to his annoyance. In his autobiography, Dr. Jamieson relates various anecdotes of his intercourse with Scott during their forty years' intimacy:—"One day, if I recollect aright, in September, he and his daughters, Mrs. Lockhart and Miss Scott, called for us, urging that we should fix a day for dining with him en famille. Both Mrs. Jamieson and I tried to decline making any engagement; but Sir Walter, saying that he had come for this very purpose, added, if I could not fix a day, he would, and that his landau would be at our door at a particular hour. Observing still some demur on our part, he said that he hoped we would not object to this plan, as it was not in the slightest degree inconvenient for him; for that he had abundance of servants, and horses that had nothing to do. We saw that we could not, without hurting his feelings, make any further hesitation. On the day agreed, we went to Abbotsford. He paid us every possible attention; but I saw he was much broken up; and although he did all in his power to excite his spirits, the exertion seemed the last gleam of the setting sun. . . . When we were on our way home, I said to my wife, 'I will never see Sir Walter again.'"

And he never did. The last verses, probably, that Dr. Jamieson ever composed were a tribute which he paid to the memory of his old and illustrious friend, Scott.

One of the most important public affairs in which Dr. Jamieson was ever engaged, was bringing about the union of the two branches of the Secession, the Burghers and Anti-burghers. Those only who understand the history of these great divisions of the Seceders, and their mutual jealousies and dissensions, can appreciate the difficulty and the value of the service of again uniting them, and the delicacy, sagacity, and tact which it required. To this healing measure, which he had deeply at heart, Dr. Jamieson was greatly instrumental.

Though the Doctor had long and frequently complained of bilious and nervous attacks, he seems, considering his laborious and often harassing life, to have enjoyed up to a great age a tolerable measure of health. His "Recollections," to which he appears to have added from time to time as memory restored the more interesting events and reminiscences of his earlier years, seem to have terminated abruptly in 1836. He died in his house in George's Square, Edinburgh, on the 12th July, 1838; universally regretted, esteemed and beloved, not more for his learning, piety, and social qualities, than as one of the few remaining endeared links which connect Scottish Society with the Past.

Besides the different books which Dr. Jamieson edited, such as Barbour's Bruce, and Blind Harry's Wallace, in two volumes quarto; Sleszer's Theatrum Scotiae, with a memoir of the author, and other works; among the more important of his multifarious original writings are the following:—

Socinianism Unmasked, . . . 1786.
The Sorrows of Slavery. A poem. London, 1789.
Sermons on the Heart, 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1790.

Dr. Jamieson had received, at different periods, literary honours. He was a member of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, and long acted as one of its secretaries. He was a member of the Royal Physical Society of Edinburgh; of the American Antiquarian Society of Boston; and of the Copenhagen Society of Northern Literature; and he was a Royal Associate, of the first class, of the Literary Society instituted by George IV., while it existed. At a comparatively early period of his career he received the degree of Doctor in Divinity, with a regular diploma from the College of New Jersey, in the United States of America.

ON THE DEATH OF WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

BY AN AMERICAN.

THE western firmament is spread
With festoons of a mighty woe;
Upon each Alleghany's head,
Each forest, and each vale below,
And o'er each rolling inland sea,
Is heard a nation's wail for thee,
Thou Ruler of a day.
Hear! chanted by the breezes wild,
The requiem of freedom's child;
Where circling the northern pole,
The hurricanes of winter roll,
Cold's revelry and sway.
Hear! wafted on the prairie's breath,
The tidings of the patriot's death,
A dirge by nature sung;
But echoing still the anthem high,
That burst to freedom, when the cry
Of independence rung.
For when that Heaven-born spirit gave
Her charter from the ocean wave,
Of Atalanta's throne,
And bade America awake,
(In accents that made empires quake,)
And arm'd a Washington;
The very triumph that she gave,
Roll'd o'er the ashes of the brave,
And sadd'ned victory's swell,—
And though no mighty battle's breath
Burst around thy bed of death,
And bore afar thy knell;
Thou honoured brother of the free,
A nation's tears are shed for thee!

Ye potentates of Europe, you
Of old hereditary sway,

Who battle holiest truth—if new,
And not the faith of grandires—say,
If all the pageants that have shown
The picture of an empty throne;
Or all the hired peals that ring
Around the coffin of a king;
Or all the mercenary gloom
Of mourners at a despot's tomb;
Can equal that spontaneous tear!
Wept o'er a worth to freedom dear,
As sunlight to the gem;
A worth that shed a holier glow,
Around the patriot hero's brow
Than empire's diadem.
No! though the willows, weeping bend,
O'er St. Helena's empty tomb,
And monarchs dead, a glory lend
To Russia's frozen womb.
Though sepulchres embannered vie
With columns trophied to the sky,
And pyramids of marble dare
To shoot beyond the tides of air,
To Heaven's empyreal blue;
Though proudest minsters o'er your shrines,
Are deck'd from farthest India's mines,
In fretted gold for you;
For him a nobler trophy springs,
(Than decks a dateless line of kings,
Which time can never dim;
Till skies wrapt up in doom shall be,
Deep in the hearts of millions free,
Behold the shrine of him!

CAMPBELL'S LIFE OF PETRARCH.*

ALTHOUGH Mr. Campbell may not, in this new work, have added much to his high literary reputation, he has contributed to English libraries by far the best book which has yet appeared, upon the fertile subject of that celebrated Italian poet, who was, besides, one of the master-spirits—one of the potent influences of a memorable period in the history of literature and of European civilisation. The memoir is unique of its kind. It is written—much of it—in the happiest vein of slipshod; but with justness and often felicity of thought, easy mother-wit, and, above all, genial good-nature, and marked superiority to cant and pedantry. It is, we believe, an axiom among critics, that none but a poet should write the life of a poet; and if this may be taken in the sense of the homelier saying, “Set a thief to catch a thief,” it is fit that Mr. Campbell, himself a great poet, should assume the privilege of talking of Petrarch, as if he were something other than “Laura’s Lover;” and though still a mere erring man, yet something better than that disembodied, drossy abstraction of poesy and romance, which he has generally been considered by his sentimental admirers.

Accident devolved on Campbell the duty of composing this life. He had undertaken to edit a memoir of Petrarch, written by Archdeacon Cox, but found it worthless; and having bestowed some pains and time in preparing himself for his editorial duties, on finding editorship a hopeless undertaking, he assumed the more congenial office of the poet’s biographer. This office he has accomplished, not like a kiln-dried pedant or raker among dry bones, but yet scholarly and wisely; and with as much genuine learning, without its repulsive seeming, as the reading public are disposed to tolerate in a popular work. For, it ought to be remembered, that the Lives of Poets are no longer composed for the cell or the closet, but for the men and women of the working-day world. The present work, therefore, is no tissue of dissertation on small points, with a wondrous parade of learning and authorities. It is a resuscitation of one of the leading spirits of his own time, by a congenial spirit; belonging to a much higher age. Mr. Campbell here, as in his Life of Shakspeare, displays edifying indifference to many of those small controversies and trivial points which hold inferior authors in bondage; while, at the same time, with penetrating judgment, and an adroit and master-hand, he seizes those leading circumstances which bore on the mind of his hero, and which were from that vivid mind reflected on the age in which he lived. He has neither attempted original discovery, where discovery was next to impossible to an English, or even to an Italian writer; nor has he sought to give new aspects to the facts concerning Petrarch, which are already familiar to all readers. Taking up the narrative of De Sade, but neglecting no other source of information, he has told the old story in his own free-

-and-easy style, and put the very original gloss of common sense upon various matters long held in dispute. In this process he has unavoidably stripped Petrarch of much of the tinsel and buckram with which the sickly imaginative have fancied it necessary to invest the image of a poet; lest, we presume, the world should not recognise him if presented in the common attitudes of humanity. He has not veiled the weakness and faults of Petrarch; if faults be not too strong a term for the imperfections of a man who, in a dark and servile age, was a priest as well as a poet, when the latter was too often either a vagrant troubadour or a parasite in the dwellings of the great. But generous justice is done to his virtues and finer qualities; to his zeal in the cultivation of letters, his love of an independent life, and his fidelity in friendship. Boccaccio is, however, perhaps unconsciously, a much greater favourite with Mr. Campbell than his proper hero; and the chapter which gives an outline of the history of that celebrated person is one of the most genial portions of the volumes. It is, however, neither stilted nor at all strait-laced. Mr. Campbell appears to consider Boccaccio’s regret, in old age, at the laxity of his early writings, about as unreasonable as Cowper’s shame for having written John Gilpin.

For a work of any compass, the personal history of Petrarch afforded slender materials, and such episodes as the life of his friend Boccaccio; bird’s-eye views of the state of Italy when Petrarch was born to it; sketches of the papal court, and other extraneous though not irrelevant matters, form its most original and not least valuable portion. The great families of Visconti and Colonna were Petrarch’s patrons; and he was deeply interested in the intestine conflicts which were then the scourge of Italy; the Tribune Rienzi was his friend. All this affords scope to the pen of his biographer. A visit to Venice naturally introduces Andrea Dandolo, and a journey to Naples the tragic story of Joan of Sicily, whose grand-father, King Robert of Naples, was the munificent patron of the poet, and decreed to him the laurel crown.

The period during which Petrarch flourished, was fruitful in remarkable men, and momentous events; and Mr. Campbell has done wisely in making his work one which might, with propriety, be named, Petrarch, his Times and Contemporaries. It is all this; and in so far differs from any former memoir, as well as in the grasp of mind, the graceful talents and varied acquirements of the author.

The great event of Petrarch’s life to those who number as two to one among the admirers of his poetry—the ladies—is his exalted passion for Laura. Mr. Campbell is neither among the incredulous, who, like Petrarch’s friend, James Colonna bishop of Lombes, treat this passion as a piece of extravagant affectation, a poetical fantasy—or, in plain terms, sheer humbug—if so profane a term may ever be used in relation to poet or poetess, dolorously singing one thing, and saying and thinking quite the reverse; nor yet is our shrewd author of the number who are full and unquestioning believers in what Byron calls the "well-sung woes of Laura's lover." He imagines that Petrarch may have imbibed a sudden and violent passion for Laura, when he first saw her at church, in that ever-famous green silk gown embroidered with violets. We should, by the way, have some doubts of the sincerity of Romeo's sudden love, if he had minutely described to Mercutio Juliet's ball-dress. But Mr. Campbell also knows "that men have died from time to time, and worms have ate them"—but rarely died for love. He knows that Laura's lover lived on in tolerable comfort for many years; making no doubt "woful ballads to his mistress' eye-brow"—but that he also cultivated letters, travelled, to divert his passion, but also to amuse himself; made court to the great; wrote as many articles on important public affairs as if he had been editor of an Avignon Times—and ate, drank, and was, in his own way, merry. Nay, though a priest, and a bold denouncer of the vices of ecclesiastics—a liberty permitted in an age when the clergy did not yet need to care much for what was said of their bad lives—Laura's lover had, for a series of years, at least one mistress; and two children were born to him by her, at distant intervals; which, upon the whole, seems to lessen the sum of the poet's sorrow and despair to a somewhat endurable compass. That Petrarch, young, imaginative, and susceptible, was suddenly smitten with the beauty in the green silk gown—an accident not so likely, to this particular poet, had she appeared in green linsey-woolsey—must have been true; but as to deep, enduring passion, the love that takes possession of the whole being, never to depart, that is out of the question. There is, in our apprehension, as much sincerity, and more manliness in the flame of Don Quixote for the Divine Dulcinea, than in Petrarch's superannuated passion; and a close resemblance between these famous love-passages, though the love of Petrarch continues to engross sympathy and reverence, while the passion of the gallant knight of the Rueful Countenance is viewed with that overpowering sense of the ludicrous which it so naturally excites. So, we fear, in the nineteenth century, would the passion which has immortalized Petrarch be regarded. The world's heart has by no means grown callous to "a tale of true love;" but it now requires that it shall be a true love—not a something to write verses about. It could still stand a few tender youthful effusions whether genuine in their inspiration or simulated; but sonnetteering, kept up for forty years, and till grey hairs appeared! Human nature has not changed in its tenderest deepest feelings; but the world could no longer stand this kind of the fudge poetical. Petrarch's patron, friend, and contemporary, James Colonna, though at a distance from Avignon, must have been as well acquainted with the character of the poet, the nature of his romantic attachment, and of some other of his innocent affectations, as any one of his biographers; and he—But we shall, on this moot point, quote the Bishop's words, though we cannot put Mr. Campbell's interpretation upon them; confessing ourselves among the "stupid readers":—

All this time the Bishop of Lombes still continued at Rome; and, from time to time, solicited his friend Petrarch to join him. "Petrarch would have gladly joined him," says De Sade; "but he was detained at Avignon by his attachment to John Colonna and his love of Laura," a whimsical junction of detaining causes, in which the fascination of the cardinal may easily be supposed to have been weaker than that of Laura. In writing to our poet, at Avignon, the bishop rallied Petrarch on the imaginary existence of the object of his passion. Some stupid readers of the bishop's letter, in subsequent times, took it into their heads that there was a literal proof in the prelate's jesting epistle of our poet's passion for Laura being a phantom and a fiction. But, possible as it may be, that the bishop in reality suspected him to exaggerate the flame of his devotion for the two great objects of his idolatry, Laura and St. Augustine, he writes, in a vein of pleasantry that need not be taken for grave accusation. "You are befooling us all," says the prelate, "my dear Petrarch; and it is wonderful that at so tender an age (Petrarch's tender age was at this time 31) you can deceive the world with so much art and success. And, not content with deceiving the world, you would fain deceive Heaven itself. You make a semblance of loving St. Augustine and his works; but in your heart, you love the poets and the philosophers. Your Laura is a phantom created by your imagination for the exercise of your poetry. Your verse, your love, your sighs, are all a fiction; or, if there is anything real in your passion it is not for the Lady Laura, but for the laurel—that is, the crown of poets. I have been your dupe for some time, and, whilst you showed a strong desire to visit Rome, I hoped to welcome you there. But, my eyes are now opened to all your rogueries, which nevertheless, will not prevent me from loving you."

Petrarch, in his answer to the bishop, says, "My father, if I love the poets, I only follow, in this respect, the example of St. Augustine. I take the minted father himself to witness the sincerity of my attachment to him. He is now in a place where he can neither deceive nor be deceived. I flatter myself that he pities my errors, especially when he recalls his own." St. Augustine had been somewhat profligate in his younger days.

"As to Laura," continues the poet, "would to Heaven that she were only an imaginary personage, and my passion for her only a pastime! Alas! it is a madness which it would be difficult and painful to feign for any length of time; and what an extravagance it would be to affect such a passion! One may counterfeit illness by action, by voice, and by manner, but no one in health can give himself the true air and complexion of disease. How often have you yourself been witness of my paleness and my sufferings! I know very well that you speak only in irony: it is your favourite figure of speech, but I hope that time will cicatrize these wounds of my spirit, and that Augustine, whom I pretend to love, will furnish me with a defence against a Laura who does not exist."

We question if the Bishop was convinced. Several years elapsed, and the still despairing lover contemplated another course of travel, to allay the pangs of unrequited love. Mr. Campbell gravely writes—and such passages are the more remarkable, as exceptions to his general strain—

But, before he could wind up his resolution to depart, the state of his mind bordered on distraction. One day he observed a country girl washing the veil of Laura: a sudden trembling seized him—and, though the heat of the weather was intense, he grew cold and shivered. For some time he was incapable of applying to study or business. His soul, he said, was like a field of battle, where his passion and reason held continual conflict. In his calmer moments, many agreeable motives for travelling suggested themselves to his mind.

We again declare for the Don as the truer lover. Had the veil been merely the smock or frowsy under-petticoat of the Dulcinea, the unpoetical garment would have made no change in his knightly adoration, though it might have shocked his delicacy. Who will say as much for Petrarch?

But is there one of our readers who haply knows little or nothing about the personal history of this immortal lover of whom we are speaking? Let us tell, in few words, that he was the son of a notary of Florence, who, during the conflicts between the Guelphs and Ghibellines, had been obliged to fly from his native city, when fortune proved adverse to his party. His wife accompanied him; and their oldest son, Petrarch, was soon afterwards born at Arezzo, an ancient city of Tuscany, on the 20th July, 1303. After skulking for several years in Italy, subsequently to the total overthrow of his party, the father of Petrarch, who was criminally accused on private as well as on political grounds, went with his family to Avignon, then the seat of the papal court. His celebrated son was now about twelve or thirteen years of age, and considerably advanced in his education. He studied for law at the University of Montpellier; but he had already imbibed a strong taste for classical learning. He was afterwards sent to Bologna to prosecute the study of law, to which he discovered so great an aversion, that his father reluctantly gave up the point. He shortly afterwards lost both his parents, and returned from Bologna to Avignon with his only brother, to collect the remains of their father's property. Their patrimony was small; and whatever might have been their secret inclinations, they were obliged, by their circumstances, to enter the Church. Avignon, the seat of the papal court, was then the headquarters of church preferment. The younger brother, distinguished by nothing save his relationship to the poet, after leading a lax life for some years, died a monk. Petrarch, now in the heyday of his youth, is thus gracefully presented to the reader:—

Petrarch was twenty-two years of age when he settled at Avignon, a scene of licentiousness and profligacy. The luxury of the cardinals, and the pomp and riches of the papal court, were displayed in an extravagant profusion of feasts and ceremonies, which attracted to Avignon women of all ranks, among whom intrigue and gallantry were generally countenanced.

From his own confession, Petrarch seems to have been somewhat vain of his personal appearance during his youth, a venial foible, from which neither the handsome nor the homely, nor the wise nor the foolish, are exempt.

Petrarch, when young, was so strikingly handsome, that he was frequently pointed at and admired as he passed along, for his features were manly, well-formed, and expressive, and his carriage was graceful and distinguished. He was sprightly in conversation, and his voice was uncommonly musical. His complexion was between brown and fair, and his eyes were bright and animated. His countenance was a faithful index of his heart.

He endeavoured to temper the warmth of his constitution by the regularity of his living and the plainness of his diet. He indulged little in either wine or sleep, and fed chiefly on fruits and vegetables.

In his early days he was nice and neat in his dress, even to a degree of affectation, which, in later life, he ridiculed when writing to his brother Gherardo. "Do you remember," he says, "how much care we employed in the lure of dressing our persons; when we traversed the streets, with what attention did we not avoid every breath of wind which might discompose our hair; and with what caution did we not prevent the least speck of dirt from soiling our garments!"

This vanity, however, lasted only during his youthful days. And even then neither attention to his personal appearance, nor his attachment to the fair sex, nor his attendance upon the great, could induce Petrarch to neglect his own mental improvement, for, amidst all these occupations, he found leisure for application; and, as he had no longer to contend with the absolute commands of a father, he gave up the law, and devoted himself entirely to the cultivation of his favourite pursuits of literature.

Being now his own master, he applied himself afresh to the reading of the classics, because a suspended pleasure increases our desire to return to it.

He loved letters and studied Cicero and Seneca; "he learned from Virgil elegance and dignity of versification; but he had still greater advantages from the perusal of Livy;"—advantages which young men may still enjoy if they please—since they were teaching him to think the men of his own age "light and contemptible" in comparison with the old Romans. His first poetical compositions were written in Latin; but it is as an Italian poet, and among the first of the first, that Petrarch is illustrious. At the age of twenty-three, he fell in love with Laura, a lady of good family, born at Avignon, and the wife of Hugh de Sade, of that same city. Of this lady so little is known, save through the sonnets addressed to her by Petrarch, that she has even been supposed an allegorical, or altogether an ideal being, like the heroine of so many love poems and romances. Mr. Campbell justly scouts this absurdity.

No one at all acquainted with the life and writings of Petrarch will need to be told that this is an absurd fiction. Laura, a married woman, who bore ten children to a rather morose husband, could not have gone to meet him at Vaucluse without the most flagrant scandal. It is evident from his writings that she repudiated his passion whenever it threatened to exceed the limits of virtuous friendship. On one occasion, when he seemed to presume too far upon her favour, she said to him with severity, "I am not what you take me for." If his love had been successful he would have said less about it.

Of the two persons in this love affair, I am more inclined to pity Laura than Petrarch. Independently of her personal charms, I cannot conceive Laura otherwise than as a kind-hearted, loveable woman, who could not well be supposed to be totally indifferent to the devotion of the most famous and fascinating man of his age.

The passion of Petrarch did not interrupt his studies. He wrote and travelled, and lived much like other people. We left him on the eve of a journey to Rome,—a great event, in those days, in the life of an Italian, a poet, and a worshipper of the ancients. He fondly examined the antiquities of what was still regarded as the capital of the world—the capital of the Christian world—of learning, and of the arts. After a rambling journey in Italy and its dependencies, he approached Gibraltar; and, before his return to Avignon, sailed as far northwards as the shores of Britain. This we mention to introduce this characteristic passage:—

Petrarch approached the British shores; why were they not fated to have the honour of receiving him! Ah! but who was there, then, in England that was capable of receiving him! Chaucer was but a child. We had the names of some learned men, but our language had no literature; and, in Petrarch's eyes, the English were barbarians, who had lately been beaten by the "title

Scotch," as he called my countrymen. Time works wonders in a few centuries; and England, now proud of her Shakspeare and her Verulam, looks not with envy on the glory of any earthly nation. During his excitement by these travels, a singular change took place in our poet's habitual feelings. He recovered his health and spirits; he could bear to think of Laura with equanimity, and his countenance resumed the cheerfulness that was natural to a man in the strength of his age. Nay, he became so sanguine in his belief that he had overcome his passion as to jest at his past sufferings; and, in this gay state of mind, he came back to Avignon. This was the crowning misfortune of his life. He saw Laura once more; he was enthralled anew; and he might now laugh in agony at his late self-congratulations on his delivery from her enchantment. With all the pity that we bestow on unfortunate love, and with all the respect that we owe to its constancy, still we cannot look but with a regret amounting to impatience on a man returning to the spot that was to rekindle his passion as recklessly as a moth to the candle, and binding himself over for life to an affection that was worse than hopeless, inasmuch as its success would bring more misery than its failure.

Having thus rebuked Petrarch for consigning

The noon of manhood to the myrtle shade,

Mr. Campbell proceeds:—

It is said that Petrarch, if it had not been for this passion, would not have been the poet that he was. Not, perhaps, so good an amatory poet; but I firmly believe that he would have been a more various and masculine, and, upon the whole, a greater poet, if he had never been bewitched by Laura. However, he did return to take possession of his canonicate, at Lombes, and to lose possession of his peace of mind.

From this one might fancy that the one poet imagined the illusion under which the other delighted to live, a real, intense, and constant passion—of which, at other times, he insinuates strong and very natural doubts; as when, in the page immediately following, he says—

A more important event in his life took place during the following year, 1337—namely, that he had a son born to him, whom he christened by the name of John, and to whom he acknowledged his relationship of paternity. With all his philosophy and platonic raptures about Laura, Petrarch was still subject to the passions of ordinary men, and had a mistress at Avignon who was kinder to him than Laura. Her name and history have been consigned to inscrutable obscurity: the same woman afterwards bore him a daughter, whose name was Francesca, and who proved a great solace to him in his old age.

And then our author moots some points which we leave to greater casuists in the Court of Love; though we must approve his generous animadversion on the poet's supposed conduct to his mistress, not according to the Muses, but to suffering, degraded, wronged womanhood.

Who knows what sacrifice of reputation this unknown frail one, who made him twice a father, may have incurred by her connexion with him! There is a heartlessness on the part of Petrarch, in consigning her very name to oblivion, which I dislike worse than all the conceits of his poetry. It may be alleged that he was ashamed of his illegitimate paternity; but, on the same principle, he ought to have been equally averse to publishing his distraction for a woman who was already the mother of an increasing family—

Namely, Madame de Sade, with whom, if we may believe his "well-sung woes," Petrarch was more in love than ever.

It was about this time that the poet settled at Vaucluse, where, in close retirement, he applied himself more earnestly than ever to poetry and the cultivation of literature. He also maintained a correspondence with many of the leading persons of the age; with the temporal and spiritual princes of Italy, and with men of learning. And Italy was in his eyes all the world; though France was becoming something. The Britons were rude barbarians, whose conquests in France caused profound astonishment; and he was filled with wonder that one beloved friend, a man of learning, who repaired to Avignon, and whom he named his Socrates, should be a native of some barbarian village on the left bank of the Rhine, between Brabant and Holland. "Petrarch, with his Italian prejudices, regarded him as a barbarian by birth; but he was so fascinated by his serene temper and strong judgment, that he singled him out to be the chief of all his friends, and gave him the name of Socrates, noticing him as an example, that Nature can produce geniuses in the most unpropitious regions." This friend was, like himself, a member of the household of the Bishop of Lombes, the author of the letter we have quoted, who liked to encourage young men of ability, and to keep them near him. Under the roof of Cardinal Colonna, the brother of the Bishop, Petrarch had frequent opportunities of meeting the most celebrated persons of the time, who came to Avignon either on business at the papal court, from curiosity, or to pay their court. While under the immediate patronage of the Colonnas, Petrarch made a journey to Paris, and visited Flanders. How curious it is to read, after the lapse of five hundred years, the account of his travels which he gives to the Cardinal, and to see how very much the Paris and Parisians of the fourteenth century resemble those of the nineteenth.

Paris, though always inferior to its fame, and much indebted to the lies of its own people, is undoubtedly a great city. To be sure, I never saw a dirtier place, except Avignon. At the same time, its population contains the most learned of men, and it is like a great basket in which are collected the rarest fruits of every country. From the time that its university was founded, as they say, by Alcuin, the teacher of Charlemagne, there has not been, to my knowledge, a single Parisian of any fame. The great luminaries of the university were all strangers; and, if the love of my country does not deceive me, they were chiefly Italians, such as Pietro Lombardo, Tomaso d'Aquino, Bonaventura, and many others.

The character of the Parisians is very singular. There was a time when, from the ferocity of their manners, the French were reckoned barbarians. At present the case is wholly changed. A gay disposition, love of society, ease, and playfulness in conversation now characterize them. They seek every opportunity of distinguishing themselves; and make war against all cares with joking, laughing, singing, eating, and drinking. Prone, however, as they are to pleasure, they are not heroic in adversity. The French love their country and their countrymen; they censure with rigour the faults of other nations, but spread a proportionably thick veil over their own defects.

Mr. Campbell has exhibited the character of his hero in a new and rather unexpected light; in that of a reformer, which he certainly was as truly, though neither so boldly nor directly, as was Luther after him. In the age of Petrarch, a scholar might with impunity attack the corruptions of the Church, and the scandalous lives of the ecclesiastics,—and the latter Petrarch did not spare. It was quite another thing, when the invention of printing, and the silent progress of the reformed doctrines, had made such attacks imminently hazardous.

A brilliant description of the pestilence which, in the middle of the fourteenth century, desolated Europe, precedes the account of the death of Laura, who fell a victim to the dreadful malady. Petrarch was then in Italy. He was informed of her death, and probably of many other deaths, by his friend Socrates; and he wrote sundry sonnets, and paid a more formal respect to her memory, by noting his "great loss" on the margin of his copy of Virgil. The authenticity of this note has been questioned, but Mr. Campbell thinks the evidence is in favour of its genuineness.

Were there any new or remarkable facts elicited in the work respecting Petrarch, we should feel inclined, in our extracts, to prefer the adventures of the hero to the remarks of the author of the book, however excellent. But there are none; and instead of any of the brilliant episodes to which we have referred, such as the sketch of Boccaccio, and of the Plague, we shall give the summary of Petrarch's character. It is eulogistic, but not fulsome nor insincere. If rightly inclining to the side of indulgence, it is impartial and it is acute.

PERSONAL CHARACTER OF PETRARCH.

It seems an invidious task of the biographer that he has no sooner committed his hero to the grave than he must discuss his character with impartiality, which is a virtue not easily practicable, when our subject has been an amiable as well as a great man. But those who leave their memories to posterity, may reckon on paying this tax of posthumous scrutiny with as much certainty as of bequeathing dues to the priest and sexton for their Christian burial.

Petrarch will stand this ordeal, perhaps, as well as any man of genius, and better than the most of them. His character, taken all in all, was loveable, and exempt from low and disgusting foibles. There was no craft in his disposition, no malignity that was mean or bitter. It is true, he was angry with the abuses of the church and the scandalous lives of ecclesiastics; and De Sade and other Catholic writers accuse him of carrying his indignation beyond the bounds of justice: but I think it needs no Protestant prejudices to make us believe from catholic history itself that the court of Avignon was corrupt, and that her cardinals were, for the most part, profligate. His anger, therefore, admits of excuse.

He was attached to the most powerful men in the leading commonwealths of Italy, and they were mutually attached to him. He thereby increased his influence in society, and his power of being useful to others. For this he has been charged with sycophancy; and the historians of the Italian republics even say that he was "always a Troubadour." If by that designation is meant a vagrant parasite of the rich and powerful, seeking for lucre and love-adventures in every change of place, I differ entirely from Sismondi's moral estimate of our poet. Petrarch was not permanent in his habitation. But his heart was not migratory, either in its love or friendship. In the former affection he was but too constant for his own happiness. In the latter, it must be recollected that his friendships lay not exclusively among the rich and the powerful; on the contrary, his Socrates, his Lælius, his Simonides, and his Boccaccio, were men as poor as himself. Burns's words will apply to him that "well he knew the social glow, and softer flame." He duly felt the value of friendship as a heaven-sent manna in the wilderness of life; and he was never even partially alienated from friends, unless, as in the case of the Colonna, at the more sacred call of public principle. He knew that ancient, broken attachments are a more melancholy spectacle than desolated palaces. They exhibit the heart once lighted up with joy all damped and deserted, and haunted by thoughts that, like birds of ill-omen, nestle only in ruins.

In judging of a human character, we must take a broad and collective view of its physiognomy, and not decide by minute differences from its general expression. The truly great portrait-painter studies, first of all, the predominant physiognomical expression of the face he paints, and does not depend for collective effect on that microscopic elaboration of minute traits, which always leads to exaggeration. Petrarch's moral physiognomy, in the main, was generous and independent. It is unfair, by dwelling on partial exceptions, to convert them into general characteristics. He was not a sycophant to kings and emperors. He spoke out his mind distinctly to them; and they put up with freedoms from him which they would not have endured from one another. Nevertheless, as he owns to us himself, he agreed too easily to live at the court of John Visconti, the would-be tyrant of Italy. John Visconti was a great man, not certainly equal to Napoleon in genius, but still the greatest of his times. Judging by myself, who am no idolater of Buonaparte, I would ask who among us would have grudged a long day's journey during his life to have seen him? nay, who, on a pressing invitation, would not have stopped some days to share his conversation? Yet we are all pretty well agreed that Napoleon had the fault of caring little for human life when it interfered with his ambition. John Visconti had his virtues, as well as the mighty Corsican. He was the Buonaparte of the fourteenth century, and fascinated Petrarch.

I have said that our poet's personal character had a general and redeeming virtue of benevolence. It is too much an error of biographers who wish to be perfectly candid in their estimate of a man to draw up, as it were, a balance-sheet of his good qualities and defects, placing them like so many pounds sterling in a debtor and creditor account, as if the same qualities in every one man had a positive and equal value with the same qualities in every other man, without relation to the rest of their character. But, in point of fact, the faults and virtues of humanity are not the same in different individuals, but become different according to their mixture and combination. The compassion of a fool may be as essentially compassion as that of a wise man; but it is not the same virtue when compounded with folly, as when it meets and mixes with wisdom. There is a moral chemistry in the combining materials of our spiritual nature which is not to be judged of mechanically, according to the disunited qualities of those materials. The tertium quid produced by mixture varies according to its adverse ingredients. An idiot may be brave, but the intelligent alone can be heroic. In like manner, the self-complacency of a kind-hearted man, how unlike it is in the result of his total character to the vanity of a malignant egotist!

Self-complacency, I conceive, may be set down without uncharitableness, as the chief foible of Petrarch. I cannot concede to his unqualified admirers either that he was free from this defect, or, with all his greatness and gentleness, that the defect became him. I may be asked to quote distinct proofs of this foible from his writings, and such proofs are certainly to be found; but they lie scattered over many passages, and impress us rather collectively, from the full perusal of his life, than from single instances. If I were merely to quote, therefore, a few of those egotistical passages, I might be lenient towards Petrarch, but should not do justice to my own opinion, which has been formed by consecutive impressions from his writings, minute in themselves, but numerous and strong from their constant recurrence. It is a mistake to suppose that self-complacency can sit with grace on any man, let him be great or small; there is a dignity in the self-forgetfulness of genius, far beyond any charm in its most vivid consciousness.

But Petrarch's self-complacency was unmixed with gall or envy; and, when blended with the kindly elements of his nature, it lost all the offensiveness that it would have had in a waspish character. I do not believe the surmise that he envied Dante's fame.

In summing up Petrarch's character, moral, political, and poetical, I should not stint myself to the equivocal phrase used by Tacitus respecting Agricola: Bonum Virum facile dixeris, magnum lubenter, but should at once claim for his memory the title both of great and good. A restorer of ancient learning, a rescuer of its treasures from oblivion, a despoiler of many contemporary superstitions, a man, who, though no reformer himself, certainly contributed to the reformation, (if Luther himself were to rise from the dead, and deny my latter position, I would not believe him,) an Italian patriot who was above provincial partialities, a poet who still lives in the hearts of his country, and who is shielded from oblivion by more generations than there were hides in the seven-fold shield of Ajax—if this was not a great man, many who are so called must bear the title unworthily.

Our concluding specimen shall be the criticism on Petrarch's sonnets. We were tempted by other matters, but leave them to the reader of a work, which soon or late must command attention as The Life of Petrarch. Of that illustrious person we may say, that he survived Laura for twenty-six years; and that while her wedded lord, in seven months after her death, consoled himself with another partner, the poet-lover solaced his sorrow with composing occasional sonnets to her memory—or to his own glory.

CRITICISM ON PETRARCH'S SONNETS.

I despair of ever seeing in English verse a translation of Petrarch's Italian poetry that shall be adequate and popular. The term adequate, of course, always applies to the translation of genuine poetry in a subdued sense. It means the best that can be expected, after making allowance for that escape of ethereal spirit which is inevitable in the transfer of poetic thoughts from one language to another. The word popular is also to be taken in a limited meaning regarding all translations. Cowper's ballad of John Gilpin is twenty times more popular than his Homer; yet the latter work is deservedly popular in comparison with the bulk of translations from antiquity. The same thing may be said of Carey's Dante; it is like Cowper's Homer, as adequate and popular as translated poetry can be expected to be. Yet I doubt if either of those poets could have succeeded so well with Petrarch. Lady Dacre has shown much grace and ingenuity in the passages of our poet, which she has versified; but she could not transfer into English those graces of Petrarchan diction, which are mostly intranslatable. She could not bring the Italian language along with her.

Is not this, it may be asked, a proof that Petrarch is not so genuine a poet as Homer and Dante, since his charm depends upon the delicacies of diction that evaporate in the transfer from tongue to tongue, more than on hardy thoughts that will take root in any language to which they are transplanted? In a general view, I agree with this proposition; yet, what we call felicitous diction can never have a potent charm without refined thoughts, which, like essential odours, may be too impalpable to bear transfusion. Burns has the happiest imaginable Scottish diction; yet, what true Scotsman would bear to see him done into French? And, with the exception of German, what language has done justice to Shakespeare?

The reader must be a true Petrarchist who is unconscious of a general similarity in the character of his sonnets, which, in the long perusal of them, amounts to monotony. At the same time, it must be said that this monotonous similarity impresses the mind of Petrarch's reader exactly in proportion to the slenderness of his acquaintance with the poet. Does he approach Petrarch's sonnets for the first time, they will probably appear to him all as like to each other as the sheep of a flock; but, when he becomes more familiar with them, he will perceive an interesting individuality in every sonnet, and will discriminate their individual character as precisely as the shepherd can distinguish every single sheep of his flock by its voice and face.

Mrs. Ellis's Summer and Winter in the Pyrenees.

Author of "The Women of England," &c.

1 vol., cloth. Fisher & Son.

THE health of Mr. Ellis required change of climate, and the south of France was fixed upon as the most eligible residence. He went there accompanied by Mrs. Ellis, who has given an account of their journey, adventures, and experiences, which forms an agreeable book, and one that will be useful to those who follow the same route.

They travelled from Paris to Bordeaux by the diligence, in the end of December, 1839, (as we presume,) and went from that fine city to the favourite English winter station of Pau, where they settled until the approach of summer invited them onward into the mountains. They went abroad, fortunately or unfortunately, without any of the preparation of books for the scenes and objects they were to behold; so that every impression from external objects came fresh and original to their minds. Of the town itself, the fine surrounding scenery and the many objects which strike the eye of an intelligent stranger, Mrs. Ellis gives vivid and elaborate descriptions. But interiors are as much her forte; and all her grievances lie within doors. Filth, or, if not quite what should be so considered, then slovenliness and disorder, met her eyes and shocked her English habits on every hand. In Pau, which she had imagined a paltry insignificant place, and found a handsome town, the houses, as in other towns of France, and in those of Scotland, a custom probably derived to us from our ancient ally, are often divided into flats; but no home experience of Scottish common stairs prepares us for this extremity:—

In many instances I should certainly have supposed that the entrance to a respectable house would lead to a place for horses or cattle; and the stairs, too, being also never washed, and common to all the families who live on the different stages or flats, are often dirty and disgusting in the extreme. Yet no sooner is the door of a salon or bed-room thrown open, than you see the walls adorned with beautiful paper, handsome slabs and fire-places of marble, elegant time-pieces and other fancy ornaments, with looking-glasses in gilt frames, in great variety and number. In addition to which, the window curtains are almost invariably arranged with taste; and over the beds, which are covered with silk, or curiously knitted counterpanes, hang rich canopies, chiefly of crimson, composed of festoons and fringes, as handsome as they are often inappropriate.

It is then, without carpets, and without comforts of a thousand kinds, that English people are content to live abroad; and I am inclined to think that this is the grand secret of being able to live at less expense in France than in our native country,—because we are satisfied to do without a vast number of things which we imagine to be essential to respectability at home. And perhaps we are sufficiently repaid for our self-denial, where the climate is like that of the south of France.

For the want of cleanliness, and the general discomfort in the appearance of the houses, I had been in a great measure prepared; but I confess there was one privation which it baffled my philosophy to sustain, and that was the want of tea; I therefore made it a great point in settling in our new abode, to lay in a large stock of this precious article, and with the satisfaction of a true Englishwoman, I ordered it to be brought up, on the first evening of our arrival at our lodgings. What then was my surprise, to find there was no such thing as a kettle in the house, that there never had been, and that neither the wants nor the wishes of a French family included this important and familiar accompaniment to an English fire-side!

Nor was this all. Water may certainly be boiled without a kettle, but it is said there is not a servant in all France who understands the virtue of boiling water.

When to these calamities of French life are added sour bread, and the impossibility of finding tea worthy of the name, at any place nearer than Toulouse, English misery touches the climax. There is, indeed, among other good things, good green tea to be had at Pau, which we cannot help thinking a substitute for black not to be despised.

The season at Pau lasts from September till April or May, when the heat becomes trying to English people. Lodgings, of course, vary in price as at other places, being dearest at the beginning of the season. They seem much about the rate of small English towns.

Good accommodations for a family of four or five persons may be found at the rate of one hundred or one hundred and twenty francs per month. For handsome furniture, elegant salons, carpets, and first-rate situation, it will be necessary to pay four times that sum.

It does not appear to be the custom with French families residing here, ever to take individuals to share at the same table, or in other words to board with them; nor indeed would such a plan be very congenial to English habits. It is consequently necessary to hire your own servants, and these may be had at the following rate:—A good cook at from twenty to twenty-five francs per month; a femme de chambre at from ten to fifteen. Of the former it is said that they are all cheats. I am unable to add my testimony to this sweeping statement, having found much kindness, and a fair average of honesty, amongst the French servants. Still it is customary, and therefore desirable, to keep such things as sugar and coffee out of their reach, and to endeavour to ascertain the actual price of what the cook may purchase, lest she should appropriate a certain commission on each article herself. As regards the direct taking of money, or indeed of anything of importance, there is certainly as little need for suspicion here as in England.

In case of the family circumstances of the visiter rendering the trouble of a cook undesirable, it is easy to adopt the alternative of having dinners sent from any of the hôtels, or the restaurateurs, from whence they can be had according to order, at any time, of any quality, and consisting of any number of dishes you may desire. The following is the rate at which tables are usually supplied:—For six persons in the salon, and two or three in the kitchen, at six francs per day, without wine or dessert. We were supplied at one time for three francs per day, and much better afterwards for two and a half, with one dish of meat, one of excellent vegetables, and one of pudding, or some other kind of sweet dish. Our best provision was from Tourné.

The provision of a table for French servants need make no part of the stranger's calculation. Let them have their bread, which is one of the cheapest articles of consumption, or a certain allowance for buying it, the wine of the country, which may be had at four sous per bottle, their vegetables, and lard, and they will be much happier than if fed from your own table. They are so obliging, too, that if any physical or moral power could operate so as to make them clean, they would deserve to rank high amongst this class of their fellow-creatures.

Perhaps it will convey the most correct idea of the state of things in the sort of menage I have described, to say that in the items included in fitting up a kitchen, no kind of pail finds a place, no dust cloth, and no apparatus by which the floors can possibly be washed; and when we add to this, that the servants are in the habit of pouring out all spare slops, wherever they may be, either in the kitchen, on the stairs, or even in the salon, the state of the floors, especially that of the kitchen, may more easily be imagined than described. In the case of any particular overthrow, they take a long brush with which they are provided, and just sweep together dust, ashes, and water, leaving the floor to dry how and when it can. Instead of being annoyed by any of these disasters, a smile, and a shrug, and a remark that it is of no consequence, is the only indication you perceive of their regarding it.

As a proof of their comfortable indifference to what we regard as points of propriety, a friend of ours told us that his servant, finding one night she had left a candle burning at the bottom of the stairs, very coolly took the kettle, and from a height of some hundred steps, poured the water down to extinguish it, altogether regardless of the ascent of other lodgers at the same time.

In addition to all this, the stranger in the south of France must be prepared for a degree of familiarity in the manners of the servants, at first rather startling to our English reserve. I ought scarcely to call it familiarity either, for on no occasion, by look, word, or act, do they betray the least desire to place themselves on a level with those they serve. There is a line of demarcation between these two grades in society, which they may be safely trusted never to pass; and if they come often into your room when they think you are lonely, and take every opportunity to chat with you, and tell you the news, it is purely with a good-natured desire to keep you from dulness, as well as from the natural impulses of their own vivacity, which irresistibly impels them to talk. In other respects they seldom annoy. Their wants are so few, their accustomed indulgences so limited, that they never come to you with complaints that they cannot do one thing, or put up with another; and while the language and gesture of vehement passion is not unfrequent amongst themselves, I have never heard of a word, or even tone of rudeness being used towards their employers.

Mrs. Ellis admires the good looks of the poorer classes of the Bearnaise, and their neat or pretty costume, and especially the coloured handkerchief, tastefully arranged, which forms the usual female head-dress.

The eye is never shocked here, as in England, by the slovenly cap, the shabby bonnet, or the mock finery which too frequently disfigures this class of women in our native land. Whether the Bearnaise women are engaged in house or field labour, their dresses are always appropriate, and their colours, which are much more striking and brilliant than ours, almost invariably well chosen.

Of these colours, the most tasteful are generally displayed in the handkerchief, which forms the head-dress. It is of a manufacture peculiar to the country, which neither fades nor crumples. The middle is usually of a drab, fawn, or brown colour, with a broad border suited to it. It is adjusted so as to give a Grecian contour to the head and face; and I suspect, notwithstanding its appearance of artless simplicity, that there are degrees of coquetry by which it is arranged, so as best to suit the countenance of the wearer. Beneath this handkerchief we see soft bands of dark hair carefully parted on the forehead, and placed against the cheek, so as to contrast in the best manner, with a complexion at once glowing and delicate, healthy and pure. Add to this, the neatest little collar round the neck, the universal shawl pin—down in front, over which the hands in curiously coloured mittens are closely folded, and you see ninety-nine out of a hundred of the young women in this part of France.

The peasant women, besides the handkerchief above described, wear generally, when out of doors, a kind of hood, called a capulet. It is made of white or scarlet cloth, of the finest texture, often bordered with black velvet, and has an extremely picturesque and striking appearance, whether hanging loosely from the head to the shoulders, over which it extends, or folded thick and flat on the head, as we often see it in Italian pictures.

Provisions, save bread and meat, are not relatively very cheap in Pau. The excellent Bayonne hams, admired over the world, sell at a franc a pound; butter is the same price; milk, three sous for a half pint; a turkey may be bought for three francs; a couple of ducks the same; chickens at thirty-three sous; vegetables cheap and good. The prices of poultry, thus given, are not so cheap as may be imagined, when the size of the fowls are compared with those of this country. Beef and mutton, never high-fed, are sold at eighteen sous per pound, but the pound contains thirty-six ounces. The meat is much inferior to that brought to our markets, and beef is seldom to be got at any price in the Pyrenees. If the pound of butter and of bacon is also thirty-six ounces, which is not mentioned, this makes an immense difference in the price. Fuel is relatively dear, though not nearly so expensive as in many other French towns.

The state of religion naturally engaged the attention of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis. At Bordeaux, and other places, Mr. Ellis preached to Protestant congregations. We, however, find nothing so interesting in the notices of his religious intercourse, as the subjoined account of the Protestant pastor of the small town of Nay, which is distant about ten miles from Pau. He had originally been destined for a Catholic priest; but he and some of his friends became Protestants; and he also married,—a step in an ecclesiastic which revolts every prejudice of the Catholic devotee more powerfully than deep crimes.

When he wished to hire a house for his family, not a single proprietor of the place would allow him one to live in. He was, therefore, under the necessity of purchasing such a habitation as his means were equal to; and though it is an old place, with only one little chimney, and no glass window, it had, on the day we saw it, an aspect of neatness and comfort far beyond that of many nobler mansions.

In his office of Protestant minister, he now receives annually from his little congregation, a sum not exceeding £28, on which his family, consisting of a wife and eight children, are supported. We had the privilege of seeing this worthy woman, surrounded by her little flock; and truly their contented cheerfulness, and their uncomplaining resignation, are well calculated to teach a lesson long to be remembered. The mother and the oldest daughter, a sweet-looking girl of fifteen, and in this country a little woman, both wore the common head-dress of the country, and were in all respects dressed with the most unpretending simplicity. By way of adding to their slender means, they employ themselves in many humble occupations, the mother often going out to wash and iron. Would that some of the discontented wives and daughters of other lands could have been with me, and have seen their smiling faces, their humble dress, their uncarpeted floors, with the general aspect of order and neatness, which in this country is the more to be admired, from its extreme rarity.

As soon as the season permitted, the strangers made excursions to many of the more interesting points in the neighbourhood of Pau; and in summer they took longer journeys to some of the more celebrated watering-places, at which they remained for a short time, examining everything of interest in the neighbourhood. Luz, St. Sauveur, Barèges, and Bagnères de Bigorre, were visited in succession in the course of the season, and also many places of inferior note, that form the summer-resort of view-hunters, and tourists in search of the picturesque, or of a pleasant spot for a pic-nic. Through these scenes, we are agreeably led by an intelligent guide, whose pictures are fortunately never confined to still life.

During her residence in France, Mrs. Ellis lost all her admiration of the small farm system; and there was indeed little to recommend it where she saw it in operation. The highest praise, the greatest recommendation, which she has given to the country, is contained in the subjoined passage. If her testimony be confirmed by universal experience, we know not why all the languid, nervous, and vapourish women of Great Britain, should not set off for the south of France. We apprehend, however, that change of air and scene, early hours, and relaxation from anxious employments and mental harassment, do often produce the effects described even in our own foggy island.

I had been prepared to expect that the climate of the south of France would be relaxing to the bodily frame, and consequently depressing to the spirits. So far from this, however, I do not recollect once to have felt during my whole residence in the south, that causeless and indescribable dejection of mind which most of the inhabitants of our northern isle at times experience, and which no one is perhaps more intimately acquainted with than myself. I know not whether the malady is mental or physical, or both; but I believe that many of my country people will bear me out in the assertion, that one of the greatest drawbacks upon individual happiness, and one of the greatest hinderances to laudable exertion, which we experience in England, arises from a want of elasticity of spirit and animal vigour,—from a sort of sinking of the soul, if I may so express myself, which often makes the dawn of each successive morning appear like a renewal of hopeless conflict; every unexpected event a fresh hinderance to the course we have to pursue; and every necessary exertion an insupportable trial. It requires, I am well aware, a combination of many causes, before the disease attains this height. It is not my business now to enter into any farther remarks upon what these causes are, or may be. All I wish to state in relation to the subject is, that in the south of France this peculiar and apparently causeless depression is seldom known, except as the result of bodily disease. Nor do I speak merely from my own experience. I have the testimony of others to the same fact. The effect of real affliction is unquestionably the same in all climates; but in that of the south of France, supposing the mind to be free from the pressure of actual calamity, there is an effect produced by the clearness of the atmosphere, the brightness of the sunshine, and the elasticity of the air, which makes the mere animal sensation of being alive, of breathing, and moving, a perpetual enjoyment. All who read these pages, but especially the young, will be able to realize the kind of sensation experienced, in setting out on a pleasant journey, on a fine bright morning, in company with the friends they love best, leaving nothing behind them to regret, and fancying much before them to invite. Now something like this sensation seems to return with every morning, in the delightful climate I have endeavoured to describe—something which makes another day be welcomed as another blessing—something which makes the very air we breathe at once a refreshment and a balm; which sends the sunshine like light into the soul, and which opens all the springs of animal enjoyment to flow with fresh vigour through their natural channels of energy and feeling.

All this, I am aware, may be deemed somewhat fanciful by those whose feelings are not influenced, like my own, by impressions produced on the outward senses; yet one strong evidence that such is really the effect of this climate, I have often thought, might be found in the almost uniform cheerfulness of the native inhabitants of the country. What else, for instance, could enable the poor women to endure fatigue and labour as they do!

Who, for the perpetual enjoyment of such health and spirits, would not gladly surrender half the comforts of English homes, namely, carpets, tea-kettles; nay, perhaps for a time, beef and a Protestant clergyman. These last were what the sage Mayor of Bagneres remarked would attract more English to that pretty town than any other inducements, and give it a decided superiority with the English over every other in the Pyrenees.

Mrs. Ellis moralizes her book, by gravely warning her readers of the injurious tendency of travelling on the continent. She, of course, excepts those whose health requires a milder climate. If any shall condemn her for English prudery and narrow views, in the threatened danger to morals and religion, which she predicts, from intercourse with our continental neighbours, and from the breaking up of our domestic habits, they may be consoled by learning that her work furnishes the antidote, in showing that travel may be a healthful and improving exercise for both body and mind.

The Old Red Sandstone; or New Walks in an Old Field. By Hugh Miller.

The public ought to be grateful to every writer on science, who pens his lucubrations in a style which the ignorant or the imperfectly initiated may be able to master. This work is not a system of Geological science, nor anything approaching to this; but it is a pleasant discursive talk, on an interesting department of Geological science, which the writer has pursued with enthusiasm, and in which he has been an original discoverer. A winged fossil fish, discovered by Mr. Miller, has been, by M. Agassiz, named in his honour. One cannot help sympathizing in his transports when the stroke of his hammer first laid open to his view the preadamite creature.

There are none of the fossils of the Old Red Sandstone which less resemble anything that now exists than its Pterichthys. I fain wish I could communicate to the reader the feeling with which I contemplated my first-found specimen. It opened with a single blow of the hammer; and there, on a ground of light-coloured limestone, lay the effigy of a creature fashioned apparently out of jet, with a body covered with plates, two powerful-looking arms articulated at the shoulders, a head as entirely lost in the trunk as that of the ray or the sun-fish, and a long angular tail. My first-formed idea regarding it, was, that I had discovered a connecting link between the tortoise and the fish; the body much resembles that of a small turtle; and why, I asked, if one formation gives us sauroid fishes, may not another give us chelonian ones? or if in the Lias we find the body of the lizard mounted on the paddles of the whale, why not find in the Old Red Sandstone the body of the tortoise mounted in a somewhat similar manner! The idea originated in error; but as it was an error which not many naturalists could have corrected at the time, it may be deemed an excusable one, more especially by such of my readers as may have seen well-preserved specimens of the creature.

The dry and rigid devotees of science may object that there is too great, and, sometimes, too far-fetched, a display of literary and poetical illustration in this discourse; though this, we apprehend, will be found no fault whatever, but probably the reverse, with those who accompany the author in his walks and exploratory excursions. Not so, however, a learned term, when a simple one would better serve the end,—and this frequently occurs. Whatever tends to popularize, and thus to extend science, cannot be too much valued: and to this the work lays a just claim.—But is Mr. Miller perfectly orthodox? There is, we own, great room for doubt on this head; and, failing Messrs. Cunningham and Candlish, and the scouts they have appointed to be on the out-look for all manner of embryo or even fossil heresies, we must make him over to the jurisdiction of the most reverend the Dean of York. It certainly never would have entered any one's head that there could be imagined anything in this ingenious essay, unsound, or opposed to revealed religion, save for those coloured spectacles with which the public vision has lately been supplied by our spiritual guides, in both divisions of the empire.—It is not easy to find a detached specimen of the work which may convey an accurate idea of its whole bearings. The following passage might, a very few years since, have suggested a subject for the pencil of Cruikshank, or the pen and pencil of Hood or Peter Pindar. Now, if not an instance of “super-eminent genius,” it is at least a proof of the progress of Geological science, and of the enthusiasm of its votaries. The scene took place in Edinburgh, when M. Agassiz, attended by several Geologists, last season, examined a collection of the fossil fishes found at Balruddery:—

Mr Murchison, familiar with the older fossils, remarked the close resemblance of the seeming scales to those of the Scraphim of Forfarshire, but deferred the whole to the judgment of Agassiz; no one else hazarded a conjecture. Agassiz glanced over the collection. One specimen especially caught his attention,—an elegantly symmetrical one. It seemed a combination of the parallelogram and the crescent: there were pointed horns at each end; but the convex and concave lines of the opposite sides passed into almost parallel right lines toward the centre. His eye brightened as he contemplated it. “I will tell you,” he said, turning to the company,—“I will tell you what these are,—the remains of a huge lobster.” He arranged the specimens in the group before him with as much apparent ease as I have seen a young girl arranging the pieces of ivory or mother-of-pearl in an Indian puzzle. A few broken pieces completed the lozenge-shaped shield; two detached specimens placed on its opposite sides furnished the claws; two or three semi-rings with serrated edges composed the jointed body; the compound figure, which but a minute before had so strongly attracted his attention, furnished the terminal flap; and there lay the huge lobster before us, palpable to all. There is homage due to super-eminent genius, which nature spontaneously pays when there are no low feelings of envy or jealousy to interfere with her operations; and the reader may well believe that it was willingly rendered on this occasion to the genius of Agassiz.

Is it worth while to mention that the author of this discourse began his researches as a quarrier and stonemason? Who can have better or so good opportunities of studying Geology, as the miner and quarrier, who has received the ordinary advantages of elementary education, and whose mind is once fairly awakened, and on the right road? We chiefly mention the fact which the author brings prominently forward, to introduce an excellent extract, and which shows what may be the pursuits and pleasures of working-men.

The immense masses of diluvium which we had to clear away rendered the working of the quarry laborious and expensive, and all the party quitted it in a few days, to make trial of another that seemed to promise better. The one we left is situated, as I have said, on the southern shore of an inland bay—the bay of Cromarty; the one to which we removed has been opened in a lofty wall of cliffs that overhangs the northern shore of the Moray Firth. I soon found I was to be no loser by the change. Not the united labours of a thousand men for more than a thousand years could have furnished a better section of the geology of the district than this range of cliffs. It may be regarded as a sort of chance dissection of the earth's crust. We see in one place the primary rock, with its veins of granite and quartz—its dizzy precipices of gneiss, and its huge masses of hornblend; we find the secondary rock in another, with its beds of sandstone and shale—its spars, its clays, and its nodular limestones. We discover the still little-known but highly interesting fossils of the Old Red Sandstone in one deposition—we find the beautifully preserved shells and lignites of the Lias in another. There are the remains of two several creations at once before us. The shore too is heaped with rolled fragments of almost every variety of rock—basalts, ironstones, hyperstenes, porphyries, bituminous shales, and micaceous schists. In short, the young geologist, had he all Europe before him could hardly choose for himself a better field. I had, however, no one to tell me so at the time, for geology had not yet travelled so far north; and so, without guide or vocabulary, I had to grope my way as I best might, and find out all its wonders for myself. But so slow was the process, and so much was I a seeker in the dark, that the facts contained in these few sentences were the patient gatherings of years.

In the course of the first day's employment, I picked up a nodular mass of blue limestone, and laid it open by a stroke of the hammer. Wonderful to relate, it contained inside a beautifully-finished piece of sculpture,—one of the volutes apparently of an Ionic capital; and not the far-famed walnut of the fairy tale, had I broken the shell and found the little dog lying within, could have surprised me more. Was there another such curiosity in the whole world? I broke open a few other nodules of similar appearance,—for they lay pretty thickly on the shore,—and found that there might. In one of these there were what seemed to be scales of fishes, and the impressions of a few minute bivalves, prettily striated; in the centre of another there was actually a piece of decayed wood. Of all nature's riddles these seemed to me to be at once the most interesting and the most difficult to expound. I treasured them carefully up, and was told by one of the workmen to whom I showed them, that there was a part of the shore about two miles farther to the west, where curiously-shaped stones, somewhat like the heads of boarding-pikes were occasionally picked up; and that in his father's days the country people called them thunder-bolts, and deemed them of sovereign efficacy in curing bewitched cattle. Our employer, on quitting the quarry for the building on which we were to be engaged, gave all the workmen a half-holiday. I employed it in visiting the place where the thunder-bolts had fallen so thickly, and found it a richer scene of wonder than I could have fancied in even my dreams.

But here we must pause, though only at the portal of discoveries, teeming with wonder and delight to this "Robinson Crusoe" in science, left on his desolate island to explore his own way.

Your Life. By the author of "My Life." By an Ex-Dissenter.

This is the second volume of a series of works, the avowed object of which, as stated in the advertisement, is "to defend the Church of England; and to assist in defeating the efforts of her Papist, Dissenting, and Infidel opponents." This is enough to show the spirit and candour of the intention. It gives a sketch of the rise of Methodism, of the Jumpers or Shakers, and of the struggle to obtain the repeal of the Test Act,—and, generally, a history of dissent for the last century. The hero is a most apostolic vicar, who, among his many residences, we at one time find close upon the Scottish border, where he came to the same decision with the frugal Laird of Milnwood in "Old Mortality," namely, that "the Church Establishment most adapted to Scotland was, perhaps, the old Presbyterian Church, whilst Episcopacy was in every respect, the one most suited to old England." He found, moreover, "that the Church of Scotland has as violent enemies on the north of the Tweed as the Church of England had on the south: and that the former was accused by the Scottish Dissenters of being impure, of having no spiritual head," &c. &c. &c. "He found that the Dissenters in Scotland were as furious, worldly-minded, and bigoted as those of England." There is much more of the same kind, and worse; but this may suffice of a work which may flatter the prejudices, or inflame the bigotry of the Church party, but which can make no impression elsewhere; though it is far, indeed, from being wanting in literary ability.

Lives of Eminent Men of Aberdeen. By James Bruce. Aberdeen: pp. 420.

That may be a proud Scottish city which can furnish so long a catalogue of the "eminent" as the one before us; yet we are told by the author of the Lives, that the volume does not contain "the half he could have wished to place in it," though there are twenty-three biographies; beginning with Barbour, who is not claimed as a native, and ending with the late Principal Brown, who certainly was not born in the Honest Town, and who probably never saw it until he had reached middle life. This license considerably enlarges the verge of Aberdonian eminence, and also enriches the author's materials for fabricating a good book, on a plan that has in this country the merit of novelty; for although many have written histories of our cities, none have hitherto written the biographies of the eminent men of particular localities. In composing these Lives, the author, a well-read and ingenious man, with no apparent lack of self-confidence, has assumed the best possible principle, which is "Not the mere settling of disputed dates, and fixing of contested localities, nor even the clearing up of the family connexions of great men; but the exhibition, according to the writer's ability, of human nature in its various appearances—the exposure to the world of truth in all its loveliness; and virtue with all her charms." Where knowledge of dates, localities, and genealogists fail, which must necessarily be of frequent occurrence, the author favours us either with his own conjecture on the subject, or his opinion on some other, no matter what, or how remotely soever related to the matter on hand. And this is done in the lively undaunted style which renders many parts of the book, be it free criticism on modern writers, the non-intrusion question, Catholic emancipation, or the emendations of the women, rather stimulating reading.

Among the eminent Men there is one Woman, ELIZABETH BLACKWELL, whose claim to superior eminence rests upon having published a Herbal, with illustrations engraved and coloured by herself, to assist her husband in their mutual pecuniary difficulties. We would fain flatter ourselves, that this degree of virtue and talent may not be so rare among the sex, as Mr. Bruce seems to imagine. Beyond the fact, that Elizabeth secretly married and eloped with Blackwell, a medical student, to London, that they fell into poverty, and probably jointly projected and published the Herbal, nothing is known individually of the author of "this noble and marvellous monument of enthusiastic and untiring conjugal affection, and an interesting evidence of the elegant and truly womanly nature of her mind." The strictures on the innovating sex—the shrewd hits at the usurping and obtrusive Wolstoncrafts, and Shelleys, Martineaus, Jamesons, Edgeworths, and Baillies, the contracts of Mrs. Blackwell, strikes us as so original and edifying, that they may serve as an excellent specimen of the work. After likening Mrs. Blackwell to Lady Rachel Russel, and the "two or three other virtuous women,"—a very limited list—who have obtained celebrity without injury to the retiring virtues and graces which are the real and solid ornaments of the sex, he proceeds:—

It is gratifying to reflect that her amiable mind led her into a walk becoming a modest woman. She occupied herself in ——— Gathering flowers,

Herself a fairer flower.

She did not, like some female writers, cry out against the manners of the age, and bewail the sins of her neighbours, and weep for the decline of vital religion, which an acute writer, whom we cannot name at present, says very truly is one of the purest luxuries that self-righteous persons can indulge in, as it furnishes them with a world of internal satisfaction with themselves. Neither did she go away, like some other women, and write novels and romances, in which not only the grossest ignorance of human life and of human nature is displayed, but the greatest laxity of moral principle is manifested; for women really know, and ought to know, but little about human life; and their moral theories, even when their practice is tolerably fair, are in general rather perverse. Neither did she compose sonnets and other pieces, like the things which we see in those handsomely bound little volumes with gilt edges and full of plates, which come out about the Christmas season, and in which are found collected the best effusions, in prose and verse, of those ladies and gentlemen who form the obfuscations of the literary world—the whole very appropriately illustrated by pictures of women, made by people who call themselves artists; and who, if a judgment might be formed from their drawings and engravings, might be supposed never in their lives to have seen women but in pictures. We have no doubt that Mrs. Blackwell knew that a woman must prudently consider what she is about before she come before the public, and particularly before she become the author of a book. Almost all women who have become celebrated for their talents, have done so at some expense of what ought to be "the immediate jewel of their souls," their fair reputation. From "burning Sappho" down to "the eloquent De Stael" scandal has been very busy with their characters. This may be uncharitable, but it is not unnatural; for there is something offensive in a woman putting out a book, except on some such subject as Mrs. Blackwell handled; or on dancing, or cookery, or anything of that kind which women ought to know about, and will be the more amiable for their knowledge. But when they go the length of writing sonnets, political economy, theories of morals, essays on population, systems of chemistry, and theological discourses, it is perfectly unbearable. Learned and intellectual women have never been in great estimation with the more judicious of the other sex. Literary men are seldom agreeable companions, but literary ladies are generally allowed to be insufferable. What sort of husbands and fathers they are who allow their wives and daughters to write for the edification of the public we do not take it upon us to say, further than that they must have strange notions of what is attractive and amiable and becoming in the female sex, when they do not discourage their literary efforts by every means in their power, and endeavour to keep them in that place in society where they will be least known and most happy. This is not being cruel to genius; for the light of nature, and the Word of God, and the moral constitution of women, all combine to show that they are a people who were not sent into this world to shine by their own light, but to be helpmates to the other division of the human family; and the very first instance which the Scripture records of a woman's advice being taken about the acquirement of knowledge was followed by the most disastrous consequences.

Leaving the "woman-kind" to profit by this lecture, we could have wished to let the old bachelors know what opinion Mr. Bruce has of their condition,—with various other matters, touching covetousness, the passion for spiritual domination, and the other vices which are commented on, apropos to eminent individuals who were or were not chargeable with those failings; but we must be contented with recommending the book to our readers, with the assurance, that whatever be its faults, it is not a dull or a heavy tome: and citing one other passage from the Life of Scougal, the author of "The Life of God in the soul of Man." It is presumed that HENRY SCUGAL was born at Saltown in East Lothian: but he was educated in Aberdeen, and at comparatively an early age he was chosen the Divinity Professor in King's College. Scougal is one of the few credible instances of a man having died for love; or in the fearful struggle between virtue and passion,—the object of his unfortunate attachment being a married woman. He died before he had attained his twenty-eighth year. "Had Scougal," says our author, "gone about like Andrew Cant, and other theologians of that age, abusing, tormenting, and oppressing all who did not submit to their arbitrary authority, he might have lived to have been four score in spite of all the ladies in the world,"—and probably have married a rich wife. And this introduces one passage which is upon Scougal's celebrated work:—

It is indeed a work of a truly evangelical character, using that term in its right and original, and not in its fashionable and modern, sense. It is truly a lovely and fragrant flower, blooming sweetly in the sterile desert of Scottish divinity, and which, by some kind providence, has been enabled to flourish in its place amidst all the bleakness around it. It is a fact not more singular and melancholy than true, that though the great bulk of the people of this country are zealous theologians and religious disputants, no civilized country in Europe has produced so few religious treatises of any utility or beauty. The people of France and Italy are not religious; but this is not because their clergy have not given them works of piety of the highest character. In this way almost nothing has been done in Scotland; and there is little expectation that anything will soon be done. From the spirit that animates the majority of our clergy, and the contempt in which sound learning and sound sense are now held, it would be sanguine indeed to look forward to the appearance of any religious works that might wipe away this reproach to our National Establishment. Nothing, in all probability, will be heard for years to come but contentious disputings about patronage and antipatronage, calls and inductions, the voluntary principle and the established principle, and other such like things, about which Christianity knows nothing and cares nothing, looking on them all as questions of mere human convenience and arrangement.

To return to Scougal, the writing of a beautiful book of piety is certainly no proof that the author himself is possessed of any particle of religion; but all testimony is uniform as to the unblemished innocence and purity of Scougal's life and conversation, his love to God and his benevolence to man; in all which his bright and blessed example was the best and most glorious commentary on his valuable writings. We have alluded to the fatal passion which hurried him to his grave. It leaves not the shadow of a stain on his sainted memory. He did not give up his virtue, but his innocent life, to the force of what all history and experience show to be the most powerful passion that can assail humanity; which has decided the fates of nations as well as of individuals, when their destinies were trembling in the balance; and which, whenever there occurs any case of competing jurisdictions between it and any other passion, invariably vindicates its own supremacy.

We give our author leave to think as contemptuously as he pleases of Osian's Poems, respectfully differing from him; but what has put it into his head that Wordsworth is their admirer; the fact being that the poet who is slighted because his "notions of poetry are entirely of his own contrivance," is as openly contemptuous of Ossian's Poems as Mr. Bruce himself.

NEW NOVELS.

I. The Little Wife, and The Baronet's Daughters.

By Mrs. Grey, Author of "The Young Prima Donna," and "The Duke." 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

These graceful stories are distinguished by an engaging prettiness and femininity. They display much of the subtle penetration of a womanly mind, and more of the tenderness of a woman's heart. They must be favourites with the one sex, and they are abundantly flattering to the other. The "Little Wife," which, if somewhat fantastic, is very charming, will likely be the most generally popular. The "Baronet's Daughters" deserve higher commendation. The sisterly group and their female friends are finely discriminated, and the truth of individual nature is displayed in numerous small traits of disposition, which only a woman could note and describe. The readers of novels have been so completely worn out by lingering deaths of the beautiful and beloved from "the English malady"—consumption, that one generally either sickens or becomes callous to such lingering executions. Yet, our author has gone over this dangerous and hacknied ground with pathos, tenderness, and delicacy, which are deeply effective; nor does she ever lose hold of our sympathies, even when the dream of romance ends, and her enthusiastic heroine sinks into a sensible, amiable, and happy matron.

II. The Last King of Ulster. 3 vols. Madden & Co.

This Irish historical romance—written by a retired officer, or a Catholic priest, or a lady, or whoever may be the author—is of the age of Queen Elizabeth, as the title indeed denotes. It opens on the shores of Lough Neagh; and the reader is at once plunged among the followers and fosterers of the chief of Tyrconnell, and those of the great and intriguing O'Neill, now degraded by Queen Elizabeth into the Earl of Tyrone. The story follows the general outline of history as faithfully as the purpose of exalting the national character of the Irish will permit. It shifts to London and the court of Elizabeth, and back again, among the Saxon invaders and conflicting chiefs and partisan leaders of disunited Ireland. Heroic achievements and romantic and perilous adventures are relieved by the passages of true love never running smooth, of three different pairs, consisting of "the bravest of the brave," and "the fairest of the fair." Priests and minstrels mingle in, and carry on the game. Above them all towers the high-souled Cathleen, the daughter of the Tanist of O'Neill, and her chivalrous lover O'Donnell, the young chief of Tyrconnell. But a Father Francis, a mysterious personage, is the genius of the story, and of Ireland's destiny; and he is not an Irishman but a Sassenach, who assumed the cowl to effect her deliverance, and who managed her discordant chiefs like so many pawns and pieces on a chess-board. The romance will charm young readers: those who delight in wild adventures "happened by land or sea," more than obtaining insight into the nature and workings of the human heart—who like, in short, Rinaldo Rinaldini, more than Gil Blas.

III. Traditions of Western Germany. By Captain Charles Knox. 3 vols. cloth. Saunders & Otley.

Germany abounds in traditions. Here we have, in addition to many other specimens already introduced to the English reader, one volume connected with the Black Forest, and that locale might furnish fifty; another with the Rhine; and a third with the Moselle and its Archbishops. The translator protests that no liberties have been taken with original authorities, so far as facts are concerned; but this is scarcely compatible with the license he has allowed himself of stating these facts with levity and irony, which almost travesties them; and which is, at all events, incongruously at variance with the homely simplicity and entire good faith of the greater part of the traditions of the Fatherland, which his lively, jeering, and sarcastic paraphrases so transmogrify and bedevil. This peppering and salting may, however, in many cases, render the viands more piquant to English palates; and the translator has had the good taste not to touch with a light or profane hand those pathetic traditions and legends which have intertwined themselves with every finer fibre of the national heart. Such things, for example, as the legend of Genoveva, which it would be an affront to the nobler feelings of humanity to treat in that drolling manner in which the translator is very successful, considering his themes and his country. The light style of Voltaire or De Grammont—the jeer embodying the sneer—is rarely the forte of Englishmen, nor is the deficiency to be regretted.

PAMPHLETS.

REFLECTIONS UPON THE CORN LAWS, AND UPON THEIR EFFECTS ON MANUFACTURES, &c. &c. By James H. Renny. —A wire-drawn argument for the Corn-Laws, and in support of that magic wand, the sliding scale; showing that the sufferings of the manufacturing interest and the working class (for suffering is admitted) arise from errors in the Banking System, and the effects of the old Poor Law; and but the sliding scale, perhaps somewhat modified; a change in the Monetary System, which shall approximate to Scottish Banking, and the operation of the new Poor Law, will make all right. The writer contends that it is right to give our Colonies a monopoly of our markets. This is enough.

SLAVERY IN AMERICA SHOWN TO BE PECULIARLY ABOMINABLE. By Wm. Day.

THE PRESENT AGE: An Address, by Dr. Channing, delivered before the Mercantile Library Company of Philadelphia, in May 1841. Reprinted in Glasgow by Hedderwick & Son.

MEMOIR addressed to the PROPRIETORS of MOUNTAIN and WASTE LANDS, on the NATURALIZATION of the ALPACA. By William Walton.—This pamphlet has, from patriotic motives, been printed by the Natural History Society of Liverpool. A great quantity, so much as six millions pounds of the wool of the sheep of the Andes, the Alpaca, and the Vicuña, have, within the last three years, been brought to the Liverpool market, where it is highly prized for purposes for which no other kind of wool is so well adapted. But the introduction of the animal itself is here recommended, and supported by a feasible theory, and many corroborative facts. Mr. Thomas Southey, the intelligent writer on sheep-stock, lately recommended the introduction of the Alpaca into Australia, to which it appears peculiarly well adapted, from its capacity of enduring thirst, or, more properly, its rarely drinking; and the experiment is now making, and is likely to prove successful. Mr. Walton does not wish the Alpaca to interfere with the ordinary sheep-walks of this country, but to occupy those rocky and heathy wilds where sheep cannot pasture, and to which the hardy constitution and habits of the sheep of the Andes are considered peculiarly adapted. The subject was brought before the British Association both in 1839 and 1840, and also before the Highland Society of Scotland at their Annual Exhibition, which was last season held at Aberdeen. Some of the animals (of which there are a good number at present in different places in this country) were then exhibited. These animals are said to have thriven in our climate. They are considered well suited to the waste mountain land and bogs of Ireland. A good deal of Alpaca wool has, under fanciful names, been spun and manufactured in Manchester and other places. Goods made from it constitute a middle fabric between the silken and woollen, but are more silky than woolly in appearance. It is sometimes used for fancy goods; and, for cheapness, with cotton warps. Imitation tabinets and poplins, Orleans' cloths, bombazines, coat-linings, &c., are made from it, and often pass for silk. The wool sells at from 1s. 8d. to 2s. 3d. per lb., and the spun yarn, of which a considerable quantity is sent to the French manufactories, at from 6s. to 12s. per lb. The memoir, as projecting a new idea in national economy, which may add greatly to public wealth, and take nothing away, is entitled to earnest attention. Among the other Peruvian sheep now in England, is a little flock of fourteen, at Knowlesley, consisting of Llamas and Alpacas, two of which were bred there, and carry finer wool than their parents. The Earl of Derby has no doubt of their propagation in this country. Successful experiments have been also made in different parts of Europe.

THE SPIRIT OF MAGNA CHARTA.—This is a pamphlet deserving of notice. Ten years ago, when the nation would hear of nothing but "the Bill, and the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill," the author of "The Spirit of Magna Charta" foretold that the principle of representation comprehended in the Bill was vicious, and would never fulfil the desired purpose. His own principle is Universal Suffrage, in a sense, however, which keeps the promise to the ear to break it to the heart. He carries out the spirit of Magna Charta, by giving every citizen a voice in choosing representatives, though in a limited and restricted way. His theory is to adopt a variety of qualifications, suited to the different classes of the community. For example, let there, with the King and the Peers, be a House of Representatives, consisting of four hundred members, sent there by four orders of electors choosing each one hundred representatives. The different orders of electors are proposed to be—1st, The "first-rate county voters," which will include the aristocracy, landed gentry, &c., and which will possess one kind of qualification, and elect one hundred members of parliament; 2d, The cities and corporate towns, which shall possess a special qualification, and elect another hundred; 3d, A second-rate county qualification, to include, we presume, the little farmers, shopkeepers, &c., which shall send one hundred members to parliament; and the last one hundred members shall be chosen by persons possessing none of the three qualifications, but being incapable of any of them, entitled to vote by right of universal suffrage. Thus every man will have a vote. It is the leading business of the pamphlet to enunciate this principle. The writer of the pamphlet, who discovers both learning and ability, is at all events the decided friend of direct representation; though his scheme would, however, give the landed interest a great preponderance in the national assemblies.

THE CHEAP BREAD OF THE FREE TRADERS A DELUSION. By Robert Gale.—This pamphlet is inscribed to the Duke of Buckingham. The author contends that nothing can save us but the extension of the home demand. How is he to accomplish this! The complaint is not that our agricultural labourers do not require three times as many shirts, hose, shoes, hats, coats, and fustian jackets as they now obtain, but that their wages being nearly all spent in bread alone, they have nothing to give to the manufacturers for their commodities. The pamphlet is a Tory catch-penny of the day.

A LETTER TO SIR F. BURDETT. By Richard Dun, Esq., M.A., T.C.D., Barrister at Law, Miss Coutts Burdett's lover. The narrative is an amusing case of monomania. It is written from the Fleet Prison, to which Mr. Dun's gallantry has brought him.

SERIAL WORKS.

A HISTORY OF BRITISH FOREST TREES. By Prideaux John Selby, F.R.S.E., &c. &c. Part. I. Van Voorst.—This is the commencement of an illustrated work on a very engaging subject. The specimens discussed are the Common Lime Tree, the American species of the Lime, the Sycamore, the Norway Maple, the Field Maple, the Horse Chestnut, the Common Holly, and the Robinia or False Acacia. The wood-engravings of the respective specimens are accurate and pretty; though the necessarily small scale of the subjects, and the still life, do not admit of the extreme beauty and lifelikeness of the engravings of the birds and animals in the other illustrated works published by Mr. Van Voorst. So much have our poets and picturesque writers said about British Forest Trees, that by contrast, Mr. Selby's descriptions appear tame, cold, and common-place. He should draw as largely from these sources as he does upon the scientific writers on trees, and thus popularize his theme.

THE PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE. Part XXXIV. Coriolanus.—The Illustrations are mostly scenic or architectural, from Roman subjects. The Annotations are few,—the Editor announcing his intention of making Shakspeare's classic dramas the subject of a general essay.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE ELECTIONS.—We never anticipated that the Whigs, by resorting to a general election, would increase their strength. On the contrary, we rather thought that it would be diminished; but we were certainly not prepared for such a signal defeat as they have sustained. The truth is, that, for several years past, the people had sunk into a state of political apathy; having been utterly disappointed in the expectations they had formed of the working of the Reform Bill, and by the mean and pitiful manner in which the Whigs, on all important occasions, truckled to the Tories. For some time past, the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel have been more the leaders of the Ministry than Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell; and no measure could be carried through, or indeed almost introduced into Parliament, without the sanction of the former. The announcement of free trade principles, however beneficial it might have been for the Ministry a year or two ago, came by far too late. At the time it was made, it did them, we have no doubt, harm instead of good. In the first place, it alarmed the agriculturists and the other monopolists, and those depending on them, and they have used their whole influence against them; while, at the same time, it did not revive the enthusiasm of the other classes, who suspected—and with good reason—that the men who had denounced free trade, in such explicit terms, only last year, could not be very sincere converts to the doctrine this year; and they believed that such men could hardly be trusted with carrying into effect any measures by which a really free trade was likely to be obtained. The consequence has been that all the agricultural constituencies, upon which some powerful Whig influence could not be brought to bear, have been lost; and the Tories have been reinstated in power, to remain in office perhaps for years, provided any scheme for supplying the deficiency in the revenue without pressing on the people can be devised, and provided that divisions in the Tory camp, of which there are already manifest symptoms, can be prevented. The experiment made last year of adding a per centage on the existing taxes, shows that such an expedient for filling the exchequer is hopeless. The increase is not one-third of what was anticipated; and arose principally from the window-duties, a rigorous inquisition of the number of windows having been made throughout the kingdom. But even this resource is not likely to be long available; for even in the finest squares in this city, we observe that the operation of building up windows is going on. No one seems able to conjecture how a Tory ministry is to be able to raise the necessary supplies; and these supplies will shortly have to be increased, as at least 10,000 additional troops must, as recent events have shown, be sent to Ireland to keep down the people.

A reimposition of the house-duty and of the old postage-rates have been talked of: but we do not think that the new ministry, powerful as it will be in the House of Commons, will have any chance of carrying one or other of these measures; and even though they were combined, they would not make up the existing deficiency in the revenue. The only tax then that appears to remain, unless a new one can be invented, is a property tax: but it is not likely that the aristocracy, upon whom it would fall with great severity, would consent to it: so that the only resource which seems to remain, after a quarter of a century of almost uninterrupted peace, is to have recourse to the old remedy of borrowing, and to leave posterity to repay the debt as they best can, or to brush it off, along with the other load which encumbers the nation, when it suits their convenience. This is a pretty state of things!

THE CORN LAW AGITATION goes on admirably. The entire Liberal press of the kingdom has taken up the question, and the fate of the existing Corn Laws at least is sealed. Scotland has returned a number of Members who, though willing to take the 8s. duty as an instalment, have declared that they will never cease to agitate for a total repeal. Among these we may mention Mr. Oswald and Mr. Dennistoun, the Members for Glasgow; Mr. Duncan, the Member for Dundee; and several others.

CHEAP FOOD MAKES HIGH WAGES.—One of the greatest fallacies with which the working classes are imbued, and which has greatly tended to retard the efforts of the advocates for a repeal of the Corn Laws is, that wages fall as the price of food falls, and that, therefore, the operatives would not be benefited by obtaining their food at a cheaper rate than they do at present. Setting aside the authority of the greatest writers on Political Economy, and historical evidence, one would have thought that any workman who has lived on the wages of his labour for the last five or six years would have had, in his own case, sufficient experience of the fallacy of the doctrine. Food, in 1836, was very nearly one-half cheaper than it is at present; yet, is there any branch of trade or employment in which wages have risen since 1836? On the contrary, have they not generally fallen; or, at least, what amounts to the same thing, is there not much more difficulty in getting full employment throughout the year at this moment than five years ago? If we refer to Ireland, or any part of America, it is impossible not to be convinced that high prices are not the cause of high wages. From the ready means of exporting all sorts of grain, cattle, and provisions of every kind from Ireland, food is not materially cheaper there than in this country—certainly not one-fourth; yet, while agricultural labourers obtain in Britain from 1s. 6d. to 2s. a-day, tens of thousands of Irishmen would be glad to receive 4d. a-day if employed throughout the year. It is true, that they occasionally receive so much as 6d. a-day; but then this is only for a limited period; for we know from good authority—that of a Report of a Parliamentary Commission in 1836—that upwards of one million of people are constantly in want of employment. Wages occasionally descend as low as 2d. a-day; but certainly no one can imagine that this arises from the cheapness of their food. The sole cause of it is the redundancy of population in relation to capital, and hence a competition for employment arises, which reduces wages to the lowest ebb. It is the same as in a glutted market; the purchasers knowing pretty accurately the quantity of the commodities wanted, and seeing that there is more than sufficient for the demand, hang back, and refuse to purchase; and having the money in their pockets, while the sellers have little or none, they sooner or later bring down prices to their own terms. There is no difference between the sale of labour and the sale of any other commodity. It is no consideration about the cheapness or dearness of food which regulates the employer or the price of labour, that is to say, the rate of wages; but simply the supply and the demand. If we turn to America, we shall find precisely the converse of Ireland—cheap food and high wages. Mr. Shirreff, an intelligent East Lothian agriculturist, who visited a great part of the States and the Canadas in 1854, without any reference to the subject of which we are treating, but merely incidentally and with the view of enabling any one to judge of the propriety of emigrating, estimates the hire of a labourer at a bushel of wheat per day. Now, a bushel of wheat, at present prices, costs 8s. or 9s. in this country. Are any of our labourers paid at that rate? He then remarks, after giving a statement of the produce of a well-cultivated farm—"Notwithstanding the enormous quantity of produce exhibited by the preceding statements, HIGH WAGES AND LOW PRICES PREVENT MUCH MONEY BEING REALIZED." But that to which we particularly wish to call attention, is the following comparative view of the state of a workman in America with cheap food, and in Britain with dear:—

"In a country where nature is so bountiful, and land so abundant and cheap, the wages of labour must necessarily be high. Accordingly, an ordinary mechanic obtains one dollar per day, with board, including washing; and superior workmen, engineers and mill-wrights, get from two dollars to three dollars. Farm labourers are engaged at from 100 dollars to 120 dollars a-year. Female house servants obtain one dollar in private families, and from two dollars to two and a half dollars a-week in hotels. As compared with the prices of produce and land, wages may be stated thus:

"If an ordinary mechanic work five days in the week, he will earn throughout the year, besides board, 260 dollars; or of Indian corn, about 1733 bushels; or of wheat, about 580 bushels; or of beef, about 13,000 lbs.; or of land, about 200 acres.

"An ordinary farm labourer will get during the year, besides his board, 100 dollars; or of Indian corn, about 667 bushels; or of wheat, about 222 bushels; or of beef, about 5000 lbs.; or of land, about eighty acres; which is a sufficient extent of surface for any labouring man to possess. Female house servants in private families get in the year fifty-two dollars, which would purchase forty acres of land, and in hotels what would purchase eighty acres of land. How very different is the situation of farm labourers in England, Scotland, and Ireland, compared with those in Illinois! Supposing the weekly wages of labourers to be 10s., 8s., and 3s. 6d., without board, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, and they do not exceed these sums, the Englishman will earn during the year about seventy bushels of wheat; or of beef about 1560 lbs. The Scotman, about sixty-two bushels of wheat; or of beef, about 1400 lbs. The Irishman, about thirty bushels of wheat; or of beef, about 750 lbs. But when the board of the workman, or simply what he himself would consume, is taken from these numbers, they will appear quite insignificant compared with the wages of Illinois.

"An ordinary farm labourer in Illinois gets the value of eighty acres of land yearly. In Britain, when due allowance is made for the board of the labourer, he does not get one-tenth of an acre of good land. When wages are compared with land, the farm labourer of Illinois is about 800 times better rewarded than in Britain."

No one can reflect on these facts—for facts they undoubtedly are, brought forward without the least party or political bias, by a person thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and whose whole interests were centred in agriculture, and at a time when, owing to the cheapness of grain, no agitation whatever existed in the country for a repeal of the corn laws—but must be convinced, that there never was a greater fallacy than that wages fall as the price of food falls; but on the contrary, they must see that cheap food, by increasing the quantity of employment, and increasing the competition for labour,—makes wages high.

SCOTCH ELECTIONS.—If every part of the empire had done its duty to the liberal cause as well as Scotland, Ministers would have found themselves in a very different situation from what they are to-day. There has, no doubt, been a loss of two liberals on the aggregate; but this loss is well compensated by the ejection of Sir George Sinclair and Mr. Colquhoun, both of whom obtained their seats by assuming false colours. We have, no doubt, that some damage was done, or, at least, some risk run, by the sentiments known to be entertained by the Hon. Fox Maule and the Lord Advocate on the Non-Intrusion question; for even in Edinburgh serious intentions were entertained by the Dissenters, who form throughout Scotland a large proportion of the liberal party, to set up a Candidate who would advocate perfect equality of civil rights irrespective of religious opinion or profession, and abolition of all preference of any one sect above another. They passed resolutions declaring inter alia, that it will "be the duty of Dissenters to unite at the next election in favour of a Candidate who will completely understand and sympathize with their views, and who is of decidedly liberal opinions on all the great political questions of the day, including that of an entirely Free Trade in Corn."

thought proper to crow over them and the public by appointing Thursday, the 22d of July, to be held as a day of "humiliation and prayer," throughout the length and breadth of Scotland, and that without any authority from the civil power. It thus appears that the General Assembly assumes the power of putting the whole population of Scotland into a state of idleness whenever they please, and the same power has occasionally been assumed within their respective jurisdictions by the inferior Church courts. We do not pretend to say that this is any new assumption on the part of the Kirk; but certainly in its earlier and purer ages, no such attempt was ever made without the sanction of the civil power, given either by the Privy Council, the Houses of Parliament, or otherwise. One would think that one day of the week is quite sufficient for all religious purposes, and that if a day of Humiliation and Prayer were considered necessary, it might as well take place on a Sunday as a week day. On former occasions, the appointment of the Kirk was to some extent tacitly submitted to, as the ground for the appointment was such as affected the whole body of the people: for example, the deficiency of the harvest, the prevalence of contagious and mortal diseases, and so on; but nothing can exceed the effrontery and tyranny of some two hundred men laying the whole population of the kingdom idle, merely because they, by an insane and utterly unjustifiable resistance to the law of the land, as authoritatively declared not only by the highest, but by the only competent authorities, have placed themselves in a situation from whence they can neither retreat without disgrace, nor advance without imminent danger, while they cannot remain in safety in the position where they are. Look at the effect of this proceeding on the population of Scotland, now approaching three millions. One-fourth are probably working men, and of these at least two-thirds, or five hundred thousand of them, live on their daily wages. Suppose them only paid, on an average, twelve shillings a-week, this shows a loss to the labouring community of fifty thousand pounds, incurred by this act of presumption and tyranny on the part of the Assembly.

FUNDS OF THE KIRK.—The wild proceedings of the majority are likely to be brought to a stop from a cause which has put an end to many other undertakings both good and bad. It appeared from a report given in to the last Assembly, that the Kirk is greatly in debt. Besides other liabilities, the agent has a claim for nearly two thousand pounds. When this was announced in the Assembly, it being after dinner, a great many magnanimous proposals were made for its liquidation. One elder (Mr Hegg of Newliston) stated that, if the agent would accept of it, he would at once pay two-thirds of the amount. Of course, after so magnanimous a proposal, that great champion of the Kirk, Mr. Mattland Mackgill Crichton, of Rankellor, could not sit in absolute silence; he got up and delivered one of his usual loud and frothy harangues; but it did not catch our ear, that he offered to pay the other third. Dr. Macfarlane, of Greenock, then proposed assessing the ministers and elders; whereupon another minister very modestly suggested, that if the elders would pay twenty pounds each, the whole debts would be liquidated without troubling the priests. These proposals occasioned a dead silence in the Assembly. It was then confidently asserted, that, by voluntary subscription, the whole money could be immediately raised. This plan was accordingly adopted. But instead of raising £2000, as was anticipated, only £600 were subscribed; and how much of that has been paid we know not. The Non-Intrusionists, then, after all, have been forced to resort to an assessment,—one per cent. on the stipends, including the glebes; and the elders are expected to assess themselves in somewhat the same proportion. The prospect, however, is but cheerless. It is admitted that even were this scheme carried fully into effect, it would not produce more than £1400 a-year; and with ten or twelve actions, already in the Court of Session, and others coming in daily, it will not pay the current law expenses; leaving nothing for the damages and expenses which will inevitably be awarded in the cases of Lord Kinross, Mr. Young, and others. It is well it is so. Nothing will be found so effectual for taming the "wild men" as bleeding their pockets freely.

IRELAND.—The elections have, as usual, been attended with rioting and bloodshed; and bribery, perjury, and intimidation have been resorted to, to obtain the return of Tories. The proportion of Liberals, however, predominates; so that the defeat of the Liberal cause is entirely owing to the English counties. The job of appointing "plain John Campbell" to the Irish Chancellorship had certainly an unfavourable effect on the Irish elections; for nothing could be more gross than such an appointment, when it was known that he could not possibly hold it longer than a few weeks. In point of fact, he had not sat in the Irish Court of Chancery for more than twenty hours, till he bade adieu to the bar, promising, however, that he would use his best exertions for the improvement of the procedure in the Court of Chancery. It has been asserted that, on accepting office, Baron Campbell agreed to give up any claim to a retired allowance; but we doubt exceedingly the statement. He cannot, as long as there are three ex-Chancellors alive, receive any such allowance; but we shall be much surprised if, on the death or reappointment of any of his predecessors, he does not claim the allowance of £4000 a-year.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.—The accounts from the manufacturing districts continue without alteration; everywhere dulness and stagnation of trade are complained of. Many mills have stopped working altogether, and the remainder are generally on short time. Great numbers of operatives have been thrown out of employment, and from the unprecedented length of time, during which the depression has existed, it is plain that there is some permanent cause for the depression. Whether the free trade schemes of ministers would now relieve our manufacturers, is doubtful; but that something must be attempted for their relief, is evident. It is reported that Sir Robert Peel intends so far to adopt the proposed Ministerial policy as to reduce the duty on coffee. The consumption at present in the United Kingdom, may be estimated at about twenty-six millions of pounds, which yield a revenue of above six hundred thousand pounds. The duty is 6d. per pound on British plantation coffee, and 1s. on Foreign. Were the discriminating duty removed, the price of coffee would be reduced 6d. a pound; for coffee of a quality fully equal to that for which we pay £5 per cwt. could be imported from Hayti and sold for 44s. It is exceedingly probable, that were the duty lowered not only on British plantation,—for all that is grown is already consumed,—but on Foreign coffee also, a considerable addition to the revenue might be obtained. On no article has the effect of low duties in improving the revenue been more distinctly shown:—In 1807, the duty was 1s. 8d. a pound, and the quantity entered for home consumption amounted to 1,170,164 lbs., yielding a revenue of £161,245. In 1808, the duty was reduced from 1s. 8d. to 7d.; and in 1809 there were no fewer than 9,251,847 lbs. entered for home consumption, yielding, notwithstanding the reduction of duty, a revenue of £245,856. The duty having been raised in 1819, from 7d. to 1s. a pound, the quantity entered for home consumption in 1824, was 7,993,041 lbs., yielding a revenue of £407,544. In 1824, however, the duty being again reduced from 1s. to 6d., the quantity entered for home consumption in 1825, was 10,766,112 lbs., and in 1831, it had increased to 22,740,627 lbs., yielding a net revenue of £583,751.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts from all parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, as to the appearance of the crops, are far from favourable. Even during the earlier part of the spring wheat plants were generally thin on the ground; and the long-continued drought prevented them from branching out as they otherwise would have done, while, at the same time, it dwindled and retarded the growth of the existing stems. The rains in June and July were so heavy and continued, that in most districts the crop was completely laid flat; and as it was then in the ear, the injury done must have been considerable. At present (20th July) the wheat has only partially risen, and unless we have for some weeks a succession of dry weather, the crop must be very deficient both in quantity and in quality. It is universally admitted that there is no chance of the crop equalling that of last year, or that an acreable average can be expected, though it is hoped from the additional breadth said to have been sown, that the total produce may not be far deficient. From the best-informed quarters we learn, that the stock of old wheat on hand in England is exceedingly small; and it is anticipated that, instead of receiving any from Ireland, supplies will be required from Britain before the harvest. If there be as much grain in the country as will supply the consumption till harvest, (a point far from certain,) there must be a large importation of foreign grain to mix with our own produce, in order to render it fit for the making of bread. The speculators in the funds have already taken the alarm at the present prospect of the harvest; for if foreign corn is to be imported, it can only be paid for, under the existing system of restrictions, in bullion. As a natural consequence, the Bank of England will be drained and money made scarce, and hence a disposition has arisen to make speculative sales of stocks. Oats, the staple product of the north of Scotland, and in all parts of it a very important article of produce, is generally represented to be very short and thin. It suffers more than any of our crops by dry weather, and although a continuance of rain will injure other grain, it will, in all probability, improve the oats. Barley being the latest sown of the grain crops, suffered little from the drought, and presents a favourable appearance. The plants are thick on the ground, and coming well into ear. The seed of the early-sown turnips, owing to the dryness of the ground, did not spring till the rains came on, and both early and late-sown having braided at the same time, great difficulty was found in many districts to get them properly thinned. Although in various counties great blanks appear in some fields, there is every prospect of an abundant crop, if dry weather should now take place, for a superabundance of moisture is equally unfavourable for turnips, as too much drought. The hay-crop has turned out very deficient, for the grass was too far advanced before the rains fell; indeed, a good deal of it was cut previously; and as little of it had been made up into ricks, it suffered severely from exposure to moisture on the ground. There can be little doubt that the price will be double what it has been in many previous years. Notwithstanding the unfavourable prospect before us, there has been little variation during the month in the price of grain. This is to be accounted for by the circumstance, that many of the leading agriculturists being apprehensive that an alteration of the Corn Laws must take place next Session, have been busily engaged in bringing their grain to market; but their stock seems nearly exhausted, as, for the last week or two, the provincial markets have been very moderately supplied. Prices of cattle and sheep continue without much variation. At the great Inverness sheep and wool market, though there was a dulness and apparent unwillingness to do business during the first day and the earlier part of the second, the usual amount of sales was effected. As compared with last year, the fall on black-faced wool may be stated at seven and a half per cent.; on Cheviot and Leicester about ten per cent.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER, 1841.

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE Privy-council, held at the tea-table of the little villa in the neighbourhood of Chelsea, to deliberate upon the splendid and tempting offers covertly made to Charles Herbert and his wife, upon condition of their assuming the guardianship and tutelage of a future duke and duchess, ended, like many other and weightier deliberations, in nothing perfectly satisfactory to any party. A salary of his own naming, and the most liberal appointments that he could desire, were flatteringly offered to Herbert and the ladies, whose valuable friendship the Duke of Plantagenet had the good sense to wish to secure for the partner of his unhappy heir, and for what he now considered his doomed family.

Of Herbert the Duke had formerly heard the highest character from his late friend, the Earl of Tarbert, as well as from his confidential solicitor, Mr. Gryphon; and, to make assurance doubly sure, he had made private inquiries at Cambridge among individuals of high standing, who had been thoroughly acquainted with the habits, attainments, and character of Herbert when he studied there. The result was perfectly satisfactory, even down to the "slight supposed tendency to Whig politics;" the Plantagenets being, if not Whigs, yet patrons of that party. His Grace became hourly more earnest and anxious in the affair; and as he had determined not to see his undutiful grandson himself until some distant period, if ever, he was the more desirous to have the self-willed, headstrong, and ruined youth placed in safe custody, and, if possible, beyond seas, and out of the reach of those strange, low, and worthless adventurers with whom he had so disgracefully connected himself. The Duke had, though most reluctantly, abandoned the hope of being able to set aside the Scotch marriage. Lawyers and family friends were agreed as to the deplorable fact, that the union must now be held valid. He could therefore only console himself with the project of bringing in a bill to amend the Marriage Act, so far as it related to noble families; and he empowered Mr. Gryphon to offer Herbert carte blanche, and appointed the next day but one, at twelve o'clock, to see that gentleman, and conclude the affair. "And the ladies of his family, sir," said the duke, condescending to rise and follow the man of business to the door of the library, "instead of being an obstacle, as in such arrangements women too often are, I consider them not the least desirable parties to my scheme for the salvation of my unfortunate relation—if it be still possible to save him. The elder Mrs. Herbert is, I am informed, a well-bred, well-informed woman, of strict principles, and a member of the Church of England; the wife an accomplished and amiable young person, and a very pretty person too, I am told, of lady-like manners—and the blood relation of my late kinsman, Tarbert. In the unhappy, and ever-to-be-regretted circumstances of my family, the duchess and myself imagine that we could not have chosen better." The duke was certainly very well-informed on these points, and, moreover, his informer now stood, hat in hand, at his elbow; a circumstance which, with many of the sort, he was, like other exalted personages, apt to forget; the knowledge for which he was indebted to others, often seeming, and in perfect unconsciousness, to have come to him by intuition or inspiration, in virtue of his rank and birth. On this principle, the duke had most innocently appropriated several rather important discoveries in agricultural chemistry, communicated to him by an ingenious man in want of a noble and influential patron. By his essays on mangel wurzel and bone dust, published in certain "Agricultural Transactions," he had accordingly established a considerable reputation as a spirited improver and patron of economical science. He had once been engaged in an amicable controversy with "my friend Davy," as he condescendingly called Sir Humphrey, and had personally superintended the preparation of the first batch of oil-cakes seen in his county. It was the more vexatious that so public-spirited and really well-meaning a nobleman, ever watchful for the public advantage, should be so crossed in his private affairs,

"Your Grace has, in this important affair, shown your usual discretion and perspicacity," replied Mr. Gryphon, to the above intimation of the duke's pleasure. "And I make no question, but Mr. Charles Herbert and the ladies will be most happy to meet and forward your views for the advantage of Lord and Lady St. Edward."

"Lady St. Edward—don't, my good Mr. Gryphon, I entreat, let the duchess hear you thus name that—that—young person. Spare the feelings of that dear woman, whose every hope was wrapped up in this foolish but ever-loved boy. And lose no time, my good sir!" he continued, graciously waving his hand, in token that Gryphon was dismissed. "I will see Mr. Herbert the day after to-morrow, at twelve precisely. The whole of the intervening time is required to frame the instructions by which I wish him to conduct himself—my little hints and ideas, in fact: for I would not for worlds appear to dictate to the gentleman I intrust with the care of St. Edward."

"Instructions!" thought Gryphon. "I must be num on that head, or Herbert, restive enough already, will bolt at once."

The Duke very long before—before, indeed, coming to the title and estates, by the death of his elder brother—had, for five months, held office as a principal Secretary of State, which had given him an inveterate itch or small passion for scribbling all manner of "instructions" to his steward, his foresters, his game-keepers, and failing those, to his dairy, poultry, and laundry women, in the making of cheeses, hatching ducklings, and getting up fine linen. "Instructions" for the direction of Herbert in the delicate and onerous office in which he was, at the same time, to be left entirely free and uncontrolled, were a more difficult task. It had, however, the happy effect of restoring his Grace to a more equable humour than he had shown since the intelligence of the elopement had driven the gout from his great toe to his stomach, and from his stomach to menace his head.

When the long and dreary solemnities of his dinner were got through, he courteously requested the duchess to hear, and give her opinion of the jottings he had made towards the proper extension of the important document, the final drawing up of which was to be intrusted to his private secretary, and which, before he next saw Gryphon, filled some hundred pages of open, wide-margined manuscript, written in a fair hand, and properly secured with demi-official red tape. It was almost a pity that his Grace's voluminous piece of codification, for the education of a young nobleman and his wife, should have been next to thrown away: for it contained, on minor points, many useful remarks, and also various minute directions, which amazingly tickled the humour of Mr. Gryphon, who mightily doubted whether Dame Nature might not show herself too strong and perverse for his Grace's compulsory legislation. Nor were the formality, minuteness, and stringency of the duke's code to be blamed for Herbert's rejection of the offer made him, as he had taken that resolution before he had heard anything of these copious "instructions." He had been the less rash in his decision, as his step-mother had evidently set her heart upon his closing with a proposal which would at once, in her language, not only reinstate him in his natural place in society, but from the patronage of the Plantagenets open the most brilliant prospects to a laudable and manly ambition.

While, at the family tea-table Privy-council to which we have alluded, Charles and his mother debated the advantages and disadvantages attending the scheme,—both, with great ingenuity and animation, maintaining the side respectively favoured—Violet, apparently fancying that she was sewing, and sincerely believing herself perfectly unbiassed, alternately turned her sweet and earnest eyes to each speaker, though they probably lingered the longest on Charles, whose argument seemed quite irrefragable. Independence—a home which, however humble, was all one's own,—ah! these were social blessings beyond all others; and they were not to be found in any species of courtier-life, nor yet beneath any noble patron's roof. Yet again she could fancy Mrs. Herbert in the right. How true it was that poor Charles might wear out long years in irksome preparation for a profession to which he surely could never give his heart, and in which he might, after all, fail, as many an able man had done! Mrs. Herbert now hinted this for the first time, and as her last argument—and drove Violet to sea afresh. True, Charles said that he had conquered the worst drudgery of law, and began to feel something like pleasure in his dry technical studies; and it was most unlikely that he, with his brilliant parts, would fail. Every one admired and appreciated Charles. Only there might be much intervening drudgery, and a long time to hang on and persevere; while he might at once, by closing with the Duke of Plantagenet's proposal, be raised to an easy and honourable position—restored to those indulgences and luxuries which habit had made almost necessary, manfully as he had renounced them. And then the dazzling future prospect! Some high, perhaps official situation—who so fit as Herbert to occupy one profitably!—a seat in Parliament—who better qualified, by knowledge, eloquence, and liberal principles, to be of eminent service to the country, as a public representative and legislator!—besides the ability to provide easily and handsomely for a family which was becoming a frequent consideration with a thoughtful young wife, about to become a mother.

When Mrs. Herbert, the last speaker, finally dwelt upon the incessant toil, harassment, and responsibility attending the most brilliant and prosperous professional career, Violet's work fairly dropt on her knee, and she wondered to herself what new objection Charles could make to reasoning so conclusive.

"One thing is wanting, mother," he replied: "but it includes all: I should not be my own master. Independence!"

Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye!

the path which he points does not, I suspect, lie through the slippery saloons of either princes or dukes."

"If, by this appointment, you were to forfeit, nay, endanger your perfect and entire independence, not another word is to be said," replied Mrs. Herbert; "though I own I cannot see it."

"The independence of any man who, at the end of a few years, is left to the kindness of the grateful noble patron the world ever saw, is in imminent jeopardy. My pupil cannot continue always a boy, nor I a tutor. I should tremble for the time when it might be expected that the master must, in order to please and prosper, become, if not a sycophant, yet a being who must surrender all liberty of action, all freedom of thought, for 'a morsel of bread,' and that uncertain too. It comes exactly to this:—If I am in Parliament by the duke's influence, I must be of the duke's politics and party; if I, confessing myself totally without a vocation, and, regarding the idea as little less than blasphemous presumption, were to get a fat living in the Church by the duke's influence, I must be of the Duke's and the Church's faith. No, no; common sense and common honesty, wisdom and self-respect say that I must plod on—stick to the oar."

Violet, with a little sigh, shook her curls in confirmation of this brave decision, which appeared quite incontrovertible.

"You are too far-seeing and fine-drawn for me to-night, Charles," said Mrs. Herbert, in a tone just shaded by pettishness. "I believe the Duke of Plantagenet is a man of liberal feelings, most anxious, certainly, for the good of his grandson, the heir and sole representative of all his family honours, and also that he fully appreciates you. I conclude that I may believe him when he says, as Mr. Gryphon has stated to you, that the obligation will lie on his side, and that of his family; and that the sacrifice of your professional expectations ought and must be requited in some substantial and permanent way."

"All most fair and honourable, my dearest mother, though I fear your generous thoughts do dukes, and all the inferior orders of mankind, a great deal too much honour. But of the duke himself I am not afraid. His anxiety in this matter, knowing his deep mortification as I do, is to me a strong proof of right judgment and of right heart. But there is the future duke and the future duchess, and their many talented relatives;—the discordant and evil influences that must at all times be in play to counteract whatever we might attempt for their improvement and honour,—these, I confess, fill me with dismay. In our own case we should surrender a sure, if limited, and perhaps very remote prospect, for a troubled uncertainty; and too probably, find the ground, which it had taken years to gain, cut from under our feet in a night—worse than all, find our pains and cares absolutely thrown away upon a couple of self-willed incorrigible fools, whom no labour of ours could render respectable; since, I fear, nature in his case, and nature and circumstances in hers, make the matter hopeless to any teacher save old Experience. To him their young Graces, like all other mortals, may in time be found somewhat amenable."

"We'll think no more of it," said Violet, quickly and resolutely, and now plying her needle closely and swiftly, "I dare say the boy is spoilt. Emmeline Crippes has had much about her that should make her apology,—if an untaught girl of her age is responsible for anything. Now, her destiny is in her husband's hands. She still loves him, and is proud, if not exactly of him, yet of being his wife."

"Of being his countess, you mean," replied Herbert. "But I must budge; I only came to warn you, mother, of the temptations and fascinations of Mr. Gryphon, who has set his heart upon making all our fortunes by this great cast—absolutely, upon our being conjoint bear-leaders and people of affairs to this young lord, and likewise lady—perhaps some little, but only a very little—for Gryphon is a most friendly man—to keep a future rich client out of the clutches of Mr. Burke Barker, who might direct him to a very different man of business. A rich young duke is a prize worth trying for. Have a good dinner for honest Gryphon any way: he is too much of a genuine philosopher of this world to forget the comfortable present in the brilliant future. He enjoys a good dinner, and he is self-invited. . . . But if I see aright in this gloamin' light, here comes Marion, sweating up the gravel-walk with such a basketful!"

That faithful ally was already in the hall, and in loud communing with Mrs. Herbert's Irish brevet-cook; and Violet, whom Mrs. Herbert sometimes fancied, if not quite forgetful of dignity and propriety, yet somewhat precipitate in her motions, flew down, as was her wont, to welcome her old friend.

"How did I come? I got a cast by water. My lading? It's a Tweed saumon, hinny; and a sma' cag o' the pickled saumont roe Mr. Gryphon and some folk prize so highly. I mind when we threw all such guta, garbage, and soaserles down Tweed, and now it is sent far and near in compliments between gentle folks. So I met Mr. Gryphon in the Strand this morning, and he stopt me, which he seldom does, for he is aye in a hurry,—'Mrs. Linton,' he was pleased to say, 'have you any commands for your friend, Mrs. Charles Herbert? I am to dine with her to-morrow.' So kennin' Tweed saumon was reckoned a great dainteth, I thought maybe the ledly would be so good as accept my share, who, to say sooth, care little about delicates in the eating line, an it be not a dish of teay, when I have by chance a headache, or am tired going about my hoose agencies."

"You are too good, too considerate for your friends, Marion; you rob yourself to enrich others."

"Gas way, hinny! These orra things come cheap to me. I'm sometimes jalousing, that if I were a lone body in need, my north-country cousins might not be altogether so mindfu'. Lord pardon these uncharitable thoughts! which this overgrown wilderness of brick and mortar, where, in the daily and nightly strife going on, every ane comes in, like Harry Wynde, for his ain hand—put into a sinner's heart. . . . But I hope the mistress will not be offended by the freedom of my bit offering?"

"Offended! certainly not, with the considerate kindness of our best friend."

"Wishes to be so anyhow; but the like of her, bred altogether in the lady-line, though a gentle, sweet woman, I'm no just so free to deal with as wi' yoursel', hinny; who, though ye may have better blude in your veins, ken and have seen far mair o' the world."

"I seen more of life than Mrs. Herbert!" replied Violet, laughing.

"Ay, but 'deed have you—of the real weary, battling, adverse world, ten times mair. But let me hang my cloak on the pin myself, hinny. . . . What kens the like o' her, in ordinar circumstances, but to eat their meat, and drink their drink, and busk themselves, and take their pleasure, and never speer where it comes a' from, or how long it is to last, more than that maze o' midges wheeling and waltzing this bonny warm night aboon these rose bushes! What ken they o' the strife and sturt of this mortal schene, if it be not their play-houses and their spinettes; and the inside o' a millender's shop, or a kirk for an hour on a Sabbath forenoon that's as like a theatre! The men o' them may pick up a little useful knowledge, if they are quick and heedful; but for the women,—poor, useless, vapourish dawdles!"

While Marion thus held forth, and laid aside her clogs, Violet smiled to think of the manner in which this "vulgar old Scotchwoman's" contemptuous pity would be received by its fair objects, if they could possibly be made to comprehend anything so incongruous or ridiculous.

"Then you do not envy fine ladies?"

"En—vy them! what for should I? Is it for the youth and beauty, fleeting at the best, which they do their utmost, by their goings on, to destroy? or for the idleset which keeps them vapourish and dwinning when there is little the matter with them, till make-believe grows earnest at last?"

"You are unmerciful to the ladies, Marion; but do let me help you."

"They are unmerciful to themselves, and becoming a pest to society. While we had but a sample o' them, o' the real sort, that could afford such vanities, if ever an immortal being can afford to live with no more thought than a bird o' the air or a flower o' the field—a swatch o' them to act the part of hair-dresser dolls for the rest to busk themselves by, it was the less matter; but now, when all must push forward alike, the draper's wife cheekie-for-chowie with the duchess, the woman's world seems standing with its heels where its head should be. I am mair than ordinar moved this evening. There's a couple come up from the north, that are lodgers in my neighbour's the tailor. Things have gone sore against them I can learn. The poor man—and it's a vain silly creatur enough—has been ruined by some of these black bubble companies—that of Mr. Burke Barker I believe: and the poor body is half crazed. But in the wrack and ruin the ledly was spared her bits o' satin and gauze dud gowns,—(let's be thankfu'!)—and the tinsel hardware gear that kind o' women hing about their persons. So the one time she is in bed drinking tea, and sabbin' and gaspin' in the hysterics, and the other time dizened and dinked out in her auld faded frippery; and either way the yirm is never out o' her head. The poor little man! I could pity it,—one o' your sma'-boned, weazened, sharp-faced, cockney cuts—but a mettle creatur. And never a comfortable meal, or a word o' sympathy and cheering from his tawpie helpmate; and, as I said, the yirm of discontent never out o' her head; though, believe his story, it was allenarly her pride and vanity brought them to the pass of giving up an honest, humble way of doin' for the grand Insurance agency and shares, and so forth, by which they were to make gowd in gowpens."

"Who is to make gold by handfuls, Mrs. Linton?" cried Herbert, leaning over the balustrade; "are you not coming up stairs to tell us the magic art?"

"Ah, Mr. Charles—naeboddy!—that is, naeboddy in an honest way. 'He that hasteneth to be rich shall not be innocent;' and that is a word that will hold while Time itself holds."

"I fear, Charles, the poor man, of whom Marion has been telling me, is the person at — who became agent for Barker's Assurance Company," said Violet, as they ascended the stairs.

"What of him?" returned Herbert.

"What, but that he is a ruined and a desperate man," replied Marion. "A senseless, prideful creatur it may have been when the world was prospering wi' it. I can judge as much by the bits o' airs it gives itself yet, betimes; but heartless and humbled enough now, poor bit mannikin, and driven daft and donnert by a handless, doinglee, discontentit, repining companion; a wife being aye, Mr. Charles, either a crown of glory and blessing to her husband, or a perpetual blister on his side."

"The same spruce, well-brushed, brisk little fellow, I fear, that bought my phaeton and horses."

"The very same: it makes me angry and it makes me wae—I would you could hear him! But I have heard o' 'the carrige,' or else no! Ane might think he had been born with it on his back, like a snail's shell."

"What has brought Bigsby up to town?"

"To get justice, Sir,—justice o' that unhang'd villain, Burke Barker, who has been the ruin of hundreds. But think ye, he can even get sight o' him? No, no. And there will be mischief among them. The creatur can neither eat nor sleep—although he had anything to eat—and the hopefu' pair never agree a minute, save when they happen to egg on one another's vanity in blaspheming and blawin' about their past grandeur. But that will not pay Madam Tailor's—that's Jack Crippes' auld frien's—lodgings. She is as real a whinstane as ever paved the streets o' Lon'on. Article by article has she pawned, for the poor senseless things, to pay herself; and now they are come to, whether next, the ledly's bracelets or the gentleman's signet-ring on his little finger is to go up the spout—which is to go first! I left them hot at it when I came away. Bracelets will carry it, I think—but if signet-ring does yield to his wife, he is, for certain, to be the death of Mr. Burke Barker. He swears that fifty times a-day; and I'll no say what black despair may rouse even yon small bulk to attempt—Tread on a worm and it will turn. I am truly wae and vexed about the pair, if this provoking vanity would but let me; and would fain have Mr. Gryphon's opinion of their case."

The conversation now took a more general turn; and then Mrs. Linton, duly refreshed with her tea, spoke of returning to town. Marion, though expense was no longer an object to her, had never lost her original mountaineer contempt for the cockney indulgencies of the entire genus of hired conveyances and public street vehicles, save when the modern Omnibus performed for her, at a cheaper rate, the duty of a porter. When she announced her intention of walking to town, Mrs. Herbert, with considerable surprise exclaimed, "The whole distance!"

"And what is it on a fine summer night like this, but a recreation?"

"A fine, sultry, August evening, darkening rapidly, and threatening thunder," said Herbert. "There are, ma'am, but two ways of it: you came all this length with acceptable and seasonable gifts and offerings to please yourself; and now you shall either remain all night with my wife—I know the key of the garrison is safe in your pocket——"

"And pussey's supper provided," slid in Violet, coaxingly.

"I could swear to that: and so, ma'am, you shall either remain where you are, or share my boat to any place you choose that is nearest home—I am absolute."

"Aweel, aweel, Maister Charles—a wilfu' man must have his way. I may get worse bodes ere Beltane; and as hame I must be—I cannot get that Bigsby body out o' my mind—I must just close with your kind offer; that is, if you were really going to hire a pair of oars at any rate, and not going into the expense on my account."

"One pair, or ten pair, we shall do nothing unfitting the dignity of the ancient Scottish nation, and the incipient governor of a duke," said Herbert, buttoning his surtout, and speaking at his mother, who was thus provoked to throw in a few more last words on that overture, which, like a good proposal to an over-nice maiden, if once rejected, might never be repeated—probably to the proud damsel's life-long sorrow and repentance. Violet, meanwhile, fearing a renewal of a subject which might be unsatisfactory to all the parties, with innocent wiles, tried to turn the discourse, by again coaxing Marion to stay. She had so much more to tell her and ask her.

"Na, hinny sweet, dinna ask it," said the old woman smiling her blandest; "for it's ill I like to refuse ye; and I have not slept out o' my ain wee bit hame yonder, in the heart's core o' Lon'on—I wonder what gives me the likin' for it—since I was the proud woman that, after long service with the fremit, was happy enough to own a hame o' my ain."

"It is because you won't break faith with pussey, that you unkindly refuse me," said Violet, in mirthful reproach.

"Not altogether:—ay, ye may laugh; but I believe the creature kens every word I say, and the very hour I promise to be back to her; for she'll snooze and sleep in the easy-chair till she hears the clock;—and my pussey, like mysel', is no aye sleepin' when she's winkin';—and then she'll jump down, and run scuddin' about the floor-head, miauning like a wude thing, and as if she were shod with walnuts:—who can tell what comes and goes in the head o' a dumb creature that has been well treated, and made a friend and companion o'?"

"Pussey's faculties have been remarkably developed by high culture," said Herbert, laughing. "If there were still witches in the land, I know not what might be said of her and another; but I do owe her a spite to-night, since I believe she is the sole cause of your refusing to grant Violet's petition."

"It's not altogether pussey, Mr. Charles:—and your bonny lady must not be offended. I have refused half the nobility of England—the ladies o' them—and their housekeepers, to visit at their grand places and stay till I tired. It's no few o' them I have come across in my time; and they ken weel who can be serviceable to them; and some of them, which is rarer, ken, and are thankful, when they are weel served—no folk better. There's nae upsetting, unsavoury pride about them, like some of your sma'-beer, new-fangled gentles. But for a' that, they ken their ain place better than they understand the like of mine; and as I am just as independent o' them as they are o' me, I bide by fair good e'en and fair good morrow; and am aye ready and willing to requite courtesy with civility and obligingness."

"I know you have refused situations of great trust in several families of distinction," said Herbert.

"Howt ay, have I, half a score o' them, with the greatest grandees o' the batch, and might have made weel out by it, too; that is, if I had not bought a life annuity from Mr. Barker's office with my savings.—But I aye liked my ain ingle-nook; and if I was a servant—and all must serve—it's the Prince o' Wales' motto:—the King on his throne, the judge on his bench, must serve—but there's a choice o' masters; and if I was to be a servant, I preferred that it should be of the public at large."

"Exactly my idea of it, sensible Mrs. Marion," said Herbert. "What think you, mother, is comparable to one's own ingle-nook, and for a master,—the public at large?"

"I see no similarity whatever in the cases, Charles," replied Mrs. Herbert. "What we talked of supposed no dependent, no menial capacity."

"Ay, so they said," put in Marion, not exactly comprehending what was meant. 'You will be entirely your own mistress, quite independent, Mrs. Linton.' But thank your ladyship, or your lordship, as the case might be. I ken ower weel what perfect independence means. It's a stubborn plant that same to grow in a fremit soil; and seldom thrives for the poor man, if the rich has a hand in the culture."

"I should have guessed you for the sort of person who would choose to be your own master," said Herbert.

"Because ye think me a dour, thrawn, head-strong auld wife," replied Marion, laughing, "that must have my own way, and will no bear to be contradicted; and it may be sae; but still and

'Ah, freedom is a noble thing,
It makes a man to be a king.'

Ye remember, Mrs. Charles, hinny, what our country poet says? But freedom does mair: it makes a king to be a man—and yon bit sky-parlour in Fleet Street a blythesomer, brighter bit, than my Lord Duke of Plantagenet's braw housekeeper's room, or the haill suite o' damasque chaumers that are a' at her command in his grand castle."

Mrs. Herbert had never listened to Marion's eloquence with so little profit or patience as upon this occasion. She wondered more than ever how her young friends, but especially Charles, could listen with so much apparent satisfaction to this egotistical maundering in a barbarous dialect. Something might be due to the old lady's clannish attachment; but the Waverley novels, which had smitten the young world with enthusiastic admiration, real or affected, as it might be, for Scottish scenery, Scottish music, plaid ribbons, and smoked whisky, had the credit of having done the rest. It was not easy, she owned, for an Englishwoman to understand it all; and she could only hope that Charles might not live to repent.

The night was sultry and lowering, but calm and still, when Charles Herbert and his fair companion embarked at Chelsea Bridge; the courteous cavalier who, at a brighter hour, might not have courted close observation, taking the greatest care of his charge. Marion's apprehensions of being run down in the dark by the passing craft, were not altogether without foundation; but, by and by, the sky cleared, and a young harvest moon showed a portion of its broad ruddy face. Many years had elapsed since Marion had enjoyed a frequent and clear sight of the well remembered orb; and she was endeavouring to give Charles an idea of what a harvest moon really was, as seen in Scotland, and in particular when rising among the hills of Teviotdale, when her worst fears of perils by water were almost realized.

But before we can accompany the voyagers, we are called for a short time to another group, and now claim our privilege of looking round and shifting the scene to a handsomely, or, more correctly, a sumptuously furnished dining saloon, in which sat Mr. and Mrs. Barker, etc. & etc.—servants counting as nothing in high life at dinner. Both parties here, however, considered servants so much something, that an effort at lively disengaged talk was from time to time made, though both were moody, or, as the silent observers said, "wastly glum."

The well-cut features of Mr. Barker wore an expression of harassing anxiety and corroding care; he looked almost haggard; and, colourless at all times, he was now deathly pale; his complexion contrasting strangely with that of his lady, whose bold black eyes absolutely flared like flambeaux, over her highly rouged cheeks, as she stealthily watched the countenance of her husband, and from time to time addressed to him some trivial sentence, on the self-same principle which makes Lady Macbeth, in the banquet scene, endeavour, by overacted courtesy, to cover the guilty abstraction of her perturbed and moody lord. Here there were present only two most respectful servants. Those, however, are happy families who have nothing at times to conceal from those nobodies, their valets. At last the cloth was taken away; the dessert and wines were placed on the table; and "the gentleman out of livery," or butler, adjusted an elegant screen to protect the glowing face of his lady from the scorching fire; touched the wicks of some of the wax-lights with a light, knowing hand, and glancing round to see that all was in high order, withdrew, leaving the silent pair to unwatched conversation. Mrs. Barker first stole, on the tip of her velvet Parisian slipper, across the room, gently opened the door, found that all was snug, and shutting it, quietly resumed her place, and threw herself back in her chair, waiting until her husband should first speak. He was sunk in reverie, but frequently helped himself to wine, and yet as if unconscious of what he was about. Barker usually allayed his wine with a good deal of Thames—but not to-night.

"Have you seen St. Edward to-day?" asked Mrs. Barker at last.

"No."

"Did you meet Sir George Lees?"

"No; d—n him!—he is shirking me, the selfish scoundrel—St. Edward, too—I don't know what it means; I looked for him twice at the club—at his hôtel—in the park"—

"Could you indeed ride to-day with so much business to annoy you, Barker?"

"Pshaw.—But Emmeline was with you I understand. Have you been at the Herberts? Have you prevailed with Herbert's wife to accede to my plan?"

"Prevail with her, indeed!—oh, simple man, if you could but know what you are saying! Yes, the Herberts will be ready enough to take my sister out of our hands.—Cunning, deceitful hypocrites! . . . You pique yourself on your penetration, sir; are you prepared to hear, that while you fancied yourself most secure, a mine is ready to spring at your feet, which may overwhelm you! Yes, Barker, you may stare; but the game which has cost us so much trouble is fairly in the hands of these Herberts, unless you instantly fall upon some measure to counteract their pretty projects."

"You speak in riddles, ma'am. Deign to be explicit; and for once straightforward,—if you can."

"If I can! but I will keep my temper, Barker, be as insulting as you will. You have made yourself more the object of my pity than resentment."

"Thanks, gracious madam! and now proceed, pray, and keep as near to the unvarnished truth as possible."

"Do not provoke me, Barker; have I not enough to endure?" and the lady applied her laced and embroidered French handkerchief to her moist eyes; yet so heedfully as not to discompose her artificial complexion. It was not customary for Mrs. Barker to wear rouge in her own house or at small parties, but she had been for some days looking yellow and bilious, and was compelled to look her best, as, in the storm of fate, her husband did his holdest.

"That frantic creature from the north, that Bigsby, who has so often been attempting to see you, annoyed me again this morning. I was compelled to threaten to commit him, but that made matters worse; and, to prevent exposure before the servants, I was obliged to promise that you would see him this evening, and I expect him every minute!"—

"Most considerate! He, that person, must be cared for—but never mind him now. Your brother Edmund is likely to call to-night? he likes to have his pill-box on the pavé at all hours."

"I expect Edmund: you are aware of the delicate condition of the countess——. I wish to hear every day what he thinks of her."

"O ay, true—which leads to the main point—the Herberts. I have never yet been able to convince you, Maria, of the importance of obtaining Mrs. Charles Herbert's care for your sister. It will be the salvation of the girl, if anything will, and of all depending—of all interested, I mean, in her proper conduct." Barker would not willingly have permitted the wife of his bosom to perceive how much he felt himself dependent on the noble connexion his address had achieved for her sister.

"You will be gratified, sir, ay, to your heart's content!" replied Mrs. Barker, bitterly enunciating these words from between her set teeth: "O, Barker, how cruel is this corroding scorn with which you speak to me of my family—of my sister!

. . . What think you Emmeline has confessed to me?—I have been in utter misery till you came in, sending over all the town, and bursting during this tedious dinner."

"More, I presume, of that d——d groom-boy—that former lover of hers?—By the Eternal! I could kill her with my own hand!" hissed forth Barker, clenching his hands and teeth; while his naturally pale complexion became livid with the strife of deadly passions.

"Trash—nonsense;—worse, much worse than that childish stuff is this new affair."

"Worse, madam!—worse than an elopement—than utter disgrace to her, the young wanton! and ruin to us?—what the Duke of Plantagenet longs for—would rejoice at; what that fellow, Gryphon, who to-day at a meeting of these cursed proprietors, has baited me till my blood boils—what he would bribe for, plot for. I tell you, nothing less than placing the girl under the immediate and close care of the Herberts can save her reputation, and leave us some chance for the future. This black Assurance business, in which you know, Maria, I have been myself most grossly deceived, has done me inconceivable mischief—even with the booby St. Edward. He is incapable of forming any opinion of himself; but he has learned to interpret the whispers and sneers of the puppies whom he meets.—But what of Emmeline?—has the young vagabond not consented to return to the country and give her no more trouble? I thought I had frightened him sufficiently."

"You are quite on the wrong scent, Barker: Emmy detests the impudent low-born varlet, whose only wish—to which he has probably been put up by some one—is to extort money out of her fears.—And what has he to tell?—That he was an impudent, presuming, young rascal—and poor Emmy, a neglected girl—a child. Mrs. James Stocks spoiled the saucy boy, her pet tiger, and most unfairly neglected Emmeline; to whom she fancied, I suppose, it was enough that she gave food and lodging, while our family was in a state of transition. Thank heaven! the laws of England are more watchful over the rights of a wife, whatever may have been her original station or that of her husband, than to permit St. Edward to shake off my sister, although she should have had twenty lovers before her marriage—that is, if he had any such wish—which, I am sure, he has not, poor simple fond boy!—I wish our worst fears were from that rascal Tom Groombridge. . . . You long for Mrs. Charles Herbert and her mother-in-law assuming the care of my sister—of the Countess St. Edward, for which poor I, it seems, am all unfit. You will be gratified:—and more—Mr. Charles Herbert is to assume the immediate guardianship of Lord St. Edward, for which Mr. Burke Barker is held quite as unqualified as is his wife to be the maternal companion of her own sister."

"What?" shrieked Barker, with a tone and glare which frightened his wife; but instantly commanding himself, he said in a quiet voice, "What do you mean, Maria? I am fatigued to-day—worn and chafed, and in no humour to be trifled with."

"I was never less in the humour of trifling, Barker. We are sold! That cunning fellow Gryphon, the Duke's solicitor,—how I have detested him since the interviews we had at the time of Emmeline's elope—marriage! when his abominable eyes, while he was at the civillest, told me that he did not believe one word I said. I was sure, then, he hated us—and now he has done us; he has scented out those post obits you obtained from St. Edwards for your city friends."

"Done what?" pray, make haste, ma'am, and do for once be straightforward—forget you are a Crippes."

"I will not be angry, Barker," replied the lady, in not the calmest voice. "I pity you, and despise your innuendoes.—The plan is this—Gryphon's plan, though the duke—the old noodle—takes credit for it:—Poor dear Emmy sucked the whole out of her simpleton last night. He, you must know, is in secret communication with his grandmother the duchess, or rather with her favourite maid, who was also St. Edward's nurse. Both the old women spoiled and petted the boy while they tormented him. It is not easy to say which is still the most dotingly fond of him—probably the nurse. The old duchess was bred at Court and delights in all manner of petty strategy. She would scheme to cheat the duke, were it but about the hour or manner in which her poodle is to be washed. Of course he has no idea that she has been guilty of the petty treason of sending messages and money to St. Edward by her trusty back-stairs plenipotentiary, with whom Emmeline has made friends. You know what an ingratiating, what a fascinating creature the countess is, when she wishes to gain any one."

"I know Emmeline's natural cunning transcends;—but no matter—go on Maria."

"Well, the development of the grand scheme is, that St. Edward and his wife shall immediately go abroad, accompanied by the whole Herbert family; travel for three or four years in a manner which becomes the rank and prospects of the parties; while the St. Edwards shall have all the while—mark the cruelty, the atrocity, the villany of the scheme,—no intercourse whatever—not the slightest, with us or with my family,—with Emmeline's family, cut off from all possible connexion with us for three or four years,—for ever! I may say,—for if this hold, St. Edward and his wife are lost to us.—He is to pledge his honour to his grandfather and the other friends of the family, that we shall be to him as utter strangers,—and she—my sister, oh, monstrous! is to be graciously allowed the means of making some paltry provision for her parents of a few hundreds a-year, if—mark the condition—they agree to receive it in the country and through Mr. Gryphon."

Mrs. Barker paused, alarmed at the stony, fixed look of her husband, who said, "Go on—tell me all," and yet relapsed into musing.

"Is it not enough?—good mercy, Burke, what more would you have?—Herbert is to have a thousand a-year of salary for himself, and I know not how much for his ladies.—They travel in the first style—and the most brilliant reversionary prospects are held out.—But let them alone. Emmeline is but a child, and will soon forget us; St. Edward, the most facile of young men. Give them these few years and he is the Herberts' property for life—the estates that you were to manage, Barker—the seat in Parliament that you were to hold—see now the event! But, goodness, love, how horrible you look! Have I done it? Did I not, as an affectionate wife, warn you against the awful responsibility of obtaining that match for my sister? Am not I the person, of all others, most to be pitied? But, no, no!" screamed the lady in another mood, and starting to her feet, "this infamous conspiracy, to tear my beloved sister—my dear brother-in-law—from their country and from us all; to crush our hearts—to wound us through our tenderest affections, never shall take effect. Monsters! Nature and law alike disclaim it. Can you not write something in the papers, Barker,—you who are so clever—to defeat it?"

"Be quiet, and sit down," said Barker sternly; and shading his brow and eyes with his hand, he was again lost in tumultuous thought. Too surely, as his wife had said, the ground had slipped from under him; yet such, in a mind of high intelligence, is the involuntary homage which error pays to rectitude, that, unlike his wife, he could not meanly heap reproaches upon the Herberts. That they would at once close with these tempting and most advantageous proposals he made no question; indeed, it never occurred to him to doubt; but neither did he question that every part of Herbert's conduct had been most fair and honourable. He had but one hope. It was placed, not in Herbert's new-born philosophy or his love of independence, but upon his imagined weak side; his overstrained delicacy on imaginary points of honour; and that overweening if latent pride for his wife, which might make him, if properly stimulated, revolt at the idea of her becoming even principal lady of the bed-chamber to Duchess Emmeline, and thus render the whole plan abortive.

Barker was roused from thought by violent ringing and knocking; and in a half minute the tall servant came in to say, that the country person, whom Mrs. Barker had appointed to come at half-past eight, was waiting Mr. Barker in the Statue-room. Barker nodded, and the man withdrew.

"Frantic idiot!—but I will see him; and provide for him too. There is a class of people—the very poorest creatures in intellect—with whom it is most dangerous to have anything to do."—Mr. Barker's phrase would have been more correct in the slang sense, "most dangerous to do." "A man of any sense, who knew the world," he continued, "would have been quiet under his losses, or sought satisfaction at law: this drivelling shrimp runs about from coffee-house to coffee-house; nay, he goes to the newspapers, and does more mischief than ten men of any judgment would allow themselves to do." Another visitor was announced:—"Ha! Edmund,—sit with your sister till I give audience to a lunatic."

Dr. Edmund Crippes, who, in virtue of smooth manners, a handsome equipage, never off the streets and squares of the West End, great family industry, one fashionable, dashing, young patient, to break the ice with, and a most judicious and rather delicate system of puffing,—was become a rising accoucheur in the fashionable world, a man whose fortunes rested apparently upon a more secure foundation than those of any other member of his Talented Family, provided that he played his cards well. All depended on that, as his brother-in-law sometimes condescended to tell him. "There is Jack, your brother," Barker would say, "with much brighter natural parts—with many unquestionable accomplishments—gone to the dogs—and will go. No saving him. He has no discretion—no self-command—no self-respect. That foreign lottery business, which in other hands promised so fair, is blown, by his arrant folly; and himself—but I wash my hands of him—there is no serving a person of his kind—and I will not farther share his disgrace."

"Nor I," said the stately physician. "I shall contribute, like you and Polly, my mite, to send him to the United States; but if Jack will come back to London, to disgrace his family, I know what we should do."

The learned Doctor, seeing Barker absorbed, now began to make his diurnal report of the young countess's hopeful state, in confidential whispers to his sister. Lady St. Edward was certainly enroute; an event of nearly equal importance to the House of Plantagenet and the Talented Family of Crippes. Her accouchement, if all went fair, might be expected to take place in about seven months." "Yes, Polly," said the facetious practitioner, "I shall have to congratulate you on your nephew, the heir to ducal honours, some time in February next. I shall have Emmy and young

Mrs. William White, the rich old banker's young wife, (who takes such deep interest in the countess's progress,) confined in the same week. Tolerable work that; but Emmeline is really likely to be a good nest egg to me;—all the young wives connected with the city are so proud to be attended by a countess's physician. I shall certainly raise my fees forthwith."

"I wish you joy of her, if it last," said Mrs. Barker—always piqued at being thrown into the shade, though but for a moment, by the younger sister, whose fortune she had made.

"Polly cross and Barker silent," said the humorous Doctor. It was but of late days that Dr. Edmund had ventured to address his "intellectual" brother-in-law without the formal Mr. The omission was symptomatic. He went on—"But Emmy's first child may be a girl;—your sex are always forward, Polly,—but no matter, there will be plenty of 'em—fine thriving planta genistas. My mother had eleven of us, had she not, Poll? If the first prove a girl in spite of me, it may anticipate my time by from thirty to forty-eight hours;—your sex are always in a hurry to make a figure in the world, Mrs. Barker."

"Goodness, Edmund! what a chatter-box you have become—you who formerly durst not open your lips before Mr. Barker; and how indelicately you chatter—knowing how very fastidious my husband is—and he is not quite well to-night. . . . My dear, you have surely forgotten the man waits you. . . . Don't you think, Edmund, that the countess should have other professional advice besides yours? You are but young in the profession; and there is all the difference in the world between the Countess St. Edward and those city women you attend." Loudly as Mrs. Barker sounded her brother's praises, where so great an interest was at stake as her auntship to a duke, she had misgivings, which, however, Dr. Edmund treated with the utmost coolness, though Mrs. Barker's appeal to her husband at once gained him to her side. Mr. Barker indeed professed the greatest confidence in Dr. Edmund's skill and science, but for his own sake solely, he considered the responsibility too great, and thought that other advice was desirable.

While this important point was debated, the unhappy provincial Ex-Agent of the Middlesex and Surrey Philanthropic Assurance got out of all patience. He had been wandering in the neighbourhood of Barker's house half the day; exhausted, highly nervous, and in the most irritable condition. Without even the means of procuring proper refreshment, and unable to return to his distant lodging and come back at the appointed hour, he lingered on for hours that seemed like heavy years, until the imagined author of his misery, having fared sumptuously, should condescend at last to give his victim an audience. About seven in the evening, becoming exceedingly faint, he went into a place—not a gin-palace, but a gin-crib, frequented by cab-drivers and servants at livery—and paid his last twopence for a glass of gin, and a morsel of bread. While he slowly sipped the unusual and harsh beverage, which supplied fuel to his previous nervous excitement, a gong was heard booming over the neighbouring gardens.

"My master's summons," said a person, who, like Bigsby, was seeking refreshment in this resort.

"Mr. Barker's place you are in now?" inquired the keeper of the gin-crib.

"He, the villain, the scoundrel!—is Barker called to his fat dinner by a gong, as if he were a lord?" cried the little quivering man, to whom, in his present state, this trifling circumstance was as the last drop which makes the full cup overflow. The man stared, but took up his change and walked off,—by no means disposed to become the volunteer champion of a master considerably in arrear with all his servants' wages, and of whom many queer stories were abroad.

Bigsby afterwards wandered about until the appointed hour, when he entered Mr. Barker's dwelling, if not intoxicated, yet under violent excitement; which increased, as he hurriedly paced the Statue-room, planning what stinging things he was to say; wondering what satisfaction he might obtain, and if he could get—provided he should condescend to accept of it—any part of his lost money to carry home to his wife, and their dunning landlady. There was little to soothe a man in this mood in those surrounding objects of expense, taste, and luxury, all of which were procured, as he morbidly fancied, by his ruin. The sound of the gong, when he recalled his own silenced humble dinner bell, and his incapacity to procure a meal, had awakened the lurking devil in his breast, and the other marks of Mr. Barker's splendour did not contribute to lay the demon to rest. After waiting in the Statue-room—the very name of which was maddening—for probably five minutes, which seemed an age, he furiously rung the bell: "Does your master know that I wait?—Mr. Robert Bigsby of —."

"Mr. Barker will be here presently, sir."

"Ha! very fine and handsome—those, those mirrors—those silk damask curtains, and bullion fringe!—May I have a glass of water?—What's that—what's that?" and he pointed to a statue of the size of life or larger, which stood in a recess behind the marble pillars at the end of the room.

"That I believe, sir, is a statue of Justice, done by a Frenchman of the name of Canova, which, I am told, cost Mr. Barker £1500 or £2000. My master has a fine taste for Virtue."

"No, sir, it is not Justice, sir; though she is blind. That's the devil, sir—the black devil—ha! At him—at him! It's Barker. There's his gong again. It splits my ears. They ring—ring." And the frantic man rushed forward, and smashed at the pieces of choice sculpture in the room, on which the small cane which he carried fell innocuous, but in his frenzy he shattered one large mirror, before the servant could rush upon and overpower him. This he would have been unable to do for any length of time had not Mr. Barker and another servant heard the uproar, and come to his assistance. There was now no doubt of the stranger's madness; yet the shrewd varlets present were not slow to extract a meaning from his incoherent ravings, which were anything but favourable to the honour of their master.

In the meanwhile, Barker, believing him mad with liquor as well as with passion, which he partly was, soothed him as he best could, and promptly decided on his own line of conduct.

"You tell me, sir—nay, take more water—you are excited, Mr. Bigsby—it will cool you and do you good—you tell me Mr. Charles Herbert warned you against this bubble office,—would to God, sir, he had warned me—who, in purse and reputation, am a much deeper sufferer than yourself. Mr. Herbert is one of my oldest and best friends; will you accompany me now, late as the hour is, to his private residence near Chelsea, and let us try whether his opinion of the things of which you complain, and which, upon my honour, I deeply regret, does not change your mind as to my share of this damnable business? . . . I have a business appointment at my chambers at nine, and am behind already; but if you will take a crush in my cab—we can, when I have finished my business, take a boat, and reach Herbert's residence before ten.—Come! I should be sorry to see you labour under such an unhappy prepossession for another night."

Bigsby looked anxiously in the face of the speaker;—could he trust to him? and yet what motive could Barker have to deceive him in the proposed visit.

"Come, come—Herbert understands business, and something of the rubs of life too: let him be umpire—and, by heaven, if he gives it against me, I am ready to share with you to the last shilling I possess."

"That is fairly spoken Mr. Barker—I shall attend you as you say: and my poor old aunt, who brought me up—who was more than a mother to me—whom I compelled, idiot that I am! to take her trifling savings out of the hands of the Duke of Plantagenet's steward, for which his Grace generously allowed her five per cent. as she was the widow of a favourite servant—to take her little all from that safe keeping and invest!"

"Say no more, Mr. Bigsby," interrupted Barker—"I assure you I was deeply affected by reading your statement of the good old lady's case;—the Duke of Plantagenet's head-gardener's widow was she?—don't let another word of it transpire,—you are aware how closely I am by marriage connected with the Plantagenets: I may have something to say in the management of my brother-in-law's property by and by—and some pretty pickings to dispose of too:—come, my good fellow, you allow yourself to be too much overcome; the old lady's annuity I shall pay out of my own pocket—on condition that not another kush is heard about it, till the Company's affairs are wound up; I do not despair of a good dividend yet."

Bigsby shook his head, incredulous, and Mr. Barker went out, and in two minutes obtained a formal certificate from his brother-in-law Dr. Edmund Cripps.

"O, mad as a march-hare! I can testify that—to smash your beautiful mirrors, and destroy so much valuable property! But, really, Barker, you give yourself too much trouble about him: can't you send for the Police? Know his friends in the North—Pooh!—who is to care for the relations of all their friends who choose to come up to London and take delirium tremens? And are you safe alone with him, Barker? You are a man of great physical courage—but to go alone, and by water, with a maniac at this hour!"

"Not a word—the servants"—and Barker made a signal of silence. "I must enjoin secrecy the most strict; there is always implied disgrace in such attacks: and if, as I hope, a few weeks restore the poor fellow's intellects—never great—no one need be the wiser. Don't sit for me to-night, Maria; I need not bid you be silent and secret."

With the certificate in his pocket, which enabled him, as he imagined, with the aid of a trifling sum of money, to deposit his companion in any private asylum for lunatics which best suited his purpose, Mr. Barker embarked with Bigsby, giving the boatmen private orders where to halt. He had already apprised the keeper of a private asylum for the insane, which had a gate and stairs opening to the Thames, of his approach with a patient whose case demanded the utmost caution and secrecy. The house, surrounded by high-walled gardens, had fifty years before been the villa of a nobleman: and, in the twilight, it might easily, for one half-hour, pass for the residence of Mr. Herbert. More time was not needed: with the keeper he anticipated no great difficulty; and the patient was for the moment certainly mad. To make this more sure, Dr. Edmund Cripps, who had no doubt himself, had got one of his black brethren of the faculty to subscribe his own certificate.

Another half-hour past, and they were fairly afloat on the Thames, Bigsby muttering to himself—"I'll hear what Mr. Herbert has to say—he warned me—he is a gentleman—and though all the world were against me, I can't be worse—I can't be worse: poor Jane!—she is ill, poor girl—and we parted in anger, as too often of late; but I may have cheering news for her when I return; and the landlady shall have my ring before her bracelets—poor Jane!" He sunk into silence, from which he was roused by the trivial circumstance of Barker unconsciously, and with little music in his mind, humming a fashionable opera tune, which wound him to rage.

"Ay, you can sing, sir—you can sing; you live in a fine house, drive your cab, and dress your lady, and strike your gong—while my wife, sir, Jane Stokes Simmons, born and bred in affluence, is sitting, cold and hungry, in our unpaid lodging." Barker, at a loss what to reply, whistled with affected carelessness. The sounds appeared to jar on the exasperated nerves of Bigsby. He ground his teeth, and entreated Barker to desist from torturing him by those sounds, or he should go mad. Mr. Barker at once desisted, somewhat astonished to hear that he had been whistling; yet, so absent was he, that in another minute he unconsciously repeated the offence; and Bigsby started up in fury and broke forth in a wild strain of execration and imbraiding, telling the boatmen, to whom he appealed, of his wrongs and losses, and of the despair and misery to which he had been reduced by that man before them.

Barker, fixed in his purpose, and knowing that less than another hour would rid him of this petty source of annoyance for as long as he chose, restrained the expression of his indignation, and entreated and expostulated with his violent accuser, but in vain. "I will tell these men—I will tell them," he cried aloud, "of your damnable villany;—they are Englishmen,—they are honest, hard-working, hard-faring men;—they love fair play:—they have, like me, wives and children,—but they do not, like me, see them naked, houseless, and starving,—and through you, sir, you!—false, treacherous, smooth-tongued, remorseless hypocrite:—called to your sumptuous meal by your gong. Do its sounds drown the cries of your victims? Yes, boatmen, this fellow—this upstart beggar, who married the daughter of a fiddler, and made a lady of her, is called to his dinner by a gong, as if he were a duke, while Jane Stocks Simmons"—

"Push on my lads," said Barker calmly—"the poor wretch is—as you see:—push on!"

"You would say that I am mad, would you, scoundrel?" cried little Bigsby, who seemed like one inspired, and springing to the throat of his enemy, he called out—"it is as false as the hell that yawns for you."

"Sit down, sir," replied Barker, beginning to lose temper, and pushing his puny assailant off—"Sit down in quiet, or by Heaven I will pitch you overboard—would you upset the boat? Strike out, my men, and here is a crown for you."

"Thank you, thank you, Mr. Barker," was the ready reply; and Barker, finding himself recognised, calmly said—"If this excited person has anything of which he may justly complain, the tribunals of the country are open, and I am prepared to meet him there."

Villain, again! cold, insulting, stinging, damned villain,"—cried the frenzied dwarf, shivering violently with emotion—"The grave is open—the Thames is open:—At the only tribunal to which misery like mine can appeal are you ready to meet me?—Then ho! for it." With the energy of madness he again clutched at Barker; and after a moment's grapple the little skiff heeled, and both were plunged into the river. One man, to save himself, sprung into Herbert's boat, which was passing at that moment, and the other dexterously recovered the balance of his own, though it was now half-filled with water.

CHAPTER XXIII.

We now return to the homeward voyagers, whom we left on their prosperous way, admiring the young harvest moon rising broad and red through the hazy atmosphere.

In a boat passing in the opposite direction, and tugged slowly against stream and tide, loud and discordant voices were heard by Mrs. Linton and Herbert, as of those of men in anger; and soon words of fearful and threatening import were distinguished, while between them and the murky horizon, figures were imperfectly seen for an instant swaying hither and thither as they grappled; until, while one man sprung into Herbert's boat, with a plunge that made it heel, and placed the passengers in imminent danger, several seemed to be precipitated into the water.

Herbert's boatmen were at first enraged at the intruder, and shoved lustily off, in order to ensure their own safety:—"Halt!" shouted Herbert,—"ship your oars—you may strike down the drowning men,—a sovereign—a couple of them—to him who shall first rescue a fellow-creature!"

"Three, four, five, ten o' them!" shouted Marion, throwing out her arms like a sybil inspired—"Oh what's world's gear to the dear life of perishing sinners! Oh what awfu' words were yon! . . . There's a human face a bit ahead, bobbins like a herrin buoy;—Lord guide us!—there, there—now yonder;—ye flit about sae in this bit cockle shell;—ye'll surely whamle us a'!"

"Where? where?" cried Herbert, who had seized an oar, and who made the little vessel wheel and quiver in rapid evolutions, with probably more bravery than nautical skill, though the boatmen, keeping a sharp look-out, did not remonstrate with him, nor deprive him of a post, which said something for his Cambridge science.

"It was yonder—yonder," cried Marion, pointing—"and there—there again—just below us; I'm sure, I could swear it was the poor little man, the tailor's lodger, that I saw first. Oh, sirs, strive hard; and as I'm a true woman, ye shall not lack your reward both here and hereafter." Herbert and the men pulled stoutly for a few strokes in the direction specified, but nothing was to be seen.

The cry of "men in the river," had now spread wide and far, and craft of all kinds, some of them with lamps, were already skimming about in every direction. Yet some minutes had elapsed before one man was picked up, apparently little injured, and who had probably, after the first stunning plunge, sustained himself by swimming.

"Do I owe my providential escape to you, Mr. Herbert?" said this dripping person, rescued when hoisted into the boat, "your passing has been most critically timed for me; a maniac got into the boat with me, and had nearly drowned us all."

"Lord-sake man, if ye have the heart of a man, help the other folks to save life, and dinna think Mr. Herbert will listen to you while there's a darg like this at his door," cried Marion.

"What did you say, ma'am?—I do not, I beg pardon, perfectly understand Scotch," replied Barker, dripping and shivering, yet with a gentle sneer. . . . "For heaven's sake, land me at all events—as well be drowned as die of cold:—your chance of picking up the lunatic is about as good as that of fishing up the Royal George.—He has been in the water a full quarter of an hour now."

Herbert, who was anxiously looking out in every direction, and calling to the people in the other boats, made no reply. He indeed began to despair; but he would not cease in his humane endeavours. Once or twice he flattered himself that he heard the voice of the missing man—now here, now there; and once a floating oar, which he had himself thrown out, deceived him. The boatmen gave their opinion, that the tide and current must by this time have borne the man a good way off, and that, if found at all, it must be farther down the river, and probably with life extinct.

"That is the common sense of it, Mr. Herbert," said the impatient Barker. "Don't, for God's sake, kill a living and sane man for the chance of recovering a drowned lunatic."

Herbert was still silent: whatever sympathy he might have felt with the uncomfortable plight of his former friend, was neutralised by this speech. "Land me as quickly as possible, boatmen," proceeded Barker, in a more imperious tone; for he was irritated by Herbert's silence.

"The boat is the lady's and the gentleman's," said one of the rowers, more inclined to obey his pay-masters than this imperious stranger.

"Once again I command you to row to the shore," said Barker haughtily. "I shall have you before a magistrate, fellow, for your insolence; and for thus detaining me at the risk of my life."

"The boat is the company's, sir, and not ours," growled the senior boatman.

"Good sake, man! you were but even now within an ace of eternity yourself. You may surely have some compassion for another perishing sinner, who, mad if he be, has maybe had good cause to drive him mad.—Do you think it is any pleasure to Mr. Herbert to be hazing and whirling about i' the dark, on the Thames here, in a bit cockle shell, if he could help it? If the poor man be daft, he is just so much more the object of pity, especially to those who have brought him, poor soul! to such a pass."

"You seem well informed of his affairs, ma'am," replied Barker in a sneering tone.

"If all Lon'on be not so, it's not for want of his exposing the source of his calamity, high and low: I mean the unhang'd rascals he has been the dupe of—name and surname."

Those names were not inquired after by the former speaker; and now a cry came across the river, "Picked him up!" and Herbert's barge was stoutly pulled to the landing-place on the Surrey side, whither the body of the poor man had been borne.

The whole party now landed. "You are now at liberty to proceed whither you will, Mr. Barker," said Herbert, speaking for the first time to his old acquaintance; and he civilly added, "the sooner you change your wet clothes the better. . . . Carry the body carefully into the first respectable tavern—get a surgeon—all the help possible—fly!"

"I'll go myself for help," cried Marion.

"And I," said Herbert, "will see that all possible is done here."

"I owe you everlasting thanks for the efforts you made to save me from the consequences of that unhappy maniac's frenzy," said Barker, while his teeth involuntarily chattered from cold and agitation. "Life, I fear, is utterly extinguished in the poor wretch—your efforts will prove useless."

"I hope not," replied Herbert. "But no means shall be wanting to restore him. Who are his friends? He was in your company."

"I know little of him save his evident madness.

I deserve my ducking for my folly in permitting him, in his excited state, to get into the boat with me."

"We have searched his pockets," said the boatman who helped to carry the insensible body. "Devil a ha'porth in 'em, save a bundle of wet, gilt bills of the famous Surrey and Middlesex Bubble Company—one of its gulls belike, who, as he could not get on by wind, tried to get off by water!"

The expression of Barker's face, the basilisk glance that shot from his deep-set eye upon the speaker, while he said, "You are a wag, are you?" were not lost on Herbert.

In another minute, surgeons and apothecaries, to the number of a round dozen, hearing that a humane rich gentleman had picked up a drowning man, crowded to the tavern, where every means were employed for more than an hour and a half to restore animation. Meanwhile, Barker, wet as he was, lingered with Marion in the bar of the tavern, spell-bound, as it appeared, to the spot. He seemed to feel that his continued presence until the scene closed, was necessary to his own defence.

As waiters and assistants occasionally passed the bar, they were eagerly interrogated on the condition of the patient by Mrs. Marion and Mr. Barker, though from widely different motives. Their reports varied; but at nearly twelve o'clock, Herbert himself descended, and sadly announced to Marion, that he had at last surrendered all hope.

"The will of the Lord be done!—and oh, the poor widow yonder!"

Mr. Herbert was somewhat surprised to find Barker still here. That gentleman had, however, partially dried his clothes, by standing before the kitchen fire, into which he had thrown the useless certificate, carried within his glove, which was to consign poor Bigsby to a mad-house. He was now, in safe enough custody.

"Mr. Barker, I am afraid you have neglected yourself," said Herbert, touched by the appearance of the shivering man, who looked almost as like a corpse as the body laid out above stairs.

"I wished to see the end of it. . . . The miserable, frantic creature who has paid so dearly for his folly, was an agent of that infamous company, of whose real character I, upon my honour, Mr. Herbert, knew as little as the unhappy person himself. In a professional capacity—one strictly professional—I was connected with the proprietors—scoundrels and swindlers!—for a short time, to my cost; and the poor wretch fancied he owed his embarrassments to me. He was!"

"I know what he was," said Herbert, coldly; and, turning to the mistress of the tavern, he gave her his card.

"And the funeral, sir, and the crowner?" inquired the landlady. "I do not see how our great room can be given up to-morrow for the 'quest, unless you have all over by one o'clock, as we are bespoken for a dance and a wedding-party."

"I hope that can be arranged."

"I'll take charge of the funeral in the meantime," said Marion, briskly, "and of the boatmen and the doctors. I have plenty of siller in my pouch the night, by chance, Mr. Charles; and ye maun just let me for aince be your banker;" and Marion cheerfully counted out her cash, and found the different expectants more moderate than she had anticipated "Lon'on cormorants and river sharks" likely to be.

"I must let you have your own way, my good friend," said Herbert, half smiling at the airs of business and modest patronage with which she proceeded. . . . "You have been kept far too late out; and now I must conduct you home: a walk will do us both good: a most painful duty, I fear, still awaits you."

"The widow!—ay, poor, yirming thing; she has gotten a real cause of repining and sorrow now."

"Will you have the goodness, ma'am, to take charge for me of a few pieces, to be applied to the use of the unfortunate woman to whom you allude," said Barker, feeling in the breast-pocket of his surtout for the pocket-book already sunk deep in the mud of the Thames. A sharp spasm contracted his features. He grew blind, and reeled as from a mortal blow. "Great Heavens! I am a ruined man!"

Herbert hastily supported him. He gasped for breath. A cold perspiration burst from his forehead.

"I fear you have met with a loss, Mr. Barker," said Herbert, gently, "but thank God for the preservation of life."

"I—I am undone! utterly undone! Every farthing—every document which I possessed that could," he paused, "that could clear my good name from the infamous imputations heaped upon me, was collected into that pocket-book; the contents of which I proposed to lay before you and Mr. Gryphon to-morrow. The swindlers have fled with their booty, and I am left here in disgrace."

He dashed his open hand on his forehead, unable to conclude the sentence, which Mrs. Marion mentally did for him, by thinking—"and I have lost my share of the plunder in the Thames. Light come, light go." It was clear that, whatever might be the cause, Barker's was no feigned anguish. He was hardly able to support himself to the cab, in which Herbert sent him home, considerably paying the hire in advance.

"God bless you! Mr. Herbert; inquire for me to-morrow."

"That's a fey man," said Marion, taking the arm which her cavalier kindly offered. "It's no a common wanness of colour yon; and the sharp traits of the face, and the wild flichterin' gledes of the eyne. I sat and watched him while ye were better employed, Mr. Charles. But I'm no tiring ye? I'm little used oxtiring with young gentlemen. I have not been seen cleeked with man kind since I saw my bonny protty-fee, Jack Crippes, off by the Berwick smack. I'm a highly favoured auld wife wi' my beaux. . . . But yon for-spoken man, Mr. Charles?"

"Pooh! 'long ere the devil'—you remember your national proverb?"

"Ay, 'lang ere the deil dee by the dyke side,' but it comes at length, sir; that dread Tribunal to which the despairing creatur cited him—that day of awful reckoning—that day of consuming wrath:—Prepare us and be our Stay, sinners as we all are!" There was a solemn pause, ere Marion resumed. "And to think how a gracious Providence brings things round; making the wickedness of man work its righteous will, and that you, sir, and your dear leddy, should be preferred and honoured, and brought again to wealth and respect,—but that ye never wanted,—and set in high places, and all mainly in and through the wicked contrivances and mawhinations of those who have bitten their ain bridle."

"So you, too, have heard of our promotion?" said Herbert, in some surprise; "and you congratulate me, it would seem, upon it."

"Mr. Gryphon was so good as to give me an inkling to-day, kennin the joy it would be to my heart to hear of any prosperity that might befall you or yours, sir."

"Have you so soon forgot your quotation of this evening, you fickle woman!"

'O freedom is a noble thing.'

"Are you at that, Mr. Charles! Well, ye may be in the right. After the awful and warning schene we have witnessed this same night, sir, what seems the value of this fleeting warld, and all that it inherits? . . . And here we are at hame:—and oh! how am I to tell that friendless, feckless woman of her bereavement."

"Gently as you can, dear ma'am,—I shall write her friends to-night, and call for their addrees from you early in the morning. We must, I fancy, be prepared to attend the inquest on the poor fellow."

"How will Mr. Burke Barker stand that ordeal, Mr. Charles? how look on the corpse?"

"Barker has nerve enough —"

"And he'll need it.—But take you care of yourself, sir,—ye got a good sprinkling o' Thames water yourself,—mind I'm answerable for your safety to the leddies. Take a drop brandy and water, as hot as ye like, ere ye go to bed; were I myself the night, I would insist on your stepping up stairs to my Patmos, and preeing a Scotch brandy-posset."

Herbert gently smiling at these incongruous images, they thus parted; Marion letting herself in with her latch-key.

The tailor, his family, and lodgers, had probably been long asleep; but on the second landing-place a light twinkled under the door of Mrs. Bigsby's chamber. Marion tapped; and the door was partially opened by that person, who, in a sharp but muffled voice, whispered—

"Pretty time of night, Big; how can you look me in the face?—leaving me alone in this odious hole, all day long, dying of one of my sick-head-aches, and no one to offer me nothing. Are you not ashamed of yourself!" Poor Mrs. Bigsby had evidently been nursing her wrath, or trying to do so.

"Madam, you are under a sad mistake,—I am not your gudeman. But be patient and peaceful; on your husband's account ye will not be much oftener detained from needful rest here or elsewhere." Marion knew that the unfortunate pair had parted in bitter anger; the wife full of repining,—the husband vowing that her upbraidings and reproaches were the keenest-felt of his sufferings, and what cruelly aggravated all else.

"O, good la! It is the old Scotch lady. I fancied all the lodgers a-bed,—I was watching for Bigsby, meaning to give him a good scolding, in fun you know,—all in fun . . . Though matters have gone against him, there is not a better or kinder husband in London,—though I do love to tease him a bit betimes."

"I am truly glad to hear you speak so of him," said Marion.

"Yes, indeed, I assure you; and I know that papa and my uncles, though they are excessively angry with Bigsby, will soon come round, and make things straight again. We were so happy, and had everything so nice about us;—I had a fortune of £1500, ma'am, and more to get. Had you seen us at—, ma'am, as Mr. Herbert and his lady did.—No wonder I feel the change,—nobody knows us here,—there I could have got everything I wanted from every shop in town. I had only to say, send in such and such to Mrs. Robert Bigsby.—You heard the row, I daresay, this morning,—these London rooms are such wretched lath and plaster things! It was unreasonable of him, don't you think, to ask me to give away my bracelets,—a bridal present?—but I have done it, ma'am. The landlady,—what a horrid woman she is! must have money,—I was never asked for money before in my whole life, till I came to London,—the bracelets are gone, and I don't miss them. I knew my poor husband was to be fagging about all day, trying to find out that black villain Barker, who has been our ruin,—so I got in something nice for supper, and a pint of wine, poor fellow,—he needs a drop of comfort,—and I am sure it is not his fault either, he is so late; for he was always kind and attentive to me. I had a letter from my eldest sister yesterday; she thinks papa is relenting,—they have the children, and my father is very fond of them. I am the youngest of three daughters, and the first married. I was a great favourite once. But it is a sad thing for a married woman to have to go back on her own family, with such burdens. My mother thinks we should come home,—that is, come nearer home. Bigsby's poor aunt I told you of, will receive us, till something better turn up,—yet he was so very provoking about the bracelets, that I did not tell him this morning; indeed he put it quite out of my head."

"That, madam, was a sore pity," said Marion solemnly. "Had you told the distressed man of the glimmering light a gracious Providence was casting up out of dark despair—"

"Hist!" interrupted the unconscious widow, "that must be my husband now,—I will tell him,—I know it is wrong to be so impatient with him; but I must scold him first;—was it not shocking to leave me in this odious place all day—quite by myself, with no one to speak to me,—and the nice supper I got in, waiting so very long?"

Marion's melancholy duty seemed every moment to become more difficult. Silly and almost perverse as the young woman was, she was not altogether without heart, nay there might even be strong attachment under the bickerings and mutual recriminations in which the silly pair indulged,—though there certainly was not that strong yet tender tie which is formed for the day of adversity. While Marion ruminated on how she was to disclose the awful truth, the house-bell was rung repeatedly and with violence; and the tailor, under the customary London alarm of "Fire," leapt from bed and pulled up his front window.

"That cannot be Bigsby. . . . O, something has happened!" said the alarmed wife rising, and beginning to tremble. Marion grasped her hand, and kept her on her seat, when she would have run out, and begged her to wait, and they would soon hear what was the matter. After a short sharp colloquy over the window, Marion's mortal antipathy, the tailor's wife, in only her night-dress, and the old plaid shawl which seemed her prescribed costume on all nocturnal alarms, abruptly knocked sharply upon the door and then bounced in.

"La, Ma'am, you are not a-bed then, and Missis Linton with you! Do you know what has happened? Your husband has drowned himself in the River."

"Inhuman wra-atch!" exclaimed Marion, extending her still vigorous arms to sustain the stricken woman, who fell into a deadly swoon.

"Goodness gracious, here's a to do!—wern't they a quarrelling like dog and cat from morn to night?"

"Draw up the window, woman—let in air—get a bason of cold water:—Poor silly, forlorn thing!" and Marion pressed the insensible body to her kind breast. "May be ye judge her by your ain stout heart, madam; that could take a husband's death more lightly." The tailor now entered half-dressed.

"Help me up stairs, Mr. Snipson, with this poor creature! I'll take charge o' her now until she is in better keeping."

The tailor who seemed at least in this instance to have more feeling than his lady, prepared to second Marion's purpose—contented to lose as a lodger the poor widow of the poor suicide, as he could retain her few goods for what was due to him of rent.

"I should not have disturbed the poor dawdle," said the tailor's lady, somewhat ashamed of herself. "if orders had not been wanted about the body: the people of the Ship can't have their best parlour taken up without knowing who is to pay. That's but reasonable you will allow, ma'am, for people in a public way."

"I thought that was settled," cried Marion indignantly. "I am answerable," she proceeded with great energy—"Mrs. Marion Linton, householder, No. 999, Fleet Street, is answerable for all just and reasonable charges."

This was perfectly satisfactory to the person below. The poor woman was carried up stairs to Marion's apartments, still in a dead swoon; but by dint of the efforts of the whole party, who kindly co-operated, she began to give signs of returning sensibility; and then suddenly remembering her condition, she fell into a violent passion of hysterical grief, from the mere exhaustion of which she at last dropped asleep. Marion now requested her neighbours to go away, while the tailor's lady pressed her services, and protested that she would sit till day-light by the new-made widow in case of whatever might occur.

"Who could have fancied the diddle-daddle body would take on so about it!"

"You, perhaps!—a Lon'on-bred leddy o' strong nerves like you, could stand the drowning o' a gudeman better!" said Marion, sarcastically.

"Yes, faith, or the hanging either, had Snip and I lived like them," returned the woman, laughing. "Especially, ma'am, if I had a chance of my old admirer, Crippes, casting up to comfort me in my widowhood. I so like to tease Snipson about poor Jack—where is he at present, ma'am? Is it true that he has a sister really married to a lord?"

"It is so said," growled Marion.

"I'm pretty sure of it, and I'll tell you how."

"Another time, if you please—I'll not detain you now. Jack, your friend, will cast up sooner than a bow o' meal—never fear him; and I am anxious now that this poor creature should get a sound sleep."

"Oh, beg your pardon, ma'am. I fancy my absence is considered as good as my company," said Mrs. Snipson, rising.

"Ye have said it, mem. I think these are the first words, Mrs. Snipson, we have exchanged for some months; and I have no desire to renew an acquaintance, dropt for good reasons; but as ye are here on my floor-head, I may as weel warn ye, that, if you can accommodate yourself elsewhere, I have other use for my premises."

"Oh, by all manner of means, ma'am. Our money is surely as good as your lodging any day—plenty of houses in London, ma'am."

"So much the better for the tenants, mem," returned Marion, leading the way to the door, both ladies parting, the very pink of politeness.

"That's the razor-grinding voiced cockney woman I never could thole," was Marion's soliloquy. "Ay, maukin, ye are mewing—did ye think I was taking no notice o' you? Can ye not make out what a' this trimash in our lanely, quiet dwallin' is about? A picture of mortal life, pussey, in a sma' way. . . . And so ye aye hide yourself below the big chair from Lucky Snipson. Ye are like your mistress wi' that quean, ye limmer—that very quintessence o' Lon'on impudence and Lon'on screwingness, and Lon'on brass;—ay, and as hard as that same metal. . . . What can she have heard of her gallant admirer, Jack Crippes?—I thought he had been in Holland."

So indeed he was, and in no comfortable plight, as the London public most characteristically learned early the next morning. On that morning Mr. Gryphon, always an early man, called on Herbert at his chambers, on his way to the Bank. "Your eyes are asking, what has brought me?" said he, when the first salutations were over. "I'll tell you:—But why have you stolen a march on me?—answer me that!—unless, instead of being at Chelsea, as I suspect you were last night, you were really returning from Richmond with a party of ladies, as that truthful scribe, 'your intimate friend and old schoolfellow,' testifies in three Morning papers."

"Who do you mean? Who is my intimate friend and old schoolfellow?—What ladies?"

"Why the person you saved from drowning—for which neither the world nor the devil owe you many thanks—Burke Barker, I mean."

"Oh, yes, I had an adventure with him, sure enough—a melancholy one—has it got into the papers already?—and a Barker edition of it, too, I daresay."

"Curse the cool impudence of that fellow!—his paragraph might dish us with the duke, if Jack, your friend, did not furnish the antidote to Barker's wolfsbane. You shall, first, see Jack's last: it is a tickler for the pride of my illustrious patron. I could really sympathize in his Grace's rage when he reads this: these fellows are enough, with their scribbling, to drive any man mad."

Mr. Gryphon now produced, not a common newspaper, but a blurred printed sheet of whity-brown, decorated with several daubs of wooden cuts of the satirical kind.

"Jack can't, now-a-days, like his brother-in-law, command a half column of Almack's Gazette, but the penny-papers are open to him yet. I wish I could get a few copies of this, though;" and he read—

"INFAMOUS CONSPIRACY OF THE DUTCH AGAINST AN ENGLISH-BORN SUBJECT.—We understand from unquestionable authority, that in consequence of an intrigue set on foot by the government of a neighbouring state, that would not greatly dislike to involve Great Britain and Holland in a quarrel, certain fat burgomasters of Rotterdam, have, under some extraordinary hallucination, been instigated to send to the Rasp-haus a distinguished English gentleman, the brother of Lady St. E——, the lady of the heir of the Duke of P——, as a COMMON SWINDLER. This infamous arrest hath thrown several noble families into the greatest distress and confusion; though probably, before the remonstrance of the British ambassador has been heard at the Hague, Meinheer may retrace his steps, and offer the amende honourable to the gentleman to whom this gross outrage has been offered. The spirit of Old England has fallen indeed, under craven Whig misrule, if an insult is not instantly and amply atoned, which in better times would have been considered sufficient ground for an international war."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Herbert, laughing heartily. "Jack forever! He really possesses a richer fancy than his whole tribe. Fancy Jack the cause of a war between England and Holland—it is superb! Poor fellow, in the Rasp-haus! Let me retain the interesting record to show to my wife."

"With the greatest pleasure; but I have an important use for it. There may, I have no doubt, be fifty 'd—d good-natured friends' of my illustrious client, happy to send him this broadside to relish his morning coffee, save that it is not likely to fall into any decent cleanly fingers west of Temple Bar. Yet some one, I prophesy, will send it in a neat wrapper, properly sealed, and marked 'strictly confidential'—My illustrious client delights in the phrase. The thing, you will see, will work like a charm. I only hope he may not propose the other side of the Andes, or the interior of Africa, for the place of your residence with Lord St. Edward, to keep him intangible to the Crippeses. But seriously, Herbert, can a thing of this sort have any effect? Are the Dutch magistrates block-heads enough to bite?"

"In the present delicate state of relations, our ancient ally will not be fond of affronting the national honour," replied Herbert, laughing. "If this could be got into any leading paper, I should not say but that it might give Jack a hitch—for I fear he is in adversity, poor fellow.—But what of my 'old schoolfellow'? Isn't Jack that, too?"

"A quite different affair: in three morning papers that information appears; the same in substance, but with each a different heading. Which do you prefer—simply, 'NARROW ESCAPE FROM DROWNING,' from the Times; 'PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE,' Morning Herald?"

"Never mind—read any that best tells the thing."

And Gryphon, commanding his shrewd countenance, read as follows:—ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.—"Last night between nine and ten, as the Hon. Charles Herbert, of Lincoln's Inn, was returning by the water from Richmond with a party of ladies, their attention was attracted to a boat passing in the other direction, in which two persons were seen struggling. The alarm of the females may be imagined, when one man leapt into their boat, and all the others were precipitated into the river. One of the ladies, with the greatest presence of mind, threw out her parasol, which was caught by one of the drowning men, who, when taken up, proved to be Mr. BURKE BARKER, the celebrated barrister and journalist, the intimate friend, and former school-fellow, of Mr. Herbert. To heighten this romance in real life, it was found that Mr. Burke Barker's life had been placed in this imminent jeopardy by his humane attempts to prevent a lunatic, who had got into the boat, from committing suicide. We are sorry to add, that although, by the humane efforts of that gentleman, the unhappy maniac was picked up, the vital spark was forever extinguished. The unfortunate man is understood to be from the north. He has left a friendless widow, to whom the gentleman, who had so nearly been his victim, has acted with the most delicate generosity."

"Damnably cool!" said Herbert, who rarely swore, and with whom oaths were more than idle expletives. "It was, I have no doubt, this precious piece of mystification that Barker penned in his wet clothes last night, in the bar of the ship, and before we had ceased to attempt the poor man's recovery."

A GARLAND OF POETS.

BY THE LATE JOHN GALT.

SHAKESPEARE.

CREATOR! though to thee it was not given
To make from dust the flesh and blood of man;
Yet in the wonders of mysterious Heaven,
Thy gift was sanctioned with creation's plan;—
That gift which with the thoughts of living men,
Thou madest the mental beings of thy pen.
No, not in melodies of word and spell,
Which charm the hearing of this thrilling heart,
When Thou the sense of passion would'st impart;
No,—not in them only Thou dost excel.
The conscious mind in Thy entrancing page,
Beholds again as in a mirror shown
The bright resemblance of a passing age,
Things that have surely been, and hearts to Heaven best known.

SPENSER.

Rare artist, Spenser! why so oft, with thee,
Do I aweary at thy beauties drowse,
And but the semblance of those feelings see,
That, stirr'd with life, would the rapt spirit rouse!
In vain, in vain, thy magic page I spread,
Thy well limn'd pictures I behold in vain;
The spell that's in them is in influence dead,
And I but feel a cold and polished chain.
At all the frost-work of thy wizard art,
Whose tinted lights admiring crowds enchant;
Charm'd yet reluctant sleeps the conscious heart,
And fancy pall'd can only gape and gaunt;
But still thy tapestries are rich and rare,
Gold brodered stuffs, and done with sample care.

BYRON.

A wayward wight, an ens of smile and frown,
Lark of the morn and bulbul of the night,
An eagle still though far in darkness flown,
He roosts with bats, and wings the owl's flight;
Nor spectral dream nor wizard spell is brought
To gloom the fancies of his spleen muse;

The lurid visions of perturbed thought
Lower black around, and only these are views.
Lord of the caverns of the guilty breast,
To thee alone the special task was given
To paint a mortal damn'd for crimes confess,
And calmly waiting for his doom from Heaven.
Come, Byron, come, in the dread midnight hour;
Come with thy sorceries, come with thy power!

'CAMPBELL.'

Thou dropping honey-comb, sweet Campbell, ho!
Awake, arise, and bend Ulysses' bow;
All other suitors of the noble dame
Have fail'd in elegance, the grace of power.
Thine be the triumph in the trial hour;
The meed be thine,—the wedding hand of fame.
Delightful bard! to thy melodious rhymes
The muse of tenderness unwearied chimes,
And, charm'd by Hope, beholds the future scene
Show lovelier hues than "all the past hath been."
Bright gems of thought that glancing gleams surprise,
While ever shine, so glimmeringly, between
The tear-wet pathos of her gentle eyes.
Oh, for another song! says Nature, as she sighs.

BURNS.

Much lauded Burns, whose manly spirit show'd,
Perhaps too consciously, the pride of power,
Still at thy name my irking fancies goad,—
Sage of the plough and poet of the bower.
How proudly noble, muscular and stern,
Thou plied'st with flourishes the satyr's flail!
And, oh! how tenderly essay'd'st to earn
Rewarding wishes for the lover's tale.
Though few, ah, few! on thy courageous crest,
The beauteous pearls to some may seem to be,
Yet rich they are, the brightest and the best,
That e'er were gifted with simplicity.
Ill-fated poet!—but the morn's sweet bard;
That soars to heaven is tenant of the sword!

OXONIAN ETHICS.*

"I say to you that, when good and wise men, when any men, come forward, and assert any thing, however strange and mysterious, the first thought should be, not to reject the testimony, but to incline to admit the fact."—PROFESSOR SEWELL.

"I doubt me that you do not thoroughly believe the truth of this strange nativity. Though you believe it not, I care not much. But an honest man, and of good judgment, believeth still what is told him, and that which he finds written."

RABELAIS.

"——— Travellers ne'er did lie,
Though fools at home condemn them."—SHAKESPEARE.

OXFORD, which was long content to act in the intellectual world, as a sort of OLD MORTALITY to Greek and Roman tombstones, has now brought the mallet and the chisel to bear on the monuments of ancient Christian and Anglo-Catholic devotion; and one cannot but acknowledge with pleasure that there is a certain advance visible in the change. For though Bentley and Porson were no doubt great men, and notable in their day, it was ever a pity, and now particularly begets more of laughter than admiration, to behold such brawny pugilists, of genuine English make, wasting their strength, not in fighting any real battle, but in carving oddities upon the club of the dead Hercules. They have now, with time, become weary of these pretty grammatico-metrical cuttings and decussations; even in the antiquated halls of an English University, a little novelty is agreeable at times; partly, also, they have become ashamed of the little glory that is achieved by the best possible getting-up of the two-hundred-and-twentieth edition of an old classical spelling-book. Without doors, at the same time, an opinion has been rapidly gaining ground, that Greek and Latin, trimmed to the very top, go but a small way to make either a man or a gentleman—nay, that they are often seen, rather naturally and neatly enough, despite of nature's richest dowry, to unmake both; and that classicality, in fact, as the thing is plied in Oxford, is no education at all, properly so called, (an educing or bringing-out of the intellectual energies,) but an artificial inoculation, an extraneous growth, a parasitical dodder, that winds itself about the most sacred life of the soul, and chokes it. These influences, though they have not had the effect (as, indeed, was not to have been expected) of banishing pedantry from Oxford, have, co-operating with the great social billowing of the day, compelled the scholastic souls on the banks of the Isis to put forth their fingerling functions in a new and a more noble direction—of which change we have seen the first-fruits in that portentous phenomenon called PUEBIA. This phenomenon, indeed, by the politic fear of bishops, seems for the present, to lie most devoutly and decently dastardized in the dust—but it only seems; and beneath that cloak of vulgar Protestant drugget, which they have cunningly donned, if you have half an eye, and watch the moment, you may see the Catholic capes and tippets damasked over with sacerdotal flosculosities, as gilded and as purple as before. And though the thing be an offence to English eyes, and No. 90 was certainly a most awkward accident to the No-Popery Tories of this religious time, yet we must think honestly, and say plainly, that this gospel of bishops, which the Oxonians now preach, is, as a study, a thing infinitely more noble, and more worthy of rational beings, in all respects, than that abecedarian litany of lambics and Trochees, of which they formerly made so barren a boast. To fish pious sentences (υποκαταστροφαι επι συναγωγα) out of Ignatius and Polycarp, is certainly a much more dignified occupation for a Christian scholar, than to hunt anapests out of Æschylus, or to adjust, critically, every Cretic ending in Euripides. So far, therefore, so well. The Oxonian scholar has now turned from Anacreon to the Gospels, and from the various readings of an untranslatable chorus in the Choephore of Æschylus, to the various uses which mortal wit may make of the inexhaustible riches of Christ. The change is worthy, and God will bless it. But the Oxonian is still a mere scholar; thinking is no part of his training. We must expect, therefore, when he essays to think, (as in these troubled times he can scarcely avoid in some fashion,) to see him bungling lamentably. It was always a favourite trick with him to laugh at Scotch "fee-losophy." Alas! for the pleasant days gone never to return; when to spread forth complacently, on his small stagnant pool, a dappled play of Greek and Latin quotations could be accounted much wisdom. The little compact classical dapperling must now come forth out of his band-box, and attempt philosophizing as much, at least, as the Bishop of Antioch and the Thirty-Nine Articles can teach him: and there he stands of a truth in these latter times, not requiring to raise himself, (for state-privilege has placed him upon a pedestal,) and waves and brandishes his wooden sword valiantly, sweating big drops (if the creature had it) of blood, and conceiting himself, when he is merely frumping the face of his own whim, to be beating (Falstaff-like) a whole world of buckramed giants into jelly. Such a spectacle most of us, who have peeped into the "philosophical" world, must have seen more than once in many places; but whose wishes to see it in perfection now, let him go to Oxford, and hear a lecture on the metaphysics of testimony, and the principles of Christian Ethics, from the Rev. WILLIAM SEWELL.

The little volume, whose title we have placed at the bottom of our page, is a grand essay on the part of the Professor of Moral Philosophy in Oxford, to base a new system of Ethics on TESTIMONY. It is one of the greatest crudities that the present age has produced; second not even to Robert Owen's famous philosophy of external circumstances; for, indeed, in strictness, it is twin-brother to that. The socializing philosopher will change the congregation of battling devils and demi-devils, called men, who inhabit this world, momentarily into a conclave of serenest gods, if you will only give him a joint-stock company, and a parallelogram. The Episcopising professor offers himself to achieve the same miracle, by a corporation of priests and a diocese. They are both materialists, manufacturers, mechanics, of the meanest kind: they have no faith, no spirituality, no innate ideas. Were the world composed of such, John Locke (supposing him to have been out and out what some base followers made of him) might have made it with his own hands; and a neat piece of workmanship it had been. But John Locke, notwithstanding his denial of innate ideas, really meant no harm: he only spoke it; whereas this Sewell both means and speaks the most gigantic nonsense systematically. Let us hear how it sounds.

* "Christian Morals," by the Rev. William Sewell, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Exeter College, and Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Oxford. A new Edition. London: James Burns. 1841.

The first step with the Oxford Professor, as it has been with all sacerdotal sophists,* is to beget in the youthful mind a morbid distrust of all its independent functions; to convince men that they have no legs, and then the ecclesiastical crutch becomes not only acceptable, but necessary: for—

In the first place, who are you that you should despise any one? You are not wise, otherwise you would not require instruction; nor strong, for you cannot preserve your life without assistance; nor experienced, for the world is immeasurable, and time infinite, and of these you see but a part, and think how small a part! All that you are quite sure of is the present moment; just as if you were imprisoned in a dungeon, and only one little eyelet-hole could be discovered in the roof, over which some hand without were drawing a long infinite series of objects, and only one to be seen at a time. Of the future you know nothing; it is all dark. You walk on; but beyond the ground on which you fix your foot, you cannot see a step. You guess, hope, fear, imagine, anticipate; and very often hopes, and fears, and anticipations come true; but they are but guesses after all, and guesses are not knowledge. And so, too, of the past. Upwards of five thousand years have passed since man was created. Millions of men have been scattered over the face of the earth, have seen sights, and done deeds, and collected observations, of which how little do you know! How far have you journeyed from your own home! What countries and nations have you seen! What have you read from those innumerable volumes, in which the learning of men lies buried as in a catacomb! And if you thus know nothing of the earth, how much less have you seen of heaven—of those illimitable regions, sown with myriads of stars, each star a world—each leading the eye beyond it into immeasurable depths of space—each subject to laws, performing works, obeying the will of its Creator; but whose laws, and works, and obedient movements, no human eye has yet done more than guess at!

I say, then, that you are not in a capacity to despise any one—to deny any fact which you may receive from the testimony of others, unless it is refuted by other and superior testimony. You cannot say what may, or may not, be. All that you know beyond the thought of the moment, you must take upon trust from others: you must live upon their contributions; trade with their capital; build on their foundations; follow in their footsteps; or you must perish;—in one word, your whole existence depends on the belief of testimony.

And now, we request particularly, let the intelligent reader consider this: OUR WHOLE EXISTENCE DEPENDS ON THE BELIEF OF TESTIMONY. 'Tis the prime postulate of the new philosophy; 'tis the new philosophy bodily, postulate, proposition, and all. The whole of Mr. Sewell's book, he tells us, is "built on this fact:" the whole of Puseyism, we add, is built on it; the whole of priestcraft. Let no wise man blink it, because it borders on the unfriendly region of metaphysics: it is a practical matter; and by the Puseyites, of all men, most practically meant. A man's head may come to depend on it; a civil war (more strange things have been) arise out of it. Let us, then, consider.

Is it seriously meant? Does a hungry stomach cry for food; a healthy eye delight in green grass; an honest heart in truth depend upon TESTIMONY? Is a man born into the world, does he breathe, does he cry, does he creep, does he walk, does he dance, does he laugh, does he sing, does he drivel, does he dote, does he die, upon testimony? He does; otherwise Mr. Sewell's new philosophy is an old folly, invented, some five thousand years ago, by the first grand-mamma that told her grand-daughter, that she had seen a ghost in the middle of the kitchen smoke last Saturday night, exactly when the clock struck twelve. So, also, a modern man may see ghosts; and in broad daylight, too, (ὅρα ἡμερο παρρη), when common sense is driven out of her native quarterage in the brain, by ecclesiastical Greek at Oxford.

Does the reader recollect a short, but very expressive, colloquy in Hamlet? It runs so, we think:—

Hamlet. Do you see yonder cloud, that is almost in the shape of a camel?

Polonius. By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.

Hamlet. Methinks it is like a weasel.

Polonius. It is backed like a weasel.

Hamlet. Or like a whale?

Polonius. Very like a whale.

We see here a very apt illustration of the learned Oxonian's great doctrine:—"If any man says to you any thing, however strange and mysterious, the first thought should be, not to reject the testimony, but to incline to admit the fact." And if Hamlet, holding discourse as he here does, instead of a profane prince, had been a holy priest, boasting apostolical succession from the magic touch of Episcopal hands, then the last thought should have been like the first; and the cloud had been a camel, and a weasel, and a whale: first the one, and then the other, and then all the three together, that men might be damned to all eternity for not believing contradictions.

Let not the reader imagine that we are jesting: distorting, exaggerating; misrepresenting, in any shape. It is too serious a matter for quips and quiddities; and the Puseyites, to do them justice, are honest men: they make no concealment. Not more certain is Mr. Urquhart that Russia will swallow up Europe to-morrow, unless Lord Pal-

* When we have finished our observations, we think the public will admit that we are justified in calling Professor Sewell "a sophist;" that is, a fellow who blinds with the dazzling show, instead of guiding with the substance of wisdom. How far it displayed either good taste or good feeling in him to apply this epithet (as he does, p. 82) to Mr. Locke, is a very different fair.

merston be assassinated to-day, than Professor Sewell is, that the whole of human existence, and the whole of Christian morals particularly, as a part of human existence, depends solely and singly on the evidence of external Testimony. He is a sophist, as we have said, of the prime order; but he has juggled himself completely first, and then comes to juggle others; for it is rare, we agree with him, that, from sheer love to deceive, men go about in the world preaching lies.* Let us now hear a little more of his philosophy. He repeats his postulate at the end of the second chapter, very succinctly and clearly, in three maxims, as follows. He is determined that there shall be no mistake:—

1. IN ALL THINGS ACT BY TESTIMONY.

2. In all things take that testimony which is appointed for you by God; which is given to you by persons set over you by His hand.

3. Never depart from this, unless you have the clearest and most indisputable dispensation, conveyed to you by an authority also set over you by God, but appointed as superior to them.

Or, in still fewer words,

Believe in and obey your parents. Believe in and obey your king; and never dispute their voice, except you are commanded by—whom?

I will tell you this in another chapter.

And the wise reader, we presume, will ask no other chapter to enable him to guess easily. "There are three authorized witnesses," so the other chapter says, "to whom we must listen: Parent, King, and CLERGY."† (P. 18.) Consider this, reader: the right of a Roman father to begin with; then the divine right of the monarch; then the infallible testimony of the priesthood! The poodle changes into a hippopotamus, and out of the hippopotamus comes the devil: an honest sophist truly!

So, so! such kernel cracked from such a shell,
A travelling schoolman! the jest likes me well.

But what clergy? for there are many bearing that name. What is the poor boy to do when No. 90 is, by some unhappy accident, played into his hands, and his conscience becomes suddenly troubled about the morality of subscribing Protestant Confessions of Faith, with papistical reservations? Shall he consult the Pope? or the Bishop of Exeter? or that mongrel thing, half legitimate, and half bastard, called the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland? or that dog-faced tatterdemalion slave, whom we of the Episcopate most fitly designate, "AN IRREVERENT DISSENTER?" 'Tis a difficult problem: we are fallen on "evil times;" with Socinianism on this side, and Popery on that, and Dr. Hook in the middle, (quarrelling with his bishop, too!) there is much difficulty, and considerable danger; and there is no man now, as in the blessed days of good King Charles, to "compel" us to go the right way, without the dubious trouble of making choice. Mr. Sewell evidently sees the vexing perplexity of this point; and, while he attempts to solve the problem confidently enough, he solves it only for one class of persons. The passage is curious and characteristic: we will give it at length:—

First, then, does your Parent take you to the church? Does he tell you that the clergyman of the parish is to be your religious instructor? And if this is not the case, I have little intention of addressing myself to you. Here, then, you have your parent's voice to guide you first; and he has a claim from God on you to follow him. Secondly, what says your Sovereign and the laws of the land? I will not at present say what ought to be done, if the laws of the land spoke differently. And yet the government of the country, ordained as it is of God, ought to have great weight; and if your parent bade you commit an act which the laws forbade, you would be bound to disobey him, and obey the laws. And why? Because of two powers both appointed by God, the Parent and the State, the State is the greater. But happily as yet you are not thus embarrassed; for the State agrees with your Parent, and recommends, and till lately it would even compel, you to take the Church for your instructor, and would prohibit others from drawing you away elsewhere, and would punish them for leading, and you for following. Even now the Church is "established;" that is, the government acknowledges it as the body whom it respects, and wishes to be respected and to be listened to by all its subjects. And so it has done for more than 1200 years.

Now, with these two voices joining together, you must be running a great risk, setting at nought very grave testimony, if you adopt any other teacher than the clergyman of the parish.

Still it may be, that both these voices are wrong. There was a time when parents were idolaters, and kings idolaters; and Christianity came down upon earth with a message from God, declaring against both; and yet men were bound to receive it. And so it may be, that among the many men professing to be Ministers from God, charged with a message to you from Him on your duty and your goodness, the true one may not be the same as is selected by your Parent or your Sovereign. What are you to do? I answer, you must ask, not the clergyman, but all the others who come to you, to produce their credentials. I say, not the clergyman; for you have fully sufficient reason, in the witness of your Parent and of the State, to believe he is right until he is proved to be wrong. Men do not rake up the title-deeds of their estates,—do not come forth before a judge with a busy, bustling, meddling, officious offer, to prove their right to a property, until that right is disputed,—until it is disputed not merely generally, suspiciously, vaguely, but by a positive distinct charge of a flaw in some specified point, and that charge made by a party who, if you do not refute him, will turn you out and take possession. Until the charge wears this aspect, a judge would refuse to hear the cause, and a man in his senses will say nothing, do nothing, but remain firm and secure on the ground of prescription. And so with regard to knowledge; for knowledge is a possession; and belief is a great good; and freedom from doubt and uncertainty in following our teachers is a precious inheritance, not lightly to be parted with nor disturbed; recommended to us by God himself in his word, who bids us "walk in the old ways, and stand in the old paths;" who by his institutions in nature inclines us all to adhere to what we have received, and, through this instinct, binds together into one, child with parent, man, with man, generation with generation; keeping order in the movements of society; giving permanence to principles; bringing mind close to mind, that knowledge may be poured from one into the other; linking and holding all things in their place, as the creation itself is kept in place, by the same law which rolls the planets in their course—the

* "For the most part, men are more disposed to warn you against evil by their testimony, than to delude you into it. They are alarmists; they like to exaggerate; they are fond of exciting wonder, and sympathy, and emotion; of spreading terror, of exercising power in deterring you from action, of leading you away with themselves from possible mischief, rather than of drawing you on to share in a doubtful good."—(P. 11.) And yet they may do all this and be great fools, as we all know to our cost on occasions.

† St. John speaks of a very different three that bear witness on earth, i. 5, 8.

law that all things should continue as they are, until something occurs to disturb them.

Brought up, therefore, to believe the Church, continue in it. Till a man impugns that belief, allow no doubt to intrude; and if doubt does intrude, reject it without seeking an answer—you do not need one. When a man is found to impugn it, ask him, first, if he proposes to give you anything instead? Has he any better authority of his own? Does he offer any good, threaten any evil? Will any ulterior measures follow, if you do not listen to him? If none, turn away from him in contempt. He asks you to disallow the validity of your title to a possession wantonly, and for the sake of invalidating it, and for this only. Does he come threatening you with consequences? Bid him first produce his own title-deeds. Ask the dissenter, who claims to be a minister from God, with a right to assist you in your study and in your practice of Christian ethics, "Are you appointed? Have you been sent? Where is your commission? Where is the proof that I shall offend God by not listening to you? Where is the evidence that the message you would deliver really came from God?" Till they can show you this, rest secure as you are. You are obeying God in obeying your parent and your governors. And till He sends another messenger revoking their commission, you cannot depart from them without a grievous sin. And what the nature of this commission should be, I will tell you presently.

The Commission, we need not say, is the old story of the exclusive apostolical succession of the Anglo-Catholic, formerly called the Protestant Church of England. For the rest, the passage is clear enough; only 'tis a pity that this missionary of testimonial Ethics, instead of essaying the conversion of sinners, preaches merely to confirm those who have been already baptized. The sentences which we have printed in Italics are particularly precious.

Let us add a word or two here, before going farther, on the monstrous falsity of the proposition, that morality is founded primarily on the testimony of papa or mamma, or the justice of the peace, or the parish clergyman, or on any testimony. David Hume wrote a famous essay to prove that testimony, even the best, is on no account to be received when it runs counter to general experience; forgetting very conveniently, in the easy flow of his sophistical argumentation, that this very experience by which he limits his credulity, is itself the fruit, or say the generalization and epitome of multiplied testimonies. Principal Campbell of Aberdeen put him right with regard to this matter, in a very Christian and gentlemanly style, as most people know. But now here comes an Oxonian, a fellow almost damned in Aristotle and Æschylus; and not content with the wise mean of the shrewd Aberdonian, jerks out furiously into the other pole of absurdity, and will have it, in as many words, that credulity and blind faith is the prime duty of a Christian man; and that there neither is, nor has been, nor can be in the world any virtue, faith, honesty, goodness, loveliness, grandeur, except by the testimony of an infallible priesthood. Incomprehensible folly! A man might as well say, that the health which he brought with him, by God's blessing, from his mother's womb, depends on the testimony of a doctor to the efficacy of certain drugs. Solomon says somewhere, "The simple believeth every word," "the prudent man looketh well to his going;"

by this sentence, seeming to lend his authority to the common opinion of men, that modest doubt is the beginning of all higher wisdom. But Professor Sewall tells us once and again, that doubt is an intruder, to be driven off without parley, as we would drive off the devil;* and when a poor man is perplexed, in his struggle through this world, with the tug and tear of contradictory impulses in his heart, he must not seek from a rule within,—conscience, pure reason, or what you will,—for power to control this anarchy: (for there is nothing within save whim, and fancy, and mutability, we are told, P. 174-6,) but he must seek out "one teacher, and one only, in whom he has implicit confidence, and receive from him in faith all that he tells you." (P. 85.) An advice which is exactly that which the Romish Church gives to her children, and if we recollect rightly, that also which Mephistopheles gives to the theological student in Faust:—

If you will have a certain clue
To thread the theologic maze,
Hear only one, and swear to every word he says.

And so far as we have been able to observe, theologians are very much in the habit of following out this pious precept. But moral science hitherto has been supposed to take in a wider range: to be a thing by excellence human, and nothing sectarian. It has been reserved for an Oxford Professor, in the nineteenth century, making broad his phylacteries, and sounding the trump ecclesiastic with pretenceful blare and fanfare before men, to manufacture heroism by act of Parliament, and to subject the heart of man, in its divinest aspirations, to the arbitrary mastership of an Episcopal ipse dixit. "Look at the lilies of the field, they toil not, neither do they spin,"—the voice which spake this was as the voice of "one having authority," we read; but it is not an appeal in the modern sacerdotal mode at all; it is an appeal to our observation of God's works, to our affectionate sympathies with the living and breathing world around us; it is an appeal to the innate emotions and instincts of all healthy hearts; whereas our apostolical doctor now not only speaks with an authority rivalling that of God (P. 247,) but coolly throws nature, reason, and humanity aside, and points you up with a triumphant, IN HOC SIGNO VINCES! to the crozier of the Bishop of Exeter, and the king-made canons of a Church, of which no man knows to this hour whether it be a Popish Church or a Protestant. Believe Professor Sewall with implicit faith, most duteous and docile student of Christian ethics! THINKING WAS NOT MADE FOR MAN; and "original thinking,"† so much accounted of among vain men, is prayed against daily in the apostolic litany as the very worst species of original sin. If you happen to meet with a man who has studied Immanuel Kant, and submits himself heroically to do the hests of categorical duty upon the mere hint of "pure rea-

* "It is in the power of a member of the Catholic Church to exclude doubt as much as any other evil thought. It is his moral duty to do so."—(P. 834.)

† In the "Christian Morals," we have a whole chapter (III.) against the grand heresy of "original thinking," said to be practised much in Berlin and Bonn, but scarcely known (happily) in Oxford.

son," or who is willing to die rather than recant his word, because his heart (his mere natural unepiscopized heart) tells him that it is base to lie,—put no trust in that man, because his morality traces not its pedigree from the Catholic Church: hold his magnanimity vain, because based on no "external testimony;" count his virtues only "splendid vices," (St. Augustine did so,) since Episcopal water never washed him from his native filth; hold no converse with him; come out and be separate; he hath a devil—a German devil; he is a very dangerous man!

But we must proceed. Granting the testimony of the Anglican Bishops as the only foundation of moral truth, to what important ethical doctrines do they bear witness? Professor Sewell enlarges mainly upon two:—

1. The personality and power of the devil.
2. The magical and miraculous power of Episcopal baptism to expel the devil.

With regard to the first important point, he says:—

Especially we will hold, and realize, and act upon the true, unfigurative, literal personality of a Spirit of evil; tempting man, lying in wait for him, triumphing over him, hating him, "going about daily, seeking whom he may devour." On this main fact must rest the foundation of all Christian ethics. With this the ancient Church began its Christian education. Her first thought was, to stand before the Evil One as his appointed antagonist; to recognise his power over man, and her own power, as God's delegate, over Satan and his angels; and to adjure him, as Christ did of old, to come out of the victim whom he possessed.

In which passage the reader will see, at once, a peculiarity, which is, indeed, the main characteristic of Professor Sewell's morals, that he altogether confounds Christian Ethics with Christian Theology. It is his professed purpose, throughout, to confound, or say rather, to identify these two things; and this he does in the most outspoken and uncompromising fashion, declaring plainly, that "an erroneous theological dogma is a moral crime," (P. 341;) and, as a necessary consequence of this, that it is the main duty of the civil magistrate to institute prosecutions for heresy, and to compel attendance on the Episcopal Church, as was done of old by good King Charles. (P. 21.) Our own Presbyterians seem to have had some notions of the same sort, as any one may gather from the much-be-spoken 23d chapter of the Confession of Faith. We apprehend, however, that the Confession of Faith and Professor Sewell will be powerless alike, in these "evil days," to convince any rational man that theology and morals, though closely connected in speculation, are not, practically, very distinct and separate things; and, if they are so separate, we cannot help thinking, that the personality and power of the devil is a doctrine that has much more to do with speculative theology, than with the conduct of life. I am bound to keep my evil lusts in check, not in respect of their origin, but in respect of their nature. My belief, that they are caused by the devil, neither makes them more odious in my sight, nor lends my arm any additional strength, to root them out. But the learned professor had a good reason for making the devil the corner-stone of his Episcopal Ethics. Episcopal baptism expels the devil, who possesses the bodies of new-born babes literally and corporally: by how much stronger, therefore, we make the devil, by so much more efficacious is the rite of Episcopal baptism—by so much more dignified is the baptismal function of a bishop. In order to makethis clear, Professor Sewell proposes to restore the form of exorcism, by which baptism was accompanied in the first centuries, and also to administer the Eucharist to all infants, and to confirm them by the imposition of apostolic hands, simul et semel, with the sprinkling of water. We quote a passage, that may convey information to some readers:

When, then, the person whose education the Church was undertaking was brought to be baptized, he was first, either in his own person or in his sponsors, placed towards the west, barefooted, and stripped of his outer garments—his hands stretched out, as if pushing an enemy from him—his head averted—and thrice he was bidden to spit in the face of Satan, as a form of abhorrence and rejection, and thrice to renounce him and all his works. And then he was turned to the east—his eyes lifted up to heaven—his hands stretched out in prayer—and he was called on to make a solemn profession of entering into the service of another master, Christ. Ἀποστρέψας τὸ πρὸς ὀρίαν; Ἀπεναντίας τῶν Σατανᾶ? Σπυρδίζων τὸ πρὸς ἑσπέραν; Ἀδελφόνε Χριστὸ?

I will not stop to ask, if such a form as this, strange as it may sound to us, is reconcileable with a disbelief in the personality of a spirit of evil. "You entered into the baptistry," says Cyril; "you stood turned to the west, and heard the order to stretch forth your hand, and you renounced Satan (ἀπεναντίας) as present at the spot,—ἐν τῇ ὀρίᾳ." "We turn to the west," says Jerome, "renouncing him whose dwelling is in the west,—qui in occidente est." They gave to him not only a personal agency, but a local habitation, as in a place of darkness.

The effects which Professor Sewell attributes to Episcopal baptism, are correspondent to the powers with which he arms the devil. Read the following passage, and note particularly the sentences which we have printed in Italics:—

All that I am desirous to point out at present is, that by the rite of baptism the Church places the recipient in an entirely new position; gives him a great blessing, which he is hereafter to maintain; gratifies the wants of his nature, instead of stimulating his desire; restores him at once to a state of security and goodness, instead of urging him to save himself by some subsequent efforts;—in one word, throws him into an attitude of defence instead of desire, and fixes by this the nature of the struggle which he will have to maintain. By baptism, says our catechism, we are not merely urged or encouraged to become, but are actually made "members of Christ, children of God, inheritors of the kingdom of heaven." We are not told, that if we do right, we shall become new creatures, but are pronounced "regenerate" already, whatever regeneration means: we are not urged to procure admission into the society of the Church, but are declared to be already grafted into its body: we are not told of everlasting salvation as something future, but are already described as heirs of it. And if you will attentively examine the language of St. Paul, whenever he speaks of the blessings of baptism, you will find that he uses the past tense. The very things which a heathen moralist would most desire, such as the mortification of the flesh, the death unto sin, the creation of a new spirit within us, the enlightenment of the mind, the admission into a noble spiritual polity, the cleansing of the conscience, the forgiveness of sins, and restoration to the favour of God, and union with his nature,—all these are described in the Bible as effected by baptism already. It is something past and done.

If baptism (Episcopal, of course,) be not merely an act symbolical of internal purity, but really and truly the effective purifier of the soul, no wonder that the Oxford professor holds it forth as the main and all-important fact in Christian Ethics; as a fact, in respect of which, all that Aristotle and Plato have written of the το ἀγαθόν and the το καλόν, is worthless: a splendid delusion, vanity, and a lie; for, though our author has studied Aristotle very profoundly, and quotes him to pedantry, (as an Oxonian writer will do, if it were only to show that he was a "reading man" in his day,) he says, also, plainly enough, that Heathen Ethics achieved no virtue properly deserving the name; and that, in fact, they only end where Christian Ethics begin. (P. 266.) This is nothing wonderful, if the doctrine of baptismal regeneration be correct; for baptism thus becomes a "miracle," wrought daily by the Episcopal Church, (P. 251;) and virtue in a Christian (episcopally baptized) is a thing altogether and generically different from virtue in a Heathen. Nay, more, the Church itself, according to the Romish doctrine, is a perpetual miracle; and baptism, as well as every other act performed by a duly commissioned servant of the church, is in its nature essentially miraculous, and, like the hem of Christ's mantle, by simple touch gives forth virtue. This ultra-sacerdotal and genuine popish doctrine, our Christian moralist, with grand consistency, does not hesitate, for a moment, to maintain. It were quite impossible for Hildebrand himself, were he alive, to assert the power of the priesthood more strongly than is done in the following very remarkable passage:—

But I will rather suggest the consideration of the vastness of the power claimed by the Church—a power which places it almost on a level with God himself,—the power of forgiving sins, by wiping them out in baptism—of transferring souls from heaven to hell, without admitting a doubt of it, as when "baptized infants, it is said, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved,"—the power of bringing down the Spirit of God from heaven, and incorporating it in the persons of frail and fleshly men. Think, I say, of this stupendous power, and then ask if any human being could dare to assume it without authority from God himself. If such authority has never been given, then the Church, in every one of its most solemn acts, is guilty of the most frightful blasphemy that man can conceive. If it has been given, is it not a fearful thing to make light of or dispute it? And when, in this dull, cold, mechanical age, men say that the age of miracles is gone by, that the time is past for spiritual gifts, and the deification of men, and supernatural communication, and all the dreams, as they dare to call them, of the superstitious infancy of the world,—remember that even now the Church is upon earth claiming every day, and exercising, the same stupendous power as it exercised in the first ages of Christianity. And though the world has grown old, and faith is waxing faint, and the power of vision is departing, and man's being is sinking down into a dead shell and husk of matter, emptied of the glorious spirit which once seemed to animate and colour it; still before our eyes there is a daily miracle working, and a divine power as strong as at its first appearance, and a body perpetuating the inheritance of a supernatural gift, and a communication open between heaven and earth. And those who are sick and wearied with the emptiness of the natural world, may still take refuge in a world which is beyond Nature, and before it, and above it.

And now, we think we have brought forward enough to enable the intelligent reader to judge for himself, wherein the peculiarity of this new system of "Christian Morals," or, as we would phrase it, "Oxonian Ethics," consists. It is a mystical and incomprehensible regeneration of the whole man, effected suddenly, and at one stroke, by the miraculous power of Anglo-Catholic bishops; it is founded altogether on the testimony of these bishops, as God's only authentic witnesses of moral truth upon earth; it consists substantially in a willing and complete submission of the whole man to the "ordinances and injunctions of the church," without "questioning or wishing to alter them" in any point (p. 382); in an unshaken "belief in me rather than in truths," (p. 330.) This is a system of ethics which may claim the praise of originality, and novelty, certainly, if no other; and yet the learned propounder of it, as we have seen, abjures nothing so much as "original thinking;" and lays it down as an axiom of all moral reasoning, with his usual confidence—"Be assured no new discoveries are to be made in the science of Ethics." Is not all this something very notable?

In conclusion, let not the Christian-minded reader, after all that we have said and shewn, hastily conceive that the author of "Christian Morals," with all his monstrosity, is, nevertheless, not a very talented and a very ingenious man, and a man from whose book a wise student may derive much benefit. Far from it. Professor Sewall is no driveller, τῶν τυφόνων, such as you may hear every Sunday in a pulpit. It is one thing to raise a racket with squibs and crackers—another thing to make the stars dance a jig. The Oxford moralist is no surface-man to dress the roads; he seeks a σκότος, whence, having fixed his lever, to move the world. He is a substantial man every inch—a man with a burning soul—a spirit with wings; and had he not been early educated at Oxford, (where they mistake a little Greek for the wisdom of the world, and the whisper of an episcopal benediction for the Spirit of God upon the waters,) might now be a very proper bird. We have, to speak truth, however lightly we may hold him as a philosopher, a great respect for him as a man; and he is not the first monomaniac towards whose intellectual character we have felt ourselves thus discordantly affected. Your "one-idea-men" are seldom common-place persons; on the contrary, they are generally the most agreeable people in the world to have to do with for an hour, if they are not allowed to bore you for a day, and if you know how to listen. In the shape of a little book of 411 pages, you may take them up, and throw them down at your leisure, ballooning it about gallantly with much entertainment, and not a little edification. It is astonishing with what a wide embracing sweep these single-notion men come on like a hurricane, carrying corn and stubble, base things and precious, in splendid confusion before them. It is a real inspiration such a happy one-idea, which, if it find not materials wherewith to bedizen its many-folded, far-flaunting prophet's mantle, is sure to make them. Friction produces heat, and heat produces sparks; so these persons, rubbing their one horned whim against the multifarious stubborn elements that are in the world, beget electric city, and wax wonderfully eloquent. It is seldom that a sober man can teach so many bright ideas to lodge peaceably in his wise brain, as such a madman can conjure up to follow in the train of his crotchet. Consider this, gentle reader; and consider this, also, that though Professor Sewell is mad, clearly mad, on the point of episcopal testimony, he is yet sane in other matters; and has, besides, like other madmen, lucid intervals, during which he can speak as much sense in a minute as is sufficient to confute all the nonsense that, when the fit was on, he had drivelled by the hour. And thus, while you discern, in this Anglican neology of Christian morals by episcopal testimony, one of the crudest and most extravagant absurdities that was ever begotten of reasoning brain, you will learn, at the same time, after Social OWEN and Turkish URQUHART, to look upon Sacerdotal SEWELL as the most remarkable one-idea man of the day.

FEAST OF THE POETS FOR 1841.

ARE there, in these uneasy times, any political, or, if the thing be possible, any merely prosaic readers, who may fancy that our annual celebration might, in the passing year, be "more honoured in the breach than the observance"; and that, because the Whigs are fallen on evil days, "there shall be no more cakes and ale"? If there be any such unhappy individuals, which we doubt, they must form a wonderfully small minority.

The approach of September has now, for a good many years, produced a lively sensation among the lovers of poesy in general, and the contributors to our poetical pic-nic in particular. Up to the last minute, and long after our allotted space has been crammed—"pit, gallery, and boxes,"—contributors continued to pour in, with pressing entreaties for a place, no matter where, so that they might appear at our festive commemoration. Sorry are we to be compelled to turn back, disappointed, any one entitled to admission, "after coming so far." But there is no help for it. They must be earlier next time; and they must, even after passing muster, be contented to wait their turn. We have no partialities to indulge, and only two simple grounds of preference: the first is indisputable merit, the clear signs of a true vocation to the Divine Art; the second an extreme tenderness, a sympathetic feeling with the modest and ingenuous youthful aspirant, passionately longing to impart his labouring soul to his brethren of mankind in poetic communion; or, as the ill-natured have it, having an insatiable craving "to see himself in print,"—yet, troubled with those misgivings, which are ever a sign of merit, where they are not the earnest of ultimate distinction in the loftiest field of human achievement.

The distressed state of the country has this season inundated us with a flood of verse, bearing on the disjointed times. Ladies, ministers, working-men, unite in tuneful denunciation of the corn-laws, and in earnest utterances on sundry cognate topics. It has been our practice hitherto to let the boding, the warning voice of the heralds or poets of the people go forth in our pages, and especially the emphatic cry, "Give us bread!"—but for the present, these effusions are so numerous, that we must lay them aside; and, besides, the offices of the poet and prophet are about fulfilled: the people are aroused; the time for the hardy workers, the earnest prose-men, has arrived. They have now struck in to finish the Herculean labour which the poets heralded. We have another reason for this year omitting political poetry. Of late there is a tone of vehemence, a depth of despair, a desperate energy in most of the popular effusions which reach us, which is almost appalling; and we have no desire to add fresh fuel to the spreading flame.

In our repositories there is a good deal of translated poetry—French, German, and classical; but this also we reserve for some future, more convenient season. The best, or the good poetry of other nations, if rendered with any portion of truth and spirit, we hold entitled to a higher place in any work devoted to elegant literature than merely smooth and mellifluous, but commonplace, native, original verse.

Another section which, with ourselves, is a favourite one—that of ballad and legendary poetry, is somewhat cribbed of its fair proportions; but that also shall speedily be atoned. The total omission of this species of verse would be a sad blank, indeed, in any work like ours, emanating from the capital of the fatherland of Burns and Scott; and of many a bright and tender nameless old ballad-monger long in the dust.

Having made this brief and necessary explanation to our favoured contributors, we take leave to intimate to the whole scattered host of the poetas minores, the dread revolution which threatens, if it has not already overtaken them. While only one youth, or one maiden, in every five hundred thousand, or say one hundred thousand, composed, occasionally, smooth and pretty verses to the evening star, the primrose, the bulbul, or any such novel theme, to their own benefit, and the admiration of all of their friends who, like Waverley's worthy old maiden aunt, have implicit faith in all poetry which was written in unequal lines, each beginning with a capital letter, it was all very well. No young person ever yet penned a stanza, (if he did not by it neglect his duty of engrossing,) without, in one way or other, being the better for the attempt. Statists are keeping a reckoning of the number of criminals who cannot read and write: we would have added, and who have never made, or attempted, a few doggerel or mediocre be!

man's verses, which is a much surer test of civilisation and humanity; the one being the form, the husk, the outward mechanical sign, the other indicating the presence of some portion of the living spirit. To return: while the minor poets were thinly strewn, there was a chance for their verses appearing in the Poet's Corner of some newspaper or magazine, although periodical publications were also comparatively few. But now when, with the diffusion of some sort of education, and of cheap reading, rhymsters have increased, and are increasing in a geometrical ratio, numerous as periodical works have also become, there is but a slender chance of any but the favoured few being brought properly before the public to receive just judgment; unless, like other folks, bent on pleasure, or the enjoyment of such a luxury as appearing in print—they pay for their whistle; that is, for the insertion of their verses in some regular Anthology—or call it Refuge or Foundling Hospital for the destitute Muses. No bookseller would undertake any publication of this sort on his own risk, for that short and pithy business-like reason—"Wont pay;" so that publication becomes hopeless, unless the poets guarantee their publishers against loss, exactly as the advertisers do newspaper proprietors. Our notion may seem depreciating—nay, degrading; but it is the true one; and if one poet publishes a handsome volume solely at his own risk, why may not another pay for the appearance of his ode or his sonnet? The principle is the very same, and the pecuniary risk much less. Many of the popular periodical works of the day, nearly or wholly reject poetry. Save in known or special cases, the lazy editors will not even take the trouble to read anything in rhyme. Some of them go the length saucily to announce that they want no verses, and will receive none. In short, we believe that the time has come for the commencement of the system we have suggested—one which, we are convinced, would work well for both versemen and prosers—giving to one class an opportunity of coming fairly before the world, despite of editorial feud or favour; and saving the other a world of what they conceive trouble. Leaving to "the TRADE" this idea of a periodical Anthology with a guaranteed circulation of 10,000, for the right of appearing in which, unknown poets, like advertisers, must pay by the scale,—we pass to a more congenial theme, those poets, namely, who, bearing the true impress, are kindly or proudly welcomed to our own Feast.

To sweeten, and to attune the minds of our readers to the themes before them, and to correct the very prosaic or common-sensical tendency of our remarks on the revolution in the publication and marketable value of the mediocre verse which abounds in the present day, and which we hold to be one of its most humanizing and hopeful features, we select, as an opening piece, a Grand Overture, the following poem, descriptive—and the word is inapt and cold—of the exalted destinies, the high calling, of the Creative Poet; and significant of the value, to all mankind, of his art or his inspiration—of, in brief, that heaven-born instinct which men name poetical genius.

THE POET'S DEATH SONG.

Quem nec fama deum, nec fulmina, nec minitanti
Murmure compressit coelum: sed eo magis acrem
Irritat virtutem animi; confringere ut arcta
Naturæ primus portarum claustra cupiret,
Ergo vivida vis animi pervicit; et extra
Processit longe flammantia moenia mundi;
Atque omne immensum peragravit mente, animoque;
Unde refert nobis victor quid possit oriri,
Quid nequeat; finita potestas denique cuique
Quantam sit ratione, atque alte terminus hærens.
Lucretius, Lib. i. v. 69-78.

Δὲς τὸν σὺν αὐτῷ τῷ γὰρ ἀνθρώπῳ.

Archimedes.

Away!—I am not thine—away!

What to the mighty, Death, art thou?

Ay—let thy chill creep o'er my clay—

Let thy dewdrops cling upon my brow;

Take all, the all thou canst, of mine,
Vain tyrant!—I am none of thine.

Deem'st thou it triumph to release

From this gross flesh the subtle mind;

Come then—and it shall bid thee peace,

Since all too long hath life confined

That native of a nobler sphere,
In dim and fretful bondage here.

For what is life—the life of clay—

What—but to trail a galling chain

From hour to hour, from day to day,

Shut from the sense of aught save pain;

A veil before the intense soul

Half-hiding her immortal goal.

Death solves the chain—the veil flings wide,

Bids earth to fellow earth descend;

But the pure principle, denied

Long with its element to blend,

Or raised from dreams, or loosed from strife,
Its touch remits to certain life.

Irradiant emanation thou

From primal Light's transcendent throne,—

Immortal Effluence, which did'st flow

From the Imperishable One;

That passing veil—that breaking spell,
Hides thee from the Ineffable.

Yet not in vain the bondage borne,

For soul doth dignify her cell,

As through a cavern's pores the morn,

So, through the frail tabernacle,

Some rays of glory may transpire,
Some sparkles of empyreal fire;

Gleams of the splendour basely mewed,

As, by that princeling fool of yore,

Mind's glorious martyr, unsubdued,

To bid eternity adore

The genius, whose lore divine

Transformed his dungeon to a shrine.

Spirit of Song—Oh! when the world

Shall, duly wielded, know thy might;

And selfishness and wrong be hurled

Back to the central realm of night;

Then—nor till then—thy sons may own
Their hope, their aim, their guerdon won.

The spirit found me:—through my heart,

And on my brain that spirit poured

Knowledge, 'twas transport to impart,

By impartation deeper stored:

For thus inspired,—I deemed my mind
The moral treasury of mankind.

Oh for the ecstatic thoughts that flashed,

Like keenest lightnings, through my brain;

Oh for the waves of impulse dashed

Upon my heart, thence—thence again

Dashed on the world, to whelm despair,
And wake electric pulses there.

The world has heard,—nor all in vain ;
There be who treasure deep the rede,
Mighty, though few—I see that train
Swell like a torrent in its speed ;
And thoughts like these have made to me
This span an immortality.

And what though none had heard, and none
Obedyed the energetic impulse wrought ;
Fame is the breath of man alone,
There is eternity in Thought,
It were the same though Truth's rebound
None echo save my heart's had found.

One source mine inspiration knew,
Mind deathless, universal, dear ;
Or wheresoe'er that influence drew
Material forms within its sphere,
And power, and awe, and beauty grew
From their embrace before my view.

These were to me as types—I sought
Their subtle spirit—drinking thence Thoughts, truths, emotions, such as wrought
Sublimest spiritual evidence ;
No sordid, blind devotion—mine
Worshipped the spirit,—not the shrine.

Thus through the vast and the minute
Nature with mind my mind imbued ;
The flower upspringing at my foot,
The giant of the solitude,
The dew whereon did twilight sleep,
Ocean's immeasurable deep,

The glow-worm in my path,—the heaven
Thick sown with stars, as my own breast
With fantasies,—the cloud-storm driven,
Or borne on gentlest gales of rest,
Became as wells of truth to me,
Deep truth, and deeper mystery.

But man—the immortal reptile—man,
My brother,—how on him my gaze
Was rooted !—Of mind's noblest plan,
That wreck sublime,—that unpierced maze
Of tangled thoughts, and clashing creeds,—
That Eden overgrown with weeds ;

Centre of dissonant sympathies,
Love, hate, scorn, admiration blent ;
Now, servile slave of vain caprice,
Now, scarce less than omnipotent,
Now bathed in heaven his glorious brow,
Wallowing in earth's pollution now.

From what mine eyes beheld, I turned
To the unbeheld, my soul before ;
And my heart's inspiration burned,
As central flame, to teach him lore,
Which, like the Titan's pilfer'd fire,
Should wake ineffable desire ;

The glow and energy of soul
Enkindle wide ; give truth to reign,—
Self's dreary dissonance control,
Weave sympathy's electric chain,
Till man with man in concert move,
And earth become the fane of love.

And what my lore—oh while I saw
Whence all the ills of mortals sprang,
Dissembled truth,—perverted law,—
The bigot's venom—tyrant's fang ;—
And, champion in the world's deep wrong,
Poured my indignant soul in song ;

While truths prophetic did inspire
High hope, and impulse new defined,
How should the pulses of my lyre
Thrill ; but to tones that stir mankind
To hate, and scorn no less than hate,
Their force and fraud,—to emancipate

The mind, which lives in all,—through all,—
From hoary superstition's yoke,
That Dagon, yet untaught to fall ;
(No single arm may deal its stroke ;)
But with mailed heart, and dauntless brow,
I've taught to make the idol bow.

Rouse ye—my fellows of mankind—
Crouch not before a mortal throne ;—
Bend to no chains, save those of mind,—
No empire, save its empire, own ;
Freedom its banner—love its might,— Wisdom its law,—its sceptre light.

'Tis not for me that hour to view,
That hour, remote perchance, yet sure,
Which disenthral the world ;—but you,
Look forward,—pant,—aspire,—endure,—
And struggle on, howe'er withstood,
Through hells of fire, and seas of blood.

'Tis not for me—that hour—the thrall
Is on you yet,—that thrall of hell ;—
But bid it cease, and cease it shall ;
Scatter the mists inscrutable
By priestly knaves and despots thrown Round Truth's and Right's eternal throne.

What ! can ye stoop the suppliant knee ;
Yield homage to a fellow clod ?
Arise—resolve—unite—be free—
And worship mind—the only god :
Be all religion thus defined,
For mind is God,—and God is mind.

Fling wide the casement :—blessed air
That bear'st the Godhead's gift above,
Now, while the spirit lingers there,
Which may thy fragrance feel and love
Come to my brow,—and cool my lips,
And soothe these eyes in their eclipse.

And thou bright orb—to me that wast
The image of the eternal light,—
Give of thy glorious flood the last—
Last draught to cheer this sinking sight ;
A moment more, and I shall be
Radiant as thou, and fleet, and free.

Borne on thy beams,—a kindred beam ;
Wafted on air,—a subtle plume ;
Pure as my fancy's youngest dream,
While these shall dwindle in the tomb,—
My spirit shall its life immerse
Within the spiritual universe.

Faint throbs my pulse—and fainter still ;
Dim, and more dim the mortal ray ;
Unshrinking mind—unconquered will,
Leave the chill phantom all his prey,
This flesh—these bones—of all bereft
Save of the worship ye have left.

See—see—thou dost—thy fearless course :
Lo the eternal presence nigh,
Hence—in thine elemental force,
Care—chance—change—destiny defy ;
Death—take thy due—I scorn thy might,
Burst from thy clod—thou prisoned light. H. D.

Much less vigorous than this noble burst are the subjoined lines; but they are in the same keynote, and may aptly conclude the preparation for our varied banquet.

TO THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

Spirit of Song ! celestial influence !
That pourest thy bright visions o'er the mind
Of the rapt poet, like the gorgeous clouds
Of summer's fairy sky—bright visitant !
That chooseth thy abode within the breast
Of Heaven's most favoured ones, and makest it
An oracle, to which the nations throng

And fondly worship, as the heavenly strains
Swell from their Delphian shrine—thy magic power
Doth make man all immortal,—shuffles off
The weary burden of o'er-cumbering clay,
And lendeth him a spirit that can soar
On the strong pinions of unfettered thought !
Thou art fair Nature's lover ! and thy soul
Is aye familiar with her changeful moods
And ever-varying features,—and in all,
With an ecstatic fondness, thou behold'st
Beauties, congenial to thy pliant thought,
And wild chameleon fancy. In thy son,
The Bard, thou dost instil this yearning love
Of Nature's charms, till, with a suitor's haste,
He registers within his heart each look,
Each accent, till his mind can paint,
At will, a fair resemblance—like the lake
That mirrors rocks, and woods, and changing skies.
Thus doats the poet, till he longs to be A part of that he worships—would become
An immaterial feeling, that could taste
All Nature's wild delights—a thing made up
Of incorporeal rapture and light air.
Then would his wayward fancy love to flit
Within the silver moonbeams, as they dance
From heaven to earth, and tremulously shine
On the unfooted mountains, or along
The blue lake glance, when midnight fairies play ;
Or mingle in the rosy virgin cloud,
The earliest that rises to proclaim
Hyperion's coming ;—or to hurl itself
Amid the roaring tempest as it sweeps
Across the boundless main ; or in the flash
Of the wild thunder burst from the black sky,
And crush to dust the everlasting hills !

Spirit of Poesy ! within the heart
Of man thine empire is, and at thy throne
The proudest of the earth must bend ; thy children are
The monarchs of futurity—their wreath
Lives longer than the regal crown—their lyres
Are prouder monuments than marble piles,—
And Shakspeare's, Milton's, Byron's genius crowns
With immortality a nation's name.

Every one must sympathize in the motive which leads us to give precedence to a few specimens of the posthumous poems of ROBERT NICOLL ; a light too early extinguished, some scattered rays of whose genius have already brightened these pages. Robert Nicoll, at the time of his premature death, left a good many poems which have not yet appeared. His volume, entitled Poems and Lyrics, published about two years before his death, and when he was a mere lad, has long been out of print. In the intervening period inquiries have repeatedly been made for it, from London, Leeds, and Sheffield, where his genius, and the bright promise that was around him, had been appreciated by a few persons of kindred feelings,—comparatively unknown and obscure as Nicoll lived and died. His humble, but truly worthy and respectable, family, have, for this reason, and as a testimony to the memory of him in whom they naturally placed so much pride and hope, resolved to publish a new edition of the Poems and Lyrics, together with the posthumous pieces, which are numerous. The greater part, or probably all of these new poems, were written in England, in the last eighteen months of Nicoll's life, while consumption was rapidly undermining his strength, and while he was doing manful battle for the cause so precious to his heart,—the cause of the People, of his brother poor men,—as Editor of the Leeds Times newspaper.

Robert Nicoll, though he could not have been wholly without some modest consciousness of the genius which is seen even in his most hasty effusions, regretted the rashness of his first publication,—much as it has been admired,—and resolved that he would publish no more verses, until he was sure that he was entitled to appear before the world claiming the proud and glorious name of Poet. Yet he may be said rather to have breathed forth than composed poetry, in every day of his brief career, until finally prostrated by that fatal and insidious malady, against which the mere strength of his will long bore him up. A good deal of Nicoll's original verse is supposed to be either lost or scattered about. Some of what exists is imperfect or unfinished, and must now so remain. Yet the pure ore lies richly imbedded there, and the dross will crumble away of itself, and be disregarded.

As specimens of the original poems which are to appear in the projected Collection, we select the following pieces, which are mainly recommended to us by their brevity or nationality :—

THOUGHTS OF HEAVEN.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

High thoughts !

They come and go,
Like the soft breathings of a list'ning maiden,
While round me flow
The winds, from woods and fields with gladness laden :

When the corn's rustle on the ear doth come—
When the eve's beetle sounds its drowsy hum—
When the stars, dew-drops of the summer sky,
Watch over all with soft and loving eye—
While the leaves quiver
By the lone river,
And the quiet heart
From depths doth call
And garners all—
Earth grows a shadow
Forgotten whole,
And Heaven lives
In the blessed soul !

High thoughts !

They are with me
When deep within the bosom of the forest,
Thy morning melody
Abroad into the sky, thou, Thrustle ! pourest.
When the young sunbeams glance among the trees—
When on the ear comes the soft song of bees—
When every branch has its own favourite bird
And songs of summer, from each thicket heard !—
Where the owl flitteth,
Where the roe sitteth,
And holiness
Seems sleeping there ;
While nature's prayer
Goes up to heaven
In purity,
Till all is glory
And joy to me !

High thoughts !

They are my own
When I am resting on a mountain's bosom,
And see below me strown
The huts and homes where humble virtues blossom ;
When I can trace each streamlet through the meadow—
When I can follow every fitful shadow—
When I can watch the winds among the corn,
And see the waves along the forest borne ;

Where blue-bell and heather
Are blooming together,
And far doth come
The Sabbath bell,
O'er wood and fell;
I hear the beating
Of Nature's heart:
Heaven is before me—
God! Thou art!

High thoughts!

They visit us
In moments when the soul is dim and darkened;
They come to bless,
After the vanities to which we hearkened:
When weariness hath come upon the spirit—
(Those hours of darkness which we all inherit)—
Bursts there not through a glint of warm sunshine,
A winged thought, which bids us not repine?

In joy and gladness,
In mirth and sadness,
Come signs and tokens;
Life's angel brings,
Upon its wings,
Those bright communings
The soul doth keep—
Those thoughts of Heaven
So pure and deep!

MY GRANDFATHER.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

Hale be thy honest trusty heart,
And hale thy beld and snawy pow,
The hand of eld ne'er furrowed o'er
A baulder or a manlier brow.
The laddie wha was ance thy pet,
Has been in places far awa',
But he thy marrow hasna met
Amang the great nor yet the sma'.
Ance proud aneuch was I to sit
Beside thee in the muirland kirk,
A ruling elder—ane o' weight,
Nae wonder though your oe did smirk:
And braw aneuch was I to find
My head the preacher's hand upon,
While by the kirkyard stile he cracked
Of haly things wi' Elder John!

And syne as hame along the muir
I prattling by your side did rin,
Ye mind how ye rebuked thae thochts—
And ca'd them vanity and sin.
But pennies frae your auld breik pouch
Wi' dauds o' counsel ye would gie,
The last war gude—but aye the first
I liket best, I winna lee!

Thy daily fireside worship dwalls
Within this inmost soul of mine.
Thy earnest prayer—sae prophet like—
For a' on earth I wadna' tyne.
And you and granny sang the Psalms
In haly rapt sincerity;—
My granny—dinna greet, auld man—
She's looking down on you and me.

Can I forget how lang and weel
The carritches ye made me read?
Or yet the apples—rosie anes—
I gat to gar me mend my speed?
Can I forget affection's words,
That frae your lips like pearls ran?
Can I forget the heart that prayed
To see me aye an honest man!

And mind ye how we gat us beuks,
And read wi' mickle care and skill,
Until ye thocht this head wad wag
The poopit's haly place intil!
For mony an idle whim of mine
Wad my auld father journeys gang;
His auld heart danced when I did right,
And sair it grieved when I did wrang.

But mair than a'—frae beuks sae auld—
Frae mony treasured earnest page,
Thou traced for me the march of Truth,
The path of Right from age to age:
A peasant auld and puir and deaf
Bequeathed this legacy to me,
I was his bairn—he filled my soul
With love for Liberty!

Be blessings on thy reverend head,
I dinna need for thee to pray;
The path is narrow, but nae een
E'er saw thee from it stray.
God bears his ancient servants up
He's borne thee since thy life began—
I'm noble by descent—thy grave
Will hold an honest man.

THE NAMELESS RIVULET.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

We met within a Highland glen—
Where, wandering to and fro
Amid the rushes and the broom,
A pilgrim thou didst go,
Tripping betwixt thy gowany banks
I heard thy tinkling feet,
While with thy solitary voice
The primrose thou didst greet!

Then, nameless stream, I imaged thee
A pure and happy child,
Whose soul is filled with guileless love,
Its brain with fancies wild;
Which wanders 'mid the haunts of men,
Through suffering, care, and fear,
Pouring its waking thoughts and dreams,
In nature's faithful ear!

Like brothers, streamlet, forth we fared,
Upon a July morn,
And left behind us rocky steep,
And mountain wastes forlorn.
Where'er thy murmuring footsteps strayed,
Along with thee I went;
Thy haunts were nature's fanes, and I
Was therewith well content.

Adown by meadows green we roved,
Where children sweet were playing,
We glided through the glens of green,
Where lambkins fair were straying.
We lingered where thy lofty banks
Were clad with bush and tree,
And where the linnet's sweetest song
Was sung to welcome thee.

Then came the forest dark and deep;
As through its shade we went
The leaves and boughs, with foliage bowed,
Were with thy waters blent.
And through the leafy veil the sun
Fell lone, and fitfully,
To kiss thy waves, that from the hill
Came flowing on with me.

And when we left the wildwood shade,
From fields of ripened grain
The reapers song came sweetly down,
And thine replied again.
Away we went by hut and hall,
Away by cottage lone,
Now lingering by a patch of wood,
Now moving heedless on!

Where praying monks had been we passed,
And all was silent there,
Save when thy voice the echoes waked,
Which heard the hermit's prayer.
We passed by thickets green and old,
By craggy rocks so steep,
And o'er leaf-shadowed waterfalls,
We cheerily did leap!

And then a spot upon us burst,
Where hills on either side
Rose up, all clad in coppice-wood,
Which rock and steep did hide.
The ivy clasped each stone and bush,
Thou flow'dst along between ;
While rock and river, bird and flower,
Filled up the glorious scene.

By happy homes of toiling men,
We this sweet day have passed,
And have enjoyed each sight and sound,
As though it were our last :
And now we loiter lazily,
Beneath the setting sun ;
My journey ends when starlight comes,
Thine is not well begun !

Now, Highland streamlet, ere we part,
Which didst thou love the best,
Of all we've seen since, silently,
We left thy Highland nest !
Lovest thou best the meadow green,
Or Highland valley gray ?
Or lovest thou best by hazel braes,
At eventide to stray !

Or dost thou love where forest trees,
Thy little waves are laving !
Or wealthy fields, where golden grain,
Ripe, to the sun, is waving !
The rustle of thy fleet foot,
Upon my ear doth fall—
Thou stream, like this full heart of mine,
Dost dearly love them all !

Without a name, and all unknown,
Fair streamlet, though thou art,
Be still unchristened ! but I'll keep
Thy murmurs in my heart.
My story of thy pilgrimage
Will to the careless tell,
How much of love and beauty in Unnoted things do dwell.

OUR AULD HEARTHSTONE.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

Where ance the cosie fire was bien,
The winter rain-drap owrie fa's ;
My father's flure wi' grass is green,
And roofless are the crumblin' wa's.
Auld thochts, auld times, upo' my heart
Are backward rowin' ane by ane :
We'll bow our houghs and hae a crack
About them on our auld hearthstane !

Our laigh cot-house I mind fu' weel :
On ae side mither spinning sat,
Droning auld sonnets to her wheel ;
And purring by her side the cat.
Aneent was sair-toiled father's chair,
Wha tauld us stories, sad and lane,
O' puir folk's waes, until we wished
Them a' beside our cosh hearthstane !

And whan the supper-time was o'er,
The BEUK was tane as it should be,
And heaven had its trysted hour
Aneath that sooty auld roof-tree :
Syne ilka wean was sung to sleep
Wi' sangs o' deeds and ages gane ;
And rest was there until the sun
Cam blinkin' on our auld hearthstane.

Auld stane, had ye a heart to feel,
Ye wad been blythe as ony kitten,
To hear o' ilka sang and reel,
And prank made up while round ye sittin'.
How days o' feastin' cam, wi' speed,
Whan dubs were hard as ony bane,
How Pace and Yule and Halloween
War keepit round our auld hearthstane.

Whan winter nights grew white and lang,
The lads and lasses cam wi' spinning,
And mony a joke and mony a sang
Gaed round while wheels were busy rinnin'.
And syne whan ten cam round about,
Ilk lassie's joe her wheel has ta'en,
And courtin' o'er the rigs they gang,
And leave us and our auld hearthstane !

And mickle mair I could unfauld,
How yearly we gat rantin' kirns ;
And how the minister himsel'
Cam duly carritchin' the bairns :
Vow, sic a face ! I tremble yet !
Gosh guide's ! it was an awfu' ane ;
It gart our hearts come to our mouths,
While cawrin' round our auld hearthstane !

Weel, weel, the wheels are broken now,
The lads and lasses auld or dead,
The green grass o'er their graves doth grow,
Or gray hairs theek their aged head.
My parents baith are far awa',
My brithers fechtin', toilin' men,
It warms my heart unto them a',
The sight o' this our auld hearthstane !

When I forget this wee auld house,
When I forget what here was taught,
My head will be o' little use,
My heart be rotten, worse than naught.
Sin' birds could sing upo' thae wa's,
I've been in chaumers mony ane ;
But ne'er saw I a hearth like this,
No, naething like our auld hearthstane.

Hearthstane ! though wae, I needna greet,
What gude on earth wad whinging do !
The earth has fouth o' trusty hearts,
Let him wha doubts it speir at you.
Ae wish hae I—that brither man,
The world o'er, were, bluid and bane,
Sic truthfu', honest, trusty chields,
As ance sat round our auld hearthstane.

WE ARE LOWLY.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

We are lowly—very lowly,
Misfortune is our crime,
We have been trodden under foot
From all recorded time.
A yoke upon our necks is laid,
A burden to endure ;
To suffer is our legacy,
The portion of the poor !

We are lowly—very lowly—
And scorned from day to day,
Yet we have something of our own
Power cannot take away.
By tyrants we are toiled to death—
By cold and hunger killed ;
But peace is in our hearts, it speaks
Of duties all fulfilled !

We are lowly—very lowly—
Nor house nor land have we,
But there's a heritage for us
While we have eyes to see.
They cannot hide the lovely stars,
Words in creation's book—
Although they hold their fields and lanes,
Corrupted by our look !

We are lowly—very lowly—
And yet the fairest flowers,
That by the wayside raise their eyes—
Thank God they still are ours !
Ours is the streamlet's mellow voice,
And ours the common dew—
We still dare gaze on hill and plain,
And field and meadow too !

We are lowly—very lowly—
 But when the cheerful Spring
 Comes forth with flowers upon her feet
 To hear the throstle sing,
 Although we dare not seek the shade
 Where haunt the forest deer—
 The waving leaves we still can see,
 The hymning birds can hear!

We are lowly—very lowly—
 Our hedgerow paths are gone,
 Where woodbines laid their fairy hands
 The hawthorn's breast upon.
 Yet slender mercies still are left
 And heaven doth endure,
 And hears the prayers that upward rise
 From the afflicted poor!

WE'LL A' GO PU' THE HEATHER.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

We'll a' go pu' the heather—
 Our byres are a' to theek :
 Unless the peat-stack get a hap,
 We'll a' be smooored wi' reek.
 Wi' ranting sang, awa we'll gang,
 "While summer skies are blue;"
 To fend against the Winter could
 The heather we will pu'.

I like to pu' the heather,
 We're aye sae mirthfu' where
 The sunshine creeps atour the crags,
 Like ravelled golden hair.
 Where on the hill tap we can stand,
 Wi' joyfu' heart I trow,
 And mark ilk grassy bank and holm,
 As we the heather pu'.

I like to pu' the heather—
 Where harmless lambskins run,
 Or lay them down beside the burn,
 Like gowans in the sun;
 Where ilka foot can tread upon
 The heath-flower wat wi' dew,
 When comes the starnes ower the hill,
 While we the heather pu'.

I like to pu' the heather,
 For ane can gang awa,
 But no before a glint o' love
 On some anes e'e doth fa'.
 Sweet words we dare to whisper there,
 "My hinny and my doo,"
 Till maistly we wi' joy could greet
 As we the heather pu'.

We'll a' go pu' the heather—
 For at yon mountain fit
 There stands a broom bush by a burn,
 Where twa young folk can sit.
 He'll meet me there at morning's rise,
 My beautiful and true.
 My father's said the word—the morn
 The heather we will pu'.

THE BRAMBLE.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

Be the bramble in the berry,
 Or be it in the flower;
 Or be it bare of leaf and bud
 Waved by the winter shower;
 That creeping bush that lowly is,
 As lowly well can be,
 It hath a charm—a history—
 A tale that pleases me!

When black grew bramble berries,
 Some twenty years ago,
 The dawning often saw us set
 Where mountain waters flow;

And when the gruesome gloaming came
 To keek into our creel,
 It found a fouth o' spotted trout
 Whilk we had tackled weel!
 The bramble-berries were our food,
 And water was our wine,
 The linnet to the self-same bush
 Came after us to dine.
 As down the glen at e'en we gaed,
 The lambies round us bleated,
 And we, wi' blythsome hearts, their word
 To ilka rock repeated!
 And when awa' we used to gang
 By fieldpaths green and lane,
 The bramble flowered beside our feet,
 And mantled tree and stane;
 And wi' the hedgerow, oak, and thorn,
 Its branches twisted were,
 That scarcely through the wall of leaves
 Could breathe the caller air!
 Then be the bramble-berry black,
 Or be it in the flower,
 I love its humble lowliness
 For sake o' days run ower;
 And grow it in the woods sae green,
 Or grow it on the brae,
 I like to meet the bramble bush
 Where'er my footsteps gae!

From these specimens our readers may form some idea of the forthcoming volume. It is to be published by Mr. Tait for the benefit of Nicoll's mother, and his younger brothers and sister—if any benefit shall result to them beyond the proud satisfaction of having shewn all the honour in their power to his memory. The work must possess every claim which the author's undoubted genius, his pure and unblemished life, his ardent, if brief, services in the cause of the People, and the affecting circumstances under which the REMAINS of the early lost poet appear, can give it. It is the work of one of the truest, and one, moreover, among the highest, of the national poets of Scotland,—of that race of peasant-sprung bards which rose with Burns, and too probably ended with Robert Nicoll. In the long interval, no brighter spirit than his has risen amidst that honoured band,—though he died ere he had well begun to live. Nicoll was just born, when that great agricultural transition was rapidly progressing, if not almost finished, which has not more completely changed the face of Scotland than the manners of its rural population. He was, while a young boy, a little herd, a witness of it, and a sharer in its attendant hardships; and the last traces of the rural life of the Scotland of Burns and of the early days of Scott, of the primitive and very poor, yet of the pure, the happy, the merry, the religious Old Times, are embalmed in the pages in which he sings "of the loves, and joys, and rural pleasures of his humbler countrymen;" and the rural scenes of his country. Since the Immortal, who first used these words to describe his own glorious mission, no one, in our humble opinion, has shown more decided signs of a call to the same high vocation,—more marked tokens of the same genial inspiration, than ROBERT NICOLL.

Instead of attempting to classify our poetic gleanings, as we have formerly done, we shall, this season, present them in Groups, or, if our readers will allow the phrase, as Tableaux Vivans.

GROUP I.

POEMS RELATING TO LOVE AND LADIES.

MY LADY'S PICTURE.

Since Solomon, the singer wise,
First limned his love in glowing dyes,
Each bard will paint like him;
Though oft-times dashed the purposed brush
By pride, and fear uncalled to rush,
More hopeful instincts brim
To-day. A spirit whispers fair—
Pursue the hint; thou hast her there.

Her eye is like the bright blue flower,
Full-petalled in the sunny hour,
But in the cloudy, shy;
Save that I never yet have seen
Clouds mantling o'er that brow serene
Infect the gracious eye.
Is this the likeness of the fair,
Spirit of my wish, declare!

Her locks are like the leafy twine
Of the careless curling vine,
And sunny as the May;
And ever as in sport they move,
Around the temple of my love
They shed a golden day.
Is this the likeness of the fair,
Spirit of my wish, declare!

Her cheeks are peaches on the tree—
A kindly-chastened revelry
Of mellow-mantling blood;
Her lips are gently round and red,
Like roses half in blossom spread,
Half lingering in the bud.
Is this the likeness of the fair,
Spirit of my wish, declare!

Her teeth, as pebbles on the shore,
When summer's sun can bleach no more,
So white and fresh are they;
Her chin—to poise a lingering kiss
So rare a pedestal as this
Was never made from clay.
Is this the likeness of the fair,
Spirit of my wish, declare!

Her neck is smooth as the beech tree;
Her breast—so daisy-beds you see
Upon the grassy common;
Her 'portment, wisely toned between
A shepherd maiden and a queen.
So is the picture—if 'tis fair,
Part of my love is imaged there.

ERMENAIDE—A COQUETTE.

Fancy! bring me all thy store
To paint the mistress I adore:
Bring me balms of Araby,
With her odorous breath to vie;
Bring the moonlight-gleam which lies
On placid lakes, to match her eyes;
Coral, moisten'd with the spray
Of glittering oceans far away,
To equal the enchantment shed
O'er her dewy lips of red!

In the forests' upland lawn,
Silent treads the stately fawn.
The mist is rising from the hill;
All the mighty wood lies still,
Breathless, dark,—save where the light
Of the slant sun shines clear and bright
On that gentle creature; showing
A form with grace and beauty glowing.
Bring that step to match the slow,
Proud motion of her limbs of snow.

Bring from sea, from air, and earth,
All of most surpassing worth:

Go where every flow'r is fairest;
Go where every charm is rarest;
Bring them all, and quick they'll fade
Compared with matchless Ermenaide!
One other task remains for thee,—
Fancy, then thy wing is free.
What is't the vagrant winds are whirling
In many a strange contortion curling,
Hither, thither, light it flies,
Wandering 'neath these summer skies!
A feather from a light bird's wing!
A bright, unsteady, useless thing!
Bring that feather, 'twill be laid
Near thy bosom, Ermenaide!
Emblem, faithful and sincere,
Of thy fickle heart's career;
Pursued till folly's hour is past,
And valueless when won at last!

THE BRIDE.

Her mother has kissed her brow,
And has left her for the night;
With a promise to call her early,
As soon as the morn is light.
That she may braid her raven-hair,
And meet, in her beauty's pride,
The noble and stately lord
Who to-morrow will make her his bride.
Her mother's step has passed,
And a shadow of grief and woe
Has come o'er the maiden's face,
So bright but a moment ago.
But away all thought of sorrow;—
And she cast her tearful eye
On the jewels and the dresses
That lay neglected by.
And she chased away the thought
That her high and queenly brow
Might ache 'neath the eastern pearls,
That but rivalled its glistening snow.
Was a dream of love of bygone days
To mar a life like her's,
When her palace might be her temple,
And the world her worshippers!
Could she think of past vows broken
When she pictured times to be,
And herself, of each splendid scene,
The sole bright divinity,—
At whose bidding would ever wait
Pages in bower and hall;
And whose sphere would be for the future
The court and the festival?
She thought of gorgeous robes,
She thought of jewels bright,
Numerous as leaves of summer,
Dazzling as stars of night.
She thought of the murmur soft and low,
Of praise that her ear would greet;
She thought of the glance of homage
That her eye would ever meet.
She turned, and before her stood
He to whom she had vowed to be
The partner of hearth and home
In grief or festivity.
Her mother has risen up
At the rising of the sun,
And has prayed for her daughter's weal
In her daily orison.
She is gone to her daughter's room
With a soft and stealthy pace,
To gaze again in alumber
On that loved and beauteous face.
But, alas! and where is she,
On whose brow was to be set,
Ere the coming day had flown,
A bright dazzling coronet?
Where is she! oh! where is she!
Has a spirit of the air
Stolen her for his bride
Because she was so fair!

Or has a tribe of fairies
The mighty mischief wrought,
And carried her away
To their own calm "land of thought!"
Or has a band of angels been
For their sister angel sent,
From this "dim spot" to take her
To their own pure element!

She is dwelling in a lovely glen,
Where village bells have rung;
Where green boughs are waving,
Where matin-birds have sung;
Where the blue sky looks deepest
Through the openings in the trees,
Where the ear is refreshed
By the murmur of the bees.
To which man might retire
From the world's uncertain ways,
"And fleet his time carelessly,
As they did in the golden days."
And bloom is on her cheek,
And gladness in her eye;
And she wakes the woods with song,
And her voice is melody.
And her light step is bounding
As the footsteps of the roe;
And free as the breezes,
That round about her blow.
Instead of bannered halls
With their chivalrous array,
Is the "pomp of groves" and fields,
And the blue arch of day.
And the murmur of the stream
Is the music which she hears;
And to worship Nature's God,
Is the lesson which it bears.
And her mother has forgiven
The errors of her child;
She hath viewed her forest life;
She hath looked on her and smiled.
And her daughter has no wish
But that present times may be
Of the future in its happiness,
The type and augury.

MADRIGAL.

Lucy's eye is heavenly blue,
Ellen's is like morning dew
That sparkles in the sun;
But who with Mary's e'er can vie!
Ah! none possess that soft gray eye
That has my fancy won.

Lucy's hair is far too light,
Ellen's has too much of night,
So sombre is its hue;
But Mary's is such glossy brown,
Her ringlets gracefully fall down
Enchanting to the view.

Lucy has a pretty smile,
Ellen many a heart will wile
From out its resting-place;
But Mary is so sweetly kind,
Each motion has so much of mind,
She'd witch you with her grace!

Lucy is scarce above my knee,
Ellen's stature frightens me,
So very, very tall;
My Mary is the middle height,
Her figure's graceful, round, yet slight,
Oh, Mary beats them all!

Ellen often takes the pet,
Lucy is a young coquette,
And smiles on two or three;
But Mary's constant, firm, and true,
As soon the heavens be lost to view
As Mary change from me!

CANZONET.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

It was no dream,
For I beheld affection's sunlight shine
Around my steps,—while, promising sweet rest,
A spirit blest
Drew near, and smiled, and spoke: the voice was thine!
Fair was the wreath
That spirit proffered,—but, vile serf to death,
Vile foe to life, I flung the flowers away,
And 'neath the sway
Of jealous passion, scorched them with my breath!
Their memory—shrined
Within my heart—speaks loud: I hear it say,
"The love, by doubt once chilled, can ne'er return;
"Vainly shall yearn
"The heart for what the hand so madly flung away."

THE IRISH PATRIOT'S TOAST.

The Green Isle's beauteous daughters—
The virtuous and fair!
From out their warm and ardent hearts,
God, keep corroding care!
May their cheeks ne'er lose the rose's tint—
Their eyes, the witching light
Which cheer'd us through the dreary hours
Of cursed oppression's night.
Oh, daughters of my fatherland,
The hour is drawing nigh
When no longer on your bosoms
A slave shall pillow'd lie:—
Nor from you drink the draught of life—
Ay, it will come ere long,
The bonds which bind us, soon must break,
The weak are growing strong!
Let 's toast the partners of our bonds,
The sharers of our grief,
Whose smiles so oft have lighten'd us,
And given our souls relief
When sinking under sorrow's load:—
To them, fill to the brim!
And he, that echoes not my toast
My malison on him.

Here's the Green Isle's lovely daughters,
Of Erin's sons the pride!
May their paths be strewn with sunshine—
Their days all peaceful glide—
Their bosoms' rest be undisturb'd
By aught of grief or care;
And long be (as they've ever been)
As virtuous, as fair!

TO ———

My dreams are of thee!—but the days are gone
When we could wander by the dark blue sea;
And I may gaze upon its waves alone,
And dream of happy days and bright hours flown,
While thought, incessant, ever turns to thee.
And art thou happy in thy lowland home?
And hast thou all forgot thine own green glen,
The sandy beach where thou wert wont to roam,
The rugged sea crag and the white sea foam—
Forgotten all 'mid homes of stranger men!
The loved companions of thine earlier day,
The friends who on a Summer's even with thee
Were wont, along the sandy beach, to stray,
Watching the wild waves in their billowy play,
While the red sun set in the deep blue sea.
And o'er the golden sand to greet thee then
The foamy billows came—yet 'neath thy gaze,
Lest they too boldly greet thee, sank again,
As 'neath thy blue eyes' light the eyes of men
Shrink from the beauty which they meant to praise.
Are all forgot! or, whilst the wild wind raves
In gusts unearthly through the old church tower—
Rustling the tall rank hemlock o'er the graves—
Thinkest thou ever of those dark-blue waves
Whose murmurs reach'd of old thy summer bower?

TO A FELLOW-TRAVELLER.

Whence art thou ! lady, with the heavenly eyes !
 And wherefore journeying to join the crowd ?
 Where many sounds, all inharmonious, rise,
 Until the smoky atmosphere is loud
 With savage execration ; and the cries
 Of human-suffering's voice of many a note,
 Are drowned, amidst unfeeling things that float
 Like ice-flakes on the sea. Oh ! what hast thou
 To hope for from the fantasies that make
 Of man and woman a coquette and rake ?
 Thy nature-teeming eyes and cloudless brow
 Can best be mirror'd in the quiet lake,
 Where deepest love might breathe his truest vow,
 And yield thee all the bliss our nature's laws allow.

GROUP II.

REFLECTIVE AND HUMOROUS POETRY.

These we group for the sake of contrast, or, as truly, upon no principle at all.

THE THREE RETURNS.

Egypt—Elba—St. Helena,

A slender bark is speeding to the shore,
 No looker-on to watch its drawing nigh.
 He's landed—he that slender vessel bore—
 A soldier, with his sword upon his thigh.
 No halt—but on ;—the turning of the die
 Gives death, or empire. Empire ! He has won.
 The eagle bursts above the cloud. On high
 He rises, glistening in the mid-day sun ;
 And gazing there, with an unclosing eye
 His talon grasps the lightning of the sky.
 He comes again, the genius of dread power,
 After brief respite to the nations. Hear
 The din of arms. Behold the golden shower Poured from the level orb of fire, just ere
 He sinks, on corslet of the cuirassier,
 And long drawn line of bay'nets. Heaven's blue
 Is hid—the clouds put on their thunder gear,
 Lurid, portentous ; 'mid the wild halloo
 Of battle, cannon roar, and curse, and cheer,
 How soon to burst in blood on Waterloo !
 Tearing the world with a convulsion new.

Again he comes—in darkness. 'Tis the last.
 Mutely they fare along. The wintry wind
 Dirges a psalm over glory past.
 We lift the pall with reverence. What to find ?
 A 'dizened coffin—all that's left behind
 Of empire ; and a few dry bones to tell
 Of godlike intellect ! Away—his mind,
 His thoughts, his deeds, are History's, to dwell
 Upon her page for ever. Here consigned—
 What could die of him—to his narrow cell,
 He sleeps in earth of "France he loved so well."

CHARITY.

ΠΑΙΣΤΑ ΕΙΣΗΓΗ ΠΟΙΝΤΑ ΠΙΣΤΗΝ, ΠΑΙΣΤΑ ΕΛΠΙΣΤΑ, ΠΑΙΣΤΑ 'ΑΓΑΠΗΝ.
 1 Cor. xiii.

O God ! there is a virtue known
 In word more than in deed,
 The first thing in Christ's gospel shown,
 The last in churchman's creed.
 'Tis strange ; but, as the wise can tell,
 We point, but reach not high ;
 The best have scarcely learn'd to spell
 The gospel when they die.

"THE CHURCH ! THE CHURCH !" they cry aloud,
 And sure the cry sounds well ;
 But how shall Heaven's pure cause be proud
 Of weapons forged in hell ?
 So Frenchmen freedom preached with swords ;
 You with the tongue of hate
 Preach love—your gospel, not the Lord's :
 The difference how great !

When the Great Teacher walked the earth,
 They said he had a devil ;
 Should he again in power walk forth,
 Think ye they'd speak more civil !
 I guess 'twould raise a fearful storm
 In this free British nation,
 Should he, from the Established norm,
 Dissenting, preach salvation.
 He preached a new commandment, new
 To many now as then,—
 "TO GOD THE NOBLEST WORSHIP DUE IS DEEDS OF LOVE TO MEN."
 No curious pile of doctrines vain,
 This simple plan receive ;
 The heart is rudder of the brain,
 Do first, and then believe.
 The lilies of the field declared
 His simple liturgy ;
 From heaven no vengeful lightning flared
 When blind eyes failed to see.
 No legal ban, no felon's cell,
 Compelled his kindly creed,
 But with the pictured parable
 He taught the child to read.

J. S. B.

TO A CAGED EAGLE.

Suggested by a Visit to the Zoological Gardens.

Bird of the far-commanding eye
 And wide-spread wing, who will not sigh
 Thee cooped and chained to see !
 To me my life's my liberty,—
 Should it be else to thee ?
 Ah, no ! thy now sunk, sullen eye
 Gives silent, eloquent reply,
 "He killed who caged me."
 The pleasure of some lady light,
 Or peeping microscopic sight,
 Is harshest hell to thee.
 Him I denounce who did prepare
 Thy bonds: what title he may bear
 I reck not; he did sin.
 If from his stock more than thy share
 Thy noble theft did win,
 He had the right, by force or snare,
 Where thou wert found, to sell thee there;
 But so to bar thee in—
 To rob the wingful of his wing,
 To chain thee here—the mountain king,
 I say, it was a sin !
 A monkey in a cage may spring,
 A sparrow hop, a linnnet sing,
 But can an eagle fly !
 Or were more space, with his proud wing
 He would disdain to try.
 Think'st thou that God made such a thing
 For scientific torturing,
 Or food of idle eye ?
 O barren bliss to look upon
 The cabineted skeleton
 Of fallen majesty !

Trust thou the instinct of thy heart;
 Thy wit sees but the smallest part,
 When deepest it may pry.
 Let knowledge be thy daily mart,
 Keep aye an open eye;
 But still with holy shrinking start
 From the strange wisdom of an art
 That teaches life to die.
 For this nor reason ask nor give,
 All living things have right to live,
 All flying things to fly.

TO THE ALBATROSS.

BY RICHARD HOWITT.

Take not the albatross,
 I love to see him glide,
 The regal bird, magnificent,
 Over the waters wide.

Amid the southern main,
Where billows rage and foam,
This wilderness of mountain waves
Seems his perpetual home.

Wrong not the albatross ;
It is a holy thing,
Still let him fan the desert air
With his capacious wing.

It cometh from the sun
With light unto the soul,
The drooping mariner to cheer,
Where wildest billows roll.

It glides into the mind,
In the mind's thoughtful hour,
With broadest images sublime,
Of Peace and tranquil Power.

How, like a spirit pure,
Its station doth it keep ;
A soul of calm amid the storm,
Lone brooding o'er the deep.

Oh, spare the albatross !
I would not see him slain :
Still let him wing, as he has winged,
The immeasurable main !

As from creation's birth,
He thus has ever flown ;
As thus unto the close of time
He would soar on alone :

Still let him seem to move,
Between the sea and sky,
A nature pure, that must endure,
A thing not born to die.

We publish the following clever burlesque verses, mainly to gratify the Cockneys, and under protest.

LORD BATEMAN'S DARTER.

A Romance.

Lord Bateman sat in his banquet hall,
Arter a werry good dinner sot he,
He drank up his wine, and his viskers he viped,
And turned hisself round to his wife So-phy.

Lord Bateman he cried, " Oh vere is my darter,—
My own little four-year-old gal," he cried,
" Come bring me now my dear little darter, Vot loves on my knee so merry to ride."

" Come sit on my knee," Lord Bateman he said,
" Not astride ! but sit like a lady, so,
And ve'll ride a cock-oss, to Banbury Cross,
And away like vinking ava-a-a-ay ve'll go !"

" Come talk to me now my sweet little darter, Come talk to me now, like a werry good maid ;"
" Oh, how can I go for to talk to you Daddy, Ven you tickle and skveedge me so," she said.

" Oh, you tickles, and skveedges, and pulls me so,
And you hugs me, and makes sich a riot ;—
I've a secret to tell ye, a werry great secret,
If so be as you'll let me bide quiet.

" Just now, as I fetched a small bit of a walk
Vith Nance Dawson, my nussery maid,
Ve comed to an 'ood vere the willets grow,—
I vonder they likes for to grow in the shade !"

" Says Nance, ' Mind the wipers ! the wipers !' said she,
' The warmints will sting ye to death for sartain ;'
But I lets go her hand, and runs into the 'ood,
And cries out—' All my eye, Betty Martin !'

" Now, as Nance vos affear'd to come arter me there,
She stood outside, and didn't she holler !
' The warmints vill sting ye to death, they vill,'
Says she, but the vinding path I foller :

" Till I comes to the bank vere the willets growed,
All under a hash tree so stately and strong,
And I seed a werry uncommon big willet,
Vith a stem as long—Oh, hever so long !

" I stooped down to pick it close to the ground,
Vith a werry long stem, for fear I should spile it:
Ven—' You let I alone ; I baint vot you thinks :
I'm a sperrit incog,' says the willet.

" ' Oh, I am a fairy a-hiding, a sperrit
As loves all little gals as is good:
I'll tell ye a secret ye must tell to Lord Bateman,
Ven you leaves this here wileetty wood.

" ' Oh, the sparrer so bold, so vicked and bold,—
The sparrer has laid a plan cunning and deep,
For to turn the poor martins all out of their nest,
The werry fust time he can catch 'em asleep.'

" This here is the secret I heard from the sperrit,
The fairy incog. vith a stem so long,—
The werry big willet as growed in the shade,
All under the hash tree so stately and strong."

Then up rose Lord Bateman in a werry big passion,
And backards and forards like vinken he goed:

" I knows vot the willet meant," said Lord Bateman,
" I knows vot she meant ; if I doesn't, I'm blow'd !

" My arms is three martins, 'tis werry well known,
And as for the sparrer, there's no difficult-ty,
The sparrer's the crest of that wagabone feller,
Lord George Fitz-Besom, my old ene-my.

" Let him come ven he likes, he shant besom me ;
He vont go for to sveep me out of my nest ;
If he dares to come here vith his gang, for sartain,
I'll hang half on 'em up, and gibbet the rest."

So Lord Bateman he vatched, he vatched all night,—
He vatched vith his men so trusty and true ;
But the fust night nothin at all comed nigh 'em,—
They cotched nothin at all, and Lord Bateman looked blue.

But the second night they cotched a fine sparrer,
Oh, a net full of sparrers they laid hold on then ;
The sparrers vos great big thundering fellers—
Lord George Fitz-Besom and scores of his men.

Oh, they hanged 'em all up in a row, for sartain,
As lovely a sight as ever vos seen:
Lord Bateman he laughed, as he said to his Lady,
" I thinks as these Besoms han't a svept werry clean."

Ever arter this werry extrorny ewent,
All the Batemans a willet has took for their crest,
' Cos the good sperrit, incog. in a willet,
Saved the Martins from being svept out of their nest.

LINES WRITTEN IN A ROMAN CAMP IN BAVARIA.

There is a cloud before the sun,
The wind is hushed and still,
And silently the waters run
Beneath the sombre hill ;
The sky is dark in every place,
As is the earth below,—
Methinks it wore the self-same face
Two thousand years ago.

No light is on the ancient wall,
No light upon the mound,
The very trees so thick and tall
Cast little shade around ;
So silent is the place and cold,
So far from human ken,
It hath a look that makes me old,
And spectres time again.

I listen half in thought to hear
The Roman trumpet blow,
I search for glint of helm and spear
Amidst the forest bough ;
And armour rings and voices swell,—
I hear the legion's tramp,
And see the lonely sentinel
Who guards the lonely camp.
Methinks I have no other home—
No other hearth to find,
For nothing but the thought of Rome
Is stirring in my mind.

And all that I have heard or dreamed,
 And all I had forgot,
 Are rising up as though they seemed
 The household of the spot.

And all the names which Romans knew
 Seem just as known to me,
 As if I were a Roman too,
 A Roman born and free.

And I could rise at Caesar's name,
 As if it were a charm
 To draw sharp lightning from the tame,
 And nerve the coward's arm!

And yet if yonder sky were blue,
 And earth were sunny gay,
 If Nature wore the summer hue
 That decked her yesterday;
 The mound, the trench, the rampart's space
 Would move me nothing more
 Than many a well-remembered place
 That I have marked before.

I could not feel the breezes bring
 Rich odours from the trees,
 I could not hear the linnets sing,
 And think on themes like these:
 The painted insects as they pass
 In swift and motley strife,
 The very lizard in the grass
 Would start me back to life.

Then, is the past so gloomy now
 That it may never bear
 The open smile of Nature's brow,
 Or meet the sunny air?

I know not that—but joy is power,
 However short it last,
 And joy befits the present hour,
 But sadness fits the past.

THE SKELETON FOOT.*

Oh! fleshless fragment of some female form,
 Of Nature's workmanship the last and best,
 Which once with life's mysterious fire was warm,
 What impious hand disturb'd thy place of rest,
 And, in a glassy slipper thee attir'd,
 Loath'd by the many, by the few admired!

The calm observers of the works of God,
 In thy anatomy His wonders trace
 With purer pleasure than, when silken-ehod,
 The carnal fool beheld thy mincing pace,
 And symmetry which raised a longing sigh,
 Though from thee now he turns his ogling eye.

Let those whose folly dares to draw a line
 Of broad distinction between dust and dust,
 Thy plebeian or thy noble cast divine!
 They cannot;—God, immutable and just,
 Alike to all his Heavenly image gave:
 'Tis man that makes the monarch and the slave.

Perhaps thou once wert wont to sit in state,
 Amid the circle of the drawing-room;
 But no! the bodies of the proud and great
 Are laid to rot in vault or marble tomb;
 For, 'tis but fair, the bones of nobler forms,
 Be left to fat the better sort of worms.

Perhaps thou trod'st some humbler walk of life,
 And wert, from truth and virtue led astray,
 By one who promised thee the name of wife,
 And praised thy symmetry but to betray
 The soul, confiding, innocent, and young,
 That readily believed his flattering tongue.

Thy perfect mechanism may have served
 Some Opera-dancer, fraught with every grace,
 Save modesty, but with that courage nerved,
 Which always sears a young and blushing face,

* The above reflections were suggested to the writer of these lines, on seeing the skeleton of a foot (apparently female) exhibited in a glass-case in the window of a fashionable boot-maker in London.

When oft submitted to the searching gaze
 Of thousand eyes 'midst thousand lights' full blaze.
 And where's the soul that o'er thy frame once shed
 The "poetry of motion!" Who can tell
 Into what realm the immortal part has fled,
 Or, if in misery or joy it dwell?

SATHANAS AND THE FRYAR OF HALIERUDE.

Heir followyth ane maist profitabyll Ballante, schawing howe venerabyll Nyckolase yarmyt to ete ane cauld suppyr, and of y^e suppyr hee gat: formerlie in use to be recytis enactments of y^e myrakyll on occasiounes of y^e festyvalle of blessyt Saunte Andro, and supposit to be maid be Master Noeboddie, commonlie callyt y^e pyppyr quho playit befor Moyses.

"Rede warill—rede aftenner than anie."

There is monie ane Fryar in Calydon,
 All Fryars of halie mude;
 But it is mie desyre to speke of ane Fryar
 Quho wonnyt at Halierude.

This halie man gryt fame y-wan
 For cunnynge in Cookerie;
 Though he none mot luke in hys Cookerie Baks
 Saafe Misterisse Doddie, ahee.

O y^e savourie dyshes of foules and fyshes,
 The puddynges and pastyes gude,
 Were all of y^e beste, as maye ethe be guesst,
 In y^e Abbeye of Halierude.

In appyll-pye ordyr were metes in y^e lardyr,
 The celloures were storit wyth wyne;
 O y^e lippes of ane laye y-smacken maye
 To see howe ane monke could dyne!

And farthyr y^e fame of y^e Fryar hys name,
 In y^e myndis of menne to rayse,
 Hee, soothe to telle, was akwayntit welle
 Wyth y^e Devvyl and all hys wayes.

Nowe, lystene Lordynges, and lystene all,
 For ane tayle of Sathanas aulde,
 Is at sic ane seasoun baith the ryme and reasoun,
 Soe lyst tyl y^e tayle be taulde.

Kynge Sathane sat in hys smokkie hame,
 And hungrie and hotte was hee,—
 Says, "Quhare schalle I get ane lyttl devvyl
 "Ane erronde to runne for mee!"

Sone ansyrit hym, ane impe soe small
 Was twystynge at hys tayl—
 "'Tis I am yer manne quho speidyllie can
 "Perform it wythouten fayl."

Hys quyssynge-glasse tooke Mahounde to looke
 At y^e impe quho spak soe bolde,
 And, though he smalle to viewe, hee thoughte hee moid:
 Soe quycklie hys heste hee tolde;—

"Cum, packe up yer tayl and wythouten fayl,
 "For Halierude hastyn yee,
 "And y^e Fryar y-telle that I hoppe hee is welle,
 "And alsua hys famylie;

"And bidde hym sende hyther ane cauld suppyr,
 "Ane suppyr cauld and gude,
 "For brennyng coalis and hotte sulphure,
 "It is but unsavourie fude.

"And if hee complice, nowe promyse I
 "Myne honoure and worde upoane,
 "Never tempte I schalle hys kyndred all
 "Tyl thrie longe yeires be gone."

Ane hoppe eftsones y^e Impe y-tooke,
 And at Etna its toppe hee stode;
 Hee steppit over y^e Straytes of Dover,
 And jumpit to Halierude.

"Longe lyffe to yer Honnoure!" y^e impe y-sayd,
 "Hoppyng I don't intrude:
 "Now certes ye doe," sayd y^e halie Fryar,
 "For ye cum for noethynge gude."

"Nowe there ye lye, maiste halie Fryar ;
 "For sumthyng gude I cum ;"
 Then ane stulle hee gat and doune hee sate
 Just lyke that Fryaris chum.

Hys erronde hee tolde, that impe soe bolde,
 Hee tolde it cleverlie,
 Howe Sathane wantit ane caulde suppyr,
 Y-cookit for hym to be.

"When dynit hee last ?" y^e Fryar said—
 "Ane hundrede yeires agoe ;"
 "And when dyd hee last y-broke hys fast ?"
 "O just ane hundrede moe."

The Fryar uprose, and blewe hys nose,
 And walkit to and froe ;
 (Full syx feete gude in hys shois hee stude,) And cryit—"Nowe, heir is ane goe !

"Ane hundrede yeires to eten noughte,
 "Maikes Lente tyme blacke and longe,
 "And quhat schall suffyse Mahounde hys mawe,
 "Quhose hungyr must be stronge !

"Certes, ane pyllie were Arthurs hylle,
 "Lyke mytis ilke hoose in tounne,
 "And were it grene cheise hys taste to pleise,
 Hee ethe coulde y-swallowe y^e mone.

"Howe can ane suppyr be kept caulde
 "Ane moment in Sathanis hame !
 "The caulddest chykene wold sone, I recounne,
 "Be devvylit in y^e flame.

"Yet sumthyng wille I, for y^e guerdoun hie
 "Is worthie myne Cookerie ;
 "Sic promyse, I trowe, is hard enowe
 "For y^e Temptyr of manne to gie."

The Fryar y-tuke hys Cookerie Buke,
 Compylit with subtyltie,
 And y^e impe croochit nygher y^e monk hys fyre,
 For shyverynge and chyllie was hee.

The Fryar gan luke at hys Cookerie Buke,
 That dysches descryvit in store,
 And taulde quhat kynde of metes to fynde
 In Oceane and eke on Shoare.

Be hys meikill skill y^e Fryar, at will,
Of myseris heartes got hee,
 Ane mylleone or twoe whilke hee thoughte mot doe
 Mahounde to satisfie.

Hee knewe full welle noe golde in Helle,
 To warme sic heartes is founde,
 But caulde they kepe thoughe placit in hepe,
 Where rostynge fyres abounde.

Then gat hee y^e blude of ane wyfe quho stude
 Hyr husbandis dethe to see ;
 Of ane manne wyth ane knyffe had slayn hys wyffe,
 And hangit hys bayrnyes thrie ;

And of fourtie conquerynge captaynes bolde,
 Quho famouse in weir had bene :
 Next hee myxit y^e blude y^e heartes amonge,
 Ane verie caulde pye I wene !

Quhen to get hym ane payste hee tryit hys beste
 In cookynge and gramyrie ;
 Seeke where hee wolde, was noughte soe colde
 As warldlie charytie.

Soe rounde y^e pye hee byggit it hie,
 Nor levit y^e smalleste hole,
 Then sent it to be for mynutes thrie
 Thryse baykit benethe y^e pole.

The impe lauchit hie—"Quhat ane daynty pye
 "To sette before y^e Kyng !
 "Never feir, schyr Fryar, that infernall fyre
 "May dammage it aniehyng."

"Sayd y^e Fryar soe cyrylle—"Nowe goe to y^e Devvyl,
 "And carrie thys pye awaye,
 "An iff ye soe muche as y^e cruste it touche,
 "There wyll be y^e Devvyl to paye."

Now laude to y^e Fryar, y^e cunnynge Fryar
 Of Halierude, evermoe,
 For never was cookit sic caulde suppyr
 For Sathanas Aulde belowe !

The heartes unethe, in spyte of hys teethe,
 To broken in peices were,
 And manie quyte quhole doune hys throte dyd rolle,
 Theyr hardnesse y-mayd hym swayre !

Ane schyver and shayke, and sadde toothache,
 That suppyr dyd gyve hym sore,
 And soe cauld to hys toothe was y^e payste in soothe,
 It yarkit for yeires ane score !

PRINTER'S Devil.

DEATH.

How solemn moves the hand of death along,
 Forcing, in silent, and resistless strength,
 A pathway through the ranks of busy life,—
 Sweeping from off the stage of this vast world,
 The boasted might of proud ambition's will,
 Its grandeur—pomp, on which we love to gaze—
 Into th' abyss of an eternity !—
 Beck'ning to man amid his scenes of mirth,
 Who unconcerned, laughs at the summons,
 Yet dreads the yawning grave ; and seeks to 'scape
 The ghastly truth, that, stalking by his side,
 Frowns on his daring inconsistency,—
 By stretching after joys, that burst within His eager grasp !

JOLLY JERRY THE BARRISTER.

(Song.)

Jolly Jerry !
 O who was like him !
 Jolly, jovial, jocund Jerry !
 Like a Christmas bowl
 Where spiced floods roll,
 So grand was the soul of Jolly Jerry !
 But to-day full sadly the bell did sound,
 We laid him in the clay-cold ground ;
 Ah, welladay !
 He's gone and away,
 Jolly Jerry !
 Jolly Jerry !
 O who was like him !
 Jolly, jovial, jocund Jerry !
 Thin-visaged Law,
 Her meagre maw
 Lined when she saw
 Jolly Jerry.
 But to-day the sons of the robe are sad ;
 The billowy rings of laughter mad,
 Cease :—welladay !
 He's gone and away,
 Jolly Jerry !
 Jolly Jerry !
 O who was like him !
 Jolly, jovial, jocund Jerry !
 In a blanket he toss'd
 Bright fancies a host ;
 Small labour it cost
 Jolly Jerry :
 But now they screw, and they stretch, and they draw,
 With hammer and wedge they drive the law,
 For he is away
 The fish who could play,
 Jolly Jerry !
 Jolly Jerry !
 O who was like him !
 Jolly, jovial, jocund Jerry !
 His round eye did swim,
 In wit and whim,
 A god was in him
 When we were merry :

But his organ mirth now peals no more,
And mockery sad were the festal roar
And glee to-day,
When he is away,
Jolly Jerry!

POETRY OF THE AFFECTIONS.

A HIGHLANDER'S LAMENT FOR GLENGARRY.

BY A LADY.

Wail ! wail ! for thy glens, Invergarry,
Shall echo no more to the steps of the brave !
Wail ! wail ! for the chief of Glengarry
Has left his blue hills for a home o'er the wave.
Wail ! through the forest and mountain resounding
No more shall his bugle-note startle the deer ;
Nor foot, fleet as light, from crag to crag bounding,
Shall tell us how little Glengarry could fear.
Wail ! ne'er again, the blue waters dividing,
Shall be heard on Loch Oich the stroke of his oar,
And the prance of his proud steed, the laggard wind leaving,
Shall gladden the hearts of his people no more.
Wail ! far away is our roof-tree transplanted,
Our eagle 's forsaken his eyrie, and flown ;
The hand never stinted—the heart never daunted,
Have left us forever—Glengarry is gone !
We'll seek him in vain when the heather-bell's filling,
We'll wait him in vain at the fall of the leaf :
Never more, never more, to our Highland hearts thrilling,
Shall pibrochs swell proudly to welcome our chief.
Wail ! wail ! for thy glens, Invergarry,
Shall echo no more to the steps of the brave,
Wail ! wail ! for the chief of Glengarry
Hath left his blue hills for a home o'er the wave.
But bless'd for his sake be each valley and mountain,
And sweet be the flowerets that smile on the plain,
And bright be the sparkle of river and fountain,
In lands that shall welcome him over the main.
And oh ! may the hands and the hearts that surround him,
Be leal as the bosoms that cherish'd him here !
May they in their deepest affections have bound him,
And hold him, as we do, o'er everything dear !
And bless'd be his bride for the words she hath spoken,
The vows that she breathed—and the pledge that she gave ;
For the friends she hath left—for the ties she hath broken,
To brighten and bless that far home o'er the wave !
Though ours be no more the delight to behold him,
To live for his pleasure—to die for his fame ;
May the banner of love, like a garment enfold him,
And honour forever attend on his name !

THE DYING CHILD.

Mother ! my soul is fading
Into its dreamless rest,
And the deathly sorrows are shading
The fire within my breast,—
And dark and sunny memories
In thousands round me sweep—
One last long look at thy earnest eyes
Before I fall asleep !
Sister ! our blessed childhood
Is a holy dream to me—
Our walks in the shady wildwood,
By the quiet old oak tree ;
We have lain where the heather-blossoms rise—
We have gazed on the gentle moon,
And laughed in the light of the happy skies,
In the dreamy nights of June,

Surely thy love will cherish,
And thy breast of beauty wear,
An emblem that cannot perish—
One curl of my auburn hair ;—
It will bring thy mournful spirit back,
Where'er its visions roam,
Like a lonely bird on the radiant track
Of day, to its first fond home !

Father ! thy smile is o'er me,
As in the days of yore ;
But thy spirit has gone before me
To God's own golden shore.
I may not speak of thy dim eyes,
Or of thy earnest prayer—
'Mong the amaranths of Paradise,
I shall see thee, hear thee there !

Mother ! my soul is fading
Into the light above,
But never, ah never, shading
The depth of its voiceless love !
I leave no ring or gem to thee,
Save that which shines on high—
My eyes are dim, and I may not see,
And now, now, let me die !"

THE CHURCH-YARD TREE.

It has fallen down, the old church-yard tree,
So late in its shadowy pride ;
And its mournful leaves in tears remain,
All seared and wet with the winter rain,
By their dying parent's side.
It has fallen down ; and the grave is green,
And the turf is bright and fair,
Where the tree which has watched the seasons roll,
The last to many a thousand soul,
Doth rest his boughlings bare.
I have watch'd that tree in my earlier days,
In the Spring and Summer gay,
In the Autumn, when the early dews
The cheerful soul with life renews,
And in hoary Winter gray.
I have paced that church's hallowed ground,
In holy and peaceful times,
When the bright blue clouds did skim the air,
And when many a gentle breeze did bear
St. Peter's Sunday chimes.
And many a mournful tale he told,
And many a sigh had he,
For the rich, and young, and poor, and old,
Whose souls have fled, and whose hearts are cold,
As the heart of that church-yard tree.
In this weary world there is many a care,
But they soon must have an end ;
And the church-yard tree is lying low,
Where daisy flowers were wont to grow,
The greensward to befriend.
'Twas a goodly sight in the afternoon
Of a Sunday in the Spring,
To watch the careless children there,
With butter-cups and daisies fair,
Around that plane-tree cling.
And I love on a Sabbath eve to stroll,
When the sun has gone to rest,
And when twilight sheds around the soul
A feeling which has no control,
Of heavenly peace possess'd.
And many a time hath that church-yard plane,
With its broad and its tinted leaf,
Which the evening breeze did gently shake,
The blessed thought and feeling wake,
To care which gave relief.
It has past away,—it has past away,
And the church-yard tree is lying,
Where human hearts do soon decay,
And moulder into earth away,—
It has past, and the tree is dying.

The careless boy and the maiden sad
 Shall court his shade in vain,
 And the summer clouds, and the summer flowers,
 The evening breeze, and the gentle showers,
 Shall please him ne'er again.

The moon-light fair, and the twilight gray,
 No more shall his pleasure share,
 And the birds who sang so many a song,
 Its topmost leaves and boughs among,
 In vain shall seek him there.

He has fallen down in his stately height,
 That rustling church-yard plane ;
 And his leafy boughs to the summer breeze,
 Which courts the sacred palmy trees,
 Shall rustle ne'er again.

FAREWELL TO CHILDHOOD.

"When I was young !
 When I was young ? ah ! woeful, when !
 Ah ! for the change 'twixt now and then !"
Coleridge.

Thou hast parted from me, childhood !
 I have miss'd thee on my way,
 Thou hast left me as the starry host
 Forsake the brow of day !
 The bounding step, and gleesome laugh,
 Have fled with growing years,
 And what were traces of my joy,
 Are furrows now for tears !

Thou hast parted from me, childhood !
 And borne upon thy wing
 The many thousand gleams of hope
 To which my heart would cling !
 The feelings too that gushed from out
 The fountain of the breast,
 Are withered up by worldly cares,
 That have their flow repress'd !

Thou hast parted from me, childhood !
 But like some friend of yore,
 Estranged for many weary years,
 Who comes to us once more ;
 The image of thy pleasant hours
 Still fit across the brain,
 Though like the pilgrim's alter'd mien,
 Thou'rt not the same again !

Thou hast parted from me, childhood !
 Though I have loved too long,
 To think unmoved of buried sweets,
 Of unembitter'd song !
 Of pastimes in the woodland green,
 And rambles through the glade,
 Ay, ev'ry spot is dear to me,
 Through which my footsteps stray'd !

Thou hast parted from me, childhood !
 Thy sun hath set for aye !
 With grieving spirit I have watch'd
 Its glory melt away !
 But every gleam hath lighted up
 The cells of memory,
 And sever'd, childhood ! though we are,
 This heart is still with thee.

A SABBATH IN THE WILDERNESS.

From our fatherland we were "far awa' ;"
 In the midst of sultry Africa ;
 Weary we sat in a lonely glen
 And sighed for our native plains again—
 'Twas the day of rest, but no Sabbath-bell,
 Wakened the echoes of that dell.

Yet not unblest by the voice of prayer
 Passed the holy time o'er us lonely there !

By the side of a scarcely murmuring brook
 A reverend father oped THE BOOK,
 Then lowly we knelt on the flowery sod,
 And lifted our hearts, to worship God.

A gorgeous Temple in which to adore
 The Highest ! a blossom-enamelled floor ;
 Mountains its pillars, and towering woods
 That met the sky and the opal clouds ;
 Silence around us, save far-off heard
 The notes of many a heaven-bounds bird !
 We sang a hymn, and the antelopes
 Came gently gliding from every copse—
 Listening they gazed, then fled away
 In the thickest shades of the woods to play :—
 Our Christian hymn ! its sound must bless
 And hallow the leafy wilderness.

C.

TO MY BROTHER.

Come with me, dearest, to the river's side,
 Where the bright floods make music as they flow,
 And while we wander by its sparkling tide,
 Sweet memories will arise of long ago,
 And thoughts, that childhood bade these waters keep,
 Flash forth once more from their enchanted sleep.

Look where it flows, unchanged, unchangeable,
 Foaming o'er rocks and rippling to the sun,
 The shy trout plays among its eddies still,
 Where dense and dark the restless currents run ;
 How strange to know that thrice three years have past
 Since we two wandered by its margin last !

Yet change is here, when we were wont to stray
 From morn till eve these woody banks among,
 Thick hung the hawthorn blossoms from the spray
 And birds of Spring in every thicket sung :
 And like a shower of gold, the bonny broom
 Flung to the amorous gale her buds of rich perfume.

Now Autumn looks o'er fields of ripened corn,
 And sere leaves rustle where our footsteps fall,
 Few and unfrequent now the notes are borne,
 That made these solitudes so musical :
 And so it is with us, for life no more
 Though happy still, is spring-time as of yore.

Ay, we are changed : upon thy noble brow
 Dwells the deep musing meet for manhood's prime,
 Thy step is firmer, and thy rich locks now
 Are somewhat darkened by the touch of time,
 And graver cares are round thy spirit twined,
 Than in these shades thy childhood left behind.

Yet, though time sports with outward forms at will,
 In deeper things his breath has scarce been felt,
 And the long lapse of years doth find us still
 Before the shrines at which our childhood knelt.
 And what in those young days we wont to prize
 Are still the same, the dearest in our eyes.

Still, as of yore, 'tis thy delight to bend
 Where some bold river thunders on its course,
 Where cataracts in whitened shower descend,
 Deafening the air with clamour loud and hoarse.
 Thou lovest to ply the angler's silent art,
 Alone with nature, and thy own deep heart.

Thou hast gone forth to mingle with the world,
 And breath'd the air of many a foreign clime ;
 But from thy spirit never has been hurled
 The warm, fresh feeling of that early time :
 And I behold the glory of thy youth,
 Blest with an honest heart of kindness and truth.

For we, though years have borne upon their flight
 A thousand joys my childhood could not dream,
 My soul has ever found its chief delight
 By lonely mountain glen, or gushing stream.
 And life can yield no pleasure and no pride
 Dearer than this,—to wander by thy side.

And should we hither stray, when young romance
Has faded in the world's ungenial air,
And the soft lightning of the eagle glance
In those dark eyes, be seen but faintly there,
Oh! may we find in Nature's beauty still
A joy all shadowless, a charm for every ill!

L. A. S.

CHOICE OF A GRAVE.

When we are rambling 'mid the flowery fields,
Or with a brook whose wild meandering yields
Such store of pleasant nooks, and shady groves,
And half-seen beauties, when the fancy loves
To lure us on—glimpses which would entice
Even men whose barren hearts seem made of ice,
Waking such tremors as when we, perchance,
Catch the sweet smile of a bright countenance,—
And we perforce go on with heart as light
As the small ripple, in its high delight
Kissing the lily, or the willow leaves,—
Mayhap we chance upon a spot that weaves
Such thoughts of joy around—it is so full
Of flowers, and moss—so wildly beautiful
In the sequestered twilight of green trees,
And circling rocks, of spring-wreathed hoariness,
We gaze till Fancy, like a froward child,
Is flower-entangled in his wanderings wild,
And o'er the throbbing of the heart we feel
A thoughtful, gently pleasing sadness steal;
Then we oft wish such spot may be our grave—
For, thus that sunny stream would ever lave
Its lilled margin—ever seen to move
To its own music 'neath the embowering grove.
That belt of daisies ever with the spring
Around our couch like dreams of love would cling,
The breeze, fragrant from other haunts, would bring
The beauty-searching bee, and die away
'Mid the umbrageous boughs, fit lullaby,
To pansies spread, like stars on verge of night;
And many a bird would pour its sweet delight
Above, and we would feel these things below,
Or mayhap hovering near—who dare cry no!
For musing in such place, death seems to be
A mingling with great Nature's harmony,
Or with the spirit here—a deep repose
In dreams of beauty from soul-torturing woes,
Which ever haunt, or lurk like fiends unseen
To mar our transports when they are most keen.

Spirit of Beauty! overpowering soul
Of lovely thoughts, and ecstasies which roll
Until the brain grows dim with very joy!
These thoughts offend thee not with dark alloy;
At thy bright look sweet thoughts and fancies spring,
Where else some trace no high and happy thing,
And be they foolish still such thoughts are sweet,
And many a heart has given an echo meet,
And Nature's self inspires them. Who ne'er thought
Upon the beauties of his native spot!
Or who ne'er wished it had been his to look
Upon the haunts he loves to meet in book,
Or in his lonely wanderings, as if they
Were his by right of earliest memory.

Then, knowing we must die—oh, be our rest
Like childhood sinking on a mother's breast,
In a wild nook which Nature half conceals,
Rich with luxuriance which she ne'er reveals.

PAN.

THE ASPEN TREE.

"Thou hast given unto the inanimate world voices."—Arcton.

Whence is that melancholy sound
That breaks the noon-day stillness round,
And, like the voice of one that grieves,
Is ever 'mong the summer leaves—
A mourner in the midst of glee!
Thou solitary aspen tree,
It comes, it comes from thee!

The water-lily floats in rest
Unbroken, on the fountain's breast,
That, like a mirror, flashes up
The beauty of the violet's cup;
So still is the unruffled air,
That even the tiny hare-bell fair,
Droops without motion there.

Yet, solitary aspen free!
No silence—no repose for thee:
Strange! thy complaining voice is heard,
Although no other leaf be stirred;
Though the tired winds in slumber sleep,
Their vigil o'er thee cease to keep,
Yet, yet thou wilt not sleep!

Oh, solitary aspen tree!
There is no sound so dear to me—
No sound throughout the greenwood borne,
In dewy eve—in rosy morn;
Yet sad withal, for, 'neath thy shade,
Those that in dust have long been laid,
With me, of old, have played.

I know not why, when but a boy,
That oft amidst my breathless joy,
Alone, I've paused beneath thy boughs
To catch their murmurs as they rose,
And, then, I never seemed alone,
For Fancy held with every tone
Communings of her own.

I love each tree that crowns the glade,
Each flower—each brook beneath their shade;
Each bird that animates the sky
Of summer with its melody;—
But, solitary aspen tree,
In deeper sympathy with thee
My spirit seems to be!

THE AULD FOLK.

O its weary to live i' this new war!',
For an auld siller-haffeted, white-powdered carl,
For there's now nae mirth
To be found on earth
Like the mirth that rang through the auld war'.

The een o' the younkens look unco wae,
They haena the blink o' my early day—
For clear i' the sun,
Wi' innocent fun,
Shone ilka blue e'e o' the auld day.

At thretty, folks now, wi' a brow o' care,
Read parliament news till their heads are sair;
But the joke an' the sang,
The winter nicht lang,
Were the marrow an' pith o' the auld lear.

At threescore, a body looks waefu' thin,
His banes winna company keep wi' his skin;
But sturdy an' stieve
Were the heart an' the nieve
At threescore an' ten—o' the auld ane.

At morn to the yokin they blithely went,
An' rested at eve wi' heart's content;
For naething could move,
Save crosses in love—
The sauls o' langsyne frae the auld bent.

An' blithe at the gloamin they'd aft coovene
For daffin an' fun—on the smooth common green,
When rollickin Rab,
Wi' his gift o' the gab,
Drew tears o' delight frae the auld een.

I mind them a' weel: there was Sandy Shaw,
 At ninety, the cheeriest carl o' a',
 Wha for ilka thing wrang
 Had a catch or a sang,
 An' bathered his griefs wi' an auld saw.

An' weel may I mind how Willie could joke,
 For a mile it was heard—the guffaw—when he spoke;
 How Jemmy was strang,
 An' Jenny was bang,
 An' Jock was the flower o' the auld folk.

For dancin' an' daffin, a deil was Jock;
 For a neibour, a kind counthie chiel was Jock;
 His bonny black e'e,
 O'erlippen wi' glee,
 Shawed the heart o' the flower o' the auld folk.

I met him yestreen—lang days had passed
 Sin we grat when he sailed to the ower-sea wast,
 An' fourscore years,
 An' mony sant tears
 Had stown frae his glimmer its auld cast.

He had come frae the hame o' the blue-necked bird,
 To steal a last look o' the green common sward,
 To chat wi' auld friens
 O' the days o' his teens,
 An' lay his white pow i' the auld yird.

But the green was ploughed up—it was a' fenced roun',
 There was nae kent face—there was nae kent soun';
 An' naught at hame,
 He said, was the same,
 But the grassy kirkyard o' the auld toun. G. P.

THE FAYRIE WELL.

A LEGEND OF THE NORTH COUNTRY.

There is a little mossy well
 Within the forest deep,
 Where the wild bees wander from bud to bell,
 And silken fox-tails creep.
 It wooeth not the evening-breezes
 Its glassy breast to cool;
 For the sun ne'er looketh through the trees
 Upon its little pool.

From the thymy bank its waters play,
 With a quaint and holy chime,
 Like the murmuring of a minstrel gray,
 Who dreams of the olden time.
 Alone it whispereth through the day;
 But when twilight leaves the hill,
 Sylph and fay attune their lay
 To the harpings of the rill.

'Twas Lillie's haunt at gloaming tide,
 When the laverock's song was done,
 When silence fell on the woodland wide,
 And sleep was on the sun.
 She sought it ere the locks of night
 Were jewelled with starlets fair;
 And she came agen, when the moon was bright,
 With garlands in her hair.

Lillie stood in the high chappelle,
 She was Sir Eilan's bride;
 But her thoughts were where the tinkling well
 Was lulling the woodland wide.
 She listened, with a sickly smile,
 But not to the holy man;
 But to a sound which up the aisle,
 Like a sick man's whisper ran.

"Come forth, come forth, my Lillie fair;
 I may not wait for thee.
 Come forth, my ladye bright, and share
 The woodland-crown with me;
 Our feast is made and our couch is spread
 Beneath the moonlit tree."

There is no bride by Eilan's side—
 He standeth there alone;
 For Lillie, to the forest wide,
 With the Fayrie Folk hath gone.

They have sought by glen, they have sought by hill,
 They have searched the dangled dell;
 But nought have they seen, but a rainbow sheen
 Arching the mossy well!

They have sought through all the caverns drear,
 And the dark nooks in the den;
 They may search for aye; but Lillie fair
 They'll never see agen!

In the darkest shade of the lonely wood,
 Beside the elfin well,
 Through stormy shower, and sunny hour
 There groweth a snowy bell;
 With dew the little cup is laden,
 And dry it may not be;
 It looketh like a lovely maiden
 With the tear-drop in her e'e!

AUSTRALIAN EMIGRANT'S SONG.

GERMAN BURSCHEN AIR—So nimmt ihn hin, &c.

Then fare thee well, thou land of Whig and Tory,
 Thou home of gold and glory,
 Thou famous British land, farewell!
 God knows the truth, I love thee well.
 But, since thou hast no place for me,
 I'll show no peevish face to thee:
 I'll seek a home in NEW SOUTH WALES.

The world is wide: hope is a gallant rider;
 God is a good provider:
 Faith's portion he appointeth sure.
 Farewell, my Scottish mount and moor!
 Where summer smiles more cheerily,
 Nor winter frowns so drearily,
 I'll find a home in NEW SOUTH WALES.

Farewell, dim nooks! ye dark and dingy gables!
 Ye ancient inky tables,
 Where many a peaking penman pines,
 Where never blessed sun-light shines!
 The bullock I'll be chasing now;
 Right stoutly I'll be racing now,
 O'er hill and dale in NEW SOUTH WALES.

God save thee well, thou hectic and full-blooded,
 With millions overflooded;
 Where labour ill redeems from want,
 Where giant weeds in purple flaunt!
 The healthy, brawny arm alone
 Is king; work is the charm alone
 To bind the gods in NEW SOUTH WALES.

God heal thy strifes, thou land of partisanship,
 Of narrow caste and clanship,
 Where nature shrinks from fashion's ban,
 Where all has rights save only MAN!
 No close noblesse shall class me now;
 No haughty Church harass me now,
 Where life is free in NEW SOUTH WALES.

Then fare thee well, thou land of Whig and Tory!
 Thou home of gold and glory!
 Nor gold nor glory gav'st thou me;
 Yet not with cursing leave I thee.
 While here ye fight your quarrels out,
 My soul its free song carols out
 To wood and wold in NEW SOUTH WALES.

LINES ON THE MEMORY OF WALLACE AND BRUCE.

Restore me Time's old monuments,
 My native hills, whose naked forms
 Have borne the rage of thunder-storms
 And earthquakes, as the mighty rents
 Upon their sides can show.

O give me them, to all the stones,
 (Their fragments) that the sculptor takes,
 And after his own fashion makes
 Proud emblems to stand o'er the bones
 Of famous men laid low.

And what are these to the huge rocks
That nature on each other piles,
That cast their shadows many miles,
Whilst those are crushed beneath the strokes
Of puny, feeble man!

My native hills ye oft recall
The memory of our noble men,
Who once did wander through the glen
Deserted by their friends, by all,
Whilst under tyrants' ban.

Can Wallace have his fame increased?
Can Bruce's deeds be better known?
By having carved in finest stone
Their honour'd names, wherewith to feast
Their countrymen's fond eyes.

O no! their names are both engraved,
Deep in the hearts of all that claim
The patriot's heart or patriot's fame.
Their Trophies are the hills they saved,
That boldly pierce the skies.

THE BRIDAL NIGHT.

The moon look'd down frae heaven high
On highland hill and lowland town,
And all beneath her dreamy light,
The wae and weary laid them down,
But aye the dance gaed through the ha'
The bride was buskit like a queen,
A wailing voice was heard the while,
Amang Kinnaber's holms sae green.

"O what can haunt my sleep of death,
The dream of love hath pass'd away,
For she doth bear a lightsome heart,
And I am in my bed of clay.
We plighted faith, my love and me,
We vow'd upon the flowery sward
With clasped hands and bended knees,
And our vows were a' in heaven heard.
O wha could think that breast sae fair
Did harbour thought of treacherie,
O wha could think that lips sae sweet
Wi' fause vows made sic melodie.
I linger'd in the dinsome town,
I wander'd by the water side,
But nought to me were the cares o' men,
Or the flowers that on the sward were spread.

And soon my weary eyes grew dim,
I wist nae where my feet did stray,
I wist nae that my hands were red
Till they were cauldier than the clay.
Thou fause love!—on a bridal bed,
Another's arms enfauldeth thee;
The hemlock in unhallow'd ground
Is growing o'er my grave and me."

TAM WABSTER.*

ODE—TO THE MEMORY OF BURNS.†

AIR.—"Bonnie Jeanie Gray."

Oh! Burns; I lo'e thy happy style,
Thy pathos, wit, and glee,
Fu' aft and sweet thy strains beguile
The weary hours to me.
I feel the magic o' thy sang
Strike ilk chord o' my heart,
As fondly sweet I linger 'mang
Thy soul enchanting art.

* What has kept silent, so long, Tam Wabster?—literally, Wabster; he, if we remember aright, whose gallant and brave resolve

"To have a kick at Fortune's ba," delighted us some years back. That one line is poetic immortality to any handloom weaver.

† This poem is by a working man. We have this year less of this kind of verse than usual, and much less than we could have wished to take; but the muse of the workshop is not only vastly prolific, as seen by our last census, but is become inveterately political.

How aft the youthfu' loving pair
Sings o'er thy "Bonnie Doon,"
When to their love bowers they repair
As day is wearing down.
An' monie a time-worn aged pair
Whase hearts thou makest to glow
When singing sweet, wi' trembling air,
"John Anderson my jo."

See, how the patriot's veins they rise
When by thy spirit led,
When swell thy strains up through the skies,
"Of Scots wha fought and bled."
Or see, yon vet'rans gray wi' years
Who've wandered monie a clime,
Their hearts they swell their een wi' tears
When singing "Auld lang syne."

He wha can read and canna feel,
His sweet heart-melting strains,
I envy not his heart o' steel,
Nor woo his frozen veins,
Oh! Burns—that name can I forget,
Or frae my mem'ry part,
No!—only when life's sun shall set—
'Tis graven on my heart.

Come then dear sons o' Scotia rise,
Our Burns, our bard revere,
And hail wi' joy co-mingling sighs
His name, his mem'ry dear,
A bumper high "permit me here,"
Wi' trembling, tearfu' een,
"To him the bard" o' Bonnie Ayr,
His Mary, and his Jean.

THE LULLABY.

A SCOTTISH BALLAD.

Fa' lown, fa' lown, ye noisy winds,
Wild-roaring frae the chimla tap;
Ye'll wauken up my sleeping bairn—
Oh! dinna break her needfu' nap.
And saftly blaw, for oh! your breath
Benumbs the flesh, and bites the bane,
Her bluid is thin, the fire's a spunk,
And maistly a' my duds are gane.
My bairn, my bairn, my bonny bairn!
Though born in shame, oh! dear to me!
Nae dearer had ye been though sprung
A blossom frae the marriage tree.
Though sair 's my heart, and scant my claes,
Thee closeely to my breast I'll fauld,
And sing ye sound despite the blast,
And keep ye warm despite the cauld.

My orphan bairn, nae freends hae ye
Forbye your mother, nane on earth;
The proud look skeigh, the prudent strange,
The thochtless jibe wi' heartless mirth.
But friendless though on earth we be,
Though woe may gather, joy may dwine,
In heaven are freends whase steady love,
Through storm or calm, we ne'er will tye.

Though frost may pinch, and hunger starve,
And nakedness through rags may keek,
Yet God will warm, and feed, and claithe,
And dicht the saut tear aff the cheek.
O hush! O hush! what starts my bairn!
Sleep on, wee innocent, sleep on,
Nae scaith is near, nae looks the noo
But looks o' love on thee are throwa.

O hush! and close your waukrife e'e,
I'll rock ye weel wi' tireless arm,
And cozy cradled on my breast,
Nae fear will fright, nae hurt will harm.
The wheel maun rest, the wark maun stau',
My pet! I winna lay ye doon,
But nursing wi' an sident care
My melancholy sang I'll croon.

Sae lanely left, sae lightly held,
 Sae spirit-sunk, sae body-bent,
 O wae ! what had your mother done
 Gin ye, my bairn, had ne'er been sent !
 A spar that sinking hope could seize,
 O, dear as comfort to distress !
 A spring where fainting life could drink,
 O, dear as rest to weariness !
 The grief and shame that on my breast
 A fearsome nightmare wildly sat,
 That choked my sighs, and scorched my tears,
 (O God that I could then hae grat !)

That sunk my e'e, and made the red
 For ever frae my cheek depart,
 Had ended life, but for the love
 That gushes frae a mother's heart.
 O gin my Willie had been spared,
 The heritage o' grief and shame
 Had ne'er been yours, nor infamy
 Been coupled wi' your mother's name !
 But O ye wild and cruel winds,
 Thou merciless, rough-rolling sea,
 That ere he could fulfil his vow,
 Swept him frae honour, love, and me ! J. Z.

ARE WAGES REGULATED BY THE PRICE OF CORN?

No falsehood has been propagated with more assiduity, or announced with more semblance of authority, at the recent elections, than the fiction that THE WAGES OF LABOUR depend upon, and are regulated by, THE PRICE OF CORN.

In town and country, in cities and boroughs—whether situated in agricultural or manufacturing districts, newspapers, daily and hebdomadal, orators from the windows of Tory Committee-rooms, hand-bills, placards and pamphlets urged the untruth with the vehemence inspired by desperation, and iterated it, till in many places a panic seized upon the working classes. “Cheap bread means low wages!” was telegraphed as if by electricity through the country, and the whole machinery of the monopolists was put in motion to spread abroad the delusion. The operatives were told point blank that the moment the price of corn fell, the wages of mechanics and labourers would fall in proportion; and at every corner of the street they were confronted and startled with the fraudulent memento—printed in the colours of the free-trade candidate—“Free Trade; with Bread from Russia, and 3s. 6d. a-week.” Wages, they were told, are regulated by the price of corn—have always been regulated by it, and always will be regulated by the same standard: when corn is low, wages are low; when corn is high, wages are high also; and the harangue was concluded with the cry—“Bread as it is with high wages; or cheap bread without money to buy it.”

Taken by surprise, as the country was by the great measures placed before the constituencies by the Administration, the mass of the people felt themselves for the moment at sea; for, notwithstanding the efforts of those economists who have laboured for years to circulate correct opinions on the corn laws and collateral questions, it is to be lamented that much ignorance prevails among all classes with reference to financial topics. The principles of free trade were imperfectly comprehended by men, from their cradles accustomed to monopolies; and the crudest projects, the most contemptible fallacies, and sophisms a thousand times refuted, were obstinately bruited abroad, till the popular mind, unable to resist the importunity of error, in many cases, became bewildered:—

The twinkling lamp
 Of wandering life, that winks and wakes by turns,
 Fooling the follower, betwixt shade and shining.

In such places as Liverpool, Leeds, Bradford, Hull, and, worst of all, the West Riding of the county of York, the Tories succeeded, by the force of artful misrepresentation, in paralyzing the energies of the people, or preventing their full development in favour of free trade; and it is to be feared that Sir Robert Peel's manoeuvre to suppress discussion by accelerating the dissolution of the late Parliament, has so far been attended with success, that the misconception respecting wages has in all parts of the kingdom not been unproductive of mischief. The Tories have, by the agencies adverted to, secured a temporary triumph; but TRUTH in turn will have its triumph, which will be as permanent as eventful.

Let us see how this proposition, that wages do and must fall and rise with the price of corn, will bear the test of close examination.

If it be true that the price of corn regulates the labour of wages, it must follow ex necessitate that in those times when the price of corn is high and excessive, wages are high also. Again, from the same premises, it will follow, that in those countries where a high price of corn is maintained, labour is well remunerated, and wages are high. On the other hand, it will ensue as a just corollary that in those countries where the wages of labour are extremely liberal, the price of corn is dear in the same proportion; and further, that when the price of corn is low in England, wages are low also. The question then resolves itself into a question of fact, upon which the humblest labourer or mechanic in the country is competent to decide.

1. Is it true that in those years when the price of Corn was high Wages were high in proportion? We deny it: it is not true, as the personal experience of every working man can testify. We could point to towns in England, where, when flour was 6s. per stone, the wages of labourers and artisans were no higher than they are this year, when flour is 2s. 8d. per stone! To narrow the argument, the average price of wheat in England was 46s. 2d. per quarter in 1834; 39s. 4d. in 1835; 48s. 6d. in 1836: The weekly average price of wheat in England on the 7th day of last month (August 1841) was 68s. 3d.;—we appeal to the common sense of the people—are wages higher now than in the years 1834, '35, and '36? They are not; they are lower! There was general employment and full wages in those years: we have now destitution, want of employment, and short wages, to a degree, in the manufacturing districts, terrible to contemplate. Compare the wages paid to carpenters, ers, and masons, in the years 1817, 1822, 1829, and 1835, as stated in the records of Greenwich Hospital, with the corresponding prices of corn; and it will be seen at once that, when corn was 94s. per quarter, wages were not higher than they were when corn was 39s. 4d.

Many of these artisans had work for eleven, ten, or nine months during the year only. We leave, then, the men engaged in the trades enumerated, to say how much higher those wages were than the wages paid in years when the price of corn was low? It seems, indeed, preposterous that wages should rise—as the monopolists assert they do—with the rise of corn. High prices are the consequence of an insufficient supply. When crops are deficient, the banks invariably restrict their issues and narrow accommodation, and must do so in self-defence; the merchants, manufacturers, and employers are consequently obliged to limit their operations; trade becomes dull; work becomes scarce. To assert, then, that high-priced corn brings high wages, is to say that higher wages are given when a number of hands are seeking employ which is difficult to be obtained, than when employment can readily be had, and when workmen can with difficulty be found.

A record of the wages paid at Bradford and Halifax during the ten years from 1831 to 1840, both years inclusive, when compared with the prices of flour in these places in each of those ten years, gives as a result that when flour was at the highest price at Bradford, wages were at the lowest point; and when flour was lowest at Halifax, wages were highest. What will the monopolists say to the following well-authenticated facts:—

BRADFORD.			HALIFAX.
Years.	Flour per Stone.	Wages, Piec.	Flour per Stone.	Wages, Piec.
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
1831	2 10½	14 3
1832	2 5½	14 6
1833	2 ½	14 7½
1834	1 8½	15 3
1835	1 8	13 0
1836	2 1½	13 7½	2 0	10 0
1837	2 3	11 1½	2 9	9 0
1838	2 9½	10 3	3 0	8 0
1839	2 10½	9 4½	2 9½	7 3
1840	3 6	8 0	3 6	6 9

It further appears from the evidence taken before the Hand-Loom Inquiry Commission, that in 1835, when flour was 2s. per stone, the wages of the weaver were 10s. per week; and that in August 1840, when flour was 3s. 4d. per stone, his wages were also 10s., or even less! Calculating that the weaver's family consume two stones of flour in the week, it is evident, that while the weaver in 1835 (when corn was cheap) had a balance of 6s. remaining from his week's wages, after the purchase of his flour, in 1840 (when corn was dear) he had but 3s. 4d. Is it not then, a cruel mockery, to say that high-priced corn brings a higher rate of wages, and a shameful wrong, by such a pretence, to defraud the poor of cheap bread? In short, if wages depended upon the price of food, and not upon supply and demand, how would it be possible to account for the fact, that the wages of one class of workmen are often rising, whilst at the same moment the wages in a different trade are falling? The facts we have adduced prove indisputably, that the assertion, that in those years when the price of corn is high wages are high in proportion, is a figment and imposture; and on the other hand as clearly show that wages are not regulated by the price of corn, but must be regulated by a different principle.

But, it is objected, that if wages in cities and towns are not regulated by corn, wages in agricultural districts are invariably regulated by it. This assertion, however, is a bold assumption, utterly irreconcilable with facts; as may be seen on comparing the wages ordinarily paid in winter-time in rural districts with the wages paid in 1834, when corn was between 70s. and 80s. a quarter:—

Counties.	Wages paid in January, 1839.	Wages ordinarily paid in Winter-time.

Warwick,	{ 10s., 11s. and 12s., with some few 14s.	9s., 10s. and 11s.

It was stated by Mr. R. H. Stares, a farmer and miller, who was examined before the Poor Law Committee in 1836, that he paid his men from 8s. to 12s. a-week in 1829 and 1830, when wheat was 10s. a bushel, and that in 1836 he paid them from 9s. to 13s., when wheat was 5s. a bushel! Again, Mr. James Ford, a farmer examined before the same committee, stated that 12s. a-week, was the highest rate of wages paid at Petworth during the war, when wheat was £40 per load, and that in 1836 he paid 10s., when wheat was but £15 a load! Earl Fitzwilliam has compared the wages paid to agricultural labourers with the price of wheat from 1797 to 1829, and the result of the comparison is, that the comforts of the LABOURERS, have always been greatest when corn was cheapest!

2. Let us next inquire whether it be true—as it must be if bread regulate wages—that in those countries where a high price of corn is maintained, labour is well remunerated, and wages are high? What says Ireland? The Tories are very fond of transporting the farmers,—who, poor men, think ten miles to market a long journey,—to the banks of the Danube or the wastes of Russia; but let us keep nearer home and ask—What says Ireland to this proposition? High-priced corn, but low wages! Wheat above 60s. per quarter, labourers paid 6d. or 5d. a-day! In the words of Mr. John Revans, one of the most intelligent and impartial of the writers who have reviewed the state of Ireland: “Wages in Ireland would fall below the starvation point, but for the wretched resource of vagrancy, which is the only support to wages now existing in Ireland.” The case of Ireland again proves how utterly false is the assertion, that high-priced corn produces or maintains high wages.

3. But let us put the converse of the last proposition, and try whether in those countries where the wages of labour are extremely liberal, the price of corn is dear in the same proportion? In the United States of America the price of corn is low, but the wages of labour are high. The average price of wheat is a dollar (4s. 3d.) a bushel;* and according to Mr. J. S. Buckingham, who has just returned from America, the wages of agricultural labourers average a dollar a-day. Adam Smith, who wrote his great work on the Wealth of Nations in 1784, noticed the same fact as to high wages and low-priced food in America. “The wages of labour,” he observed, “are much higher in North America than in any part of England. In the province of New York, common labourers earn 3s. 6d. currency, equal to 2s. sterling a-day; ship carpenters, 10s. 6d. currency, with a pint of rum worth 6d. sterling, equal in all to 6s. 6d. sterling, &c. &c. These prices,” he continues, “are all above the London price; and wages are said to be as high in the other colonies as New York. The price of provisions is everywhere in North America much lower than in England. A dearth has never been known there. In the worst seasons they have always had a sufficiency for themselves, though less for exportation. If the money price of labour therefore,” adds Dr. Smith, “be higher than it is anywhere in the mother country, its real price, the real command of the necessaries of life which it conveys to the labourer, must be higher in a still greater proportion.” Here is a country in which, for upwards of half a century, corn has been low in price and wages have been high!

On the whole, then, as we find it clearly proved that wages have not risen and fallen in this kingdom with the price of corn,—as high prices do not maintain high wages in Ireland,—and as low-priced corn does not, in America, produce low wages, are we not warranted in calling upon the operative classes not to listen for a moment to the lie propagated by those who have the deepest interest in deceiving them? Working men of England, Scotland, and Ireland! it is a falsehood that cheap bread means low wages, or that free trade means distress! No; FREE TRADE is your only hope; with it our commerce will expand and extend, for foreign nations will give and take; and brisk demand alone can maintain good wages:

No! let all lands exchange with all
The good which freight this foodful ball;
Then will the strife of millions cease;
For Free exchange is Peace! is Peace! *

To quote the words of Mr. Villiers to his constituents at Wolverhampton:—“You know too well what has been the effect of dear food on your trade, and on your wages. You can settle that question by the answer you give to the question—Are your wages good now?—(Loud cries of ‘No, no; bad!’) Is your trade good now?—(No, no.) Is food dear now?—(Yes, yes.) Have you got the Corn-laws now?—(Yes, we have.) Well, then, suppose you had had a doubt as to whether scarcity was a blessing, as they tell you, and abundance a curse, it might be worth while to change the Corn-laws, if it was only for making the experiment of plenty. But you are not such dolts as to be gulled by such rubbish. You know, as all men who have brains in their heads do know, that men’s wages depend upon the demand for labour, not upon the price of bread; and you know better than I can tell you what the difference is between five men seeking one master, and five masters seeking one man—and you know that free trade means more trade, which means more demand for men, which means the time when men can get more wages.” Even Lord Stanley, who is not usually very scrupulous, was ashamed of the nonsense uttered, for electioneering purposes, by his party respecting wages; and in his last speech at North Lancashire, admitted that wages are not ruled by the price of corn, but are regulated by supply and demand. "I don't say," observed the noble lord, "as some have assumed on the other side, that high prices necessarily causes high wages; because I believe the amount of wages is regulated upon very different principles, and is not wholly dependent upon the price of any article, but upon the supply of labour in proportion to the demand for labour." If there is a larger proportion of labourers willing to give their labour, in proportion as those who are willing to give their labour is in excess, in such proportion the competition between themselves will reduce the amount of wages, without reference to the price of corn." All through, the Tory writers have employed the fallacy, non causa pro causa, in their arguments upon this subject; for though the money price of labour is determined by what is requisite for purchasing a given quantity of the necessaries and conveniences of life, THE DEMAND FOR LABOUR, as Smith justly says, "determines the quantity of those necessities and conveniences which must be given to the labourer." Wages, or the money price of labour, are regulated first by the demand for labour, secondly by the price of the necessaries and conveniences of life; but mainly by the demand for labour, on which the price of those necessaries and conveniences ultimately depends.

Since the foregoing article was put in type, several cases have occurred, in different parts of the country, where, in consequence of the rise in the price of flour, labourers have demanded increased wages. They have said to their employers,—"A month ago, you told us that cheap bread meant low wages; and that high wages and high-priced corn went hand-in-hand. Now THEN IS THE TIME FOR HIGH WAGES! The price of flour is rising every day; we require you now to vindicate your own doctrines, and do justice to us by advancing our wages." In Hull, upwards of a hundred labourers, who receive about 13s. or 14s. a-week, have tested their deceivers in this manner; but although corn advances, wages stand still! The employers of those labourers who are engaged in the Canada timber trade, refused to increase the wages of their men; and thus have practically refuted the falsehood which they themselves had, but a few weeks previously, employed to defeat Mr. Clay and Colonel Thompson.

THE BABY.

COME hither, my daughter; your marriage-day is at hand; you will not be much longer the light of this old house. Sit by me, and I will once more tell you a story, as I used to do, when you were a little girl, and looked up in bright-eyed wonder at my tale.

I doubt not William has told you often enough that you are all in all to him; that no one human being ever was to another what you are to him; that he feels for you a deeper, tenderer, purer, more disinterested devotion, than ever man felt for woman. Don't believe him. Nay, never start and turn pale; the young rascal believes what he says to be true, and that ought to be enough for you. What I mean is, that I have in my day said and felt as much for the old woman on the other side of the chimney there.

But I mean something more than that. You have yourself been the object of a deeper, tenderer, purer, more disinterestedly devoted attachment than his. Now, don't grow angry, though it becomes you too, and bespeaks the sincere confiding spirit of the bride. He, too, would be in a towering passion if he heard me: and yet neither of you have cause.

You do not understand me; nor will you, nor can you, till you come to be yourself a mother.

The riddle is out. I mean that you were a person of much more consequence in the eyes of two others—eh, old dame?—that you were the object of a more profound love than you ever can be again, long, long before you knew how delightful a thing it is to repay love with love.

You have been admired, and have been told that you were admired; and, though I your father say it, who ought not to say it, you are worthy to be admired. And you have been flattered—flattered by admiration; never deny it, girl, it is human nature, and sits prettily upon a young woman. But you were welcomed home, and admired, and watched over with far more solicitude before you were twelve months old, than ever you will be again. Strange it is, but it seems to be the unwavering rule of Providence, that the warmest affection should ever be squandered upon those who are unaware of the wealth which is heaping upon them.

It was a proud and happy day that of your birth. The ways were mud, and keen hail-showers, alternating with sleet, were borne on the wind, that howled and thumped round the house, as if seeking to force its way in. And the bodily suffering of your mother scarcely exceeded the mental anxiety of the rest of the household. It was a heavenly summer-time when all was over: wind or weather what did we heed them, when she looked proudly up at me, as I looked at you lying in her arms?

After all, any disinterested person must have thought you a strange-looking creature. You had not learned how to make use of your eyes: one was turned up to your eyebrows, and the other down to your mouth—

"Now, papa"—

Fact, fact; ask the old woman there, if you won't believe me.

But you were beautiful in our eyes, and in those of your good grandmother. She had been passing back and forward, the whole morning, between your mother's apartment and the parlour, thinking to keep up our spirits, but sinking them rather by her agitated looks. But when she came to tell me that all was well, she could not find her voice, and she did not need to find it, for her face was radiant. You were a lamp set down amongst us to enlighten all our faces. We had lived together, and thought we loved each other; but when you were added to the family group, it was as if a new revelation; and it seemed as if we had been living coldly and heartlessly with each other. A cord was around us, drawing us into closer relationship; and you, little unconscious elf, were the talisman that worked all these wonders.

I could write a big book about the first year of your life, and yet not contrive to say all I have to say, to show how much more important a baby is, than any grown or growing person possibly can be.

You will scarcely recollect the day of your christening. That, too, was a memorable day. Mother, nurse, grandmother—I cannot well say which looked most consequential; while you, the real heroine of the occasion, took it with unparalleled sang froid: you did not even seem to mind the beautiful rich lace cap, of which there is a family tradition that your mother was christened in it too: you positively slept through the ceremony, to the great consternation of the nurse, who held it a bad omen that you did not squall. But if you thought little, I thought the more; for when I turned from the marble font to the altar window, where was painted the dove hovering over the cloudy chaos it was commissioned to impregnate with light and love, I felt awed and subdued, and anxious for my baby, and yet consoled; I felt that it was your inauguration into the sorrows of life. The mystic rite was the herald of the sufferings to which humanity is heir; but it was, at the same time, the pledge that God would temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

I will not tell you how we—for she, there, went foot for foot in feeling all my joys, cares, hopes, and fears about you; as, indeed, she has been the mirror of my life for I will not say how many years, bearing half my sorrows, and redoubling all my joys. I would not have said so much for fear of making her vain. Never praise people to their faces, girl; it spoils them; but you see she is asleep, and can't hear me. What makes the old woman's head keep nudging at that rate behind her handkerchief? Has she been listening to us all this time?

I will say nothing of our care for you even in trifles,—of the long happy walk we had one day from bazaar to bazaar, to choose playthings fit for so very young a baby,—of the utter forgetfulness of my personal dignity, with which I used to bring biscuits to the baby from town in my great-coat pocket. You would think I was wishing to bribe you by these recollections, not to forget the old folks when you leave them. It would be unkind to do so; it would look as if I thought you could forget them.

NO. XCIII.—VOL. VIII,

You grew up among us like an opening flower. Every day we saw something new to love and praise in you. To hear us talk, one would have thought there never had been such a baby. A strange thing it is, a child! There is a delicate beauty about its soft eyes, and rosy cheeks, and tiny mouth. It was so pretty to see the little monkey examine our hands, one after the other, to see if they contained sugar or biscuit. And it was so engaging when it held out its little mouth to be kissed. And it was sparkling, when it dived down into its nurse's arms, and hid its face in her bosom, when playfully minded. But strangest, loveliest of all, was its appearance when it seemed to be trying to think—when the expression of thought beamed through its infant lineaments—when the consciousness of reason and eternity seemed to be dawning upon God's own image, shrinking abashed from the glories of its own nature.

And yet, my daughter, in moments of depression,—and such moments come to all,—there was something terrible in thy childish glee. When I reflected how trifling the cause of thy delight,—the absence of any reason why it should give thee delight,—the transitory nature of the delight itself,—I was tempted to think that all human happiness was alike unreasonable and unnatural. Life seemed to be a succession of brief bursts of ecstasy, at long intervals, gradually growing duller and duller, till it ended in inane apathy. I will not dwell on the thought. It is one which mocks us in our happiest hour, and which not reason, faith alone can dispel.

But more desolate and dangerous emotions were awakened when illness came upon thee. There is nothing on earth so painful as to witness the sufferings of a child. We cannot divine their cause or nature, and it cannot tell: the impotency of human desire to give relief is never so painfully felt. The innocence and weakness, too, of the sufferer, conjure up rebellious thoughts. My God! I know that my own sufferings are the consequences of my own sins, but what has this innocent done? It is not alone when the little creature writhes in torture that we feel these misgivings: its uncomplaining languor goes with more deadly certainty to the heart. Oh, what a relief it has been, after such a visitation, to see my child's eye brighten again, and hear its blessed, clear, soft voice breathing of happiness!

It were hard to say whether thy sufferings or thy enjoyments most endeared you to me. You have been a dear good daughter to your father, and you understand the playful exaggeration of this nursery legend. And yet it is not all exaggeration.

But go! my tears are under my eyelids, and I shall make a fool of myself if I go on. You will understand me better when you repeat to a child of your own the tale your father told you the night before your marriage,

MISS SEDGWICK'S LETTERS FROM ABROAD TO KINDRED AT HOME.*

MISS SEDGWICK is a New England lady, "of a certain age," who has been long admired in her own country as one of the most genial and able of its native writers, without respect of sex. She has latterly been known in England as the author of one or two pleasing novels, descriptive of the manners and character of the people of the Atlantic or Old States, and of some short domestic stories, distinguished by their beauty and simplicity, and admirable for a purely Christian, moral, and religious spirit, undeteriorated by sanctimonious cant and sectarian exclusiveness.

Miss Sedgwick has of late received an immense quantity of praise from the English press, courteous, cordial, and coterieish; and she deserves it, perhaps, to the full extent, yet not exactly in the kind given. She is not the founder of "a national literature;" but she is the American Mitford, with, if somewhat less of grace, then more of depth; and with broader views of human nature, and of the uses of literature, whether to the solace of its ills or the elevation of its aims, than the lady of Three Miles' Cross chooses to employ, admitting that she may possess the power. Her sole object is to charm; Miss Sedgwick, while she seeks to please, at the same time strives more directly for the moral improvement of her readers,—for the correction of their errors, and, above all, the enlargement of their charity.

In the summer of 1839, this lady, with a party of friends and kindred, visited Europe, and made a flying leap, for it was little more, to London. Of England, of Great Britain, she saw nothing with her bodily eyes but what might be noted in the journey from Portsmouth to London, with a divergence to the Isle of Wight, Southampton, and Winchester. After a month's residence in the metropolis, the party went by steam up the Rhine, and through Switzerland into Italy, where they spent the winter. Every part of Miss Sedgwick's tour must have interest to her own countrymen; but the peculiar value of her book to English readers, (for it is all pleasant reading,) is limited to the first half volume, which records her adventures and observations while in London or on the road to it.

She kept throughout a regular and voluminous journal, of which the fruits or kernels are before us. It is written with the ease, freedom, and, we may add, the self-confidence of a lady's private correspondence; often in a lively and somewhat slight style, but never in one flippant or flimsy; these being qualities, of a high civilisation, not yet naturalized in Massachusetts. If she had but slender opportunities of seeing much of the inward heart of this "wonderful tight little, right little island" of ours, she made good use of those she had; and she knew much more of our popular literature and social condition, before crossing the Atlantic, than many of ourselves.

She enjoyed a passing glimpse—all that provincials, or even the denizens of the metropolis, generally attain—of some of the great literary lions; and of whoever or whatsoever she did see, where not studiously complimentary, she speaks frankly and unscrupulously. Of this frankness the travelling English have surely no right to complain; and if others condemn, it may be reasonably inquired of what they expected Miss Sedgwick's work to consist, if not of descriptions of the more eminent of the individuals whom she met. She has been censured for the freedom of her gossip; but though we can never subscribe to her doctrine—"I have violated no confidence, for none was reposed in me,"—the implied, the tacit confidences of social intercourse being, with honourable minds, more numerous and equally sacred as strictly covenanted silence, and as locks or seals,—we see no great wrong actually committed. But future travellers must not plead Miss Sedgwick's canon. Whoever gives a letter of introduction to a friend, reposes in him a trust, and becomes, in some measure, the guarantee of his discretion and honour; whoever opens his door to the stranger, takes him into his confidence, and acquires a right to place confidence in his discretion and honour.

When Miss Sedgwick and her friends landed at Portsmouth, Captain Basil Hall, to whom they had a letter of introduction, happened, fortunately for them, to be living there with his family. They, as good patriots, entertained a little spite at the free-spoken Tory; yet the letter was sent, and his prompt, frank, and useful kindness, his true and zealous service, gave them a favourable impression not only of himself, but of his country. Captain Hall foresaw and obviated every difficulty; and, in the truest spirit of courtesy, acted as the guide and philosopher of the Transatlantic democrats.

They made an excursion, under his auspices, to the Isle of Wight, with the scenery of which miniature of Great Britain, Miss Sedgwick was of course charmed, though she afterwards says, that, after all the villages she has seen in England and Germany, there are none to equal those of New England.

They had by this time seen "a comfortable" English hôtel; the inside of a pretty cottage, "to be let furnished;" a biscuit bakery on the most magnificent scale of the manufacturing Queen of the Ocean; and a yacht, with all a yacht's luxurious appointments. The first really important sight to an American, looking deeply into the structure of English society, was this:—the scene is Brading church, in the Isle of Wight:

A troop of children (twelve we counted) ran out to open the gate of the church-yard for us. One pointed out the "young cottager's" grave; another was eager to prove she could repeat glibly the epitaph "little

* Two vols. Moxon, London.

Jane" had recited. They showed us Brading Church (built in the seventh century) and Richmond's house, and the trees under which he taught. We gathered some holly leaves from the tree that shades his courtyard, which we shall devoutly preserve to show you. We might have remained there till this time if our curiosity had equalled the resources of our "train attendant." It is quite a new sight to us to see children getting their living in this way. We have little to show, and the traveller must grope his way as well as he can to that little. These children with us would have been at school or at the plough, looking to a college education in the perspective, or a "farm in the West:" something better than a few chance pennies from a traveller. But though there are few prizes for them in the lottery of life here, I was glad to see them looking comfortably clad, well fed, and healthy.

But the children do not exactly "get their living in this way;" though, besides a bad way of obtaining pence to buy gingerbread and marbles, they may, in this way, sometimes eke out the straitened means by which their parents may, while denied "in-door relief," struggle to maintain them—"to drag them up." There are other scenes of a similar kind, in which this glorious Old England, the richest, the greatest, the most powerful country on the face of the earth, contrasts sadly enough, in the circumstances of a full half of her numerous family, with Miss Sedgwick's ruder country. But there were also many pleasant things to be seen, particularly by a lady so well versed in our history and our poetry. The "wandering voice," the "messenger of spring," must have been familiar to her from infancy; and here it was first heard. It is really as much an event in some lives as visiting Windsor or Westminster Abbey, which she thus sweetly describes:—

I cannot give you an idea of the deliciousness of a walk here between the lovely hedges all fragrance, the air filled with the melody of birds, and the booming of the ocean waves for a bass. For one sweet singing-bird with us, I think there are twenty here; and, included in this twenty, the nightingale, the blackbird, the lark, and the cuckoo! The note of the English blackbird is electrifying, but yet I have heard none sweeter than our wood-thrush, that little hermit of our solitudes. You would forgive me, dear C., for observing some contrasts that may perchance strike you as unpatriotic, if,

"Borne, like Loretto's chapel, through the air,"

I could send over to you one of these picturesque cottages, (any one of them,) draped with ivy to the very top of the chimneys, and set it down beside our unsightly farm-houses.

But here, again, these well-found, well-fed, vulgar, bustling, rude democrats have our refined society on the hip:—

In my strolls I avail myself of every opportunity of accosting the people, and when I can find any pretext I go into the cottages by the way-side. This, I suppose, is very un-English, and may seem to some persons very impertinent. But I have never found inquiries, softened with a certain tone of sympathy, repulsed. Your inferiors in condition are much like children, and they, you know, like dogs, are proverbially said to know who loves them. I stopped at a little cottage this morning, half smothered with roses, geraniums, &c., and, on the pretext of looking at a baby, made good my entrance. The little bit of an apartment, not more than six feet by ten, was as neat as possible. Not an article of its scanty furniture looked as if it had been bought by this generation; everything appeared cared for, and well preserved; so unlike corresponding dwellings with us. The woman had nine children; six at home, and all tidily dressed. I have not seen in England a slovenly-looking person.

Even the three or four beggars who stealthily asked charity of us at Portsmouth were neatly dressed.

I greeted, en passant, a woman sitting at her cottage window. She told me she paid for half of a little tenement and a bit of a garden ten pounds (fifty dollars) rent. And when I congratulated her on the pleasant country, "Ah," she said, "we can't live on a pleasant country!" I have not addressed one of these people who has not complained of poverty, said something of the difficulty of getting work, of the struggling for bread, which is the condition of existence among the lower classes here. Strange sounds these to our ears! . . . I will spare you all the particulars of my wayside acquaintance with a sturdy little woman whom I met coming out of a farm-yard, staggering under a load of dry furze, as much as could be piled on a wheelbarrow. A boy not more than five years old was awaiting her at the gate, with a compact little parcel in his arms snugly done up. "Now take she," he said, extending it to the mother, and I found the parcel was a baby not a month old; so I offered to carry it, and did for a quarter of a mile, while the mother, in return, told me the whole story of her courtship, marriage, and maternity, with the last incident in her domestic annals, the acquisition of a baking of meal, some barm, and the loan of her husband's mother's oven, and, lastly, of the gift of the furze to heat the oven. The woman seemed something more than contented—happy. I could not but congratulate her. "It does not signify," I said, "being poor, when one is so healthy and so merry as you appear." "Ah, that's natural to me," she replied; "my mother had red cheeks in her coffin!" Happy are those who have that "natural to them," that princes, and fine ladies, and half the world are sighing for and running after. . . . By the way, speaking of lambs, and such fancy articles, immense flocks of sheep are grazing on these downs, and each is as big as three of our Merinos, and the mutton is delicious.

Hereabouts the Americans fell in with a man who gained a scanty and precarious living by the perilous trade of gathering the eggs of sea-fowl from the cliffs, for which privilege—here must have been another feature new to them—he paid a rent to the lord of the manor. Miss Sedgwick relates:—"The man was stout and very well-looking, but with an anxious and sad expression. I found he had a large family to feed, and among them four stalwart boys. I asked him what were their prospects. 'None,' he said, with an expression suited to the words, 'but starvation.'

These were not the best preparatives imaginable for the enjoyment of Carisbrooke Castle and Netley Abbey, on which, by the way, Miss Sedgwick makes a remark which may be significant of the low state of the Arts in the United States. She seems to place the mechanical Daguerreotype, with its minute accuracy, above the highest creations of genius in imitative art:—"No description can convey as definite an idea as any of the hundred engravings you have seen of Netley Abbey; and I am sorry to say to you, that even a Daguerreotype picture would give you no adequate impression of its beauty."

Though admiring to enthusiasm those fine specimens of old ecclesiastical architecture which fell under her notice, Miss Sedgwick was probably far too late in life of witnessing the cathedral service of the Church of England to be spiritually impressed by it, or to feel its effect even on the senses. The Puritan, as Miss Sedgwick delights to call herself, had been trained in a more spiritual worship. In Westminster Abbey, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor, she remained as callous to the outward and visible as in Winchester Cathedral.

This was the third time we had been present, since we came to England, at worship in the temples into which art has breathed its soul. First in Winchester Cathedral, then at Westminster Abbey, and now at this old royal chapel. The daily service appointed by the church was performing with the careless and heartless air of prescription. The clergyman and clerk hurried singing through the form of prayers, that, perfect as they are, will only rise on the soul's wings. I felt the Puritan struggling at my heart, and could have broken out with old Mause's fervour, if not her eloquence. I thought of our summer Sunday service in dear J.'s "long parlour." Not a vacant place there. The door open into the garden, the children strewed round the door-step, their young faces touched with an expression of devotion and love—such as glows in the faces of the cherubs of the old pictures; and for vaulted roof, columns, and storied glass, we had the blue sky, the everlasting hills, and lights and shadows playing over them, all suggestive of devotion, and in harmony with the pure and simple doctrine our friend Dr Follen taught us. To me, there was more true worship in those all-embracing words, "Our Father!" as he uttered them, than in all the task-prayers I have heard in these mighty cathedrals. Here it is the temple that is greatest. Your mind is preoccupied, filled with the outward world.

Dr. Follen, a native of Germany, exiled for his liberal opinions, was, we believe, a Unitarian, and at one time the colleague of Dr. Channing, who, in an eloquent funeral sermon, has described Follen as a man such as there are few. But Puritan seems the term which is used by Miss Sedgwick for persons of every sect, in contradistinction to Churchman.

In travelling from Southampton to London, Miss Sedgwick visited Miss Mitford, with whom she had long maintained an epistolary correspondence. This lady has spoken so often and freely of her home, her pleasures, and her pets, that we presume no one can take offence at a similar sketch from another and a very friendly hand:—

I had written to Miss Mitford my intention of passing the evening with her, and as we approached her residence, which is in a small village near Reading, I began to feel a little tremulous about meeting my "unknown friend." Captain Hall had made us all merry with anticipating the usual dénouement of a mere epistolary acquaintance.

Our coachman (who, after our telling him we were Americans, had complimented us on our speaking English, and "very good English too") professed an acquaintance of some twenty years' standing with Miss M., and assured us that she was one of the "cleverest women in England," and "the doctor" (her father) a fine "old gentleman." And when he reined his horses up to her door, and she appeared to receive us, he said, "Now you would not take that lady there for the great author, would you?" and certainly we should have taken her for nothing but a kindly gentlewoman, who had never gone beyond the narrow sphere of the most refined social life. My foolish misgivings (H. must answer for them) were forgotten in her cordial welcome. K. and I descended from our airy seat; and when Miss M. became aware who M. was, she said, "What! the sister of — pass my door!—that must never be;" so M., nothing loath, joined us. Miss M. is truly "a pleasing person," dressed a little quaintly, and as unlike as possible to the faces we have seen of her in the magazines, which all have a broad humour, bordering on coarseness. She has a pale grey, soul-lit eye, and hair as white as snow; a wintry sign that has come prematurely upon her, as like signs come upon us, while the year is yet fresh and undecayed. Her voice has a sweet, low tone, and her manner a naturalness, frankness, and affectionateness, that we have been so long familiar with in their other modes of manifestation, that it would have been indeed a disappointment not to have found them.

She led us directly through her house into her garden, a perfect bouquet of flowers. "I must show you my geraniums while it is light," she said, "for I love them next to my father." And they were indeed treated like petted children, guarded by a very ingenious contrivance from the rough visitation of the elements. They are all, I believe, seedlings. She raises two crops in a year, and may well pride herself on the variety and beauty of her collection. Geraniums are her favourites; but she does not love others less that she loves these more. The garden is filled, matted with flowering shrubs, and vines; the trees are wreathed with honeysuckles and roses; and the girls have brought away the most splendid specimens of heart's-ease to press in their journals. Oh, that I could give some of my countrywomen a vision of this little paradise of flowers, that they might learn how task and industry, and an earnest love and study of the art of garden-culture, might triumph over small space and small means!

Miss M.'s house is, with the exception of certainly not more than two or three, as small and humble as the smallest and humblest in our village of Stockbridge; and such is the difference, in some respects, in the modes of expense in this country from ours; she keeps two messervants (one a gardener), two or three maid-servants, and two horses. In this very humble home, which she illustrates as much by her unsparing filial devotion, as by her genius, she receives on equal terms the best in the land. Her literary reputation might have gained for her this elevation, but she started on vantage-ground, being allied by blood to the Duke of Bedford's family. We passed a delightful evening, parting with the hope of meeting again, and with a most comfortable feeling that the ideal was converted into the real. So much for our misgivings. Faith is a safer principle than some people hold it to be.

It would be almost a pity to correct the mistakes into which Miss Sedgwick has fallen, while the Americans retain so lively an admiration of aristocracy. And now we find Miss Sedgwick, and her party of five ladies and one gentleman, settled in "clean, comfortable lodgings," through the good offices of Captain Hall, in that street at the West End rendered classical by the residence of Mrs. Trollope's dear Widow Barnaby. If at first somewhat bewildered and mortified to find London so different, so superior, in short, to New York or even Boston, both in size and magnificence, they rationally consoled themselves by the reflection—

"Why, these people have been at it these two thousand years, and Heaven knows how much longer." By degrees envy melts into self-complacency, and we say "they are our relations;" "our fathers had a hand in it;" we are of the same race, "as our new-planned cities and unfinished towers" shall hereafter prove. Mr. Webster said to me after we had been two or three weeks here, "What is your impression now of London! my feeling is yet amazement."

It would be idle to follow Miss Sedgwick in either "realising," or correcting all her preconceived notions, or in hazarding about—a capital word that, and one worthy of instant adoption—among the usual sights of London; eagerly, like a good patriot, catching at any compliment to her own beloved country, and mortified to find that the English seemed to think so little about it. She went to Covent Garden Theatre, with only a literary lady, who had a free ticket, admitting two; and she remarks, that "necessity has taught women here more independence than with us, and it has its advantages to both parties; the men are saved much bother, and the women gain facility and freedom." Where is the necessity? The society of London surely includes a much greater proportion of idle, lounging cavaliers than that of New York or Philadelphia. The women of America may at once gain this degree of independence, which is greater by the way in London than in the smallest provincial town that has a theatre. The crowd gives the freedom in this as in other matters.

The pit of the Italian Opera House was visited one night. But the description is so characteristic that it must be quoted at some length, to enable the reader to realize American female feelings.

The people who have the reputation of being the first singers in the world sang: Grisi, the young Garcia, Persiani, Lablache, Tamburini, and a very interesting young man, the son of an Italian marquis, whose nom-de-guerre is Mario. The little Queen was in her box behind a curtain, as carefully hidden from her people as an oriental monarch; not from any oriental ideas of the sacredness of her person, but that she may cast off her royal dignity, and have the privilege of enjoying unobserved, as we humble people do. No chariness of her countenance could make her "like the robe pontifical, ne'er seen but wondered at." She is a plain little body enough, as we saw when she protruded her head to bow to the high people in the box next to her: the queen-dowager, the Princess Esterhazy, and so on. Ordinary is the word for her; you would not notice her among a hundred others in our village church. Just now she is suffering for the tragedy of Lady Flora, and fears are entertained, whenever she appears, that there will be voices to cry out "Where is Lady Flora?" a sound that must pierce the poor young thing's heart. Ah! she has come to the throne when royalty pays quite too dear for its whistle!

We had the ballet La Gitana after the singing—and Taglioni. No praise of her grace is exaggerated. There is music in every movement of her arms; and if she would restrict herself within the limits of decency, there could not be a more exquisite spectacle of its kind than her dancing. I would give in to the ravings of her admirers, and allow that her grace is God's beautiful gift, and that fitting it is it should be so used. But could not this grace be equally demonstrated with a skirt a few inches longer and rather less transparent? To my crude notions her positions are often disgusting; and when she raised her leg to a right angle with her body, I could have exclaimed, as Carlyle did, "Merciful Heaven! where will it end?"

I would divide the world, not as our witty friend — does, into men, women, and Mary Wolstoncrafts, but into men, women, and ballet-dancers. For surely a woman must have forgotten the instincts of her sex before she can dance even as Taglioni does. I am not apt, as you know my dear C., to run a tilt against public amusements; but I hold this to be an execrable one.

The opera, in its native country, was found still more offensive. Nor is it surprising that the American ladies were startled and even disgusted. Who has not known worthy country ladies in England utterly shocked and appalled, and not knowing where to look, when first visiting a gallery of casts? There are, however, many degrees between the ultra-delicacy of the American lady, who, according to the facetious Marryat, furnished the legs of her piano with nice little decent frilled trousers, and the natural feelings of Miss Sedgwick, who enters as strong a protest against the ballet as her mother may have done against the waltz.

At the opera she, as it appears, saw Queen Victoria. It was not to be expected that a stranger, and a republican, should sympathize in our absurd raptures, real and pretended, about "our lovely young queen,"—our "People's queen,"—our "sage, and intellectual, and Whiggish queen;" yet history, memory, association, poetry might have somewhat elevated "the descendant of a long line of princes," the "August Majesty of England," above an ordinary young girl at a spectacle. We could have forgiven Miss Sedgwick for treating with republican plainness the Queen of Naples, or with democratic severity the bronzed Russian princess, whom she describes: the former was seen at a Court ball—the latter in Germany. Here they are:

Nothing struck me about the Neapolitan women but the vacuity of their faces, and the abundance and brilliancy of their diamonds. The Italian princes retain their diamonds, as they do their pictures, when every other sign of wealth is gone. The queen, who looks like a quiet body, designed by nature to nurse babies and keep the house tidy, sat with the court-ladies at one end of the dancing-room, and rose once to make a progress through the apartments. The royal family supped by themselves. Several tables were spread for the guests. Besides the knick-knacks of our evening entertainments, there were fish, oysters, and game, and on each table an entire wild-boar, stuck with silver arrows. The ladies gathered hungrily about the tables, and ate like good trencher-women.

We retired after supper to an adjoining room, and sat down in a most liberty-equality style near a coterie of ladies, who put up their eye-glasses and stared at us, but without any other uncivil demonstration.

We soon perceived they were the ladies of the court. And they no doubt forgave us on the flattering ground of our being North American savages.

The following scene occurred on the Rhine:—

The big Russian princess, who is a sort of "man of the sea" to us, is flourishing up and down the deck with two of her suite, one on each side, as if to guard her from contact with the plebeian world. Every look and motion says "I do not love the people." The royal brood may wince, but they must submit to the democratic tendencies of the age. These steamers and rail-cars are undermining their elevations. I have not, as you know, my dear C., any vulgar hostility to those who are the heirs of the usurpations of elder times—"the accident of an accident"—but when I see a person radically vulgar like this woman, queening it among those who are her superiors in everything but this accidental greatness, my Puritan blood and republican breeding get the better of my humanity.

This woman, whom we meet everywhere, in the garden, at the table d'hôte, and at the kochbrunnen, is quite the noisiest and most vulgar person we encounter. Such a person would naturally be fastidious in her associates; and her prime favourite, if we may judge from their constant juxta-position, is a coloured man with woolly hair, some say from New Orleans, others that he is a West Indian. I do not speak of this in any disrespect to him, but as a proof that colour is no disqualification in European society."

Unfortunately this is a mistake; colour is a great disqualification in European society. Perhaps Russia may be an exception to other European countries.

When we got into the diligence at Bieberich there were two neat peasant-women beside us. We saw the Russian princess, whose carriage had disappointed her, waddling about, attended by her suite, in quest of a passage to Wiesbaden. One of the gentlemen said to her, "The sun is hot; it will be tiresome waiting," and counselled her highness to take a seat in the diligence.

is quite shocking," she said, "to go in this way." "But there is no other, madame." So she yielded to necessity, and put her royal foot on the step, when, looking up, she shrunk back exclaiming, "Comment! il y a des paysannes" ("How is this! there are peasants here!") I am sure we should not have been more dismayed if we had been shoved in with the asses that carried us in the morning. We drove off; and when I compared this woman, with her vacant, gross face, her supercilious demeanour, and her Brussels-lace mantilla, to our peasant companions, with their clean, substantial, well-preserved dresses, their healthful, contented, and serene faces, and their kindly manners, all telling a story of industry, economy, and contentment, I looked proudly, thankfully back to my country of no princesses! Arrogance and superciliousness exist there, no doubt, but they have no birthright for their exercise.

Now, we can forgive, nay applaud, all this, though we should have liked, as in good taste, a little more tenderness for the young British Queen in a woman, herself descended of English blood. The criticism on Charles the Second's beauties, at Hampton Court, is in much better taste than the slighting notice of Victoria; though these ladies are not quite so much beholden to the satirical pen of De Grammont as Miss Sedgwick seems to fancy.

Sir Peter Lely's flesh-and-blood beauties of Charles the Second's time fill one apartment. Hamilton and Mrs. Jameson have given these fair dames an immortality they do not merit. They are mere mortal beauties, and not even the best specimens of their kind. They are the women of the coarsest English comedies; not such types of womanhood as Juliet, Desdemona, and Isabella. They have not the merit of individuality. They have all beautiful hands—probably because Sir Peter Lely could paint beautiful hands—and lovely necks and bosoms, most prodigally displayed. There is a mixture of finery and negligence in their dress that would seem to indicate the born slattern transformed into the fine lady. It would take a Mohammed's heaven of such beauties to work up into the spiritual loveliness of an exquisite head of St. Catherine, by Correggio, in another apartment of this gallery. What a text might be made of these counterfeit presentments of the sinner and the saint for an eloquent preacher in a Magdalen chapel!

But if unmoved by "the plain little body," the living representative of monarchy, Miss Sedgwick was stirred by the proud keep of Windsor and its accessories.

Such a mead! such turf! such shade! "Father Thames" might be compared to an old king winding his way through his court; the very sheep that were lying on the grass under the majestic trees in the "Home Park," looked like princes of the blood.

The party saw Eton College, and quoted Gray of course, while Miss Sedgwick makes this remark, which may in part be just,—

The children here strike me as not having the bright, intellectual countenances of ours, which indicate their early development; but, as a physical production, the English boy, with his brilliant complexion and sturdy frame, is far superior to ours.

A dinner and a musical soirée at Lansdowne House are become such hackneyed lions rampant, that we reject them for the more modest literary breakfast of Mr. Rogers, and Miss Baillie's lunch.

The hour of the breakfast party is from ten to eleven. The number is, I believe, never allowed to exceed twelve; and only comes up to that when the host is constrained, like a certain friend of ours, by his diffusive benevolence, to extend his invitation (his "ticket for six") to a caravan of travellers.

The entertainment is little varied from our eight o'clock breakfasts. There are coffee, tea, and chocolate, rolls, toast, grated beef and eggs, and, in place of our solid beefsteaks and broiled chickens, reindeers' tongues, sweetmeats, fruit, and ices. These are not bad substitutes for heavier viands; and, for our variety of delicate hot cakes, you see none of these, unless it be the poorest of them all—a muffin.

On some occasions there were guests invited to come after breakfast, to enjoy the social hour that follows it. Now that ideas travel so rapidly from one quarter of the world to another, I trust some steamer will bear to America that which is recently received in England, and has, as long as other cardinal points of philosophy, governed continental society, viz. that eating and drinking is not a necessary element in social intercourse.

We had the pleasure of a breakfast at Rogers'.

His manners are those of a man of the world, (in its best sense,) simple, and natural, without any apparent consciousness of name or fame to support. His house, as all the civilized world knows, is a cabinet of art, selected and arranged with consummate taste. The house itself is small—not, I should think, more than twenty-five feet front, and perhaps forty deep, in a most fortunate location, overlooking the Green Park. The first sight of it from the windows produces a sort of coup de théâtre; for you approach the house and enter it by a narrow street. Every inch of it is appropriated to some rare treasure or choice production of art.

But the most interesting thing in all the collection was the original document, with Milton's name, by which he transferred to his publisher, for ten pounds, the copyright of Paradise Lost. Next in interest to this was a portfolio, in which were arranged autograph letters from Pope and Dryden, Washington and Franklin, and several from Fox, Sheridan, and Scott, addressed to the poet himself. Among them was that written by Sheridan, just before his death, describing the extremity of his suffering, and praying Rogers to come to him. But I must check myself. A catalogue raisonné of what our eyes but glanced over would fill folios. I had the pleasure at breakfast of sitting next Mr. Babbage, whose name is so well known among us as the author of the self-calculating machine. He has a most remarkable eye.

Miss Sedgwick is rather apt to stumble upon brilliant eyes and wonderful "cranial developments." So we come to Mr. Macaulay, who fortunately might be passed in a crowd without much attention to either eye or brow.

Macaulay was of the party. His conversation recollects his writings; it is rich and delightful, filled with anecdotes and illustrations from the abounding stores of his overflowing mind. Some may think he talks too much; but none, except from their own impatient vanity, could wish it were less.

I believe, of all my pleasures here, dear J. will most envy me that of seeing Joanna Baillie, and of seeing her repeatedly at her own home; the best point of view for all best women. She lives on Hampstead Hill, a few miles from town, in a modest house, with Miss Agnes Baillie, her only sister, a most kindly and agreeable person. Miss Baillie—I write this for J., for we women always like to know how one another look and dress—Miss Baillie has a well preserved appearance; her face has nothing of the vexed or sorrowing expression that is often so deeply stamped by a long experience of life. It indicates a strong mind, great sensibility, and the benevolence that, I believe, always proceeds from it; the mental constitution be a sound one, as it eminently is in Miss Baillie's case. She has a pleasing figure, what we call lady-like—that is, delicate, erect, and graceful; not the large-boned, muscular frame of most English women. She wears her own gray hair; a general fashion by-the-way here, which I wish we elderly ladies of America may have the courage and the taste to imitate; and she wears the prettiest of brown silk gowns and bonnets fitting the beau-ideal of an old lady; an ideal she might inspire if it has no pre-existence. You would, of course, expect her to be, as she is, free from pedantry and all modes of affectation; but I think you would be surprised to find yourself forgetting, in a domestic and confiding feeling, that you were talking with the woman whose name is best established among the female writers of her country: in short, forgetting everything but that you were in the society of a most charming private gentlewoman. She might (would that all female writers could!) take for her device a flower that closes itself against the noon-tide sun, and unfolds in the evening shadows.

In the United States, Mrs. Barbauld would perhaps divide the suffrages with Miss Baillie; but in England, as far as my limited observation extended, she is not rated so high, or so generally read as here. She has experienced the great disadvantage of being considered the organ of a sect. Do not the "Address to the Deity," and the "Evening's Meditation," rank with the best English poetry? And are not her essays, that on "Prejudice," and that on the "Inconsistency of Human Expectations," unsurpassed?

We lunched with Miss Baillie. Mr. Tytler, the historian, and his sister were present. Lord Woodhouselee, the intimate friend of Scott, was their father.

Mrs. Barbauld's writings, we should say, were, and are much better known, much more diffused in England, than those of Miss Baillie, save a few of Joanna's exquisite little poems, such as the Kü-zen, which has gained a place in every memory. But if the fact were as it is stated, there is another substantial reason: Mrs. Barbauld has long since departed to the land of forgetfulness, whether so many admired books speedily follow their authors.

For the denizen of a New England village, Miss Sedgwick has really a very pretty knack at turning a compliment; and she omits nobody; at least it seems so.—We cannot imagine into what circle she had stumbled that authorizes the following charges. Certainly the same thing could not have happened in any weaver or shoemaker's workshop in all broad Scotland south of Spey:

I have seen instances of ignorance of us in quarters where you would scarcely expect it: for example, a very cultivated man, a bishop, asked K. if there were a theatre in America: and a person of equal dignity inquired "if the Society of Friends was not the prevailing religious sect in Boston!" A literary man of some distinction asked me if the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews were read in America; and one of the cultivated women of England said to me, in a soothing tone, on my expressing admiration of English trees, "Oh, you will have such in time, when your forests are cut down, and they have room for their limbs to spread." I smiled and was silent; but if I saw in vision our graceful, drooping, elm-embowering roods of ground, and, as I looked at the stiff, upright English elm, had something of the pharisaical "holier than thou" flit over my mind, I may be forgiven.

Miss Sedgwick met with yet rarer bishops.

I have been delighted with the high admiration expressed here in all quarters of Dr. Channing, and, above all, to find that his pure religion has, with its angel's wings, surmounted the walls of sectarianism. I have heard him spoken of with enthusiasm by prelates as much distinguished for their religious zeal as for their station.

What strikes the traveller as a stranger, and passes unnoticed among ourselves, must be of the greatest interest to us. Among these things are her observations on the condition of the women, both the single women and the married, who are, in her estimation, not quite so much of the graceful vine, clinging round its wedded elm, in England as in America.

A feature in society here that must be striking to Americans, is the great number of single women. With us, you know, few women live far beyond their minority unmated, and those few sink into the obscurity of some friendly fireside. But here they have an independent existence, pursuits, and influence, and they are much happier for it: mind, I do not say happier than fortunate wives and good mothers, but than those who, not having drawn a husband in the lottery of life, resign themselves to a merely passive existence. Englishwomen, married and single, have more leisure, and far more opportunity for intellectual cultivation, than with us. The objects of art are on every side of them, exciting their minds through their sensations, and filling them with images of beauty. There is, with us, far more necessity, and of course opportunity, for the development of a woman's faculties for domestic life than here; but this, I think, is counterbalanced by women's necessary independence of the other sex here. On the whole, it seems to me there is not a more loveable or lovely woman than the American matron, steadfast in her conjugal duties, devoted to the progress of her children and the happiness of her household, nor a more powerful creature than the [unmarried!] Englishwoman in the full strength and development of her character.

Now, my dear C., a word as to dress for the woman-kind of your family. I do not comprehend what our English friends, who come among us, mean by their comments on the extravagance of dress in America. I have seen more velvet and costly lace in one hour in Kensington Gardens than I ever saw in New York; and it would take all the diamonds in the United States to dress a duchess for an evening at L—— house. You may say that all the lace and diamonds are transmitted luxuries, heir-looms, (a species of inheritance we know little about,) still you must take into the account the immense excess of their wealth over ours, before you can have a notion of the disparity between us.

The women here up to five-and-forty (and splendid women many of them are up to that age) dress with taste—fitness; after that abominably. Women to seventy, and Heaven knows how much longer, leave their necks and arms bare; not here and there one, "blinded, deluded, and misguided," but whole assemblies of fat women—and, O tempora! O mores!—and lean. Such parchment necks as I have seen bedizened with diamonds, and arms bared, that seemed only fit to hold the scissors of destiny, or to stir the caldron of Macbeth's witches. — dresses in azure satins and rose-coloured silks, and bares her arms as if they were as round and dimpled as a cherub's, though they are mere bunches of sinews, that seem only kept together by that nice anatomical contrivance of the wristband, on which Paley expatiates.

I saw the Duchess of Cambridge the other evening at the opera with a crimson-velvet turban! Remember, it is July.

We have seen in the gardens plenty of delicate muslins over gay-coloured silks; this is graceful, but to us it seems inappropriate for an out-door dress.

One enjoys this kind of retaliation, for the free remarks on similar topics of the Trollopes and the Kembles. An American woman, indeed! setting up her national standard of taste, in dress and in the proprieties, to the ladies of England!—to London itself! "Marry, come up!" But, if Miss Sedgwick tells her mind, and takes her revenge of our ladies, she is pleased to extol the tastes of the lower classes; and we should not be surprised if, at home, she were of the number who suffer under the grievance of conceited helps dressing just as they please, and even putting on spectacles! and waiting at table in their hair, instead of wear-neat cap. There is no land without its own social miseries. In England Miss Sedgwick saw neither "dirt nor rags."—Alas, that it is not always so! Yet, considering the condition of so many of the population, the wonder is, that dirt and rags are so infrequent in England.—From a number of sensible and just remarks upon the condition of society in the respective countries, we give the following extract, which embodies several mortifying, but wholesome, truths :

Those who from their birth or their successful talents are assured of their rank, have the best manners. They are perfectly tranquil, safe behind the entrenchments that have stood for ages. They leave it to the aspirants to be the videttes and defenders of the outworks. Those persons I have met of the highest rank have the simplest and most informal manners. I have before told you that Lord L—— and the Bishop of —— reminded me of our friends Judge L—— and Judge W——, our best-mannered country-gentlemen. Their lordships have rather more conventionalism, more practice, but there is no essential difference. Descend a little lower, and a very little lower than those gentry who by birth and association are interwoven with the nobility, and you will see people with education and refinement enough, as you would think, to ensure them the tranquillity that comes of self-respect, manifesting a consciousness of inferiority; in some it appears in servility, as in Mrs. ——, who, having scrambled on to ——'s shoulders and got a peep into the lord and lady world, and heard the buzz that rises from the precincts of Buckingham Palace, entertained us through a long morning visit with third or fourth hand stories about "poor Lady Flora," or in obsequiousness, as in the very pretty wife of ——, whose eyes, cheeks, and voice are changed if she is but spoken to by a titled person, though she remains as impassive as polar ice to the influence of a plebeian presence. Some manifest their impatience of this vassalage of caste in a petulant but impotent resistance, and others show a crushed feeling, not the humility of the flower that has grown in the shade, but the abasement and incapacity ever to rise of that which has been trodden under foot. Even the limbs are stiffened and the gait modified by this consciousness that haunts them from the cradle to the grave.

A certain great tailor was here yesterday morning to take R.'s directions. His bad grammar, his obsequiousness, and his more than once favouring us with the information that he had an appointment with the Duke of ——, brought forcibly to my mind the person who holds the corresponding position in Stockbridge. I thought of his frank and self-respecting manner, his well-informed mind, his good influence, and the probable destiny of his children. I leave you to jump to my conclusion.

The language of the shopmen here indicates a want of education, and their obsequiousness expresses their consciousness that they are the "things that live by bowing." And, by-the-way, I see nothing like the rapidity of movement and adroitness in serving that you find in a New-York shop. You may buy a winter's supply at Stewart's while half-a-dozen articles are shown to you here. If you buy, they thank you; and if you refuse to buy, you hear the prescribed automaton, "Thank you!" I say "prescribed," for you often perceive an undercurrent of insolence. You will believe me that it is not civility to which I object.

As you go farther down from the tradesman to the servant, the marks of caste are still more offensive. Miss —— took me to the cottage of their herdsman. He had married a favourite servant, who had lived, I believe, from childhood in the family. The cottage was surrounded and filled with marks of affection and liberality. Miss —— had told me that the woman belonged to a class now nearly extinct in England. "I verily believe," she said, "she thinks my mother and myself are made of a different clay from her;" and so her manner indicated, as she stood in a corner of the room, with her arms reverently folded, and curtsying* with every reply she made to Miss ——, though nothing could be more kindly gracious than her manner. I thought of that dear old nurse who, though wearing the colour that is a brand among us, and not exceeded in devotedness by any feudal vassal of any age, expressed in the noble freedom of her manner that she not only felt herself to be of the same clay, but of the same spirit with those she served.

I confess I do see something more than "urbanity" in this "homage." I do not wish to be reminded, by a man touching his hat or pulling his forelock every time I speak to him, that there is a gulph between us. This is neither good for him nor me. Have those who pretend to fear the encroachments and growing pride of the inferior classes, never any conscientious fears for their own humility? Do their reflections never suggest to them that pride is the natural concomitant of conscious superiority? But to return to these demonstrations of respect; they are not a sign of real deference. I have seen more real insolence here in five weeks in this class of people than I ever saw at home. At the inns, at the slightest dissatisfaction with the remuneration you offer, you are sure to be told, "Such as is ladies always gives more." This is meanness as well as insolence.

As we drove off from Southampton, a porter demanded a larger fee than we paid. H. called after us to be sure and give the fellow no more. The fellow knew his quarry; he mounted on the coach, and kept with us through a long street, demanding and entreating with alternate insolence and abjectness. He got the shilling, and then returning to the homage of his station, "Do you sit quite comfortable, ladies?" he asked, in a sycophantic tone. "Yes." "Thank you." "Would not Miss —— like better this seat?" "No." "Thank you." Again I repeat it, it is not the civility I object to. I wish we had more of it in all stations; but it is the hollow sound, which conveys to me no idea but the inevitable and confessed vassalage of a fellow-being.

I am aware that the sins we are not accustomed to are like those we are not inclined to, in the respect that we condemn them heartily and en masse. Few Englishmen can tolerate the manners of our tradespeople, our inn-keepers, and the domestics at our public-houses. A little more familiarity with them would make them tolerant of the deficiencies that at first disgust them: and after a while they would learn, as we do, to prize the fidelity and quiet kindness that abound among our servants without the expectation of pecuniary reward; and they would feel that it is salutary to be connected with this large class of our humble fellow-creatures by other than sordid ties.

If I have felt painfully that the men and women of what is called "good society" in America are greatly inferior in high cultivation, in the art of conversation, and in accomplishments, to a corresponding class here, I have felt quite assured that the "million" with us occupy a level they can never reach in England, do what they will with penny magazines and diffusive publications, while each class has its stall into which it is driven by the tyranny of an artificially-constructed society.

While the marks of No. 2, No. 3, and so on are seen cut in, there cannot be the conscious power and freedom, and the self-respect brightening the eye, giving free play to all the faculties, and urging onward and upward, which is the glory of the United States, and a new phase of human society.

Yes; the Americans have reason to be proud of their republican country; the country of the righted many—not of the privileged few.

As an Anglo-American, Miss Sedgwick, grateful at the same time for a hundred acts of individual courtesy and civility, was delighted with the "old country;" yet it strikes us that, while only admiring England, the ancestral land of her kindred, she really loved Germany, and felt herself more at home there ;—was much more at ease, and took more cordially to the people and their ways. She admires the social freedom and kindness seen in the manners of all classes; nay, in spite of Sir Francis Head, she admires the cookery. At Wiesbaden she writes :

* A thousand to one this servile-mannered woman was educated at a lady's charity school.—E. T. M.

We have now been here more than a month, and I may venture to speak to you of what has been a constant subject of admiration to us all, the manners of the Germans. The English race, root and branch, are, what with their natural shyness, their conventional reserves, and their radical uncourteousness, cold and repelling. The politeness of the French is conventional. It seems in part the result of their sense of personal grace, and in part of a selfish calculation of making the most of what costs nothing ; and partly, no doubt, it is the spontaneous effect of a vivacious nature. There is a deep-seated humanity in the courtesy of the Germans. They always seem to be feeling a gentle pressure from the cord that interlaces them with their species. They do not wait, as Schiller says, till you "freely invite" to "friendly stretch you a hand," but the hand is instinctively stretched out and the kind deed ready to follow it.

This suavity is not limited to any rank or condition. It extends all the way down from the prince to the poorest peasant. Some of our party driving out in a hackney coach yesterday, met some German ladies in a coach with four horses, postillions, footmen in livery, and other marks of rank and wealth. What would Americans have done in a similar position ! Probably looked away and seemed unconscious. And English ladies would have done the same, or, as I have seen them in Hyde Park, have leaned back in their carriages, and stared with an air of mingled indifference and insolence through their eye-glasses, as if their inferiors in condition could bear to be stared at. The German ladies bowed most courteously to the humble strangers in the hackney-coach.

Yesterday, at the table d'hôte, I observed a perpendicular old gentleman, who looked as if he had been born before any profane dreams of levelling down the steepes of aristocracy had entered the mind of man, and whose servant, in rich livery, as stiff as himself, was in waiting behind him, bow to the persons opposite to him as he took his seat, and to those on his right hand and his left. Soon after our landlord came to speak to him, and familiarly and quite acceptably, as it appeared, laid his hand on the nobleman's shoulder while addressing him.

Soon after we came here, a gentleman with whom we passed a few hours in a Rhine steamer met us at the table d'hôte. "Had I not," he said, "the pleasure of coming from Bonn to Cologne with you ! I see one of your party is absent. She is, I hope, well," &c. To appreciate as they deserve these wayside courtesies, you should see the relentless English we come in contact with, who, like ghosts, never "speak till they are spoken to." A few days since, as we were issuing from our lodgings, a very gentlemanly German stopped us, begging our pardons, and saying "English, I believe !" and then added, that as we appeared to be strangers in quest of lodgings, as he had just been, he would take the liberty to give us the addresses of two or three that had been recommended to him. This was truly a Samaritan—a German kindness. The hôtel-keepers, that important class of travellers, often blend with the accurate performance of the duties of "mine host" the kindness of a friend. Their civility, freedom, and gentlemanliness remind me of my friend Cosens and others, the best specimens of their fraternity at home. The landlord often sits at the table with his guests, and, with his own country-people converses on terms of apparent equality.

The same self-respect blends with the civility of the shopkeeper. He is very happy to serve and suit you, but, if he cannot, he is ready to direct you elsewhere. Shopmen have repeatedly, unasked, sent a person to guide us through the intricate continental streets to another shop.

The domestics are prompt, faithful, and cheerful in their services. There is freedom, but no presumption in their manners, and nothing of that unhappy uncertainty as to their exact position, so uncomfortable in our people. In all these subordinate classes you see nothing of the cringing servility that marks them in England, and to which they are exposed by their direct dependence on their employers.

Our English friend, Miss —, who has been repeatedly in Germany, and is a good observer, acquiesces in the truth of my observations, and says this general freedom of deportment comes from people of all ranks freely mingling together.

When shall we begin to jumble together ? It was fancied the Reform Bill would tend to break down the brazen walls which divide castes, and that railroads would help their amalgamation. No effect of the sort is yet apparent. The observations of Miss Sedgwick on German manners have been those of every intelligent English traveller for the last twenty years. After having seen more of the country, she reiterates her opinions.

The perfect blending of self-respect with deference, of freedom with courtesy, in the manners of the subordinate classes in Germany, puzzles me. They are, as you perceive by the rate of wages, quite as dependent on their employers as in England, but I have never seen an instance of cringing servility or insolence. The servants are indefatigable in their attendance, grateful for a small gratuity, and always meet your social overtures frankly and cheerfully. A seamstress sewed for us for two or three weeks, a quiet, modest, and respectful girl ; when she parted from us, she kissed us all, including R.,—not our hands, but fairly on the cheek ; a demonstration to which, as she was young and very pretty, neither he nor you would object.

I bought some trunks at Frankfurt of a man who, when he had closed our traffic, asked me to go up stairs and look at his rooms, and the picture of his wife ; and when he saw my pleasure in his very clean, well-furnished home, he said it was all their own earning ; that they had not much, but they had contented minds, and "that made a little go a great way." When he brought home the trunks, he brought his two little boys to see us. I could tell you fifty similar anecdotes, which all go to prove that the bond of brotherhood is sound and strong among them.

The family ties seem to be very strictly maintained. Children are kept much longer in subordination to their parents, and dependence on them, than we have any notion of. The period of minority may be almost said to extend through the parents' life. A very clever German woman lamented to me the effect of an English education upon the habits of her son. And, by-the-way, she considered his reluctance to submit to the restraints of his father's house, and his notion of complete independence and escape from the thralldom of his minority, to have been perfected by a year's travel in America. After telling me that he had refused to occupy a suite of apartments in his father's house, because he could not submit to be asked, "Where were you yesterday !" "Where do you go to-morrow !" she concluded with, "But I have nothing to complain of—he is a very good young man, but he is no longer a German. We should have foreseen this when we sent him to England. We cannot expect if we plant cabbages they will come up potatoes."

The next observation corroborates the recent statements of Mr. Chorley, and points to another charm—another high advantage in the cultivation of music which has escaped him.

The strict union of families seems to me to be promoted by the general cultivation of music. I say seems to me, my dear C. ; for, conscious of my very limited opportunities of observation, I give you my impressions with unaffected diffidence. Almost every member of a family is in some sort a musical performer, and the domesticated the more social and exciting of the arts. You would be astonished at the musical cultivation in families where there is no other accomplishment.

There is one of the rights of women secured to them here which I have been assured has an important effect on general prosperity and individual happiness. The German wife has an inextinguishable right to half the joint property of herself and her husband. He cannot deprive her of it by will, nor can it be applied to debts of his contracting. "This it is," said a gentleman to me, "that makes our wives so intelligent in the management of their concerns, so industrious and economical." I don't know how this may be; but it seems to me to be but common justice that a wife should be an equal partner in a concern of which she bears so heavy a part of the burden. Would not the introduction of such a law have a beneficent effect on the labouring classes in the United States? How many women would be stimulated to ingenuity and productive labour, if the results of their industry were secured to them! How many women are first wronged and then disheartened by having an inheritance consumed by a husband's vices, or dispersed by his wild speculations! How many, well qualified for respectable branches of business, are deterred from attempting them by the impossibility of securing to themselves and their children the proceeds! How many poor women among the lowest class of labourers have you and I both known, whose daily earnings have been lawfully taken from them by their brutal husbands! This is a pretty serious evil, as in that class at least (you will allow me to say) the destructive vices are pretty much monopolised by your sex.

It is one of our distinctions, thank God, in the New World, that we do not quietly rest in any error; so I have faith that in good time this matter will be set right.

With one more glimpse of one of the eminences of the day, we must close our cursory notice of a work, agreeable always, as the reader must perceive, and also fertile of the best kind of instruction. This passing view is of Sismondi and his household, and dwelling in the vicinity of Geneva.

After a pleasant drive of a mile and a half, we reached M. Sismondi's house, a low, cottage-like building, with a pretty hedge before it, and ground enough about it to give it an air of seclusion and refinement. On the opposite side of the road, and withdrawn from it, is a Gothic church, shaded by fine old trees; and before it is the Salève, and Mont Blanc for a back ground. I envied those who could sit down on the stone benches in the broad vestibule of the church, with these glorious high altars before them. It pleased me to find Sismondi's home in a position so harmonising with the elevation and tranquillity of his philosophic mind.

You would like to know how M. Sismondi looks. I can tell you that he is short, stout, and rather thick; that he has a dark complexion, plenty of black hair, and brilliant hazel eyes; and then you will have just about as adequate a notion of his soul-lit face as you would have of the beauty of Monument Mountain, the Housatonic, and our meadows, if you had never seen the sun shine upon them or the shadows playing over them. . . .

We dined at Chesne to-day. Madame S. insisted we should all come, saying, in her kindest manner, "It is but sitting a little closer;" and, turning to Confalonieri, "We do not give entertainments; but it is better than Spielberg, my dear count." We found everything as you would wish to find it in the house of a liberal friend. Married people without children have always seemed to me much like mutes, but here I do not miss them—affections that flow full and free will make their own channels. Sismondi rarely dines out, and "has not," Madame S. says, "in his life drunk a half-glass of wine beyond what was good for him;" and surely he has his reward in a clear head, and unshaken hand. He is sixty-seven. Madame S. expressed her regret that he was so near the allotted term of life, while "he had yet so much to do." "I wish," she added, playfully, "that I were nineteen, and my husband twenty one." Sismondi replied, that he should not care to live his life over again; "it had been so happy, he should not dare to trust the chances." We in our rash love would have exclaimed, "O king, live for ever!" forgetting that he will live for ever without "the chances."

You should have heard the clatter of our young people as we drove away. "Who would think M. Sismondi was a celebrated savant!" exclaimed L.; "I should never think of his being a great author, or anything but the best and kindest of men." "Did you observe," said M., whose American feeling is always at welding heat, "how perfectly well informed he is about America, even to the smallest details?" K. declared that, though she had ridiculed the idea of falling in love at first sight, she had already plunged so deep into an affection for Sismondi that she began to think such a catastrophe possible. And then came other characteristic remarks: L. maintaining that "Madame S. could not be an English woman, she was so gentle and lovely!" and M. saying she was like the best specimens of American women—like E. F. and S.; and we finally laid aside all our national biases pour et contre, and finished by agreeing that she is

That kind of creature we could most desire
To honour, serve, and love.

K. and I walked out this morning to breakfast with the Sismondias. It was scarcely nine when we sat down to the table. He breakfasted on curds and cream, as on these delicate articles Madame S. says he expends all his gourmandise.

The strain, altogether, is rather too candied for our taste; so we skip to the conclusion, a Genève soirée, where half the men were savans:—

I met M. De Candolle last evening at a soirée at Sismondi's. Besides, having the greatest name in Europe as a botanist, he is a most agreeable person. He and Sismondi talked across me most courteously of our country, and with a minuteness of information that showed what an interesting field it is to the philosopher and the man of science. De Candolle spoke respectfully of our botanists, Grey, Nuttall, and Elliott, and dwelt on the superior richness of our country, for the botanist, to Europe. "America is for me and not for Sismondi," he said; "for you have no history." He does not imagine how much we make of our little.

There were some dozen people present, and we took our tea round the tea-table, which was spread with biscuits, cake, sweetmeats, and fruit, quite in the rural fashion of New England. The English, we are told, laugh at this mode of hospitality, and desecrate Lake Lemman with the homely title of "Tea-water Lab." When will the English learn to look with a philosophic eye on customs that differ from their own!

Ay, or the Americans?

Sunday evening.—We have just returned from taking tea with the Sismondias. Madame S. spoke of the Genevese women as the most exemplary she has ever known: this, mind ye, is the opinion of an Englishwoman. They are reproached, she says, with being rotte and pedantic in their virtues, but she maintains that "it is exactness, not pedantry." She attributes much of the merit of the strict performance of their moral duties to the pastors of Geneva. Every young person, on attaining the age of fifteen, enters on a course of religious instruction from the pastor, which excludes other studies and all amusements. All ranks are comprised in this sacred study and novitiate.

We do not learn what Miss Sedgwick thinks of this, and other institutions peculiar to the society, of which Miss Pigott quaintly says, "All the women seem as if they had been bred governesses." In the following scene, an American lady might almost have fancied herself at home, at a Dorcas Society of a more pretending kind; though the stiff, proud English may be apt to mutter something like fudge at this sort of make-believe charity and play-business:—

We went last evening to our friends at Chesne to meet a sewing society for the poor—just such as we have in our own villages. We found the historian of the Italian Republics, and the writer of other and more books than many people ever read, arranging the chairs and tables with madame, and Henri and Françoise, their servants, whom they treat more like friends than servants. Presently, Madame Martin, the wife of the pastor, entered with a pile of garments cut out and ready for her coadjutors. Their goings-on were much like ours on similar occasions, except that the husbands were allowed admittance, and a quiet game of whist in the corner, provided they play for a few sous, and give the winnings to the society. M. Martin is a man of superior intellect and most delightful countenance; I thought so, at least, while he was asking me questions with great interest about my country. The girls had promised to join the sewers, but, instead, they were reapers. I turned, and saw them all gathered round M. Simondi in the corner, L. at his feet, and he recited Italian verses to them!

We should have resisted the temptation of following Miss Sedgwick across the Alps, save for this peep of Silvio Pellico.

He lives near Turin, as librarian to a certain marchesa. We wrote him a note, and asked the privilege of paying our respects to him, on the ground of being able to give him news of his friends, and our dear friends, the exiles, who were his companions at Spielberg. He came immediately to us. He is of low stature, and slightly made: a sort of etching of a man, with delicate and symmetrical features, just enough body to gravitate and keep the spirit from its natural upward flight—a more shadowy Dr. Channing! His manners have a sweetness, gentleness, and low tone, that correspond well with his spiritual appearance. He was gratified with our good tidings of his friends, and much interested with our account of his godchild, Maroncelli's little Silvia. His parents have died within an year or two.—“Dieu m'a fait la grace,” he said, “de les revoir en sortant de la prison. Dieu fait tout pour notre mieux; c'est cette conviction qui m'a soutenu et qui me soutient encore.” In reply to his saying that he lived a life of retirement, and had few acquaintances in Turin, we told him that he had friends all over the world. “That proves,” he said, “that there are everywhere 'belles ames.'” His looks, his manner, his voice, and every word he spoke, were in harmony with his book, certainly one of the most remarkable productions of our day.

I have been very sorry to hear some of his countrymen speak distrustfully of Pellico, and express an opinion—a reluctant one—that he had sunk into willing subjection to political despotism and priestly craft. It is even said that he has joined the order of Jesuits. I do not believe this, nor have I heard any evidence adduced in support of it that tends to invalidate the proof of the incorruptibility of Pellico's soul contained in Le Mie Prigioni. He is a saint that cannot fall from grace. There seems to me nothing in his present unqualified submission incompatible with his former history and professions. His phase of the Christian character has always been that of sufferance. He is the gentle Melancthon, not the bold and valiant Luther; the loving John, not the fearless Paul.

We are somewhat inclined to the reluctant opinion of Pellico's countrymen. There is a meekness over-much—an endurance which looks exceedingly like the submissiveness of one who is unwilling to expose himself farther to the fatigues and risks of battle. Miss Sedgwick is truer to her own creed when she exclaims:—

My dear C., it is worth the trouble of a pilgrimage to the Old World to learn to feel—to realise our political blessings and our political exemptions. And what do those renegadoes deserve—I cannot call them by a gentler name—who, enjoying the order of despotism in travelling through Europe, come home and extol the Austrian government, and sigh for those countries where there is no danger that freedom may run into the madness of “Lynch-law!” What is every tyrannical decree of absolutism but a Lynch-law? I have met an Englishman who was not ashamed to prefer the quiet of Austrian dominion to a government that involved the tumult of an English election! Would these people be cured, think ye, by a year's solitary reflection in the dungeons of Spielberg?

They deserve to have the experiment tried on them.

Before concluding, we must hazard a few words in vindication of some anonymous gentleman whom all America may most wrongfully condemn, while they set down his countrymen as bears, through the evident mistake of Miss Sedgwick; a mistake in which some of her English critics seem to share.

Miss Sedgwick had accepted an invitation to dine with a lady whom she had not seen, and a party; but mistaking the hour, she arrived just an hour and a half too late, and after dinner had been an hour delayed for her. Upon her arrival, the host left the table to receive her in the drawing-room, evidently with the humane intention of sparing a lady the awkwardness of entering a dining-room under such circumstances, and knowing that his wife, to whom the visit was made, would probably soon join her guest. But Miss Sedgwick, when politely told she might “do as she pleased about going in,” chose to proceed; so the consequences were of her own seeking, or rather she forgot, that if to see her hostess was her great object, that end would have been much better attained by sitting quietly for a little while where she was:—

I begged ten thousand pardons, assured Mr. — that the dinner was a perfectly unimportant circumstance to me; that I would not lose the only opportunity I might have of seeing Mrs. —, &c. So, with a dim smile, he gave me his arm, and I entered the dining-room. There were ten or twelve people present. There was an awful silence, an obvious suspension of the whole ceremony of dinner awaiting my decision. My courage was expended; I felt it ebbing, when H., who was sitting next the lady of the house, came to my relief, both hands extended, as if to save a drowning creature. He is, as I have told you before, the very embodiment of the kindly social principle. He stopped my apologies by assuming that I was the injured party, and dealt his blows to our host and hostess on the right and left. He declared that Mrs. — wrote a hand no one could decipher. He never, in a long acquaintance, had made out a note of hers, and he was sure I had not been able to tell whether I was invited at six or eight! He would know “how — had received me.” He was certain “he had made some blunder, it was so like him!” I answered, with strict truth, that Mr. — “had made me feel comfortable in a most uncomfortable position.” To my dismay, and in spite of my protestations, Mrs. — insisted on re-beginning at the Alpha of the dinner; the guests had reached the Omega. The soup was brought back. H. averred that it was most fortunate for him; he had been kept talking, and had not eaten half a dinner; so he started fresh with me, and went bonâ fide through, covering me with his ægis as I ran my gauntlet through the courses.

This valuable and ready-witted friend was n—

* “God granted me the mercy of seeing my parents when I came out of prison. God orders all for our best good. It is this conviction which has hitherto supported, and still sustains me.”

bably Captain Hall, who tried to rescue Miss Sedgwick from what would have been no scrape at all, save for her own inadvertence. What could the poor gentleman do, save what he did? He could not say, "I think you had better stay where you are, ma'am, until my wife comes up stairs, and not put my dozen people into confusion, and yourself out of countenance, by joining them at this late stage of dinner—especially as you say you don't mind dinner, and I daresay have had lunch at your usual American dinner hour." Now, this is the only complaint which Miss Sedgwick insinuates of English manners in this class of society. Yet she necessitated the fuss made about her; and was in short the offender, if there was any offence.

For the sake of our country readers of the gentle sex, we must give an evening party at the London residence of Miss Burdett Coutts:—

We passed an evening at Miss C.'s; she is truly what the English call a "nice person;" as modest in her demeanour as one of our village girls who has a good organ of veneration, (rare enough among our young people,) and this is saying something for the richest heiress in England.

I was first struck here, and only here, with the subdued tone we hear so much of in English society. When we first entered Miss C.'s immense drawing-room, there were a few dowagers scattered up and down, appearing as few and far between as settlers on a prairie, and apparently finding intercommunication quite as difficult. And though the numbers soon multiplied, till the gentlemen came genial from the dinner-table, we were as solemn and as still as a New England conference-meeting before the minister comes in. This, I think, was rather the effect of accident than fashion, the young lady's quiet and reserved manner having the subduing influence of a whisper. Society here is quieter than ours, certainly. This is perhaps the result of the different materials of which it is compounded. Our New York evening parties, you know, are made up of about seventy-five parts boys and girls, the other twenty-five being their papas and mammas, and other ripe men and women. The spirits of a mass of young people, even if they be essentially well-bred, will explode in sound; thence the general din of voices and shouts of laughter at our parties.

I have rarely seen at an evening party here anything beyond a cup of black tea and a bit of cake, dry as "the remainder biscuit after a voyage." Occasionally we have ices (in alarmingly small quantity!) and lemonade, or something of that sort.

MUSINGS IN THE WEN—POLITICS OF THE PARKS.

It was a beautiful summer that, during which the members of the last unreformed Parliament, of blessed memory, were detained in London, toiling, in the heat of the dog-days, at the concoction of the Reform Bill. What with long nocturnal sittings in the stifling atmosphere of the House of Commons, and dry-parched morning committees, to settle the tactics of the evening, a mouthful of fresh air was, at that time, a luxury to our legislators, more especially to that portion of them upon whom devolved the responsibility of altering the constitution of the House of Commons. It was, therefore, not to be wondered at that Lords Stanley, John Russell and Co., frequently adjourned their deliberations, of a fine afternoon, to that delicious piece of green-sward, canopied by old trees, and circled by bosquets, which lies between Marlborough House and the ornamental water in St. James's Park.

There might not unfrequently be seen, in laudable economy of their time, the knot of statesmen whom so many of their countrymen then esteemed models of legislative wisdom, patriotism, and love of liberty, taking the exercise which physicians enforce from men of sedentary professions, and concerting the movements of the Parliamentary war at the same time. Perhaps, in the intoxication of leading on a great popular movement, they did, for the moment, imagine themselves what the people believed them to be, and were—as dreamers are emperors, conquerors, and successful lovers, while the vision lasts—during a brief interval, "all our fancy painted them." They have awakened into their real selves since that time, and have taught others to know them better. How few of all the champions of the Reform Bill have preserved a wreck of their reputation as champions of popular rights! Some of them have got sick of their business, and retired into private life—others are to be found leading on the hostile bands. A very few still struggle on, professing adherence to their old opinions. Their young enthusiasm and mutual confidence have died of old age in less than ten years. The wine of their eternal friendship has already been turned to vinegar—

Each spoke words of high disdain
And insult to his heart's best brother:
They parted ne'er to meet again.

It could not be otherwise. The very spot where those "their first vows of love were plighted"—where they enjoyed the honeymoon of their wedding to reform, was prophetic of their brief endurance. The Parks are the express image of the spirit of "matchless constitution." Sturdy independence, rational politics, can no more live and breathe their atmosphere, than virtue remain unthawed in the dissolving temperature of Armida's bower.

Take your stand in what part of the London Parks you please, you have around you ornamental gardens, fenced in by the sumptuous palaces of the aristocracy, or by regal residences, or by the offices of Government. Nothing that art can do to heighten the beauties of a not ungenial soil and climate has been neglected within them. The elements of wood, flowers, grass, and water, have been rendered as available as in the household lawns of the wealthiest and most tasteful of the nobility. Every mansion which skirts these "trim gardens"—sacred to the amusements of the wealthy—bespeaks affluence or power, and the polished pleasures that wait upon them. Business, with its scare-crow gravity intrudes not there. Along the winding margin of St. James's canal saunter elegantly clad groups, now disappearing among the shrubbery, now re-appearing under stately elms, bright in the colours of their garments, and seemingly as careless of the morrow as the diversified water-fowl that come to feed from their hands. Gay equipages of every imaginable tint and form—all elegant, all commodious—glide noiselessly along the tree-skirted alleys of Hyde Park, glowing to the sunbeams. The glossy and prancing steeds seem conscious of the beauty they drag behind them. The thick shady groves of Kensington Gardens are alive with loungers listening, it may be, to the finest music of Germany and Italy, performed by some military band.

Even the more homespun classes, who penetrate into these recesses, catch the spirit of the place, or seem admitted like rough homely figures in a picture by Raphael, to heighten, by contrast, the external graces of aristocracy. Is the vacant space before Buckingham Palace, or the Mall, or Constitution-hill, thronged by crowds of hard-handed artisans and comfortable citizens? They come there to gaze on a chariot with outriders, in which are seated a comely young woman with her husband. They are there to worship the strange invisible spirit of power typified in that unimpressive form, yet not less felt because of the strange selection of a visible agent. They are there to express by their long patient waiting till the pageant pass—by their eager rustling crush forward to catch the earliest and longest glimpse of it as it glides by them, the strong abiding hold it has upon their imaginations. They are there when "the vision that held their eyes" is past, to break up into knots, and wander about among the elegancies that surround them, gazing at the minor stars of aristocracy, imbibing the spirit of the scene, and confirming in each other's mind, by their conversation, the belief that there must be something very great and good and sacred in what has stimulated their curiosity, and drawn them thither.

The Parks, too, have a literature of their own; and the associations which it furnishes all tend to heighten the charm, and consequently strengthen the power of the visible scene. The wit and pleasure of all the courtly circles since the Restoration, have their local habitation, their abiding home in the Parks. All who are read—and all are more or less read—in the English literature of the last two centuries—can people them with thousands of pleasant images. We can scarcely cross the deserted ring in Hyde Park, without recalling the time when richly dressed crowds assembled there to gaze with edification on the carriages of Charles II. and the Duchess of Cleveland passing and repassing; and still as the equipages crossed each other's path, the merry monarch rising to greet his buxom virago of a mistress.

Wandering amid the rectilinear vistas and cross-paths of Kensington Gardens, the more domestic stateliness of the courts of William of Nassau, Anne, and the two first Georges, crowds upon our recollection. Graver they were, the epochs of these monarchs, but not so much more virtuous than that of Charles, as gravity would persuade itself. Glimpses of graceful levity, too, at times break through like sun-bursts in a misty day. In the whole annals of the gallantry of Charles's court, there is not a more piquant incident than one related by Lady Mary Wortley Montague of the staid court of George I. That monarch, who, with all his formality and advanced years, could appreciate a pretty face, especially when set off by lively elegance of manner, had taken a strong fancy in his quiet way to Lady Mary. He liked to see and hear her in his evening assemblies. One evening she left the circle earlier than he wished, though his taciturn disposition forbade any other expression of his desire that she should stay than a—"Don't go yet." The lively lady was at no time of her life accustomed to regard any wishes than her own, nor did she on this occasion. Meeting, however, one of the lords in waiting at the foot of the stair, and mentioning to him the royal hint of objection to her departure, his Lordship quietly took her in his arms and carried her back. Setting her down at the door, he ushered her in with as cool self-possession as if nothing particular had happened; but the breathless confusion of the giddy wit led to inquiry, and the adroit courtier had no reason to question the satisfaction of his laconic sovereign.

St. James's Park swarms with associations of those who seem to have been born only to amuse themselves, or utter clever sayings. It will for ever be haunted by the eidolon of Charles II. feeding his ducks at the decoy, and then sauntering across to the King's Garden to have a chat with Nell Gwynn at her chamber-window. The easy selfish Earl of St. Albans, who lived through the civil war, the banishment of the cavalier party, and the intrigues of the Restoration, without once incurring an anxious thought, or even pecuniary inconvenience, will ever be visible to the mind's eye, leading along the Mall, Henrietta Maria, who governed a king, but was governed by a subject. Here, too, grotesque figures of the imagination will intrude themselves. Steele's Political Upholsterer, with his learned associates, will for ever sun themselves on the bench at the end of the Mall; and Goldsmith's merry Vagabond sit waiting for some one to invite him to partake of a steak and a tankard. The ludicrous of reality sometimes exceeds the most daring flights of fancy,—a remark called to mind by an incident which here befel no less a person than the shy, precise, demure, author of Sir Charles Grandison. Richardson was already far advanced in his sixth decade, when Lady Bradshaigh, excited to the step by her admiration of his works, commenced a correspondence with him under a feigned name. At her request he consented to exhibit himself one Saturday on the Mall at St. James's, having been led to hope that his incognita would by some sign or other enable him to recognise her in turn. She maliciously kept him pacing backwards and forwards for several hours under a burning sun, his daughter and a companion of hers fretting their hearts out at a reverential distance, and the dinner spoiling at his house near Hammersmith, and on that occasion at least the lady "made no sign."

Persiflage is as unfailing an attendant upon the elegant parade and luxury of the aristocracy of a refined age as the privileged jester was of the rude state of the feudal lord. Actors—and all appdages of courts are actors—living in the public gaze, and intent upon keeping up a comely exterior, feel the hollowness behind the scenes, and attempt to relieve the painful consciousness of a void by laughing at their own grimaces. Mask and anti-mask must go together, or half the charm is sacrificed. A court is nothing without the contrast of a city. Half the pleasure of the courtier's life consists—more than half his time is consumed, in thanking God that he is not as other men, neither as those citizens. This observation is meant as a parenthetical apology for bringing such common-life figures as upholsterers and mountebanks "between the wind and the nobility" of the right-hand denizens of the Parks.

They are, however, subject to other intrusions, more or less earnest and annoying. Wealth is not the natural lot of man, born to eat his bread in the sweat of his brow. What the future may have in store we know not; but the experience of all past time shows the narrow circle of the affluent as a sunny Goshen, amid the howling darkness of surrounding poverty. The family of the Havees can never get the much more numerous family of the Have-nots to keep such a distance as is necessary for the entire comfort of the former. The crowd through which the gorgeous pageant of courtly life passes along will constantly be breaking rank in its anxiety to catch a nearer view, and arresting the progress of the performers, treading on their heels and toes, and fingering and soiling their gay apparel. That Leviathan, the mob, incommodates its more delicate brethren even in its moods of good-humoured curiosity or playfulness. The Duchess of Cleveland wanted not humorous persecutors, who amused themselves one night by following her in masks the whole length of the Mall, recounting the not-exceedingly edifying adventures of her life, and prophesying that she would yet die the death of Jane Shore. The Countess of Coventry (the elder of the celebrated Gunnings) was once mobbed in the Park. And it would be hard to say, whether, during the reign of periwigs and bag-wigs, wrist-ruffles, and huge cuffed and skirted laced coats, the wearers of that splendidly grotesque attire were more annoyed at being jostled by prentice boys aping their finery, or huge porters let loose among them from time to time arrayed in the extreme of the fashion, by way of animated caricatures. The squalor of London once lay in close proximity to St. James's Park. The sanctuary of Westminster, and the privileged precinct of Whitehall almost encircled it; and within these cities of refuge might be found the choicest specimens of the rascality of London; and as Satan contrived to break bounds, and stray into Eden before the fall, so his grim-visaged servants straggled at times into the day-light of the Park even before Reform or Reform-bill were dreamed of.

The Parks are, as I said at the outset, typical of "Matchless Constitution." The British Constitution is an excellent device for adding to the comforts of those who are comfortable already. De minimis non curat lex: The law was not made for the advantage of the vulgar. The airy space, surrounded by magnificent dwellings for the noble and wealthy, with gate-keepers to prevent the ingress of men in their working clothes; and the government offices, by means of which the revenue is distilled out of the whole land into a concentrated essence of wealth, to be administered in reviving draughts to place-holding cadets of noble families, in order that they may be supported without diminishing the family wealth, is an exact representation of the working of our constitution. Our aristocracy is a well-fed and well-trained body—a selection of as fine specimens of the human animal as one could wish to see,—but the paddocks in which they are pastured and exercised till they reach such a pitch of perfection are kept up at the expense of the half-fed millions without. The Parks are a striking specimen of what human industry, intelligence, and taste, can accomplish. A whole world of persevering ingenuity lies between the stagnant marshes which bluff Harry began to reclaim, and the elegant lawns that stretch on two sides of Buckingham Palace. But might not the labour spent in polishing this jewel have been more profitably employed? May not we have been paying too dear for our whistle? May not this extreme adornment of one spot be about as wise as Lord Winchelsea's corn-law recipe for raising corn from barren soils by the aid of oil-cake manure?

Who says that human nature is exclusively selfish? Why, a chimney-sweeper can stand and grin with delight at the splendour of a ducal equipage—forgetting his own miserable existence in his joy at seeing what a fine thing human nature can be made. Thousands have for ages repeated their self-sacrifice that one might enjoy life to the utmost of his capacity, and rejoiced in their immolation. It is bad policy in rulers to conceal from the crowd the wealth of which they have plundered it: if they hang it about their persons, the slaves will bow down and worship the gorgeousness to which their own unrewarded toil has given existence. London is a proof of this. London is the stronghold of the monarchy. The Cockneys are permitted to gaze on the splendour of the court—they imagine that its proximity reflects light upon themselves—they identify themselves with it in their imagination, and their loyalty is but a specious sort of self-love. Symptoms of a desire to keep the people at arm's-length have been noticed in high places: they are ill-judged;—allow the crowd to stare and gossip, and it will wish to stare and gossip on.

How could it be expected that men bred in the lap of "Matchless Constitution" should wish to break down the wall of the garden in which they enjoyed such pleasing seclusion from the cares of a working-day world? The wiser among them conceded the privilege of entry to a few, in order by that means to engage them as porters to keep out the rest. The trick has succeeded for the time: the new constituency is every whit as Conservative as the old; and the disinterested champions of a more liberal admission have already fallen back into their old tricks of caballing and intriguing for the largest share of the fruits and flowers.

Can this last? Scarcely. Jeremy Bentham's house stands within St. James's Park; and opposite to it the column of the Duke of York, towering above the houses of Carlton Terrace, perpetuates, and continually incites to the repetition of the sarcasm, that "he was placed so high to keep him out of the reach of his creditors."

Poems by the late John Bethune; with a Sketch of his Life. By his Brother.

THE brothers Bethune are of what, since the era of Burns, has been a rather numerous class—the literary peasants of Scotland. Both are poets; both are agreeable tellers of Scottish stories of humble life. We are, however, inclined to think that none of their previous productions are of more interest or value than the affectionate Memoir which the surviving brother has written of JOHN BETHUNE. It is a complete picture of the struggles, the difficulties, the ambitions, the perseverance, and self-denial of the virtuous and intelligent labouring poor of Scotland: a proof of what may be achieved, in the most disadvantageous circumstances, when talents are supported by virtues.

John Bethune was the son of a farm-servant in Fife-shire, and born near the seat of Sir David Lyndsay, "Davie Lyndsay of the Mount." His mother taught him to read, and his brother gave him some slender instruction in writing and cyphering. This seems to have been the sum of his early education; but at eighteen, and long after he had been a poet, he bought a small dictionary, and improved himself in grammar and orthography. At eight years of age, he became helpful in herding his father's two cows on the margin of Lindores Loch. His father possessed a few of those volumes, which wont to be considered heirlooms in a Scottish peasant's family; and before the boy could read distinctly, he was acquainted with "The Cloud of Witnesses;" "The Scots Worthies;" the metrical History of Bruce and Wallace; and the Poems of Burns. Before he was thirteen, he was assisting in supporting himself by breaking stones on the high road; anxious to relieve his father, who, during a long illness, had contracted some debts. Hand-loom weaving was then (in 1823-4) a comparatively good trade, as the weavers could earn 2s. a-day, while labourers made only 1s. 3d. Bethune was, accordingly, apprenticed for two years to a weaver; and speedily, by great exertion, worked up his time in a shorter period, when, on a capital of £10, saved in the family "by the most desperate economy," he commenced business at the age of sixteen. His elder brother and biographer, who was working for 1s. 3d. a-day as a labourer, became the young weaver's apprentice.

The numerous failures and universal panic of 1825 ruined their prospects; and both brothers were fain to betake themselves once more to out-door labour, at 1s. 2d. and 1s. a-day; and the money sunk in weaving utensils was so much lost capital. About this time, a student from St. Andrews, who "was struggling hard for his education," tried to teach a few children in their hamlet during the summer months, and strongly excited the poetical feeling in Bethune, by recitations from Scott, Byron, Campbell, Moore, and other works, hitherto to John sealed books. His first step was also to recite: the next to imitate what he admired. In early life, the foundation of that insidious disease, consumption, to which he prematurely fell a victim, was laid in over-exertion in labour, and as probably in hard fare, which was also too scanty to sustain the vigour of a growing lad, engaged in severe toil, and exposed to all the vicissitudes of the seasons. A copy of his early verses, not remarkable in themselves, yet wonderful, indeed, as the production of an "illiterate boy of fifteen," are prefixed to the following account of their author in his early years:—

"These, it must be admitted," says his brother, "are very far from being finished poetry; but still, with all their imperfections, occasional indications of MIND, and sallies of imagination, may be met with in the whole."

In the month of November, 1827, he was employed, along with two others, in clearing out a water-course, which gave drainage to a considerable extent of country. The water, from recent rains, was then so deep as to reach almost to the knee; and, owing to the advanced season of the year, extremely cold. One of his fellow-labourers was taken ill, and confined for several days: he also caught cold, but the case was not so severe as to keep him at home; and thus he continued to struggle on at a most killing employment, till it terminated in a cough. Near the end of the same month, he was engaged a day taking marl from a pit in a marshy situation, when, having got himself wet, he again experienced an increase of the disease. Near the end of December, he was sent to drain off some standing water from a swamp. The day was one of intense frost: he again got himself wet, and again caught cold. During the whole of this period, the cough occasioned by his first illness had continued; but, as it was not violent, it did not excite any alarm. On the night of Old Handael Monday, however, it had increased so much as to deprive him entirely of sleep. Next day a doctor was called, who attended him afterwards with the greatest care; but, for nearly a fortnight, nothing seemed to produce the slightest alleviation.

He recovered by slow degrees; but by the time that he was again fit for labour, his elder brother had been disabled by one of those accidents to which quarriers and miners are peculiarly exposed. His brother, after dwelling upon John's affectionate assiduity, relates that "The result of this accident was a heavy expenditure, occasioned by distress, and four months of inability to labour; at the end of which period, from his exertions in behalf of his unfortunate brother, he again found himself in debt."

The time which elapsed between his sixteenth and eighteenth year had produced a remarkable change in his personal appearance. Up to the former of these periods, his growth had been like that of other boys of his age; but, by the time he reached the latter, he measured somewhat more than six feet. The disease in his stomach had completely stolen the red from his complexion; and, except when the blood was called to his cheek to resist the effects of extreme cold, his face was uniformly pale, with a thoughtful expression, which accorded ill with his years. His mind had now taken a decidedly literary turn; and between this and 1831 he had produced a great number of poetical effusions, which are still lying, as he left them, in an old copy-book. Many of these, from the circumstance of being written in a very minute character, upon such scraps of paper as had come to the house with grocery wares, &c., and from having b long exposed to smoke, dust, and occasional drenchings with rain water, which oozed through the roof, can now scarcely be read without the assistance of a magnifying glass."

The list of his poems is very long, but few of this period have been deemed suitable for publication. Indeed, the character of the man, or his personal history, is much more interesting than the productions of his muse, creditable as these are to his talents and acquirements. He now began to improve himself in spelling and penmanship. But all this while,

From his work he was never absent a day, or even an hour, when the weather admitted of going abroad; and if at any time he was inclined to fret, it was when kept at home by rain or deep snow. I think I may also affirm, without fear of contradiction, that there scarcely ever was a man who gave his time or his assistance to his poorer fellow-creatures more willingly than he did. Whatever he may have accomplished in another way, it was done solely by keeping one object steadily in view, and devoting to it the whole of those hours which others devote to amusement, idle conversation, and visiting acquaintances.

By the end of the year 1830, the disease in his stomach had begun to produce symptoms of another kind; and, for the six following years, he was seldom wholly free from a painful malady which frequently proves fatal, and which, after it has advanced beyond a certain stage, can only be cured by a dangerous operation. The dyspeptic tendency, too, had increased rather than diminished; and at this time, in about an hour, or an hour and a half after taking his dinner, he was often affected with a faintness, and a sort of false hunger, to such a degree that his legs would scarcely support him; yet day after day he drudged on at his work; and that he might perform the usual quantity, during those intervals of comparative health which he enjoyed, he wrought harder than he would have otherwise done. Between this and the end of 1836, the state of his system was such, that lying longer in bed than five hours at a time produced such a degree of uneasiness as to render it painful rather than refreshing; and as a necessary consequence, he rose in general about three in summer, and at a little past four in winter. These long and solitary mornings he spent for the most part over a fire which he had himself kindled; and when I rose, which was not till some hours later, I found him always employed either in writing or reading; with respect to the latter, though I never questioned him upon the subject, from the circumstance of his Bible being always lying beside him, it appeared that he was in the habit of reading a portion of Scripture before he engaged in any other book.

To make money by his productions, appears to have been early and steadfastly Bethune's object; and when his brother abandoned writing, his rebuke was:—"If Burns had abandoned writing in a fit of despondency, he never would have obtained the £900 which he afterwards acquired by an edition of his works." They were poor, he said, "and could not save by labour; so every gain from literature was worth looking after, were it only for their parents' sakes. This idea of turning his literary talents to a profitable account seems to have taken at last dangerous possession of the mind of an uneducated though clever man, more remarkable for strength of moral principle than felicity of genius.

His self-denial must have been extreme even for one in his rank of life; though we are not quite sure that the parsimony which, even for commendable objects, risks present comfort and health itself, is entitled to unreserved praise. It is said, after the above allusion to the genius of Burns:—

As another evidence of his industry, and a proof that his "miserable earnings," as he termed them, were not squandered upon idle indulgences, it may be also mentioned, that from them, previous to November, 1832, about £14 had been again saved. In the spring of 1830, the reader will recollect that he was rather in debt; little more than two years had passed since then; and when it is known that his earnings seldom exceeded £19 in any year—that, besides himself, he had at least one of his parents to support—that he was in the habit of giving considerable sums in charity, and, perhaps, still more for books—some idea of his personal expenditure may be formed. This could not possibly exceed £7 per annum, food, clothing, and everything included.

Having thus mentioned his little savings, I hope the reader will pardon me for stating the manner in which they were expended. On the 8th of November, 1832, the writer of this sketch was once more subjected to the effects of gunpowder, by an accident in a quarry; and, before he was able to resume his work, the last farthing of the £14 was gone; and the author of the following poems, and the narrator of his story, were left to begin the world again, with only the clothes on their backs; and these, having already seen severe service, promised soon to leave them.

Yet the life of the brothers was not without the most pure and elevating enjoyments. While working as a day-labourer in the woods, at £19 a-year, John Bethune had begun "to carry a book, with a slip of paper and a pencil, constantly in his pocket; and if, in the course of his solitary labours by day, a good idea occurred, he sometimes took such notes of it as would enable him to recall it in the evening. About this time, "The Happy Home," "The Shout of Victory," "Song to the Rising Sun," and a number of other productions, the original MSS. of which are stitched up with these, were composed. The first of "Hymns of the Churchyard," of which there are three, owes its origin to the same period; and I shall never forget the time and the place at which I first heard him read it. The house which we inhabited was long and narrow, with a small vacant space at the farther end of it, lighted by a single pane of glass; and to it, on the summer evenings, when he had the advantage of daylight till it was almost ten o'clock, he sometimes retired with his papers. On one of these evenings I had taken sanctuary in this quarter before he came home. The sun shone cheerfully in at the little window, giving an air of warmth to the place, and making visible a long level streak of its dim smoky atmosphere. When he arrived, with his writing materials in his hand, he leaned upon the chest where my papers were lying, and said, "If you would only stop for a few minutes, man, I would let you hear my last production." He then read, with a low musical voice, the lines beginning, "Ah, me! this is a sad and silent city."

To complete this very beautiful picture of what may be the tastes, pursuits, and pleasures of men in the humblest station, we shall present our readers with an extract from what we consider among the best of the poems:—

Ah, me! this is a sad and silent city;
Let me walk softly o'er it, and survey
Its grassy streets, with melancholy pity!
Where are its children! where their gleesome play!
Alas! their cradled rest is cold and deep,
And slimy worms watch o'er them as they sleep!

This is pale beauty's bourne; but where the beautiful
Whom I have seen come forth at evening hours,
Leading their aged friends, with feelings dutiful,
Amid the wreaths of spring, to gather flowers!
Alas! no flowers are here, but flowers of death;
And those who once were sweetest sleep beneath.

This is a populous place: but where the bustling—
The crowded buyers of the noisy mart—
The lookers-on—the showy garments rustling—
The money-changers—and the men of art!
Business, alas! hath stopp'd in mid career,
And none are anxious to resume it here.

This is the home of grandeur : where are they—
The rich, the great, the glorious, and the wise !
Where are the trappings of the proud, the gay—
The gaudy guise of human butterflies !
Alas ! all lowly lies each lofty brow,
And the green sod 'dizens their beauty now.

This is a place of refuge and repose :

Where are the poor—the old—the weary wight—
The scorn'd—the humble—and the man of woes—
Who wept for morn, and sigh'd again for night !
Their sighs at last have ceased, and here they sleep,
Beside their scornors, and forget to weep.

Bethune's literary projects and compositions were endless ; but " the great difficulty of obtaining access to the public still remained." The booksellers would not risk publishing for him ; he was too right-spirited to publish by subscription ; and some of the periodicals declined his contributions, even when, in his inexperience of such matters, he, as he imagined, tempted the editors by offering the manuscript free. Yet, steadily looking to the money-value of the time and labour that he had expended in qualifying himself for authorship, and with no apparent misgiving as to his own powers, he was unwilling to give up the expectation of ultimate profit. Gain, to a certain extent, had been realized by his brother, who had written some little tales and sketches, which found acceptance in one of the small periodicals of the day. Some little poems, by " A Forester," which John sent to the Edinburgh Christian Herald, were printed ; but when he understood that nothing more than " empty praise " was to follow these labours, he dropt the connexion, most unpoetically indifferent to mere fame.

The overseer of the estate on which he worked having died, Bethune was promoted to a situation of some trust, the emoluments of which were £26 a-year, with fodder for a cow. His brother and biographer was here his assistant ; and they lived alone in a cottage. The solitary situation was favourable to literary pursuits ; and Bethune never gave up the hope of being able to add to his resources by his pen, and thus increase the comforts of his parents in their declining years. This employment he lost after the first half-year, the estate having been sold ; and he was disappointed of obtaining a similar situation.

Among his projects, was writing lectures upon Practical Economy, which it was intended he and his brother should deliver in different towns and villages, selling the tickets for admission. The subject must have been a favourite one with a man who could live upon £7 a-year ; and we are rather surprised that the work was not more warmly patronised, as its objects are those which persons, who seldom limit their own expenses, always the most highly approve in the poor. In the instance of this publication, the authors—for it was a joint-concern of the brothers—were probably as anxious to reap the fruits of their labours as to qualify themselves for their task. Yet its early history is curious.

To their dismay, they found that neither themselves nor their few acquaintances had any books to which they could refer for information. They were not, however, to be deterred from what vanity prompted them to consider a useful undertaking, by difficulties ; and with no other guide than an article on " accumulation," in the Penny Cyclopædia, they commenced their task. Thus they had to grope their way at almost every step, like the inventor of an art ; and, with all their care, frequently got into errors, which had to be corrected afterwards. To those who are curious in literary matters, it may not perhaps be uninteresting to know, that these lectures were at first written upon brown paper bags ripped open, shreds of paper which had come to the house with tea, sugar, tobacco, &c. ; in short, everything which would carry ink ; while the writers had no better writing-desk than their knees. The whole of the writing, too, was performed with two quills, which were more than half cut down before they were applied to that purpose.
